Sigh… And there we go again, she's lost in her own world. I do appreciate her enthusiasm, but it is very concerning to see she's as absentminded as always.

"I was also wanting to go." Tamase nods, standing up from the bench. "There is so much left to read from the books… It is a bit frightening, to be honest."

"Damn right, those books are dummy thick."

"So, would you like to come as well, Ayamine?" She looks my way, her eyes almost closed, then she nods.

"Sure, you can't bitch at me in the library after all."

"Y-Y-You! Why do you have to-"

"Sakaki-san, please don't be angry! She's just joking!" Tamase waved her hands in front of me, putting herself between us. "Isn't that right, Ayamine-san?"

"Nope, being dead serious." Placing a hand on her waist, she gives me a side glance. Then, she smirks.

Tamase's eyes shoot wide open, seeming to be wordlessly screaming, as if her eyes were melting into an abstract form as she quivered.

"If you're just going to sass me then, do all of us a favor and don't join in the studying session."

"I'll stay quiet, won't let you get under my skin anymore."

"What?! You're the one who's always-"

"Sakaki-san, please!" Tamase again trying to put herself between us, a sigh escapes my lips as our eyes make contact, I then take a step back.

"Kei-san, you too. Please don't act like that, we're gonna end up thinking the wrong thing if you keep it up." Yoroi admonished her, sounding more concerned then upset. Ayamine sighed and gave a nod.

"I get it, I also wanna get better soon."

"Sigh… Good then. Mitsurugi, what about you?… Mitsurugi?"

She was already in her fatigues, had already put her suit in its place. Folding her arms, seeming to be groaning, she was leaning on the wall. If I recall correctly, she seemed to be bothered by her performance, according to Shirogane-kun, so she might be mulling over it now. I'm sure coming to redo the lessons will do her good to clear her mind. It is very odd for her to stay this quiet.

"Mitsurugi, are you listening?"

"… Hm? Oh, my apologies." Giving me a small bow, she softly let out a sigh before brushing some hair to a side. "What is it, Sakaki?"

… Did she not even register our argument? Mitsurugi would normally jump in to stop it, now that I think about it. How odd, she must be tormenting herself for some reason.

"We all were planning on going to the library to read up on the material we were given. Would you like to join in?"

"But of course I would. Are the rest ready?"

"… Yes, we were… debating just now on what to do."

"I see. My apologies, I was lost in thought."

"Meiya-san, are you feeling well? You look rather pale."

"I am well, thanks for asking. The training left me…" She looks up before closing her eyes, sending a hand to those odd shapes she forms atop her head. "… shocked, one could say. Pay me no mind, I am fine."

"Still, it wouldn't be good for you to force yourself if you're in need of rest." Yoroi didn't let the issue go, after all her medical knowledge is her best trait. "There is much to read, so an hour or so of sleep won't-"

"I said I am fine." Folding her arms, she leaves the wall. "I welcome the chance to clear my mind, so if everyone is in agreement, let us depart for the library."

"… I see. Sorry, didn't mean to… boss you around or anything." Yoroi looks down, playing with her belt.

"Then, should we be going, Sakaki?"

"… I suppose. Are we all ready?" All of them give a nod, and so we exit the changing room.

Shirogane-kun wasn't outside, so I suppose he must have been made to aid that Lieutenant from the Guard. Even Mitsurugi didn't seem pleased with the arrangement. I only hope he doesn't become sick by forcing himself in the trainings. There is little to be done if the Instructor decides to push him as she always did. Perhaps I could ask Mitsurugi to come along to speak with her if anything happens.

As we went our way through the hallways, going to the barracks to get our bearings for the study session, Yoroi and Tamase kept discussing what they thought about the simulation, with Ayamine's one liners popping up every now and then. Yet, I can't help but notice Mitsurugi is still out of it, walking as if merely following us on automatic, her attention locked on cloud nine.

"Mitsurugi, are you alright?"

"Eh? Oh, yes. Nothing's wrong, Sakaki."

"Then, why are you spacing out so much? It isn't like you."

"I'm just… pondering on my performance."

"Then, why not discuss it with us?"

"Because I haven't made up my mind about it. I do not wish to give an… emotional response, nor to downplay mine own lacking display." Looking away, her tone turning harsh, her eyes closed with much tension.

What on earth is she this upset about? She does take her training to heart, yet this is just the beginning. This isn't like her, at all.

"… I'd say that you shouldn't take this so hard, but after the CCSE I can understand your wish to excel again." She looks down, her hands going to her belt. "However, this is merely the beginning. Let's all throw in our grain of sand, and see how we proceed from then on."

"… Yes, you're right. My apologies, Sakaki."

"Please stop that, it's unlike you. Why are you this down about it? I don't remember you being like this over firearms practice." And you were awful at that. I still remember how bitter you looked, how you wouldn't even respond after you failed right at the start of the very first sniping run.

"I'm just…" And again, she looks away while sighing Mt. Fuji out of her. "Dejected at myself, one could say."

"Well, all of us are, in a way. Let's focus on what we can do for now, alright?" I don't know why she takes it so hard, but her own personal code must be at work. I'm no one to judge, so let's simply lend her a hand.

"Yes, I agree. However, I believe you performed better than myself. You didn't seem to be shaking as much, and were tied in second place with Ayamine from our original members."

… Precisely that's why I'm mad, but I won't let it show.

"Anyways, we all have our own issues with the training, so let's get the basics ironed out today." She then nods, making a small smile.

Rejoining the conversation, we all proceeded to discuss our opinions on the sims until we reached the barracks. The study session went well enough, since both me and Ayamine made an effort to be civil about it. Thanks to all that Shirogane-kun pointed out during the lecture we had earlier, we could arrange a proper reading order that allowed us to tackle almost one quarter of the book.

He was right in that there was no need to memorize everything in here. I do wonder why there is so much unrequired, dated knowledge on these books. Either the UN is handed second-hand equipment or there is a large delay between the shipping of the manuals and the time it takes to iron out new protocols and tactics. Perhaps, some higher-ups don't want to share the knowledge.

In any case, the first reading session ended well enough.

Then, since it was still early enough and we have the day free, I asked Mitsurugi if she felt well enough to give me some lessons on CQC, but Yoroi insisted that she looked off. Despite her initial complains, Mitsurugi apologized and said she would take an afternoon nap.

I only hope she doesn't take this failure too deeply. Knowing what duty lies on her shoulders, what expectations she has to satisfy given her face, even if I don't know her situation, it would be understandable for her to need some time to meditate on her own.

And so, I simply let everyone do as they pleased. Ayamine said she wanted some more reading, so she stayed behind in the library, while us three went back to the barracks, since Yoroi proposed us to play something to kill time.

At the very least, the squad is still functional. Once Ayamine clears her suspicions, we'll be able to focus on what's ahead working as a team. I only hope she learns to keep that attitude away from the sims.

… Sigh, now, it's only waiting to see how we fare from now on, and hoping Mitsurugi doesn't dwell too much on this.

"I cannot believe it…" Washing the foam that formed atop my head, enjoying the warm water running down my back, my lips refused to relax.

I wasn't allowed to visit his cell earlier, since he wasn't in it. Having just gone to ask yet again, it would seem Shirogane won't return to it until dinner has ended, and by then our curfew will be in effect.

Such a blunder on my part, I should have asked him to wait for me after the test. Then, we could have gone to deal with the matter of his sword. It will do him no good to delay it, and yet that discussion might have slipped his mind after all he had to go through. Not only that but, since I am still slightly doubtful towards him, I wish to be there in case Tsukuyomi decides to act out.

I know he told me not to speak of it, but if it is to shield him from further burdens I should tell Tsukuyomi of how he defended me. Perhaps Mion and Shion reported the matter already, but due to the smokescreen the UN is trying to erect, Tsukuyomi has been left in the dark.

"Yet, she also wasn't in her room." Moving my hands to my shoulders, in a futile attempt to imitate the detailed, almost dead-eye precision of his massage, I move my neck from one side to the other.

It is most odd for Tsukuyomi and the trio to not be present. Their presence wasn't around me when I trained, so something serious might have come up. It might only be her trying to pry for intel, in which case I should talk with her posthaste. Then again, she wasn't in her room, so all I can do is wait.

And yet… My hands stop, I close my eyes. As warm as the water on me, but as tender as the sheets are during winter. Just as kind as his massage was on the mountain, as careful as a mother laying down her children to sleep, such as that is the embrace I saw in the sim pod.

Why am I having such daydreams? I do admit… I see him in a new light now. However, in no way am I such a salacious person. This is… merely my hormones acting on their own. Indeed… that is the only logical explanation.

Furthermore… There is no way we would ever do something as shameful as… that in a sim pod. I would never give in to such ways, no matter how pleasant his massages might be.

"… No! His hands were not pleasant! Whatever am I saying?! Guh… Pah!" Some foam entered my mouth, now that taste just refused to leave it.

Uh… This is all his fault. How dare he to lay his hands on me in such a way.… I do appreciate his gentleness, but still, that was uncalled for. To even go as far as demand to call me by my name as well…

"It's a beautiful name, that's all. I just think it suits you well."

Ugh… No one had ever praised me in such a way. And he was being honest, as well.

" Your name is beautiful and it suits you, Meiya."

And it isn't as if I am ungrateful for what he did for me, or how he continued to aid us afterwards. Refusing to abandon Sakaki, and even facing off against Mion all on his own despite his exhaustion… I do see why he would have been given a Minaru Kamui. However…

" And since your name suits you, that means I think you're beauti-"

"No! He did not utter such words! Ugh… Bleargh." Great, now I ended up swallowing warm water.

Such blunder… Just what is wrong with me?! What is this feeling on my sides? Why do they tickle me so? Whatever spawns these thoughts on me?

It is true I haven't heard anyone compliment my person, aside from my performance in the trainings, in a very long time, and he did seem honest at the time… However, I am, in no possible way, so shallow as to simply lose myself over a single compliment.

Sigh… In any case, this is mine own folly. I should be grateful Takeru exposed this side of myself to me, it would be most shameful to display this out in the open. Next time I see you, I should thank you in some way. I wonder whatever could I do to aid you, Takeru…

"Hm? Did I… Ah!" I'm calling him by his name? Whatever is wrong with me?!

I think I… did try to do that a few times back during the test. Guh… How shameful of myself, to be so easily swayed. The heavens have blessed me, for the one who did so seems to be an honest fellow. Imagine what would befell me had I shown this pathetic side of myself to an untrustworthy person. I would only have given trouble to Tsukuyomi.

Shaking my head, finishing my shower, and drying myself up, I sit on my bed as I get changed.

Assuming our TSFs arrive tomorrow, I am sure Tak… Shirogane will be in our designated hangar by early morning. I can then ask him for a moment to go deliver the sword. Perhaps, I could try to see if Tsukuyomi is free after dinner. I know not what she is busy with, but a mere moment of talk shall suffice.

"Sigh… Still, I need to be careful. I never thought I would… be so careless."

Lucky I am to not have had her watching over my training, or I would have been found lacking any answer to justify my behavior. All that I went through in the CCSE, to now be held back by such a petty sinkhole…

"It's a beautiful name, that's all. I just think it suits you well."

Argh! Why did you have to say such a thing to me?! I mean, there is a point where baseless flattery becomes an insult. I do not believe he truly… thinks me beautiful. I am just… shocked. It has been a long time since I've been complimented. That is all there is to this.

Once dressed, I lay on my bed while resting both hands atop my stomach.

Still, I do wonder who he received his blade from. He was very passionate when speaking of it the day of the alarm… and even during our talks in the CCSE…

Someone who marked his life… Perhaps… Could he have been given that blade by whoever he had to mercy kill before? The way he spoke of that woman, especially when we talked by ourselves while Sakaki slept, was enough to see the wound in his heart. Was he… being courted by a fellow? Otherwise, I fail to see how he could have been handed the blade.

No… It matters not. Whoever was the one who gave him the sword, he seems honest enough and already agreed to return it. Yes, that is what matters most.

… However, it does make me wonder… The way he spoke of her, how he defended his sword before… and even the first time we dueled, how happy he was when he told me of the time he was soundly bested by someone far better than him…

"… Just who was that woman? What did she do to ignite such a fire in your eyes?"

Considering everything, she must have been one of our high fellows, to have been sent to Yukon. I wonder… what kind of fellow she was. She surely was mature enough to not let some prejudices blind her actions. To make someone as talented as Shirogane fall for her, who could she have been?

"Sigh… No, this isn't what I should be thinking about."

Standing up, running both hands over my trousers, I yet again sigh.

Remember all what you were taught about poise, remember what Grandfather said about keeping one's composure in front of vile compliments, and… remember what Tsukuyomi taught me since we first met.

Even if he was sincere, there is much separating us. And even if he does have a Minaru Kamui… I cannot expect him to remain being my fellow. After all… I am a shadow.

Remembering those days I was under Grandfather's care, and how it later became worse once I was assigned as Sister's body double, how 'freedom' was erased from my lexicon…

I was always alone. The heavens have blessed me with such caring squadmates, and for Ta… Shirogane to have given me a second chance despite my lackluster behavior. Now that I'm finally able to have some measure of freedom…

"Curiosity is not a sin, but you should be careful with it. Sometimes, the answers that you seek are not those you would be wishing to hear."

Therefore, if it does me no good to learn of who she was, I should not pursue the issue. I finally received my role and began my piloting training, this should be enough for someone like me. I will make Grandfather proud, so, focusing on my own endeavors is what I should be doing.

Exiting my room, I directed myself to the PX. Running into Tamase on the way, we went together the remaining distance, enjoying some simple chatter as we walked.

(Mitsurugi House.)

[Mana]

---

Grabbing the scarf I wear with a hand so that the gust does not take it from me, I await the moment to enter.

Then, the wooden gates are opened and I quickly walk into the grounds of the house, bowing to the attendant that opened the gate, and then quickly walking past the small garden set in the entrance and going towards the door, where I am welcomed by a maid in service of Raiden-sama. After the greeting, she moves aside and opens the door for me, so I then enter the Mitsurugi residence.

I have been made to wear a rather modest dress for the occasion and I have tied my hair in a single hairbun to travel here. Even if I have been ordered to move using the trains of the House, I must remain ever vigilant for this is a secret task given to me by Yohime-sama herself. My concerns over Maya's attitude should remain subdued until my return to the Koubuin House, for now I have only one task ahead of me.

I am guided to the living room by the maid. Raiden-sama was sitting there, waiting for me.

"Good afternoon, Raiden-sama." I give him a bow, then later I remain standing in attention.

"Welcome, Tsukuyomi. Please, sit down, let us enjoy some tea as we talk." Thanking him for his kindness, I sit in front of him, serving myself some tea. "Now, I am not wishing to sound ungrateful, however I believe I told Takahisa-sama I required no retainers." He folded his arms, sizing me up with his stare.

"I have been tasked with aiding you in Meiya-sama's teaching, and the order was issued to me by Yohime-sama. I will not be staying here, at the least not for now."

"I see. Then tell me, what have you been tasked to teach her?"

I proceeded to inform him of my orders, which encompassed many subjects and areas. From our history to how to conduct herself in the higher circles, from how to employ Shogi as a form of negotiation, to how she should carry herself in front of others. As well as all other lessons regarding her education, even if I'll be but an overseer for the time being.

"This does feel as if you were a retainer…"

"Yohime-sama was clear on her orders, however. I am not staying here, I shall be coming every odd day from now on."

"Haha, I understand Tsukuyomi. Now then, allow me to ask you a question."

He shifted in his seat, his coming gaze sent a shiver down my back. Sending the birds of caution away, the storm clouds in his stance were coming towards me.

"What do you think of Meiya?"

"What do I think? I do not have an opinion of her, I haven't met her yet."

"Answer me clearly, Tsukuyomi. What is Meiya to you?"

What has brought such hostility? This feels as if he were one of those specters in those tales, those guarding a princess. Raiden-sama narrowed his eyes filled with storm clouds, his words rumbling with thunders.

"She is another member of the Koubuin Family, regardless of her situation. I am but a servant, and she is someone I will guide and protect will all of my might if the need calls. What else could she be for me?" I also narrow my eyes at him, I know I am nothing but a fresh recruit yet I find his doubt insulting.

I only hold worry for Meiya-sama in my heart, as I do for Yuuhi-sama. They are one of the reasons I am who I am, and I desire nothing short of being by their side to aid them in what I can, in what they might need from me.

Even if I also would like to bestow them kindness, I know such closeness could backfire. Sigh… I can still show them what affection means through other ways. Using my cooking, for example.

Raiden-sama remained staring at me silently for some seconds, grasping his beard as he did. I couldn't help but to gulp under his stare, clenching my fists and bringing my legs closer. It feels as if someone were passing a feather just over the nape of my neck right now, trying to force me to make a miss.

"I see, so that's how you think." He relaxed his posture, I had to hold a sigh as he did. "Well, do forgive the inquiry. Meiya should be done with her math lessons, were you wishing to see her now?"

"Yes, if you so allow."

He stood up and I followed, however he went towards a set of stairs on a corner of the house. Those stairs descended for some reason.

"Raiden-sama, where are we going?"

"To see Meiya, of course."

"Forgive me for asking but… Is she being kept on the basement?"

"Yes, that is the case. The traditions so demand. It is sad, but she spends most of her time there." He says, a tint of grief apparent in his squinting eyes.

The weight of his words on him was as obvious as the dissonance of the grand steel door we found at the end of the stairs with the rest of the house. It resembles those founds in prisons, made entirely out of steel with a small rectangular area to see further into the room. As if this were the entrance to a dungeon were criminals are kept in, as if something monstrous was on the other side and that required such a door to be framed into the wall in such a way.

As he opens it and enters, I also follow behind. A rather well decorated living room came into view, in extravagant blue as I was told Raiden-sama likes, an elderly man was sitting by a little girl's side pointing to her book in the other end of the place.

The girl looked at us, her eyes widening as we made eye contact. Wearing a black sweater and a long, frilly blue skirt with lines of black and white, Meiya-sama had her hair done in a similar ponytail to the one Yuuhi-sama uses.

"I believe it has been enough for today. You might retire." Raiden-sama said, the old man bowed to him and said his parting words, reminding Meiya-sama to follow with the contents of her book.

The man gave us another bow as he approached us and then exited the room. The little girl came to Raiden-sama's side, but unlike Yuuhi-sama, she had no smile in her complexion. She bowed to us, hands joined by her stomach.

"Good afternoon, Grandfather."

"Oh, Meiya-tan! How were your lessons?"

Huh?

Raiden-sama's eyes reflected a clear sky as he hugged Meiya-sama and lifted her off the ground. What does the -tan mean, however?

"I have been fine, Grandfather." The girl returned the hug, smiling faintly. "However, who is this teacher?" She said as she looked at me.

"Good afternoon, Meiya-sama. My name is Mana Tsukuyomi and I shall be looking after your learning efforts from now on."

Raiden-sama brought her back to the ground. Meiya-sama got closer and gave me a bow.

"Thank you kindly for your help, Tsukuyomi-sensei. I shall do my best to answer to your teachings."

"No, Tsukuyomi shall suffice Meiya-sama."

"Eh? No, you are my teacher. I have to show you respect." She said, the firm resolution of Takahisa-sama in her words, the same way to look straight, deeply into my eyes as Yohime-sama.

"I… Ahem, Meiya-sama please think of me as your vassal. I would prefer you referring to me as Tsukuyomi."

Meiya-sama gave a glance at Raiden-sama, curving her brows as her hands shifted together. He nodded at her and she relaxed her posture.

"I will call you Tsukuyomi then. Thank you kindly for your help."

"Please, you don't have to bow to me. It is alright, Meiya-sama." She again seemed to be uncomfortable at my words, a hand slowly rising to her chin.

"Well, I will leave Meiya in your hands. I expect you to handle her with care, Tsukuyomi." I gave a nod to Raiden-sama and he went his way out of the room, closing the door once he did.

"Alright, let's start. Meiya-sama, what do you say of having a few Shogi matches?"

"Yes, as you say Tsukuyomi." A few pebbles leaned on my back at her words. The contrast with Yuuhi-sama is subtle but evident. Meiya-sama lacks that sunshine in her eyes, as if she were minding her words to not upset me. As if… she were afraid of something.

We went towards the table that was already prepared and we then spared against each other. She is very good for her age, but I suppose she has been trained in case she was ever required to be a body double for Yuuhi-sama all her life.

We spent the afternoon together seeing how good she was at what she had learned, with the passing of time she slowly relaxed a bit more. Her speech mannerisms are very good and formal, though she seems to use a rather frontal approach when using her own voice. She is even more formal whenever she speaks in 'the proper' voice, as she called it.

Meiya-sama is far ahead from both Mion and Shion in her math and history lessons, and her thought logic and ability to make arguments is astounding for her age. She… does seem to be a tad bit too stubborn when she likes an idea however, just like her father. It is truly nice to see her show emotion as she pouts when I prove her wrong as we debate over the smallest of details.

To think there are people who only see her as a political tool, as nothing but an expendable body double to shield Yuuhi-sama. I will do my best effort to aid her, Takahisa-sama, Yohime-sama. Not just as a teacher, but as a counselor and confidant.

"Well, this was enough for today. Why don't we take a small break?" A few hours have already passed, after all.

"We can still practice. There are some books we didn't see yet." She says, leaning forward. She does not like to lose a discussion, apparently.

"It is alright, Meiya-sama. Let us spend some time simply talking to our leisure, what do you say?"

"… Yes, as you say Tsukuyomi." She again bowed to me, stiffness overflowing. Sigh… I suppose it'll take time for me to be anything other than another teacher for her.

I went to the small fridge that was in a corner, found some fruits, and after peeling and cutting them I returned to her side. Bringing them to the table on a wide dish, Meiya-sama sat in front of me and ate slowly.

"You won't eat, Tsukuyomi?"

"I will, but it is only natural to allow you to pick your food first. I am your vassal after all."

"But you're also my teacher. Please, let's eat together." She pushed the plate towards me, furrowing her brows.

"If you insist, so I shall do." I picked some slices of apple, she seemed to prefer strawberries. "Meiya-sama, if I may ask, have you been taught how to wield a blade?"

"Yes, Grandfather has taught me how to use the Mugen Kidou style. I practice every day after my afternoon classes are over."

"I see. What do you say of sparing against me today before I leave?"

"Yes, as you say."

"No, Meiya-sama I am your vassal. Do not be so formal with me."

"Eh? Is it truly alright? My teachers have taught me to always be polite. They said it is rude to refer to your elders in any other way." She said, her eyes cascading downwards.

"It is true that you should abstain from such behavior, but I am your vassal. You do not need to be so stiff with me."

"But… If you say so, Tsukuyomi." Yet more rocks stockpile on my shoulders at her answer.

I guess she won't understand she doesn't need to be this formal to me in a day. Well, it is a matter of time. She'll get used to me eventually.

"Then, shall we go practice your swordplay?" She nods and stands up. I do so too, but I halt my movement as I realize the door is closed and, at first glance, it seems we cannot open it from the inside. "Meiya-sama, how do we contact Raiden-sama from here?"

"Oh, there's a button nearby to call Grandfather." She goes to the wall and points to a painting. "It's behind this, he told me to use it if I needed him to come for anything." She then steps aside, letting me get close to the painting in question.

I move the frame and see a small button built into the wall. After I push it, however, a rumbling similar to that of a stampede could be heard from up above. As if glasses and plates were thrown to the ground and shattered, as if the furniture was being moved violently, as if someone was hurling rocks at the wall, the sounds reiterated themselves for some seconds. Soon, I could hear the steel door being rammed by something. And the sound reiterated itself, this time with more violence in its echo.

I stood in front of Meiya-sama instinctively, yet as the door was swung wide open, Raiden-sama was the one who entered the room…. Why are his eyes furrowed in such way?

"Meiya-tan! What happened?!" Before I could blink, he was already behind me. Crouching by Meiya-sama's side, he ran his hands over her body to see what was of her.

"Tsukuyomi said she wanted us to practice swordplay. So I called you." Meiya-sama was unfazed by all this, however.

"Oh, is that so? I forgot to leave her a communicator, now that I think about it."

"Um… Raiden-sama, what was that noise just now?"

"What noise?!" He stood up sharply and looked around with hawkish eyes, placing a hand on the katana he had on his waist.

"No, I was talking about the noises after I pressed the button."

"Oh, that was me. I feared something might have happened to Meiya-tan, so I hurried to her side." He says, puffing his chest.

"I believe I heard some plates breaking, however."

"Don't worry, we can always buy more of those."

"However, how-"

"Now, I believe you wanted to go to the small dojo we have on the house?" Just like Takahisa-sama, he just won't allow anyone to pierce his speeches.

"… Yes, sir. That is the case."

"Well then, let us go. I believe I should have some gear you can wear to spar against Meiya. But of course, you will be careful with her, won't you Tsukuyomi?" Again, his eyes took a hawkish tint. I stand in attention by reflex, nodding at his words. "Good. Now, let us be on our way."

As we returned to the surface, I saw three maids sighing as they tried to fix what little was left of the living room.

Going out to the garden, we went to a small building to a side. The dojo wasn't as big as I assumed it would be, but it was enough. Raiden-sama gestured to a side, towards the changing room. After changing into the traditional protective gear, not the new one I have become used to in my training on the Guard, me and Meiya-sama each grabbed a wooden sword. Taking our positions, she took the Mugen Kidou stance while I chose to take Waki.

She makes the first move, a frontal slash. I parry and pressure her with few but precise attacks. Unlike Maya, I vastly prefer to take a more reactive approach and capitalize on the mistakes my opponent makes. After all, the one who shows the first signs loses. Prediction is half a fight.

She tries to aim to my lower left, I allow her to pressure me for a moment. Deflecting her attacks with ease, I shift my footing. Moving forward with my left I send few, but strong attacks at her. Aiming upwards, I keep pressuring her. Once I realized it was impossible for her to counter me at this speed, I arched my knees and went for the final blow. I pushed forward one last time and delivered a downwards slash, that she barely managed to parry. She took a step back and tried to block the follow up, but the force of the strike made her slip backwards. Falling to the ground, Meiya-sama didn't let go of her blade however. I halt my movements, letting out a sigh.

"Well, this is my victory. Well done, Meiya-sama." I help her up and we then bow to each other.

"That was a spectacular bout, Tsukuyomi. As expected of someone of your family." Raiden-sama praised me, clapping a few times as he got closer. "Meiya, what did you think?"

"It was a good duel." Some stiffness resided in her voice, it seems she is upset to have lost. "Tsukuyomi, would you practice with me again sometime?"

"Why, of course. I have been assigned to aid you, so if you so desire I can spar with you any time, Meiya-sama." And for the first time in today, she smiled at me.

It wasn't Yuuhi-sama's wide, radiant smile. It was a smaller, but in a certain way stronger, smile. The sun will always shine bright no matter which day it is, however that is not the same for the night. That is why the landscape one can see during a full moon night is a sight to behold.

"Thank you very much, Tsukuyomi. I shall do my best to improve." I nod at her. She's still being too formal, but there will be time to fix that.

After going back to our attires and going out of the dojo, the sky had darkened already. We went our way to the basement again as Raiden-sama asked Meiya what she thought of my lessons, to which she answered she was pleased and she found all of them helpful.

"It is good to hear you two got along well, Meiya." Raiden-sama patted her head as he walked. "Now, let us enjoy dinner together."

"Raiden-sama, a moment." One of the women serving as maids got closer to us as we had reached the stairs to descend. "You have a call. Please come answer it."

"Tell whoever it is I'll answer later."

"Sir, it is about some of the repairs needed for the house. The call cannot be delayed." The woman insisted, one of Raiden-sama's brows twitched.

"Mmgh… Tell them I'm on the bathtub. I am going to have dinner with Meiya now. So Kamiyo, please relay the message to-"

Then, the two other maids appeared and, all three together, dragged Raiden-sama to the opposite direction.

"Tsukuyomi-sama, please take Meiya-sama to her room. We shall be taking dinner to you shortly." One with blonde hair said to me, throwing a key my way. She then locked her arms around Raiden-sama's right arm.

"Ah, yes…" What is wrong in this household?

"Release me! I am your boss… Let me have dinner with Meiya-tan!" Raiden-sama kept wailing as he was dragged away.

"Meiya-sama, is this normal?"

"Normal? What do you mean?"

"Does this happen frequently?"

"Yes, Grandfather sometimes has to answer important calls. When that happens and he doesn't want to, the three maids come and take away him like this. Grandfather is very strong, so they have no other choice." So this is normal to her… I guess it only shows how dear you are to Raiden-sama.

"Well, let us go back to your room."

"… Yes." She grabbed onto my arm as we descended the stairs.

After entering the room, it only took a few minutes for the food to be brought to us. I asked Meiya-sama about her kendo lessons as we ate, it seems she isn't as far ahead from the two little ones as I thought. Lacking a sparring partner who matches her skill is what's holding her back the most in my opinion.

Once we finished dinner, I began to gather my bearings to leave for the Main House again. As I was putting what few things I had brought with me back into my bag, she approached me, hesitating in the last steps.

"When are you coming back, Tsukuyomi?" Her hands joined and hanging low, she directed a gaze my way.

"I will be back every two days. Please do keep studying as you have been."

"Yes, I will. Um… Can I ask you something?" She came closer, looking from the ground to me a few times, her hands shifting together in their hold.

"Of course, what is it?"

"Can you tell me… how it is to be outside?"

"… It isn't that different. I also stay indoors most of the time."

"I see. Do you go somewhere you like sometimes?"

"Yes, I go buy books from time to time. While I also used to have free time of my own, I mostly spent it studying inside or practicing Kendo with my cousin and the others in the dojo I went to."

"How is it? Walking outside?" Her eyes staring right into mine, her lips trembled like a boat's rippling waves.

"It is nice, feeling the wind on your face. Have you been shown pictures of the Empire, Meiya-sama?"

"Yes, of parks, the castles, the shores. There is something I do not understand about them." She folded her arms, looking down.

"What is it?"

"Why do people like to go to the beach so much?"

"Well, many do like the sea. I believe you were shown what it looks like, what do you think of it?"

"I think it's pretty, but isn't the sand bothersome?" She tilted her head, bringing her hands together once more.

"Not particularly. I have only gone a few times, but it isn't bothersome by any means."

"But Grandfather told me it gets stuck to your skin, gets inside your clothes, and it also can dirty your hair and ruin your hairstyle. And it can burn your feet when you walk too." Plucking her lips, she counted on her hand the 'bad things' as she said them. I had to make an effort to not giggle at her pouty expression as she did so.

"While that is true, one only needs to be careful. Sand isn't as foul a trouble as you described, Meiya-sama." I say, smiling at her innocent stare.

"I see. Then, what about forests? I was told you can hear the animals at night. How is that?"

Meiya-sama kept asking me about how it was to be outside, how it was to walk in a park, to be in a meeting, how was the city when the people were moving around. Despite being taught about the world, she wasn't allowed to be in it. So, all she can do is fill the gaps by herself.

And in her current position, I doubt she will ever be able to enjoy such freedoms. Even Yuuhi-sama accompanies her parents on their travels sometimes, however Meiya-sama has been forced to live inside these walls forevermore. I wonder if I could bring her some books to help bridge the gaps under the guise of giving her context for her role as a political piece.

"Well, it is time for me to leave. Until next time, Meiya-sama."

"Ah… Wait, Tsukuyomi." She held my arm with her tiny hands as I stood up from my seat. "May I ask you one last question?"

"Yes, of course you can. What is it?"

"Um… What kind of person is… that Yuuhi?"

My hands halted all movement at her question. I have been forbidden of speaking of the matter, but she shouldn't know anything about her family. She should have never heard the Koubuin name, she should never have had any contact with radios or televisions… The rocks that were on my shoulders forced themselves down my throat as she stared at me with those clearly innocent eyes, clutching my arm.

"… Who is this Yuuhi you speak of?"

"I once overheard one of my teachers saying I wasn't acting like her as good as I should. Then, when I asked her about it, the teacher said I heard that wrong." Looking away from me, her gaze descends as do her eyelids, as if submerged under a frozen lake. Her hands release me and get together, folding tightly. "I never saw her again after that day, and everyone else I ask says they don't know anything." Then she looks up at me, her tiny lips shifting and twisting. "Tsukuyomi, do you also not know anything?"

… I could lie. That would be easy. However, what could I tell her? She's far too young, she wouldn't understand. But… Looking at her now… Forgive me, Father. As a member of the Tsukuyomi… No, I won't shield myself behind my family. I cannot lie to her. I do not wish to blatantly lie even if telling her the truth is beyond of my options.

"Meiya-sama, you are someone very special." I crouch and caress her hair.

"Special?"

"Yes, you are the only one who can help this Yuuhi."

"Help? Then, will I meet her one day? Will I go outside?" She got closer, expectation brimming in her trembling hands. She seemed to be holding her breath, waiting for my answer.

"… One day you might. However, you need to be away from her for now."

"Why?"

"Because you need to get stronger. You are to protect Yuuhi from the shadows, just like your name implies."

"My name? I have to be in Yuuhi's shadow?" She tilted her head, her brows lowering slightly. I pat her head softly, ruffling her fringe.

"Yes, that is the case. One day you will be old enough to learn everything. Until then, you have to keep honing yourself. Your efforts will never betray you."

"But will I go outside someday?"

"… If you're strong enough to help Yuuhi, you may. She is also alone, so I hope… you two can be good fellows whenever you meet."

"I see… I got it, I have to keep doing my best. And then, I'll be able to go outside and help like Grandfather does." She said, nodding a few times.

"Yes, but keep this a secret. Can you promise me that?"

"But… But why can't I know?"

"You see Meiya-sama… Curiosity is not a sin but you should be careful with it."

"Careful?"

"Yes, sometimes… it is better to wait to receive an answer than to purse it hastily. Be patient, the time will come. Can you promise me you'll be patient, Meiya-sama?" She nods, her brows narrowing.

"Yes, I promise. I won't say anything and I won't ask anymore. Thanks Tsukuyomi, now I know what that weird feeling was." She smiled again, her shoulders dropping in relaxation.

"Weird feeling?"

"Yes, ever since I heard that name I've been feeling weird from time to time. Like when I try to open a jar of jelly but it won't no matter how hard I pull at it, or when I can't solve my calculus and my head starts to hurt. I don't know why, but I feel that kind of way when I think of that name."

So she's… worried about her sister? I have heard twins are somehow connected. Despite never having met, she can still feel the absence of Yuuhi-sama by her side. Or perhaps… Does she resent her?

"Do you… dislike that feeling?" She closed her eyes, narrowing her brows a bit.

"No, I do not. I don't know but I feel… lonely." Her gaze lowers like an anchor, her hands again rustling together slowly. "I never felt that way before. Being with Grandfather was always so much fun, and the maids also keep me company too. But…" She stops and looks up again, returning to her neutral expression. "But since I heard that name, for some reason, I feel lonely. I don't know who she is but I want to meet that person called Yuuhi." I found no hidden feelings in her. She's as earnest as she could be, children cannot lie and when they do they cannot hide it.

Meiya-sama doesn't hold any ill will towards Yuuhi-sama. It looks like you are wrong after all, Father. Meiya-sama will never put her sister in any danger, her heart is in the right place.

"I see. I can't promise you anything regarding that, but at the least I can guarantee you that, in due time, you will know all about why you're here. Please be patient, Meiya-sama."

"Yes, I will. Thank you, Tsukuyomi." She smiled again, this time her smile was wider and truly shining.

"Good. Well then, I have to be going. Until next time, Meiya-sama." She nodded, and I smiled her way before bowing, then going my way.

Introductions of the Masquerade

Chapter 31 : Introductions of the Masquerade

December 16th, 1988. Near 7 PM.

(Takeru's House.)

[Native Takeru]

---

After helping by placing the chairs in order, I look and see the oven is still turned on. Mom still hasn't taken the cake out of the fridge. Walking into the kitchen, I pull her dress a bit.

"Mom, is the cake ready yet?"

"Takeru, you've been asking for a while now. The answer won't change in a few minutes." She sighed, looking over what she was making in a pot.

"But is it going to take much longer?"

"Takeru, let Mom cook in peace." Dad closer and grabbed me, lifting me off the ground. "Let's go watch TV for a while, what do you say?"

"Yeah." We go back to the table, Dad leaves me on a chair and sits by my side.

It's so good that he came back like he promised. He hasn't told me anything of what he does with the samurai rangers, but he seems really, really tired. So, let's have a lot of fun today, so that he can rest well. He's gonna leave again on Sunday… But he'll come back another day!

Everything is already tidied up on the table, so we're just waiting until Mom is done. They're even letting me watch TV manga now, instead of them putting on the news as always during dinner.

Ding!

Hm? Oh, maybe Sumika is coming?

"Takeru, you stay here. I'll go see who is it." Patting my head as he stood up, he started to go to the door.

"Eh? I'm going too!" Leaving the chair, I follow behind.

"No, it's too cold outside. And you're not wearing a scarf."

"You're not wearing one either." I puff my cheeks, Dad's brows got together as his mouth moved a bit.

"Well, but I'm big so I can take it. You're still small, so stay here. I'll be right back." And there he goes.

What's up with that? I'm already six! I can tie my own shoes by myself! I'm not so little anymore.

Once he opens the door, I hear two familiar voices, and then both of them came to the living room, dressed up with coats.

"Oh, Takeru-chan! How are you?" Haruna-san came in with Sumika, both wearing yellow scarfs. "Is the cake ready?"

"… Not yet."

"Hahaha, how cute you look when you pout." She patted my head, smiling. "Sumika, don't you have anything to say?"

I looked at Sumika, who was kind of nervously coming towards me. With her hands hidden behind her back and her eyes glued to the ground, she slowly walked, like a turtle. She's usually reserved, but she had started to smile more often…

"Takeru-chan… Here, happy birthday." Eyes still down, she handed me a small box wrapped in red and blue.

"Thanks a lot, Sumika!" I give her a hug, and she made a cute noise when I did. "Really, thanks a lot for coming."

"I live next door… There's no way I wouldn't come." She said once I released her.

… Some of my other classmates also lived near and they never came to visit me for my birthday, or invited me to theirs.

"Well, let's see what it is." I slowly untie the knot on the package, and rip the paper once I did. "Oh! A spinning top! I never had one of these!"

"… That's good." Dad crouched and looked at the toy. "It looks to be made of good wood, too. It wasn't too expensive, right?"

"A present's price must never be disclosed." Haruna-san said, placing a finger atop her lips.

"Thanks a lot, Haruna-san, Sumika."

"No, it was nothing. Sumika was the one chose it for you." She then smiles, pushing Sumika's back. I look at her, she quickly looked to the ground again.

"No… I just thought it looked nice…" She said, rubbing her hands together.

"Thanks a lot, Sumika. Let's see how it spins."

As Haruna-san and Dad sat down and started talking, me and Sumika tried to see who could make spin the top for the longest time for a while.

"Takeru, come here." Dad called me, so we stood up and went to his side.

"What's up, Dad?"

"Let's go wash your hands, you still have to open your other presents."

"Oh, yeah."

After washing our hands and going back to the table, I saw a box on top of it.

"Happy birthday, Takeru. This is from Koetsu and Kobayashi."

"Really?! But… Are they busy?" I haven't seen them in a long time, since we moved here actually.

"Yeah… They're really busy in their office." Dad's eyes grew smaller as he patted my head.

"Can we call them to say hi?"

"I'll send him your thanks, Takeru. Koetsu is really, really busy. He's doing all kinds of calculus with very complex math." He said in a scary tone, raising a finger upwards.

"Eh… Why is everything about math and numbers?"

"Hahaha… You'll understand when you grow up. Now, open your presents." He gives me a pat in the back towards the table.

There was a smaller one wrapped all in white and another bigger in green and white. The smaller one was from Mami-san… And there's a letter in it.

" Greeting, Takeru-kun.

I suppose I should also say happy birthday, since I hope this letter reaches you by then. I hope you're well and in good health.

While I have been mulling on what book recommend to you, the notice of your coming birthday gave me a good reason to hasten my search for a suitable one for your tastes."

She also writes as weird as she talks.

" Remembering our talk about Mayal's Gift, I thought it proper to bestow you a book that might help you in learning to read in between the lines. A book is more than what you might think of it at first, after all."

"Dad, what does… 'bestow' means?"

"It means giving someone something."

"Why didn't she use giving instead, then?"

"It's… Sigh, it's a manner of speech Takeru." I don't get it.

"And what of this in between the lines? There's only spaces between them."

"No, it's not literally Takeru." Dad pats my head, sitting by my side. "It means you can arrange words to mean more than one thing at a time."

"So… Oh, is that like what the teacher said of that tale?"

"What tale?" Sumika asked.

"You know… The one where the princess goes to the moon… What was its name?"

"Kaguya, was it?" Sumika says, tilting her head with a finger in one of her cheeks.

"Yeah, that one. I thought that she abandoned his love, but the teacher said she left him that weird drink so that he would live long enough to meet her again, but he didn't get her message. Does that mean reading in between the lines, Dad?"

"Yeah, that is it. You can be really sharp when you want to, Takeru." He seems happy that I understood it.

Adults are so weird and complicated… Why can't they just say what they mean openly? I again look at the letter, with Dad by my side in case more weird words are in it.

" That is why I chose a book about poetry. It is not as long or detailed as I would have liked, but I do recall you disliking long reads. It has many simple phrases found in our literature as well as explanations on their meanings, and some simple Haiku poems as well. I believe it fitting for your age, and a good first step if you find yourself liking poetry.

I believe you'll find it interesting, but regardless of your opinion of it, I shall be looking forward to hearing your thoughts on it at a later date. Please, do be as detailed as you wish in your reply."

Poetry? I never really read any before… This should be fun though!

" I shall be awaiting your answer and book recommendation. You can only send me it's name. I shall look for a copy of it in my free time.

I hope your evening can be a pleasant one. We might not be able to see each other for a long time, but I will be looking forward to these exchanges.

See you later.

Mami Kobayashi."

"She writes with a lot of hard words…"

"… Did you like the present, Takeru?" Dad asked kinda in a low voice.

"Yeah, it's gonna be fun reading something new! But it's hard to understand her letter sometimes…"

"Haha, you'll get used to it with time. Now, here's mine and Koetsu's present."

In the other box… It's really heavy. Tearing the paper off it, there was a big, long box under it. I slowly push the lid off it.

"Is this… Oh, a sword!" I took it out slowly… A long, wooden sword! "Is this for me, Dad? Can I really have it?"

"Yeah, you told me you wanted to have one. But, promise me you'll be careful with it. If you're good, we'll take you to learn how to use it on Summer."

"Really?!"

"Yeah… But! You have to be careful with it. No taking it out of the house and no using it inside. Do you promise you'll be careful with it? You won't give Mom any problems?"

"I won't! I won't! So, you'll take me to learn to use it? Will I go with the samurai rangers then?"

"Well… You'll need to be really really good with a sword before the samurai even think of recruiting you. Only those who are really good with a sword can be a samurai, after all."

"Uuh… Then I'll practice! I'll get really good and then I'll go fight with you!"

"Thanks Takeru… But don't worry, we'll beat the bad guys before you have to fight." He patted my head, this time more slowly. "So, what do you say of reading that book? Sumika, wanna read it too?"

"Yes, it sounds fun!"

Dad took me to my room to put the sword somewhere safe behind my closet. Then, we went back down and sat in the couch with Sumika. Then he read us the book.

Some things are really weird… But they're also really fun. I never thought stuff could be explained in this way with only three sentences.

After a short while, Mom called us to the table and we all started eating together, sharing jokes and complimenting Mom's food.

It's sad Uncle Koetsu couldn't made it… But I'll send him and Mami-san a letter and some cake later. The book was really fun, even if it also had weird words sometimes.

Sumika and Haruna-san said their goodbyes after a while, since it was getting late even if it's Friday.

"Takeru, let's go to sleep." Mom grabbed my hand, but I released myself and went towards Dad.

"Dad… Thanks for coming." I give him a hug, really tightly. Sometimes, he couldn't come for my birthday before, but he made time to come home for the weekend. "I'll send you a nice present in your birthday."

"Thanks a lot, Takeru." He also hugs me tightly. "Today was fun?"

"Yeah! It was the best birthday ever!"

"I see… That's good." He ruffles my hair, then gives me a kiss on the forehead. "Let's read some more books tomorrow. So, you gotta wake up early."

"… I'll try." I look away. I hate waking up early… But Dad is here, so I'll do it.

"Haha… Well, come on. Mom is waiting." He takes me to the stairs, and then me and Mom go to my room.

After getting in my pajamas, Mom closed my window so that I wouldn't stay up late talking with Sumika.

"Thanks for the cake, Mom. It was really tasty!" I say after I get under the sheets.

"Hehe, that's good to hear. Are you happy with your presents?"

"Yes, but I'm more happy that Dad is here today. We should have moved here faster. It's much more fun to be here." I say, rustling to a side. Even if Jouji is really noisy, the people here are more funny.

I still don't like some of the teachers, and some guys in our classes are really mean too. But Hiiragi is much, much more nice than Yao and Osaka.

"… Yes, we should have. Now, I'll turn off the lights." She said, standing up.

"Eh? You won't read me a book?" I say, pouting.

"You still want a book before going to bed? Didn't you say before you were a big boy already?" She smiles, playing with her hair.

"It's my birthday today."

"Haha… I can't argue with that." She gently and slowly caressed my cheek, her smile getting bigger. "So, what should we read tonight?"

And, as usual, Mom read me something until I nodded off.

January 8 th , 1989. Around 4 PM.

(Takeru's House. Backyard.)

"See? It's not that hard." I say, stopping the beanbags I was juggling.

"But I can never do it right." Sumika puffed her cheeks as much as she could.

"Hehe, then you just gotta practice." I hand her the two bags and she starts juggling them.

She made it to twelve before one fell off. She started pouting again.

"It's too hard!" She moved her hands around, her hair swaying as she did.

"Does that mean that you give up on the candies?"

"Ah… Don't be mean, Takeru-chan. I can't do it."

"Yes, you can. You just gotta do it!"

"But I failed to get to twenty."

"Then you try again. Don't you always tell me that every time you help me with my math homework?"

"Takeru-chan, this is different." One lone hair of hers tumbled down, all swirly. Her eyes dropped to the ground, looking like a stray puppy.

"Come on, Sumika. Let's try again one more time. Or I eat all the candies." I smile at her, she taps the tips of her fingers for a while and then nods.

I show her again how to do it and again she tries. This time she made it to fifteen.

"See? You just gotta try harder."

"But I still didn't made it to twenty."

"A small pebble will eventually cause a rock slide with enough impulse down a hill." I say, puffing my chest.

"There you go again, with those weird phrases…" Sumika plucked her lips, narrowing her eyes at me.

"What? It's true, it's called snowda… snowballing. Things growing bigger suddenly or something."

"You're reading that book too much. You're speaking really weird now, Takeru-chan." She pouted at me, her voice raising in complain.

"No, I'm not. So, let's try again!"

We stayed outside playing for a while, with Sumika complaining she couldn't so it every time she failed. It started to get really cold, but Mom didn't come to tell us to go inside. And that's weird.

"Takeru-chan, let's go back inside. I'm cold…"

"Yeah… Let's go read a book or something. Did our moms went to buy something?"

"No… My Mom was back home cleaning."

Hmm… How weird, they never let us play outside by ourselves for so long. We went back inside, but it was all quiet. The lights weren't on yet. So maybe they did went to buy stuff?

… I can't reach the switch so I can't turn on the lights. Some light still comes from the windows, but it's really dark. I didn't knew… the house could be this scary with the lights out.

The TV and the radio aren't on, the keys are up there where they always leave them. What's going on here?

"Mom? Are you there?"

No answer.

"Maybe they went somewhere?" Sumika said, walking closely behind me.

"Hmm… But they would have called us. They never leave us alone in the house." It's weird. Something's weird here.

We slowly walked towards the table, but there was no one in the kitchen or the living room… Hm?

… On the floor, just in the corner where the small division to the kitchen starts…

There was a pot, just lying there. That's weird, Mom never let's stuff on the floor. And why are the lights out?

As I got close to the fallen pot, I could see something else on the floor near it. A hand. Sumika tightened her grasp on my back, gasping as she saw it.

"W-Who's there?"

I slowly made my way there, dragging my feet and Sumika along.

There were no sounds in the house, save for the tickling of the clock, the sound of the fire of the kitchen being on.

I gulped, closing my eyes really tightly, taking the last steps towards the kitchen.

Grabbing the edges of the small wall and peeking into the kitchen, with Sumika grabbing my arm from behind me, I saw someone… sleeping on the floor.

"… Mom? What are you doing?"

Mom was just there, face down on the floor. She had left the fire on.

"Mom, why are you sleeping on the floor?" I crouched and shook her shoulders. She didn't react.

On the inside of the house, it was really warm. Outside was where it was cold. And yet… And yet… Mom feels really cold right now.

"Mom! Wake up! You can't sleep there!" I keep shaking her, grabbing her strongly, but she still doesn't wake up. Why? Why won't she wake up?

"… Takeru-chan." Sumika pulled my shoulder. "Let's go call my Mom."

"Why? Mom… Mom is just sleeping. Nothing's wrong!" She said she wasn't sick anymore! Nothing is wrong!

"Ah… S-Sorry…" She took a few steps back, looking like she was about to cry.

"Sorry Sumika… Um… So…" I gulp, my feet feel heavy all of a sudden. I can feel my heart in my neck, beating really strongly. "Let's… Let's call Haruna-san. She might know how to wake up Mom."

I grab Sumika's had and dash out of the house. Because Mom… must be tired.

Haruna-san must know what's wrong, how to wake her up. Because nothing is wrong.

Because Mom isn't sick anymore, and… and she will wake up, and she won't have to go to the hospital again… Nothing bad is going on… Nothing bad will happen again .

November 25 th , 2001 . 06 :03 AM.

(Detention Barracks. Takeru's Cell.)

[Takeru]

---

Ugh… Rolling to a side, I feel a pair of hands on me.

Slowly, they begin to shake me. And they don't stop.

Opening my mouth wide to yawn, exhaling all this awful feeling away, I open my eyes.

"… Hey, Kasumi."

"Good morning."

"Yeah, good… Yaaaawn." Rubbing my eyes, I sit down. Then, I yawn again, as if I were screaming something caught on my throat.

"Are you feeling fine?"

"Yeah… I just had another nightmare and my head hurts a bit." Lately, I can't remember what I dream about, but damn, it makes me feel like shit.

My back swaying down, I could just stay on the bed for another hour. Covering my mouth as I yawn again, hunching forward, my eyes feel heavy all of a sudden.

A day full of working for Takamura, no lunch for me, still don't know how the Guard took the business of my blade. Seeing that memory of this world's me… only made me feel more lonely.

Family. As much as I miss them, my parents are gone. Can't turn to my squadmates as I did when I could rely on them, if they smacked me last loop, saying I shouldn't burden them with my own emotional shit, I don't wanna know what they'd say here if I tried.

Yawning again, I know I gotta get out of the bed. I'll end up looking at the ceiling for hours on end like I used to do back home after the power plant blew up… But why do I feel so heavy?

At least they're willing to do peace with me. That… should be enough. And Sensei will help me, so long as I help her. I always knew she wasn't the Yuuko I fell in love with… I know that already…

Giving in, I flop back onto the bed, yawning yet again. Legs feel asleep, like when I was sitting for a lot of time while studying for a final. Shoulders feel heavy, stomach is empty… Sigh… Just endure it on your own… I can… I have to do this, to fix what I did to my world.

Sigh… Ugh, shit, now I can't muster the willpower to get up. Goddammit…

Then, I feel a hand on my head, ruffling my hair.

"Takeru-san? Are you feeling well?" Kasumi was looking down at me.

"Yeah… Just… Tired."

"Your mind does seem exhausted. Is it… my fault?" Her bunny ears fall down. "Did I harm you during the recovery session?"

"No, that's not it… I think I might have woken up in a bad spot of the sleep cycle or something."

"… Your mind seems sad. What is it?"

"Sigh… Can't hide anything from you, huh."

"Sorry…"

"Nah, I'm not mad." Smiling at her, I finally shrug off the heaviness and sit down again. "I guess the exhaustion just caught up to me today. Seeing him being treated as part of the family in the second memory… just made me miss mine, to be honest."

"I see. Are you sure you're well?" She rubs my back, sending the awful feeling crashing down like it was hit by a Heavy's laser.

"Yeah… Thanks for always looking for me, Kasumi." I pat her head, ruffling her hair, some of it caught between my fingers as I slowly do so. She moves her bunny ears as I do.

"No… It's nothing."

"It isn't nothing to me. So, thanks." Smiling her way, I end the patting with a soft caress to her fringe. "I'll be fine now, you can go back."

"Really? I can repress the memory if it hurts you." Locking her eyes with mine, her brows moved down a tiny bit.

"It's okay, I just had to catch up to the stress, I guess. I'm okay now, Kasumi. For real."

"… If you say so. Then, should I go to your office tonight as well?"

"No, I have some questions for Sensei, so I'll drop by the cylinder room around 1900 hours."

"Alright, see you then. Have a good day."

"Yeah, you too." She smiles, leaving the key to my cell on my bed.

"Bye bye." We wave at each other, and then she goes her way.

Sigh… What an idiot I am, making her worry. But still, better that this happened on a Sunday. I… don't think I could go to a lecture how I'm now.

Getting out of the bed, standing up and stretching, I sigh as I hear some bones crack.

Can't help missing them, can't help getting sad from time to time… But I have to prove to this base that I'm not a mad murderer so retiring into my shell won't do me any good.

Seeing Kasumi smile, that is what I wanna do for others. One day, they will smile in that same way, whether I am there by their side or not.

Yeah! That's why I'm here! Sure, I'm still sad and feeling heavy… But I'm letting this hamper my efforts.

Going to the sink, I splash cold water on my face to properly wake me up. Rinsing my mouth, taking off my clothes, I enter the shower and turn it on.

It's as it were slowly scalping my hair, this cold feeling. Clenching my teeth, my breathing picks up in speed as the water keeps running down my back, my knees begin to shake.

Force palming a wall, letting the water fall right on the back of my neck, grinding my teeth against each other, I inhale sharply over and over.

"… This is nothing. I came here… to fix my world, to save as many as I could. And one day… one day… I'll see them again… I'll see my family again…"

This time I won't let anything screw me over. Nothing is going wrong this time.

Feeling the stagnant, heavy feeling be replaced by a sudden gust of euphoria, I grab the soap and, very violently, wash myself to prevent the cold from getting to me.

Because this time I'm not failing. No accidents are going to happen. And I can't go making others worry. Like Hayase said, don't go throwing your burdens onto others. I screwed up my world, I gotta be brave… even when I'm feeling down, when I'm missing them. Because they're not coming back, and I gotta honor their lives. No one is getting in the way of my ambitions from now on.

" I'm saving them… No matter what… Struggle… I'll struggle until the very end… Can't be getting depressed… about being left all alone…"

The cold water kept falling, I kept scrubbing away. Repeating my oath over and over, feeling my motivation return to me, yanking me wide away and into alert mode.

Same day. Some moments later.

---

Having eaten breakfast already, the sudden seething motivation having calmed down, and the odd, heavy feeling having vanished as well, I expected Takamura to lead the way to the usual office. However, it seems she had other plans for today.

"Are you sure this is a good idea, 1st Lt.?"

"Yes, were you not wishing to go see them?"

"Well, yes. But I have no authorization to-"

"Cadet Shirogane, we're just taking a visit to the mechanic crew of the hangar to check on my TSF's maintenance. Isn't that right?"

"Yes, I guess."

I didn't expect Takamura to be so carefree. As soon as we finished breakfast she asked me if I wanted to go take a look at the Fubukis that were arriving. I don't know if she is being considerate or if she has an ulterior motive for it.

Well, in any case, it'll be nice seeing the Fubukis again. I wonder if I could convince Sensei to actually use them in combat, last loop they actually proved useful and I guess they're easier to produce than the Shiranui.

We reach the hangar, and as we enter we see two of them being docked in. Man, I might have better TSFs at my disposal now but the Fubuki will always have a special place in my heart. Let's hope I don't reduce this one to scrap this time around.

"Oh, so it was you. Good morning, Shirogane." Meiya approached us as we walked near the iron fence. "And 1st Lt. Takamura." Her smile turned into a tight line as she saluted Takamura, who returned the gesture.

"Morning, Meiya. So you came to see them too, huh?" She smiles slightly as she takes a look at the Fubukis.

"Yes, I honestly couldn't sit still despite being Sunday. But didn't you say that you had a mission?"

"Yes, we are here to check something with the mechanic crew." Takamura smiles faintly at her, but Meiya tenses up and averts her gaze with a dry 'I see' barely escaping her lips. I wonder why she doesn't like her. Does she think she's here on Yuuhi's orders to watch over her?

"Hey, Takeru!" Mikoto and the rest come towards us.

"Morning guys."

"Morning, Shirogane-kun. Ah, salute!" They all salute Takamura, who again returns the gesture.

"Good morning, squad. Shirogane, let's go pick up those papers."

"Sure. Don't stare too much at the Fubukis guys. See you around."

I know, I can't be seen slacking off. I wave at them as I follow Takamura to the floor. I feel like… someone's staring blades at me right now. And I really don't wanna turn around.

I let Takamura do the talking as I grab the folders with her Takemikazuchi's data. As she kept discussing things with the mechanics, I took a peek from below at the Fubukis. They're really something else, I don't know why people look down on them so much. If we could upgrade them, they would be even better than that Kagerou I piloted while being much cheaper than the Shiranui, according to the notes I read yesterday night. Then, we could put the extra money to something more powerful, like mass producing the Type-00C or restart the Second's development.

I'll have to make a mental note of that for when I go speak with Sensei today. In any case, tomorrow I will have to start doing the work with my squad, so you five better get ready to… Wait a second… One, two, three…

There's only five Fubukis lined up on the hangar. Why is that? Did Sensei plan on giving me a different training unit?

I hear the sound of the stairs and see Mikoto running towards the left corner of the hangar, where the purple Takemikazuchi was just unveiled. The rest soon followed, looking at it in awe. Except Meiya, who I think is furrowing her brow as usual.

"Oh? What is…" Takamura stared open eyed at the purple TSF, frozen in place. One could practically hear the noise of her fans overloading as she tried to comprehend what she was looking at.

But man, it looks so… empty. Now that it doesn't have its machineguns docked forming the long skirt like in Valgern-On, it looks so ungraceful. Also, I know it doesn't exist here, but still, it just looks weird without the TR on its back. You just cannot lack that ridiculously looking and unnecessarily bulky rifle. I'm gonna mod my Type-00C and show the world the greatness of Valgern-On's Takemikazuchi. Well, this time let's make sure you stay in one piece purple buddy.

Wait, didn't something bad happened around this-

"How dare you touch it, you insolent commoner!" Ah, there it is.

Tsukuyomi-san teleported out of nowhere and slapped… As far as I can recall, she always used to slap Tama's hands away from the thing, but this time she directly slapped Mikoto in the face. Mikoto stumbled back, almost falling, as she slowly closed the distance, the trio on her back.

"What reason have you to touch this TSF? Do you not recognize the meaning behind its color?!"

"Tsukuyomi!… 1st Lt., what is the meaning of this?!" And now Meiya snapped.

They start arguing as they always did in our past loops, except Meiya looks angrier. I can clearly hear her shouts from here, and she's never sounded so… angry? Livid? Bothered? I dunno why, but this time she's more upset than in the past loops. Maybe it has to do with the stronger nationalism?

"Shirogane, follow me." Takamura signals me to come along her as she walked towards Tsukuyomi-san.

We approach the group, Chizuru was taking a teary eyed Mikoto away from the Guards. Tama was trying to calm Mikoto, who kept shivering despite the other two's attempts. Meiya was facing a furrowed Tsukuyomi, that was still trying to reason with her.

"Hey Mikoto, you okay?"

"Yeah, I just… It looked so cool I couldn't help myself." She rubs her cheek as a few tears drop down her eyes.

"Let's go get breakfast, Yoroi." Chizuru and the rest leave. Kei took one look at Meiya as she kept arguing with Tsukuyomi, and then also went into the hallway.

"Even if they are your partners, we cannot allow commoners to touch this Takemikazuchi. Surely you know who sent this to you, please understand our actions." Yes, the usual stuff. Tsukuyomi-san is again begging Meiya to take the TSF as her own, and our blue samurai looks insulted to no end.

"Cease your prattling! I… I am a mere Cadet, I have not even finished my training in the way of the sword, much less being appointed as the successor of the Mitsurugi House, there is no reason for me to receive such a privilege. Take this Takemikazuchi back to its rightful owner at once!"

"I cannot do that. Her orders were clear on this matter, in case you ever need it, this Takemikazuchi will remain here at the ready for you. Please, do not reject her aid. She merely wishes you the best, you must know how much you mean for her."

"Silence! What would everyone think of this?! This is a clear violation to the honor code, I have not the right to pilot it. This is-"

"Cadet Mitsurugi, if I may?" Takamura speaks at her, causing Meiya's complexion to change. Her enraged face relaxed a bit as she looked away. "1st Lt. Tsukuyomi has been ordered to deliver this machine, if I didn't misunderstand anything from your words. If she cannot go against her orders, would it be too much for you to accept this gift open handed?" I didn't expect… No, of course she knows who Meiya is, she's also a pawn of Yuuhi. She must have been informed of Meiya's true identity.

Tsukuyomi-san gives Takamura a court bow, that she returns in kind, and takes a brief glance at me. For some reason I feel a knot on my stomach. It… hurts to see her.

"Meiya-sama, we cannot simply return this. So please, do not reject the helping hand she's giving you." Meiya tensed up her eyes as she closed them. As she opened her eyes, she took a glance at me. I gave her a nod, she grimaced and sighed audibly.

"Do as you please then."

"Thanks for your understanding. Well then." She gives Meiya a deep bow along the Three Idiots, and gives Takamura a small bow before going her way.

As she passed me, our eyes met for the briefest moment. Hers were frontal but almost dulled, there was not hatred or suspicion on them, but the way they twitched, the slight trembling of her lips, and the fact that she couldn't hold my gaze made her confusion obvious. The other three still looked at me with the usual scowl.

"Shirogane, let's go back to the office."

"Yes, let's… Wait, what's that?" I stop in my tracks as I see a sight to behold on the right end of the hangar. Hohoho, so you're already here, eh?

"What is the meaning of this?!" Meiya's yell by my side was soon replicated all throughout the hangar.

Ten Type-00C, standing proudly side by side, were being docked into the hangar. That was fast, maybe the delivery of Meiya's Takemikazuchi helped speed the delivery of these units. Us three made our way towards them, as well as many others.

"Alright! You've seen them already, keep your distance!" That shout…

"Did you not listen?! Until the XO comes to sign the papers, you cannot lay a finger on these things! So can you all do us a favor and get out of our sights?"

Mion and Shion were in their red dress along many black robbed Royal Guards making a human wall between the Takemikazuchis and the curious onlookers. Tsukuyomi-san and the other three were also helping out with the task.

"I cannot believe my eyes…" Takamura was staring at them, clearly shaking a little.

Us three made our way back to the upper section of the hangar, looking at them from here is kinda surreal. Having this many Type-00 on the base so soon is a stroke of best luck.

"Ten Takemikazuchi units, whatever are they doing here? Those two…" Meiya gazed at the guards, clearly staring at the pickles that were arguing with a mechanic.

"So Mion and Shion are delivering these ones here?" Not a second after I said that, she shot me a glare. Urk, I should have stayed quiet.

"Shirogane, you're still calling them by their names? I won't help you if you get in trouble for that." Meiya, stop with that dubious look.

"It is truly a surprise, what could have made this happen?" Takamura, who ignored Meiya, stroked her hair as she gazed at the ten gray titans.

"Make way! Who do you think you are?!" What was… That voice…

The sudden shout gave me a slight pain on the back of my head. A man in the red dress of the Guard, in a stronger tint than Tsukuyomi-san's one, drove must onlookers away with his voice. The man has a ridiculous haircut. Two 'horns' in his sides and a pointy strain on top. Very tall, he could probably hug a bear and get out of it unscathed with his muscles.

"M-Master?!" Meiya's looks as a wild animal that saw a tree get hit by lightning as her eyes widened.

She said Master… Is he her teacher or something? She approached the man, and he drew a giant smile upon seeing her.

"Oh, Meiya-sama! It is good to be graced by your presence!" He gives her a small bow.

"Master, what turn of events has brought you here?"

"Well, I came to deliver these machines, and was assigned here with a small unit to give you a test, to see if you're worthy of receiving my final teaching in the Mugen Kidou." So he is her teacher… which means, he's an important person within the Empire.

"I can't believe he of all people would be sent as a mere deliverer." Takamura stroked her hair as she gazed at the giant that was talking, or rather shouting, with Meiya.

"1st Lt., do you know that man?" She froze and looked at me with an inquisitive glare.

"You do not know of General Guren?" Guren…

"The name sounds familiar for some reason, but I don't know who he is. I suppose he's one of the Royal Guard's most important men, right?" Her eyes open even more. She then sighs and shakes her head.

"He's not one of, he's THE most important one. He's the General of all the regular Guards who are not in service of a Regent House. He's Koubuin-sama's most trusted soldier, one of the best commanders in the Empire. Great General Daizaburou Guren is the personal commander of the 15th Royal Guard Battalion that serves under the express orders of Her Highness, the fabled leader of the Wolf Battalion." Almost puffing her chest, one could taste the pride coming out of her every word.

But… The Wolf Battalion? I never heard of them last time. If we had such a powerful unit, why didn't they send it to Sadogashima? Were they killed during the coup? Or left protecting Yuuhi, maybe?

"I see. I don't really know much about the Empire's or the Guard's units. But you're right, let's go back to-"

"Oho! If it isn't Takamura-dono!" Or not.

"General Guren, it is an honor to meet you!" Standing upright and tense as a cable, she salutes this Guren. I never thought I would see Takamura nervous around someone. Well, he is a General, so showing this much respect is the obvious thing to do.

"No, no, do not be so stiff! It is good to see you're fine, grasshopper! Last time I saw you, those eyes of yours were mired by awful eye bags, clouded beyond recognition. Even if it's on the UN, I am glad you can continue your endeavors!" He's louder than Zoe-san, for the love of God. Why does he have to shout?

"Master, please, could you speak more softly? This isn't the Palace." Seeing Meiya being so apprehensive is weird.

She's not like this with Tsukuyomi-san, but I suppose this guy is a total different beast compared to her. He is Yuuhi's most trusted General after all. Wait… I think I'm in danger, now that I think about it.

"I vastly prefer to yell, Meiya-sama! But in any case! Best of luck in your work, Takamura-dono." He smiles widely at her. He doesn't look like a bad guy though, despite being kinda scary with that haircut and his stoic face.

"Thank you very much for your kind words, General." Takamura bows deeply to him. Then, as he finished his talk with her, he apparently noticed I was here. I should have ran away when I had the chance.

"Who would this grasshopper be?" He stopped shouting.

"Cadet Takeru Shirogane, sir." His face distorts itself, I can see why he's the leader of the Wolves. He looks like a one right now, ready to charge at his prey.

"So you're Shirogane, eh?" He frowns his brows, tensing his lips and cheeks. He looks like one of the Four Heavenly Kings statues that were in my world's temples, I suppose you came here to harm me under Yuuhi's orders. Well, F my peaceful time.

"Yes, sir."

You could poke the air right now thanks to the tension here. I could see Mion and Shion getting closer, both bearing severe expressions.

"Um, Master? This man is one of my squadmates on Squad 207. He's done me many a great favors." Thank you, Meiya. He gazes at her and relaxes his posture, dropping the tension in his body. This guy's stare is intense for sure. He's the real deal, a true war vet.

"Is that so! Well, I sure hope you continue to support her from now on, Shirogane." Stop shouting dammit! And I despise that hateful glare. Ugh, these fucking… No, bad Takeru. Don't snap.

"Daizaburou-sama, the attendants have arrived. We are to proceed to the designated briefing room." Mion spoke in a business tone similar to Tsukuyomi-san's. Looking at her and Shion is… making me feel weird, as if I were meeting with an old friend. Is this because of the memories I saw yesterday?

"Finally. To make us wait so much… Well, Meiya-sama, I will be awaiting the day when we can have our final duel. Until then, stay safe." He salutes her, she responds in kind. And then goes with the Pickles towards a group of people, that were being apparently led by Pyatkh.

Ugh, my head hurts a bit. Daizaburou Guren… I feel he knew you. Your hostility right now wasn't because I'm an unknown face near Meiya, you reacted especially bad to my name. If Yuuhi sent him here, he and the Pickles were ordered to kill me. Heh, she sent her right hand to make sure no mistakes were made. But of course she did, I'm soiling the memory of someone dear to them. What else did I expect from these brain-dead mannequins?

"Cadet Shirogane, are you alright?" Takamura and Meiya were looking at me, brows arched.

"Yeah, just a bit surprised. Didn't think a General would waste his breath on me."

"Please do not take offense Shirogane, he was merely being cautious. I'm sure you know why." I nodded at her. Meiya still looked kinda down as she gazed at them leave.

"Well, 1st Lt. Takamura, let's go to the office, we lost plenty of time already." She arranged her hair again and gave a nod.

"True. Let us go. Until later, Cadet Mitsurugi."

"Ah, um… 1st Lt., could you let me speak with Shirogane for just a moment?"

"Hm… Alright, but please do not take too long." Takamura goes towards the hallway, giving us some space.

"So, what did you want to talk about Meiya?" I hope it's not about those visions because… I won't answer that.

"Shirogane, I'll cut to the chase. Do you think you can find some time to go return your blade?" Oh, that. Since I already took care of that I forgot I had promised her we would go together.

"Actually, I already returned it." She opens her eyes wide, and then looks at me a bit upset.

"Why did you not tell me of this? Rather, why did you do it alone?" I suppose she's suspecting me. It is an important matter after all.

"I just seized the opportunity. 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi came to talk with me when I arrived here and I told her of it. When I went back to my room to pick up my clothes, my sword was no longer there. So don't worry, it's in safe hands now." I thought she would be happy but… Why does she seem so down?

"… Is that so. So you no longer have it. Well, I'm glad you could resolve the issue before it became a problem. Did Tsu… the 1st Lt. tell you anything? She wasn't too harsh on you, I hope?"

"She was quite angry, yeah. But I suppose I'm in the clear for now, since nothing happened since then, and even when she saw me today she didn't do anything." She nods slowly at my words. She does look troubled now for some reason.

"Yes, you're right. In any case… It's good that's solved. Forgive me for holding you."

"Nah, it's cool. As much as I wanted to keep it, this was for the best." I sigh, shaking my head. Meiya had folded her arms, her eyes now looking away from mine. "Sorry for not telling you before."

"No, it is alright. You were understandably exhausted, after all that happened since your return to the base. Well, I shall hold you no more. Best of luck in your endeavors."

"Same to you. Later, Meiya." I wave at her as I go into the hallway, she waves back with a faint smile, and then turns around and seems to remain gazing at the purple Takemikazuchi.

Shouldn't she be happy that the sword is back with the Empire? Did she… expect me to become her fellow for real? Oh well, whatever.

I rejoined Takamura and we went towards the elevator, the hallways were bustling with rumors as we walked. This surely made things lively here, but it will also make life difficult for me.

Under the guise of delivering these Type-00C and coming here to finish this training Meiya was talking about, they're probably here to kill me too. And it's not like I can attack that guy without getting into a lot of trouble. First, I don't know if I could win in a fist fight with him, due to his build. Second, if I harm him, our relations with the Empire will be done for. There is no way I can harm or kill a General and get away with it. Yuuhi you're not playing around, you purple devil. Didn't expect that sweet face to be capable of such cutthroat behavior.

"Cadet Shirogane, are you truly fine? You seem truly out of sorts." Takamura stared into my eyes while we were on the elevator. I was being too obvious, huh.

"Well, it seems the General does not like me much. I just hope they don't try to spark a fight with me."

"The XO mentioned to me that you didn't like the Royal Guard much, can… can you tell me why?" She must be nervous because she… Oh, right. You're also a member of the Guard. And if the General, who is Yuuhi's right hand, ordered you to cooperate… "Cadet Shirogane?"

"Oh… Ah, well, since I was… Ahem, since I'm seen as a foreigner here, the Guard has not been very kind to me. I don't really hate them, but it seems they don't want me around." I scratch my head slowly as I look up, I have to remain calm.

I can't show her that I'm suspicious of her. Yuuhi might have left her in the dark to avoid a leak, but all she needs is a word, an order from the General to turn against me. I wonder if Sensei knows of this… I mean, I did talk already… Nah, she wouldn't… Alright, stop it. No more depressing thoughts, I have the S5 pass right here, the Kagerou is waiting for me down in Hanger 90 in the worst case. It's too early to start panicking, Takeru. I did try to-

"Ahem, allow me to tell you that he was merely doing his duty. I assure you, in no way could a noble man such as him hold any ill will towards you. And I highly doubt someone as honorable as General Guren would soil his name by antagonizing a mere Cadet."

"… Yes, you're right."

"In any case, let us focus on our project. There is much for us to do."

"Yeah… Let's make the most out of today."

The rest of the day went by uneventfully, with me delivering folders around again and giving some advice to Takamura when she got stuck on some documentation, thanks to the different way we do things here under Sensei's command. The planning stage seems to be going on without much problems anymore, so we just might be able to get one railgun done and tested before Sadogashima.

Here's hoping the Guard leaves me alone long enough to get there.

Chapter 32: Links of the Undercurrents

November 25 th . Near 7 PM.

(Yuuko's Office.)

[Yuuko]

---

" Don't worry, I've pacified the few that wanted to keep pushing for the punishment." Mitsuko-nee says on the other side of the line, I spin on my chair. "So long as your promise to pay for the soldiers' treatment holds water, everything will be fine."

"Good to hear. I suppose you will be paying us a visit in some days?"

"Yes, I am looking forward to that. However, Yuuko, are you sure you're going to pay up their silence? I thought you were on a-"

"We shall be getting some funds soon-ish. And, as I said before, Shirogane will be the one paying up."

"… According to the databases, he has no family nor possessions. Can you explain me how is he going to get the money? He's a cadet, he has no wage as far as I'm aware."

"He doesn't, and you'll get your answer once you come here."

"Sigh… If I didn't knew you, I'd think you have something with the kid."

"… Mitsuko-nee, if that is all, I'll hang up."

"Come on, now. Don't get all cranky." Again, her cheery tone along a chuckle. Ugh, how I hate it when she does this. "There's one last thing. I assume you already had a meeting with the detachment of the Royal Guard that went there?"

"Yes, it honestly surprised me that your report was spot on. The General was very 'to-the-point', which was welcomed to be honest. They seem to be here to get a direct report for the testings we've been making, and to… appraise one of the pigeons."

"… Nothing else?" Her tone descending into a whisper, hushed and alert as if we were talking about the casualties of the Valkyries, and the almost non-existent list of volunteers to join our cadet program in this nation. "Look, my sources tell me someone from the Guard, from high above, was the one who ordered the execution to be called off, and now the General suddenly was put in charge of the delivery of the Takemikazuchis. Is that truly all there was to the meeting?"

"Yes, nothing else happened. Anything else you required?" Sadly, there is no way I can tell you of the mess that the little sword caused me, or about his circumstances.

"… No, nothing else on my end. If I hear anything, I'll contact you."

"Thanks, as always. Later, Mitsuko-nee." Cutting the call, I finally sigh aloud.

To think the man came to 'question' me about the motives behind the… How was it? Minaru Kamui, I believe, Shirogane had on him. Luckily, I truly had no idea what it meant until Shirogane told me about it, so lying was easy enough. However, he kept pushing for answers on his past, if I knew about how he acquired the blade, asking why his profiles were locked.

When I said I was his tutor and deemed the matter to be private, he instead chose to, quite foolishly, try to pressure me about why the UN kept hidden the fact that Mitsurugi was harmed.

Sending him away by force isn't something I can do, so I simply told him the truth, that the HC wasn't behind the accident, which is what this is, and that they were taking measures to prevent losing face. In the end, Mitsurugi didn't sustain any serious injuries and the chasers didn't act on what they were ordered to do, we have recordings and the accounts of the Pickles' on their briefing to prove that. And that they were also going to receive a harsh reprimand behind the curtains.

Again, I reiterated that I had made sure Shirogane was punished accordingly for the folly of murdering people, and yet, that seems to have picked his interest. Refusing them would have been a bad idea, so I suggested him that they could approach him if they had any doubts regarding his loyalty, so long as they didn't try to pick a fight in my base, else the deals we signed would go up in smoke. To say that he was taken aback would be an understatement. He didn't think I'd let him approach Shirogane so easily, for some reason.

However, if Motoko-nee's report isn't wrong, and if it happens again today, then it is in my best interest to at least let them speak with Shirogane. I don't need more distractions, after all.

The matter of the sword settled as I wanted it to, with it being nothing but Shirogane's mistake due to his missing memory, and no harm intended from our side, we returned them the sword in good faith and, in the name of the project, I kindly asked him to not bring it up ever again. He seems to have a brain over all those muscles, so he agreed to the terms easily enough.

Allowing them to approach Mitsurugi to their leisure and perform whatever test they wish to have against her at a latter date, and me handing them a report on the parts we made for the current deal, was enough to end the meeting on a good note. Until they asked for permission to speak with Shirogane, and I obviously refused.

Not only he is in the middle of a punishment, not only is he helping out with the railgun, and that project has little hands as is, but they should learn that on my base we play by my rules. Of course, they then began to prattle on and on about how they were merely wishing to speak with him regarding the blade, but in the end they had no choice but to comply with my rules, since they backed off when I requested an answer for why they were insisting so damn much.

This small window will give us a buffer to have him recall any little tidbit he can to convince them, or at least make them doubt, of his identity. I'll see how we move forward after seeing their movements and answers, and Shirogane's progress on the memory recovery as well.

Opening my mail, seeing the reports, for the moment I'll focus on the shorter ones.

Now, the Valkyries seems to be getting the hang of the sims, going by Suzumiya's reports. However, it seems the fresh ones are still lagging behind, and some of the 'training courses' are too complicated for them. According to her, Isumi believes the machines to have some sort of psychological trigger, since most of them find it hard to stop training despite the difficulty.

I wish I could send Shirogane to them, but considering his punishment and his role as the Viking, as well as all that he's handling as of now, I don't want to overburden him. Perhaps, I'll ask him to write a handful of tips for what they're having trouble with, besides his suggestion to make sure they don't isolate themselves or get 'sucked in' in his own terms.

Otherwise, I could arrange a mock battle against the Viking to clear their heads away from the sims. Hmm… Now that I think about it… I could dust off that TSF for it, as well. Yeah, after all, he wanted more sensors, so let's see how he handles it.

Sigh… Drinking some more coffee, opening another mail, the preliminary tests on the Type-00Cs are here… Hmm… Not bad, worth the money if you ask me. The most money I would spend on a per unit basis for maintenance, but with an output far surpassing any TSF at our disposal. Honestly, this is nothing like those early estimates we received when the Takemikazuchi was unveiled. Heh, the Royal Guard must have purposely sent the Type-R's cost sheet. If we had received this data, the Type-00C would already have been adopted, at least by the Valkyries and the top squads of the IJA. Well, it plays in my favor.

At least everything is taken care of within the base. Now, if only I could decipher the way to apply the second theory to the 00 Unit. I swear, at times it feels as if it wasn't supposed to work on it by itself. The graphs don't align, the equations sometimes contradict themselves, it's as if there was something missing, as if the 00 Unit that world's me envisioned had something the one I built is lacking. And frankly, it's pissing me off to not figure it out, no matter how many tests I run, how many times I look over the numbers and the specs. I wonder what was I researching on that other world.

Knock!

Hm? Looking at the cameras outside my office, I see him waiting as usual, scratching his head. Oh right, Yashiro said he had some questions.

"Come in." Tapping the button, the door is unlocked and in he comes, a slower stride in his steps.

"Hey Sensei, how's it going?"

"… Frankly, all's good. So, sit down, I've some questions for you."

"Uh… Sure." Raising a brow, he sits down on the usual sofa.

Standing up and grabbing the mug I usually give him, I start the machine and pour coffee into it. Going to hand it over, after leaving it on his hands, after he gives me his thanks I lean back onto my desk, a finger on my chin.

"First, the negotiations about the sword are over and done. The Royal Guard won't press the matter anymore."

"Wow, for real? I thought they wouldn't back off easily."

"Oh, believe me, they didn't. I think you saw who they sent this morning to negotiate." Rolling my eyes, I grab my mug and finish my drink. Then, I go pour me some more coffee.

"Oh, right. About that, I think he knew the General."

"… Is that so." I didn't tell Shirogane about how this world's him served under Guren. So he got that answer by himself, huh. So my hunch was correct, he can pull the memories without much effort, so long as we spur them to the surface. "Anything else that came up?"

"No, not really." He then drinks, leaning back and stretching his legs.

"Well, that's taken care of. Be on your guard, they might approach you any time now."

"… I guess you couldn't convince them of my innocence, huh?" Looking into his drink, he sighs as he crosses a leg over the other.

… How odd, for you to doubt my influence. I could have easily prevented them from getting close to you by simply having you be escorted by an MP during your punishment, you should know that. Also, I could have shielded you myself, since you are my special protegee, and they surely didn't want to be too pushy once I asked for their motives to delve into your past. Whatever has spawned such doubts towards me, I wonder?

"… What's up, Sensei?" Raising a brow, staring at me as if he didn't have a clue.

"Nothing."

"Did… the Guards gave you problems?"

Okay, now what? Yes, the Great General is someone very important indeed. I won't deny that, and I won't say it would have been easy. But this is my base, and moreover, I have the recordings of when 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi chose to overlook the issue of the blade after Niigata. I had cards to play to nullify their movements, I had planned some moves ahead and it's why the meeting went by just as I planned. Did something happen in one of his loops; or, are you doubting me?

"No, there were no problems. Is there anything you think I should be concerned about, perhaps?"

"Well, the guy is a General. And in this more nationalistic world, nothing good will come out by clashing with the Guard when we could avoid it, so I can get why you would be upset at more setbacks getting in your way." Closing his eyes, he then, grabbing his mug with both hands, drinks some more.

"… As I said, everything is on the rails. You do not need to concern yourself with that."

"Alright, if you say so."

"Now, about what I wanted to ask you." Looking my way, drinking again, he leans forward. "What did the me of your world did while researching the Nucleus?"

He furrows his brows for a moment, blinks a few times in quick succession, leaves his mouth barely open as he groans, then shakes his head.

"… No idea."

"What do you mean?"

"She never told me, and I never asked. She said she figured out how people could link themselves to different futures by seeing how Marimo-chan was always being negative about her relationships and how others were always positive no matter what shit happened to them. But she never told me in detail what exactly did she do to get the theory right, and she did say she was not even close to test it out. She was just a physics teacher, after all."

"… I see. Nothing we can do then."

"Something's wrong with the theories?"

"No, I just can't line up both theories well enough for now, so I was hoping you could offer some insight into the matter." I sit down, resting my neck against the seat, spinning slowly.

"Oh, so that's why you want to observe how I regain his memories."

"Yes, that too. So, what were you wanting to ask?" Considering he is reading up on some documents, perhaps he's willing to ask for my help now.

"First, is there any chance we might get the Fubuki accepted to be used on the frontlines?"

"… Huh? The Fubuki?"

He then proceeds to tell me how much better it was after the XM3 was installed on it, and how, during the third incident we have to prevent, it basically saved his and his squadmates' lives.

"Sadly, due to the way the Type-97 and 94 are built, there is little we can do to upgrade them. Starting another project for it would be a waste of resources."

"But it could help in replacing the Gekishins, at least for the ones in the backrow, or for either solo missions or hit-and-run naval tactics to support the TSAs." He counters, a cocky smile raising up, as if as I did when I had just solved the measurements of the new rockets for his modified Kagerou.

"… I'll consider it. Anything else?"

"Yeah, what's up with the OS of the PC you gave me?" He leans forward, yet his eyes aren't entirely focused on me. It's as if he were looking at my shoulder.

"Hm? The OS? I believe it had the latest version installed. Is it giving any issues?"

"Well, no…" Again, a brow raises as he scratches his head. "But the UI is godawful. I'm having some trouble actually using it."

He then went on to explain how the OS wasn't 'user-friendly', how he had to rely on the repository to install programs, how it was lacking many features he had gotten used to in his home world. I explained to him there was nothing to be done, and that I would send him a mail with the details on how to work around it. I had hoped he had come with some serious questions, but it seems today was a wasted day in the end.

… And all the while, despite his tone remaining composed, his eyes were locked away from mine, and there was a lack of the usual glee that Shirogane usually displays in his gestures, in the way he moves his hands, or even in his shrugs.

"… Was there anything else you wanted to ask?" Resting an elbow on my desk, making a point of dropping my mug a bit too strongly so that it made noise, I stared right into his eyes. He nodded, holding my gaze yet remaining as composed, as oddly calm as he was.

"Actually, yeah. So, before I go to Kasumi, was yesterday's recovery session helpful?"

"Hm? Oh, yes. The data was… interesting, for sure. Now that you mention it… Are you sure that he was being watched by one of the Shogun's retainers?"

"Yeah, it was Maya-san, no doubts about it. Same with the other one, he clearly was with the Pickles and Yuuhi eating dinner, it seems." Finishing his drink, leaning back comfortably, speaking slowly and without any pause. And yet, his eyes again avoid mine as Yashiro does with carrots.

Yuuhi, is it? Perhaps we didn't even need to bring out the memories, he seems already quite attuned to them on his own. Could this newfound composure be an effect of that? No, it would be too fast for inherited memories, especially forced ones, to affect someone's way of being in this way.

So he's doing this consciously? To what end? He… wouldn't still be holding some kind of reservations towards me, would he? If I recall correctly, he did say he was getting rather negative before, yet this isn't what I would call a shift towards that end of the spectrum. It's just a lack of the usual hyper attitude he has, that is all… there is to this.

"Sensei, you hearing?"

"… Yes, yes. So, you claim he was close enough to Her Purpleness when they were still children. Any idea why?"

"Hmm… No, not really. I never met the Pickles, and Yuuhi was dead in my world."

"Huh? Excuse me, what?"

"Oh, I never told you? Yuuhi doesn't exist in my world. Meiya is the sole heir of the Mitsurugi Group back there."

"… Huh. Is that so? So, you have no link whatsoever with her?"

"No, our contact during the mission I met her in was scarce. I didn't get a bad impression of her back then, but nothing that could have made us close happened. So, no idea why things turned out like this in this world." He crosses his arms, no delay in the words or the gesture, clear as the only result of an equation. "You didn't find anything else on his background?"

"No, sadly." I can't dig more info on him carelessly. Yoroi was clear enough on his message, and with this matter of the blade and the deals, I have to be careful. "For the time being, you stay on your guard around the Royal Guards if they approach you. You can retire to your cell after you're done with the recovery session."

"Okay, got it." He gets up, leaving the mug where he usually does. "I'll let Kasumi give you a report then. Goodnight, Sensei."

Nodding my way, he turns around and goes to the door. Moving his arms left and right, with slow steps all the while, he exits the room, without looking back or waving as he used to do.

I took his mug and put it back in place, wiping it with a tissue. Leaving it as usual, sitting and spinning back and forth slowly, resting my entwined fingers on my stomach, I look up at nowhere. And yet, one of my brows refuses to rise up, its inner edge sunken in.

"… So you're not smiling anymore, huh. I wonder why."

[Takeru]

---

Well, shame Sensei didn't have a better OS to use. I do know how to use the terminal… for the most basic of stuff, that is. Seriously, how do they even use this all day long? Isn't it a time waster?

Luckily, she dealt with the sword already. I really didn't wanna part ways with it, but it is what it is. I just gotta be careful around the Guards. She wasn't surprised about him knowing the General, so I guess she's still keeping some things from me. If I had any guilt of doing stuff behind her back, that just made it go up into the sky as I did whenever Sumika landed a DMP on me.

On the plus side, I did find some interesting bits of data though. Thanks to having read up on many different TSFs and weapons I think I can start writing those reports about the weapons and stuff I wanna make. But that will have to wait until tomorrow.

Sadly, he didn't contact me yet. Sigh… I know I shouldn't be so paranoid, but I need to build this bridge just in case this memory business goes wrong.

Getting close to it, the door opens on its own and the hallway welcomes me once more. This long black hallway always gives me the creeps, it's like it was made to tell you that you were trespassing into forbidden ground. It kind of reminds me of that hallway in the Megoman games, the one before a boss room where the music changes. My gaming senses tell me a boss is waiting for me on the other side of the door. However, what awaits me is a small bunny girl playing Cat's Cradle by herself.

"Hey Kasumi, sorry to keep you waiting." She moves her bunny ears to acknowledge me and slowly turns around, pouting. She had some string in her hands and was trying to form something with it.

"… I still can't make a Dancing Butterfly by myself."

"You're still hung up on that?" It has been a while since I showed it to her though.

"Yes."

"Ahaha, you'll just have to keep practicing. So, how did Sumika react to the memories?" Sensei did refuse to talk about that, for some reason. She stands up slowly and comes closer.

"She reacted well to the first, I think she was overjoyed to see it. But she reacted very badly towards the second. She went into shock again. I don't know why, I could only feel the overflow of the emotion, I couldn't even get her to listen to me." Slowly her eyes dart to the floor, her palms shift around as if she were gripping something.

"Well, let's go one step at a time. Let's assume the memories with the Royal Guard are bad for her from now on. So, do we do the same as yesterday?"

"Yes, sit down please." Then, she goes to get the thing I have to wear on my head. Handing it to me, I put it on. "Do you wish to see any kind of memory in particular?"

"Wait, I can choose now?" I sit down on the floor and Kasumi again sat behind me, placing her head on my shoulder.

"If you focus on certain thoughts, it will be easier for me to bring out the memories. Also, we will probably see more of it."

"Alright, I want to see something about his life as a commissioned Royal Guard today. This General came to the base, and I have the feeling he'll try to attack me, so let's see if I can get any useful info that might stall him, even for just a bit. I'll try to focus on the feeling of some grand, important mission. Would that work?"

"Yes, now close your eyes. Let's focus."

I close my eyes and remain like that for a while as I start thinking about my meeting with Yuuhi during last loop and some of my deployments against the BETA.

Relaxing again, that tingly feeling on the back of my head appearing once more, the pain below my ears as well, the darkness remains as it was for a while as I took deep breaths to calm down. Slowly, painfully so, a light appears on my vision. Twisting and turning, rippling as if it was a water surface hit by a rock, it begins to envelop my whole vision as my limbs feel more and more distant.

But this is different than yesterday's. It's as if I were gazing at a fire, but then what seemed to be a tunnel stops and the fire starts moving in a diagonal, but half of it is gone now. Dark yellow and orange distorted wings cover my whole field of vision, then a darkened figure appears within the flames. It's getting closer and closer. I still can't hear anything. What is that thing?

I feel as if a jolt of electricity spread throughout my head, then I'm enveloped in a feeling similar to that of being on a hot spring, relaxing onto the warm water. The figure comes out of the fire, my vision becomes more focused. A towering Fort-Class marched through the remains of a city. And it's getting closer to… No, I'm getting closer to it.

"1st Lt.! Return to your position!" A voice rings right on my ears. He's on a TSF during a mission, inside a cockpit. The voice is one I don't recognize as well.

"Don't we need to stall for the rest of the vanguard to arrive?" He moves his head slightly to his left, as he slashes a Tank that tried to jump onto him.

"Yes, but charging at the Laser-Class like this is suicide!"

"Marching against these numbers is suicide anyways, so get ready to boost at my signal." You tell 'em, boy. It's like hearing my old cocky self from school, but with an actual serious intent behind his cheery tone.

"All units, ready for the command sir!" Another voice I don't recognize speaks to me.

"Well, get ready to blast those guns! Three, two, one… Forward!" Unlike last time, I feel the rush in me as we charge at the BETA.

This tense, warm and exciting feeling… The rush of battle, just like Hayase said once. It takes hold of you, and before you know it your heart swells within and everything else kind of fades away. Only what's in front of you exist.

They make short work of the BETA, Tank and Grapplers alike, in synchronization too perfect to be a fresh team. They know how each other fights, and they cover their backs almost without delay. Despite, you know, his recklessness and almost suicidal charges. I guess we are more similar than I thought.

He takes a look behind him and I see four Zuikakus, two black and two white, as they spray their muffins upon the remaining BETA. The radar's red dots disappear in an instant, only to be replaced by more red dots.

"Oi, Amanohara! Send the canister shells to the herd to our right." Oh, nice decision. If those Destroyers get too close this will turn into a slaughter. Wait… Why do I feel like-

"Roger!" I feel like I've heard that voice somewhere…

"Fukuha! On me! We're marching onto those Grapplers!"

"Roger that!"

A black Zuikaku rushes forward along us as the herd to the right gets bombarded by the canisters. This world's me and this Fukuha decimate the Tanks with their guns as they march forward. With the momentum of the boost, he took aim at the Fort and started shooting at it with some 120mm ammo. Yeah, take that! Wait! The sting is gonna-

He back-boosted away from the sting, wasting not a single second. His reflexes are really good, and without the XM3 to boot. Fukuha dashes forward and slashes the sting off with his sword. Yeah, way to go! This is almost like looking at a video of a battle! That being said, that was a top notch move. Bait the sting, dodge at the last second by having the boost end and start another one upon contact with the ground, then have the other in the element shave the sting away. I recognize this tactic from my trainings in a Gekishin during my first loop, when we were prepping up for Iceberg. No wonder he'd rely on it, using a Zuikaku.

"1st Lt., I ran out of canisters! That's all I can do for now." The female voice I have trouble recognizing speaks through the comms.

"Don't worry, keep covering our rear with Okamoto and Onda. Me and Fukuha will take care of that Fort! Let's go!"

"Roger!" The other three voices roared as they sprung to action.

Looking at the radar, there were many blue units advancing to our position. So they're literally the first vanguard in whatever this mission is.

Fukuha's Zuikaku was to my left, he boosts ahead and slashes a Grappler. Another tried to jump onto him, but we shot it down with a 120mm to its body. As we rush forward, our maneuvering turns weird. His TSF starts kicking at the BETA, he starts side dashing at irregular intervals along the stream of Tanks, he put both guns on his shoulders with the pylons and they were still shooting at the BETA to his sides according to what the radar is showing. Fukuha was also gunning at the BETA in front of us, he back-boosts as he jumps, sending two shots at the Fort's head. I suppose that since they're close to the Laser-Class they can't jump so high, hence the need to stay close to the ground. The Zuikaku then back-boosts and rejoins us, shooting at the aliens that were behind us.

"Is that amount of gore enough to please you, 1st Lt. Shirogane?" He says in a jokingly tone.

"Yeah, we go onto the Fort!" He chuckles, I could feel the honesty in it. "Take your sword out, we're ripping it from below."

"Yeah, because swording everything is the way to go." He replies in a deadpan tone. What the hell is wrong with this guy?! Isn't he a Royal Guard?

"Hahaha! Don't say that in the common channel or 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi is gonna kill us."

"Which of them?"

"Both, probably." He says, rolling his eyes. Both share a laugh.

"Hehehe, you're right. Getting closer, careful with the Tanks to the sides."

"I know. Now let's tear this bitch down! Swordbreakers!"

"Swordbreakers!" Both shout at the same time as they Boost Jump under the Fort, sword at the ready. And like me and Hayase did during Niigata, they tear the Fort from below, splashing blood and flesh onto their TSFs.

"Squad Leader! Please refrain from using our squad's name during this mission!" The other male voice complains at him. Another female voice that wasn't Amanohara, one that sounds mature, replied in a cold tone.

"Okamoto, even if we're part of a bigger force today, we have no reason to change our methodologies, especially when they're the most effective solution to our situation. There is no need to restrain ourselves, have some pride."

"You tell him, Onda! Regardless of our standing here and the nature of this mission, our way of doing things won't change. Isn't that what makes us who we are?!" He yells at the top of his lungs, and for the first time I can actually feel it.

Not just looking and hearing. I feel his breathing get faster, the beating of his heart, and this blazing sensation on my gut. It's as if I was recalling a vivid memory of my own.

"You heard the leader! We're tearing these monsters, we're the Shogun's might! The Swordbreakers!" Fukuha also yells, I feel a grin on my face form.

Both of our TSFs keep boosting and slashing at the Fort's joints. Seeing the damage, he takes a step back and sprays uranium into the Fort. Fukuha does the same to the other side. As the Fort starts to tumble down we dash away from it. Okamoto finishes off the Fort with some 120mm at its head as it falls to the ground, showering both of our TSFs with its brains and blood.

"Sir, our rear has been secured."

"Good job, Amanohara." The other four Zuikakus form a circle around me, shooting at the stray Tanks that were still around.

"1st Lt. Shirogane, respond immediately." Oh, Maya-san is calling us.

"Oh, Maya-nee! We cleared our zone alre-"

"1st Lt. Shirogane, you have to address me appropriately as per the protocol states." Yup, she got angry. I feel him laugh internally with me. Maya-san does sound slightly worried.

"Sorry about that, 1st Lieutenant Tsukuyomi. We have cleared our zone, we will advance onto the Laser-Class right now."

"Desist from that course of action, my flight will meet up with yours in around four minutes along Takatsukasa-sama's flight. Hold the line until we-"

"Negative. That's too much time, we're better off doing a Laser Hunt and then pulling back towards you than sitting still here." He's right, even now the other three are shooting missiles at the Tanks and occasional Grappler, no way in hell they'll last four minutes alone.

"Then rejoin us now, charging in with just the five of you is too-"

"Negative, we're already close by. And if we let the Laser-Class advance any more our rear will get blasted off, and the HM cloud will dissipate soon anyways. The Swordbreakers will perform a Laser Hunt and then rejoin your flight in a short while." I've never heard of what a Laser Hunt is, I might go and do some research on this.

"1st Lt. Shirogane! You're the leader of Squad G during this mission, you're not an independent squadron!" I can now clearly feel the tension in her voice. I never thought the cold Maya-san could be so openly worried.

"Sorry, Maya-nee. The interference is kiiiinda making it hard to maintain communication. Can't hear you very well, to be honest." Pfft! You're a jokester just like me. This is just like what me and Meiya did during the Mt. Tengen incident.

"Takeru! Don't you dare to-"

"Later!" Did he just close the call on Maya-san's face? Boy, you have some steel balls. "Aight, listen up! Take a second to fix the Laser-Class' position on your radar, and then we're marching right into them. Switch your magazines if you must, we will have to kill around a thousand Tanks to get to those white little bastards."

"Um, 1st Lt Shirogane? Is this not insubordination?" Amanohara asks with clear tension on her voice.

"It's not treason so long as we produce results, right Leader?" Fukuha says, with clear venom in his voice.

"Exactly. Let's go and kill those Lasers, you'll see that we'll get a scolding at most."

"However, we are lacking our usual members." This Amanohara replies, stuttering at times. "Both Tsukuyomis are absent so-"

"We don't need the Pickles for this kind of issue." Ugh… What was… the sting I just felt, right in my chest? Were they… not in good terms? "Trust in yourselves, we can save many lives by nullifying the Lasers here and now. But, what do you think? Should we go through with it?" He asks, I could feel the pressure, the tension on his gut.

"If you say we can do it, I'll follow you." Fukuha answered, almost instantly.

"I agree." Onda also replied quickly. "If that devil's luck of yours is telling you to advance, that is what we shall do, Leader."

"Sigh… Not like we could convince him of doing anything else at this point." Okamoto snickers and sighs again, making the rest chuckle as well. "Yeah, it is better if we deal with this ourselves, before we get noticed by anyone. So, if you so order, I shall follow."

"So Amanohara," He asks, "If you wish to retreat, you're welcome to-

"Uh, fine! I wasn't doubting you, and I am going to follow you. However, I am telling Hikami-san about it. It is risky for us to fight at our best under so many eyes." Huh? Under many eyes? Are they some sort of secret squad? Would make sense, since there's no intel about him left.

"Sigh… Got it, so let's do this swiftly then. Would that be alright with you?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you're still rattling me out?"

"W-Well… I do think you should be more careful…"

"Heh, thanks for worrying. But rest easy, this revenant ain't going down tonight." All of them chuckle for some reason, his face was tensed into a frown as he cackled to himself. "Now, we'll do a NOE flight until we reach the lasers, just do it as we have always done even if we're only five this time. Crush their fangs, Swordbreakers!"

"Swordbreakers!" All four of them shout in unison as we boost while flying almost near the ground.

As they were getting closer to a herd, however, some shapes begin to blur and not because of the speed. Slowly, everything starts losing color. The pain comes back, the tingly feeling reappearing on me.

"Kasumi, are you alright?"

"I'll… try to… Just give me a second…" She sounds terribly exhausted. But as I was thinking on stopping her, color returned to the images and they started moving again.

They open fire onto the wall of Tanks. Since they can't move up or they'll get shot by the Lasers they have no choice but to pierce through the red sea. See? If we had that ammo I wanted to make this thing would be a piece of cake.

"1st Lt., I'll dive into the herd and drop an S-11."

"Roger that. Careful with it, Onda. Okamoto, let's open up a path for her."

"Roger!"

A white Zuikaku rushes into the herd as we give it cover. There's many Tanks trying to climb onto it, we're keeping a clear line between her and them, but we're getting low on ammo and fuel.

"S-11 dropped! Let's retreat!"

"All units, fall back."

The four other units back-boost dash away from the herd alongside us, and a few seconds after that a giant explosion blinds my sight. Wow, half of the Tanks in the front got decimated. Well, S-11s are mighty powerful.

"All right, this is our chance! Rush in and get to those bastards!"

Our frames get filthier and filthier as we keep advancing, our blades are soiled with BETA blood from top to bottom as our slashes cut through dozens of them at a time, littering our path with dismembered limbs and torn pieces of flesh, at this point no one could say that the other Zuikakus weren't supposed to be painted in red.

Piercing through the jumping Tanks at top speed, I feel an enveloping sensation. His… My… Our body tightens, our vision grows narrow. The sheer shift into full focus brings forth an unexpected rush into me, and despite our breathing being steady, I feel our heart beating faster and faster. I know this feeling… To shift into killing mode, to become a blade. Reveling in this old but intense feeling of both hatred and hope, I lose myself in the battle ahead along him.

"Squad, what are we?!"

"The people's blade!" Okamoto shouts as he drives his sword into a Tank, back-boosts and then does a wide slash, killing four Tanks in the swing.

"The wolves that keep watch over them." Onda says calmly but fiercely as she hovers while slashing at the Tanks with daggers on each hand, only to later swiftly take out her rifle and shower two Grapplers that were charging at her.

"The sword that smites evil from its roots!" Amanohara shoots her two guns at the charging Tanks, clearing a path for me and Fukuha.

"Made of a steel that's harder than truth!" Fukuha dashes along me with one gun on its pylon shooting forward and his sword at the ready. He kicks some Tanks and slashes at them, doing side steps while we keep boosting.

"Crush their fangs!" We say as we swing our sword and boosts onwards. I feel the fire coming out of his throat as he leans forward, boosting into the herd, tearing through it with its blades and sheer speed.

"Swordbreakers!" All five, or six counting me, shout in unison just as the Laser-Class appear on our monitor.

The five TSFs go into full boost gunning at the Tanks, creating a red carpet that's ready to guide us to our targets. A sound beeps inside the cockpit, alerting us that we were near the Lasers.

I feel a wide, wicked grin appear on our face. Full boosting ahead, the end of the sea became visible, and beyond it were our targets. The Laser-Class got choked with the uranium muffins as we kept marching forward at top speed without giving them a chance to look at us and shoot, their small bodies were crushed easily. However, there are too many of them.

"Everyone, sick your 120mm at them!" As we move in zigzags in the air to avoid the ones that shoot at us, we send what little ammo we have onto them. Less than ten remaining, eight, seven, six-

BOOM!

Amanohara's Zuikaku got both arms destroyed. It fell to the ground with a deafening roar, the Lasers were ready to scorch her. We're too far away, dammit!

In a split second, we rush forward and throw our sword at the herd, as it were a boomerang, as we take aim with the rifle.

The sword crushes two Lasers and we manage to strike down the remaining ones along Fukuha. Okamoto and Onda are clearing the Tanks on our flanks, while Fukuha moves to cover our rear.

"Amanohara! How are you? Any injuries?!"

"F-Fine, sir. I've sustained no injuries, but some of my sensors are out of order. I can still move, do not worry." Sigh, she's alright. Still can't remember where I heard her voice, though.

"Glad to see you're fine. Lock onto our IFF and follow us. Alright, team. Out of here!"

"Roger!"

The TSFs fly towards the blue dots on the map, the signals of our allies, but slowly everything loses color again. The shapes get blurred, the sounds begin to resemble an echo, and in the end, after some blinks, everything is distorted into that gray abstract thing.

She must be exerting herself, this was more than enough for today.

"Kasumi, it's fine. Don't push yourself, take me back."

"But…"

"C'mon, you've done enough today. This is much more than what we saw yesterday, don't exert yourself."

"Uuh… Fine."

I feel my body being detached from somewhere, a very familiar place. Feeling as if I was going back to the surface of a pool after taking a dive, like I was this morning when trying to release myself from the prison that was the cushy hold of my pillow, I slowly regain my own senses and open my eyes. Even the low light in the room looks terribly bright right now to me.

"How are you feeling, Takeru-san?"

"… Hmm? Kasumi?" Why is she looking at me from above? Where…

I was resting my head on her lap. Slowly raising up, feeling even more stiff than yesterday, gotta use a hand to support me as it felt as if my battery was flashing red. I blink a few times and finally feel like I'm back, swaying a bit and rubbing my forehead.

"You took quite a lot of time to come back." She rubs the top of my head slowly in a circular motion.

"What? What hour is it?"

"A bit past midnight." She says as she takes out a clock from one of her pockets.

"Damn, didn't think I would get so exhausted. Ugh… But it was totally worth it. How are you feeling, Kasumi?"

"I'm fine. I drank something and ate some fruits and got better." She smiles as she gets up. "I already reported the results to the Professor, so don't worry about that."

"Thanks a lot, Kasumi." I pat her head, she moves her bunny ears. I yawn, stretching as I also get up, moving my ankles to make sure my legs are awake and ready. "Ugh… This was completely different than last time, though. I could actually somehow feel the same as him, and we saw so much more today."

"Yes, now that I know what to do it will get easier. It is still very tiring." She drop her shoulders as her eyes half close looking downwards.

"Wanna take tomorrow off? I'd be bad if you collapsed because we were trying to rush this."

"But… We have to make you regain those memories as soon as possible." She protested firmly, moving her bunny ears up and down a few times.

"Kasumi, there's no way we can regain years of memories in a few days without that harming us somehow. Let's take it easy. That, and I can only handle so much badassery at a time." Some of his movements were actually good, his sidesteps are more coordinated than mine, his slashes follow a similar but more concise pattern. I'll try them out during tomorrow's practice.

"If you say so. How do you feel? Do you want something to eat?" She hands me some chocolate which I accept.

We talked for a while on how the memory projection felt. After that I returned to my cell.

This time was like nothing before, I could feel his laughter, his nervousness, the smile on his face, his fire as he motivated his men. I still can't remember who Amanohara was, but I feel like I do know her.

He was someone important to be in charge of a Squad during such a mission, and for it to need to remain hidden as well. Swordbreakers, huh? In a nation with a sword fetish as high as the Empire, to have that name on a squad…

Well, I have no idea what the mission was about or where it happened. I'll have to wait until after tomorrow to see if I can get some concise answers. However, going by that little exchange with the Fukuha guy, at that point he was already against the ways of the Royal Guard. I wonder why those two Pickles weren't with him on that mission, or who Hikami is. I'll ask Sensei tomorrow, hopefully she won't just give me the silent treatment.

Oh well, let's just go to sleep. Rinsing my mouth and washing my face, I rub my feet for a while before getting in the bed. Hm… My nails are getting out of control, should have brought my small kit from my room. I'll have to ask for permission to go get it tomorrow.

" Yawn… Damn… I'm beat…"

As soon as I laid my head on the pillow, all the heaviness I was holding back came at me, I yawned again as I curled to a side, rubbing a cheek against the pillow.

Sure hope tomorrow goes well too…

I really don't need the General or the Pickles… getting in the way…

Yawn… Let's hope… the training starts with… the right…

Zzz…

Chapter 33: Reluctance

---

November 26th. Around Noon.

(Track Field.)

[Kei]

---

Panting, almost feeling like if I lose any speed I'll fall over, I continue to run. Those two annoying ponytails being ahead of me, almost as if I were following her line.

"… So, you still think… he's a normal cadet?"

"He just… is very talented." She retorts, trying to not lose breath or speed.

Yeah, right. Shirogane bested the preliminary level during this morning practice. In his first try. Trampling the best record by a factor of five, add that to his already large list of oddities.

He even had the balls to try and give us some pointers, acting all friendly. In no way a normal person could attain such aptitude by mere independent training, even a genius would take time adapting to the controls, anyone would make mistakes in their first piloting sessions, no matter how tiny.

But you don't, Special-kun.

"Ayamine, please stop showing such open enmity towards Shirogane." Mitsurugi, catching up behind me, said. "He has… his own reasons to possess such skill."

"And he can't tell us because…"

"Because it's tied to his prior location." Arching her brows, me slowing down to run by her side, she sighs in thankfulness. "Surely you do remember what occurred… to Yukon Base merely some months ago?"

"… So that's where he was?"

"Indeed. He requested me and Sakaki to not divulge the details, however, he has a valid reason to… have cleared Level D as fast as he did."

"And why didn't you said anything?"

Suspicious, too suspicious. Mitsurugi never would hesitate to defend someone, nor would she remain quiet if she could prevent an issue by being frontal.

"… He asked us to remain quiet, and it is a serious matter for him. Furthermore, I believe it best if Shirogane himself decided when to speak of it with the rest." Looking right at me, an avalanche would have less impulse than her gaze, she may be stomping her boots as hard as she can to keep up the pace, yet her words flew out with far more vigor than our stride.

"… Got it. My bad."

"No, I wasn't placing blames on your shoulders." As sincere and open as habitual, that's what I like about you. "However, there is little reason to ignore him as you did earlier. Shirogane was merely trying to be attentive after his performance."

"… I see."

Maybe I let the frustration of, yet again, being on the same spot as the princess control me. But if she says this much… What happened to him? Was he forced to pilot against his will? I don't understand why she would refuse to speak of…

Hmm… Oh, right. Special-kun said once… that he got someone killed. And yet, he could so easily murder those soldiers…

No, he was rather down when we met again back at the base… Am I the asshole right now, then? I guess that, by screening him out, all I did was sour the mood for the rest. It still doesn't sit right with me, how easily they're letting it slide. He killed our fellows, he actually did it himself. All that I had to go through after Mom and Dad… Why do you get forgiven so fast? What didn't I do?

As the laps kept going, as it felt as if my socks were getting ingrained in between my fingers, my mind replayed the video footage that was shown on the monitor of his run. Again, as a soldier, I've nothing but respect. But it's too odd, too out of place. He did some… unorthodox movements at times, yet it is obvious Special-kun knows the basics already, at the least. Why? Why does he inspires such trust in the rest? I was always… doing my best and trying to help… and all I got were screams from the princess and some nods from Tamase, whenever she actually tried to be part of the conversation that is.

Slowing down, jogging away from the track once I finished my run, my boots dragged themselves to a tap, refreshing myself. While I didn't expect the Instructor to ease up, having to run right after the sim practice is truly a new flavor of hell. Luckily, today is yakisoba sandwich day.

"Well, Tamase is already finished." The princess said, tapping her glasses. "Are you all ready to go get lunch?"

Yoroi and Mitsurugi agree, I nod, Tamase hurries up to drink some water and wash her face. All together, we return to the barracks to wash ourselves properly, they debating the trainings as we did.

"Um, Ayamine-san?" Tamase had come to my side, both of us walking behind the rest.

"What's up?"

"How did you manage to maneuver through those two buildings at the middle of the test?" Speaking slowly, a hand on an elbow, she almost gave me a small bow when asking.

"Hm? I just tried to position myself for the next jump, by making a dash through the opening." But then, I got shot down by one of those odd giant balls they use as the targets.

"I see… So you were trying to prepare another jump then."

"Yeah, I don't have your shooting, so all I can do is try to put some distance between me and the targets."

"Come on, my shooting isn't that great… I even ended up failing the run because I ran out of time." And again, she sighs and, well, everything in her hunches over.

"But you didn't get hit. Good job." I pat her shoulder, giving her a thumbs up.

She truly did a great job in there, she did miss some shots but not a single target made contact with her during the run. She's the only one, bar Special-kun, who didn't sustain any damage at all.

"Ahaha… Thanks, really. So, um, would you like to accompany me to the library before dinner to reread some of the chapters about tactics?"

"Sure."

"Hey, hey, what're you talking about?" Yoroi slowed down, coming near.

"I was just asking Ayamine-san if she didn't mind coming with me to the library later, to review some of the controls and maneuvers in the manuals. Would you like to join us, Yoroi-san?"

"Sure thing! Though, I still can't believe the amount of targets we have to deal with near the end." She sighs, scratching her head.

Yoroi also did very well, scoring third place in the run. I didn't think she'd move so nimbly in a TSF, and her aim also isn't anything to scoff at. Sure, Mitsurugi handled herself better and received less damage, which is why she got second place, but Yoroi's performance was better than mine for sure. She may always seem to be in the clouds, but can also get shit done when it counts.

"Damn right, can't believe they sent three at us at the same time." If it hadn't been for that, I would have passed the very first course at least. Nothing like Special-kun who cleared the whole level, but still making progress.

"I do agree that, perhaps, the last segment is unnecessarily treacherous." Mitsurugi joined in, her arms folded as she nodded. "I barely managed to react on time to the threat."

"Regardless, you and Yoroi managed to complete your first run." She taps her glasses, sadly joining in as well. "I was thinking on going to the library after the afternoon course, what are your plans?"

"Me, Kei-san, and Miki-san were going before dinner, to get a small breather." She answers for us, not noticing how the princess' eyes narrowed as she did.

"I see. Perhaps we could all go together, then. Mitsurugi, would you happen to have plans already?"

"… I am planning on taking some time for myself, there is something I need to look into." Looking away, sounding solemn, yet another wall erected between us.

"I see. Then, what about going to the library after the next training?" Tapping her glasses, looking away from Mitsurugi, away from the rift, she yet again tried to make us do what she wants to do.

Looking at Tamase, the hand on her elbow is rubbing it over and over, in a slow but constant rhythm. She's slightly looking down, her lower lip pursed. But she won't speak up. If the princess asks directly she'll just say yes, to not be a bother.

"Sorry, I'm going before dinner." She sends me another narrowed gaze, crossing her arms.

"And, why is that? We could all debate together on our impressions after our first formal day of training, that would benefit the squad as a whole, to compare our logs and find ways to improve together." Then, for some reason, she rose a finger up and started to make circles in the air. "So, it would be better for us to at least do a small review together."

Tamase kept looking away from us, her steps becoming a bit delayed. She should know how sensitive Tamase is to the whole 'for the better of the team' approach. Why can't she piss off and let us progress at our own pace? It's not like we passed the CCSE because of her. Some squad leader you are, you ended up being more of a dead weight than anyone else.

"Don't feel like it. I'll hit the books by dusk."

"Sigh… Why must you always act on your own like this?" Frowning much, she rose both hands up, looking away. "Fine, study by yourself. Don't come complaining at us when you keep making amateur mistakes."

"… Why don't you save those words for when you can actually pilot better than the rest, princess?"

"What was that?"

"You heard me. You're not the ace of the squad, you don't have any right to go around dissing or bossing us around. Seems to me like this is you trying to get Yoroi and Tamase to show you their maneuvering and shooting data."

"You…" She stops walking, facing me as she frowns.

"Sakaki, stop!" Mitsurugi grabs her shoulder, preventing her from getting closer. "We cannot start this again."

"Stand back, Mitsurugi. Ayamine, what is it with you now?"

"I won't let you diss me. A squad leader that's dead weight on the CCSE, who can't even get a single, decent score in her training has no right to be bossing us around as you do."

"First, I wasn't dead weight. And if we're going by the scores, you're tied with me."

Tch… That's only because I tried to actually clear the mission instead of playing it safe like you always do. I got shot down instead of receiving high damage, that's the only reason I got the same score as you.

"And unlike you, I'm trying to help the whole squad. Study by yourself if you want, keep that poker face you always make, but can you stop getting in our way if you don't have anything to contribute?"

"Sakaki-san, that's going too far!" She finally spoke up, still holding her elbow despite how she was, very subtly at it, quivering.

"Yeah, we can't start fighting again!" Yoroi said, placing herself between us.

"She started it, I'm just drawing the line." She shrugs, rolling her eyes.

"You didn't ask for our input, as soon as I spoke you got all pissed off. Some leader you are." She gritted her teeth, Mitsurugi sighed as she shook her head, and Yoroi looked back at me while furrowing her brows.

"Kei-san, please stop this!"

"Why? You okay with being bossed around without a care?"

"Well… But that's not what's going on here."

"I was taking into account our combined goals." Tapping her glasses, she exhales through her nose. "While I am the leader and I could order you around, I was asking you what you thought, and you immediately chose to answer aggressively. You're the one at fault here, Ayamine." Again raising a finger, her tone also did the same.

"Ever heard of asking for an opinion? Don't recall you asking me or Tamase our plans before you tried to make us agree to yours."

"… Huh?" Her stride halted, she blinks quickly while looking at me, then at Tamase. "Don't use her as a shield for your-"

"Why don't you ask her, then?" I then tap her shoulder, giving her a nod. Still rubbing her elbow, she takes a step forward.

"… I… I wanted to write a letter today, for my Papa, so, um… I can't… go to study after the trainings…"

"… I see. Sigh… You should just have said so."

"W-Well… I… I was… Um…"

"You started preaching about the team, made her feel bad for not coming along." Mitsurugi and Yoroi shoot me a glare, I shrug.

"Sakaki, I believe this little discussion has been solved." Mitsurugi said, caressing her hair. "Ayamine, you shouldn't have reacted as you did. Assuming Sakaki had ill intentions won't do us any favors."

"Not my fault she can't ask for an opinion before shoving hers down our throats."

"What was that?! You're the one who's always blowing everything out of proportion!" Again frowning and with that damn finger up doing circles, her voice rose to even more annoying levels.

"Who was the one who dissed the other first again?"

"Ugh… You could have simply told me Tamase wanted to study later." Folding her arms she looks away, from me and her own faults while trying to keep a expression as neutral as the UN.

"C-Come on, you two." Yoroi hesitantly steps back, giving both of us a look. "This was just a misunderstanding."

"Indeed. I am convinced none of us here are wishing to be subjected to yet another lecture on teamwork by the Instructor." Mitsurugi nods to herself, folding her arms.

"Um…" Again grabbing her elbow, again looking down. "I'm sorry, I should have spoken out by myself."

"… No, Ayamine is partly right." Oh goddammit, how thick can she be? Partly my ass, it was your miss. "My apologies, Tamase. I suppose I should begin by asking your opinions before anything." Tapping her glasses, she sighs. Then, she looks at me. "That being said, you could try to be more direct next time."

"… Sorry, Tamase. Didn't meant to put pressure on you." She shakes her head, giving me a smile. You're too good to be a soldier.

"… Aren't you forgetting something, Ayamine?" Raising the finger, she eyed me sideways.

"… Oh, right. Today is yakisoba day, don't have time to waste on you."

"Wha… Why, you-"

"Chizuru-san, no! Kei-san, you too!" Pouting much, she again placed herself between us.

"Sigh… By goodness." Again sending a hand to the ponytail, she gave us a worried look. "Despite everything, Ayamine is right. We are tardy for the PX. Let's leave this matter behind."

"Yes, please stop fighting!" Tamase also chimed in, doing an effort to frown and seem upset. A caterpillar would certainly instill more fear in the CO than her on us right now.

"Don't worry, won't let her get under my skin." Nodding her way, I could practically hear the princess' groans.

"Mmgh… Sigh… Fine, let's just go." We start walking, me behind Tamase and near a wall. "So, are you in agreement to study before dinner then?"

I nod, Yoroi also does the same, Mitsurugi says that in that case she can also join in, Tamase thanks them, and we continue walking on. Yoroi again tried to engage us in one of her ramblings, so I used that opening to relieve some tension by joking about the news.

Still, the nerve. Must be nice in that glass house of yours, seeing nothing wrong with your own behavior. She was the one who pushed the issue and resorted to insults. I was an idiot for thinking that the test had changed her way of being.

The sun coming in strongly through the windows, Kyozuka-san shouting at someone who didn't want to get beans in the rice, the usual ruckus of the PX welcomed us as we got close to the entrance. The line was larger than usual, thanks to us wasting time, but luckily we all could get our full plate.

"And 'ere, some extra yakisoba for you, Ayamine." She gives me her usual grin, placing an extra sandwich on my plate.

"Thanks, Ma'am." Giving her a bow and a smile, that only makes hers grow even more.

"Haha, don't mention it. Y'all started the pilot training, right? So, how's it goin'?"

"Well enough, we're doing fine."

"Good for y'all. So…" She furrows her brows, leaning in, covering her mouth, and speaking in a whisper. "…'bout that Shirogane… He still giving ya trouble?"

"… He's kinda odd, but at least he isn't bothering me."

"I see. That's good to hear. Keep up the good work, girl. And if ya need an ear, ya know where to find me." Again grinning my way, I nodded back and gave her a small bow.

Going my way to the table, I wonder why she asked me that. What are people saying of Special-kun now? He never had a good reputation, so maybe there are people who only heard of him killing people and are spreading a rumor or something? I mean, he did help Mitsurugi. I do recognize that. But I can't speak up, if someone links me to him, I'm done for. It's back to being constantly badmouthed behind my back like when I just got here at the start of the year.

Sitting down by Tamase's side, with the other three in front of us, we began to eat, discussing what we thought of the trainings so far.

" Did ya see? He ain't around today, either."

Hm? Are those people… Yep, looking around our way, even if they're trying to be subtle. Subtle as a brick, and thick as the princess' eyebrows.

" Told you the guy was a bastard. That's why they have him under surveillance." Another 'whispered' to the group.

" I heard he killed some of our men when they were unarmed, even threatened the squad to fail the test if they rattled him out."

… It's the same they did with me.

Whenever I was late for the PX, they would say I was looking for things to break, for ways to sabotage the UN. Saying I was planning to steal, that I was doing comforting duties for a high rank, and all kinds of shit. Clamping the lips and deafening myself was all I could do. And thankfully, no one bothers me now. But no one spoke out for me, save for Kyozuka-san.

I know they're lying. Special-kun didn't kill unarmed soldiers, and he didn't threaten us. Those chasers also attacked us three, so I can sort of understand how he could have been left out of choices… but he still resorted to killing. Does that make it okay to ignore these lies? I have no choice but to do so. If I speak up, they'll lump me together with him, then it's back to daily hell.

… But it's unfair. And, if he… was in that base when that terrorist attack happened, then I suppose… he could have been made to fight. He wasn't lying when I questioned him either. Munching on my sandwich, closing my eyes, I can do nothing but listen in.

"Excuse me." Tapping her glasses, and with the other hand pressed onto Mitsurugi's arm, the princess turned around. "Would you happen to be speaking of my squadmate?"

"Huh?" The man blinked for a second, not expecting a reaction. "Oh… Yeah, that bastard. You got my sympathy for being paired up with that-"

"Could you kindly retract your words?" Crossing her arms, narrowing her eyes, she shot them a glare.

What the hell is going on here? Is she… speaking up so that Mitsurugi doesn't have to?

"… Huh, so that's how is it." A woman that was seated on that table, leaned her cheek on a hand, smirking. "Guess you don't like us speaking bad of your man."

"If you don't realize the folly that is speaking behind someone's back without knowing anything, then I will have to again ask you to take back those words."

"I, too, must ask you to refrain from speaking in such a way towards him." Mitsurugi, folding her arms and squinting her eyes, glared at them.

"Ah… No, I mean… Didn't that guy… you know…"

"If you're referring to the accidents, yes, he had to." Raising a finger again, she sighed before brushing some hair off her face. "To protect us, because those soldiers were trying to maim all five of us."

"Eh?! But… that American-"

"He's Japanese, and protected us against his better interests. Please take your words back." Tapping her glasses, she insisted. Mitsurugi was giving them all a stern look, nodding to the words.

The tables around us simply fell silent, some wide eyed, others looking away, others standing up and leaving. The man fumbled an apology before turning back, the woman simply left in a hurry.

"… Such foolhardy way of being." Mitsurugi whispers, coiling a fist.

"I don't know what I expected from the UN." Tapping her glasses, she fumes as she drinks some juice.

"Are you sure that was a good idea, Chizuru-san? I mean, we're just cadets."

"There's no way we could just let that go, can we?" Raising a finger again, Mitsurugi nodded to her words.

"I wonder how Shirogane-san is taking all this…" Hunching over, her fork stopped cold.

"… Why did you do that?" I couldn't help but ask.

"Huh? What do you mean?" Raising one of those thick eyebrows, she looked up my way.

"Why did you speak out for him?"

"What? Because they were speaking ill of him, of course!"

"You could have ignored it."

"Don't be ridiculous! In no way I would let anyone spread such baseless accusations towards of one of my squadmates."

"… Then, why didn't you do the same for me back then?"

Her mouth hanging open, she can't find an answer. Because she doesn't have one.

"Ayamine, Sakaki didn't mean… anything by remaining quiet back then." Her tone slower than usual, a hand tracing her fringe. "We all were getting acquainted to the UN, so everybody was merely exercising caution on how to deal with the issues the others may have. Which is why we placed the policy in the first place, and, well, since you never requested our aid, I personally didn't think it wise to speak out of turn without knowing if you'd welcome the intrusion."

"… I see." Gulping down what's left of my juice in one go, munching down the remaining half of my sandwich, I then pick up the tray and stand up.

"Ah, Kei-san! We didn't-"

"Later."

Picking up speed, I go to the counter and leave the tray. Looking down, I leave towards the barracks, to get my books for the short lecture we have before the afternoon training.

Same day. Around an hour after that.

(Sim Room.)

[Takeru]

---

Yawn… Man, what a pain this is.

The stock Fubuki appears in my sight, not even moving. The shots are fired without me needing to align them well, without actually testing my precise shooting. Down it goes in stock explosions, another appears shortly after crouching by a building a bit farther ahead.

While getting the hang out of this OS again isn't exactly easy, these fights aren't really doing much for me either. But I can't steamroll through all of this or the girls will get all paranoid again. Level D with all the basic drills was a chore to deal with, and these first two missions of C aren't exactly challenging in the slightest since assisted aim is on, the enemies don't move, and they also don't attack immediately.

Really, training with Valgern-On would be far better than this, other than for getting used to the shaking, but it could be done in a better way. Sigh… However, Sensei said she didn't want to give us the XM3 yet, and if I press her anymore, with how pissed she was yesterday night for some reason, that won't end good.

I finish off the last Fubuki and quickly shoot a volley at the sudden shadow, flinching a bit at the alarm. I was kind of doing things on auto, so that shook me wide awake.

"Exercise C-8 completed. Well done, Cadet Shirogane." Takamura grins in the projection. "You achieved yet another record time, congratulations."

"I see. Good to know. Is this all for today?"

"Yes, that shall be all. Unbolt yourself and come on out." Cutting the connection, the projection also disappears and I'm back at the cockpit.

Once I'm done and ready to get out, moving my neck as I do, I spot Mikoto coming out as well from her pod, followed by Tama on the next one.

"Hey. How was your run?"

"Oh, mine wasn't all that bad." Mikoto smiles, coming to my side as we walk. "I got to the last mission in Level D just now. Didn't expect another of those flying balls at the end, though."

"So, you couldn't complete it?"

"No, the alarm also caught me off guard, so I messed up my shot's timing." She sighs, scratching her head.

"Yeah, that alarm is truly scary." Tama quivers a bit. "But your tips were very useful, Shirogane-san. Thanks to that I also reached the last mission in Level D today, but I failed it too."

"I see. That's good to hear, you two. That's awesome progression for a first day." Giving them a thumbs up, they chuckle as we get to the open area.

Tama always has problems with her pace. It was why she got taken out in that mock battle where Kei and Chizuru just refused to cooperate until the last minute. She's too cautious, so she's the one who's less likely to commit to a full boost dash or even try to engage at melee. So, I simply told her that it's better to screw up at the start, and that she shouldn't discard being more offensive, like she was during our match in Valgern-On with the Game Guy, by first mastering dashes and firing as she did so.

Mikoto, on the other hand, is the one who is always trying to outmaneuver the opponent, so I told her to be more concise, to shoot first and move later, or do both as she keeps the distance. That way, just like my world's Mikoto, she can get more done in the same move. Instead of always looking for a vantage point, she should polish her already good instinct for dashes to force mistakes on the opponent. This will let her see her potential for midrange shooting faster, while also teaching her the importance of spacing for whenever we get the XM3.

Getting back to the Instructor, Meiya was again shaking her head as Kei and Chizuru were with their back turned to each other. Let me guess… those two couldn't get close to clearing Level D today.

"Alright, squad, line up!" We do as ordered, I eye those two as we did.

Chizuru has the inner side of her brows firmly planted down, her arms glued to her sides. Kei had her poker face as usual, but her hands were coiled a bit too tightly. Sigh…

"You've done spectacular progress for a first formal day. Shirogane has already taken on Level C, and Mitsurugi, Yoroi, and Tamase are at the last movement exercise as well. While Sakaki and Ayamine found some setbacks, they're also close by. This was a much better first day than many others squads enjoyed, congratulations." She smirks, so we can't really celebrate. She must have something up her sleeve. "So, we shall keep this schedule of a small lecture to then come to train. I trust you shall be able to keep up with the reading, seeing your performance just now. Well, that's that. Dismissed!"

"Salute!"

The Instructor goes her way, Takamura also does, at least to wait nearby until I get changed.

She did offer the girls her help, but it looks like they're going to read up stuff this night. Luckily, they all were more than willing to have her help in the trainings, so that's one concern less.

"So, how were your runs?" Asking the other three, I smile their way as we begin to walk out of the sim room.

"Mine was most challenging. It was truly complex to maintain my speed while not losing balance." Meiya says, again folding her arms as always. "However, your advice was truly helpful, Shirogane. I had not yet noticed my aim was being assisted in any way."

"That's true, however I still can't handle the full speed of the machine." Chizuru sighs, dropping her shoulders. "I cannot understand how you can endure the shaking of a full dash for so long."

"Eh, it's all a matter of practice. I can handle the G-Forces, but even then it's not like I'm going to have it easy either."

"By the way, Special-kun…" Kei had gotten closer, yet was still giving me a side glance. "What were those odd moves you were pulling?"

"… Which of all of them?"

"You know, when you landed with a single feet. What was that?"

"Oh, I was just trying to do a sidestep." Like I saw in that memory of his fight.

"… Huh, and why did you?"

"I thought it was a good idea." But sadly, I can't seem to get the timings right. If I had the XM3 I could do it, but with the stiffer controls… I truly got spoiled by the superior OS. "I mean, at some point the enemies will start attacking us seriously, right? We can't count on them acting so dumb all the time."

"So that's what you were thinking then." Meiya nods, a hand on her chin. "Would you mind sharing the reasoning behind it?"

"I guess? It's more of a gut feeling than anything. I was just trying to have a way to move out from the line of fire without using the boosters."

"Sigh… Shirogane-kun, you may be very talented, but do try to stick to the curriculum. The Instructor will get upset if you keep trying those odd moves."

"I know, I just thought it was worth it. By the by, what did you guys have the most trouble with?" Looking at Chizuru and Kei, one sighs and shrugs, the other gives me another side glance.

"I'm merely getting used to the speed, that's all." Raising both hands in defeat, Chizuru shakes her head.

"What about you, Ayamine?"

"… I'm fine, I'll clear it next time."

"Come on, don't be like that. If you got problems with your shooting, why not rely on your squadmates?"

"I can manage on my own, thanks."

Sigh… You stubborn, hard-headed, bull. I can tell she's in a bad mood for some reason, maybe they had another argument, or maybe she still has something against me. However, I can't just ignore this. I need her to be better. And yet, if I keep pushing she'll get in an even worse mood, she doesn't like me much to begin with. What should I-

"Look Ayamine, this isn't basic anymore." Raising a finger and doing circles, Chizuru gave her a frontal stare. "We are training to become pilots now, all together. If one falls behind, all of us pay for it, right?"

"Yeah, I know. You saying I'll fail the course?"

"No, but if you don't improve, you'll only hamper the rest. Why not just admit what you're having trouble with?" She is trying to be less confrontational, by her standards, but still…

Kei looks away, poker face in place. We keep walking, but no one says anything. Chizuru taps her glasses, sighing a mountain off. Tama and Mikoto keep switching glances between them. Sigh… Guess it's better if I take the fall.

"Hey Ayamine, you really think none of us can lend you a hand?" Giving a look to Chizuru so that she desists, I then look at Kei, whose brows lower a bit.

"No, not saying that. I can handle this by myself."

"I mean, I'm sure you can. But we're comrades, so we should lend a hand if we can. No one can protect its life alone, right?" Chizuru twitched when she heard me, Kei frowned and looked away. "And believe me, I know how frustrating it is to hit your head against a wall you can't overcome. All the tips I'm giving you guys are what my old squadmates told me about when I was down on my luck."

That seems to have taken all of 'em by surprise, eyes as watermelons, brows up above the clouds.

"Really?" Again back to the poker face, she holds my gaze.

"Yeah."

"… For real?" She gets close, eyes narrowed as she scans my face.

"Yes, it's the truth." And it is, I'm just telling you what you guys told me during my first loops when I couldn't get better, when we trained together to become better, when… we were more than squadmates.

"So don't close up, you're not worse for relying on others. As part of the military, we have to do all we can for our people, right?"

"Eh?" Eyes wide, she got tilted. Well, I kinda expected that reaction.

"Yeah, we gotta do all we can for the rest, and that includes our comrades, right?"

"… I guess… I guess so." She looks away, pursing her lips a bit.

"All of us are in this together, so don't hesitate to ask." Smiling at her, I then step aside. "Tama and Mikoto can lend you a hand when it comes to sniping. Right, guys?" Looking back at the smaller duo, taken aback a bit, they both nodded.

"Yeah, let's all work together, Ayamine-san." Tama comes closer, smiling her way. Mikoto also nods towards Kei, scratching her head.

"Well… I do need some help with my aim…" I knew having Tama help her would get Kei to agree. Meiya smiles, nodding at the exchange, while Chizuru heaves a sigh.

"Kei-san, maybe you should focus on your sniping for awhile? Your midrange seemed good enough to me on the monitor." Oh right, Kei's sniping sucks. Like, for real. She's as bad at sniping as I am at history.

"Ugh… I'll polish my good traits first."

"That is a fair strategy, indeed." Nodding twice, Meiya played with her fringe. "It wouldn't do any of us good to overcompensate in our less stellar areas."

"You say that because your sniping sucks too, don't you?"

"Wha… T-That is not true!" Pouting much, she folded her arms real tight.

"No, Shirogane-kun is right. Both of you were adept at CQC, so it is understandable that you're facing trouble now that the training is mostly against ranged targets at the beginning." Tapping her glasses, she smiled at Tama. "I believe Tamase could give you two quite some lessons tonight."

"Your sniping also sucks, leader." Kei narrowed her eyes with a smirk, Chizuru, who wasn't expecting the retort, was left with her mouth half open.

"Yes, but I am asking for advice on how to improve. Perhaps you should follow my example?" God, why can't you two have a peaceful conversation for once?!

"Please cease this petty argument, both of you." Meiya shook her head, then giving both of them a hard stare. "Such infighting will give us no boons in our trainings."

"Then Mitsurugi, what is your plan to polish our rough skills?" Chizuru tapped her glasses, arching a brow.

"I do not know."

"Huh? What is that supposed to mean?"

"That a single day of training isn't enough for me to formulate a definitive answer, I've had no time to analyze and ponder on the piloting as it is. If you wish to hear a biased emotional argument I can comply, yet I doubt that would do us much good."

Oh God, not this again. Chizuru is trying harder not to snap, drop the subject, or just use an order to end the argument, she only wants to help all of us improve. Meiya, who is even more dedicated to her training in this world, simply doesn't want to give her opinion when she feels it lacks substance and is upset at how heated this is getting. And Kei simply refuses to back down when she's seeing this as Chizuru's way of forcing us to see things her way.

"Guys, let's just all calm down." They look my way, lips plucked, brows furrowed. "I already gave this squad enough shit to deal with. If you don't chill down, I'm gonna tell the Instructor on you."

Shocked as Sumika was when I gave her my very first well cooked pizza, scared as I was whenever Meiya marched into the kitchen, they looked to the ground. Sigh… NotMarimo-chan to the rescue.

"Um… We can still try harder every day." Tama said, almost stuttering. "So, uh, if anyone wants advice I'm always open." Smiling as sweetly as usual, the air around us was cleared up as those three gave a nod in response. Thanks, Tama.

"Same here. If anyone wants my logs or any advice, just drop it on me and I'll see what I can do." Winking at them with a thumbs up, they all give a nod.

"Exactly, let us all work together from now on." Tapping her glasses, she smiled towards me and Tama. "The simulations have only just begun, and it will take much until we learn to properly pilot."

"That might be true, but it's also really fun to practice!" Mikoto, however, didn't give a shit about the conversation as usual and, smile plastered, began to gush out about her runs.

Hahaha… You're still as deliberately deaf as usual.

"Yoroi-san, don't start again!" Tama tried, in vain, to halt her stride.

"But it's the truth! Yeah, it shakes a lot, but the rush of speed is better than I thought it would be!" Smiling much, she was practically rebounding against herself again.

And they would be better if they had the XM3, though. Sadly, that's locked down for now.

"In any case, even if my sniping isn't as good as Tamase's or Shirogane-kun's, it is better than yours." Meiya and Kei couldn't help but to narrow their brows. "What I have trouble with is with the rush Yoroi just mentioned. So, us three need to polish our weak points. Otherwise, the Instructor will either give us more assignments or make us run more laps before lunch." Then, the other four looked as grim as I did after receiving my math tests back in middle school.

"Huh? Why would she? I mean, if you're still making some progress, that's enough, right?"

"Shirogane, you have already reached Level C." Meiya couldn't hide the embers in her tone. "She will assuredly drive us to match your performance. We have to redouble our efforts, I for one have no intention to remain behind in the trainings." Then, all five of them nodded, fire burning within their eyes.

"Alright, you do you, just don't overload your engine or you'll get busted."

"Huh? Busted?" Here we go again.

"You know, exhausted?"

"… I see." Confused as always, she blinks in quick succession while folding her arms. Mikoto giggles, as does Tama, and Chizuru sighs. "In any case, we need to catch up to you, and quickly. As Sakaki said, I do not wish to bring upon myself further laps at noon."

"Oh, that means we should carefully shift our focus and put some accel in our stride." Mikoto says, chuckling to herself.

"Huh? Yoroi-san, what do you mean?"

"That you five gotta grip onto the training, or you're gonna slide off the course." Nodding at her, we both chuckle. Tama tilts her head, not understanding.

"Shirogane-kun, what are you on about?"

"Chizuru-san, we're merely saying that we need to gain some traction in the trainings."

"Yeah, we gotta be careful to not end up spinning on the road. Right, Mikoto?" She nods, both of us grinning.

"That's right. Otherwise, the Instructor is gonna push us to a wipeout."

"… Sakaki, do you understand what they're saying?" Meiya asks, arms folded and tilting her head.

"No, I've no idea." Tapping her glasses, she gives us a hard stare.

"Seems like the squad leader didn't catch your drift. What a shame." Kei joins in, smirking from ear to ear. Chizuru groans at her, but manages to not retort.

"Huh? Ayamine-san, you know what they're trying to say?" Tama asked, eyes wide.

"Well, kinda. I guess the transmission just failed." You just wanted to keep poking fun at Chizuru, as always.

"Yeah, the message just went under the hood." Mikoto and Kei chuckle, Tama and Meiya raise a brow.

"Stop with the secret code. Shirogane-kun, what are you trying to say?"

"Okay, don't get mad Sakaki. I'll give you a brake, alright?" Mikoto holds her mouth as she laughs, Kei snickers, Chizuru's brows are twitching.

"… I still do not comprehend what is going on here." Meiya shakes her head, oblivious to the joke.

Same day. A few minutes after 7 PM.

(A hallway near the Food Storage.)

---

Another day of delivering reports, the project seems to be going well. The training also started better than last loop, we managed to stop Kei and Chizuru from fighting again, and the girls agreed to let Takamura help them from time to time.

Having her watching over me hasn't given me much trouble so far, but you never know. Sensei didn't call for me today, I could work to my leisure, no one from the Guard approached me. Everything seems calm.

I again got D rank rations, so I guess Sensei is doing her thing. The attendant is still not even looking my way, but it is what it is. I'm starving, so I better get to Takamura's office quickly. She insists I eat with her, since it seems she has things to ask. Oh well, let's just keep the facade up.

As I was getting closer to her office, I obviously started to run into more and more people in the hallways, and that meant more and more whispers and mean looks. I tend to forget about it when I'm with the girls, since they're kinda chill now, but this world really is much different. I wonder why the hell it turned out this way. Maybe it was always like this but I was never 'on the other side'. Tsukuyomi-san and Meiya… were very rejecting towards me during the coup, to be fair.

I wonder if that's why you grew so hateful, so angry at the Guard. Did people treat you like this at some point? If this is how the UN is treating me, I don't wanna imagine what the Royal Guards would do to someone they deem a traitor. And yet, I don't feel that he completely hated them either, I don't feel the anger of the CCSE towards Takamura for example. Just what the hell happened to-

THUD!

Not paying attention as I walked near the wall, someone bumped their shoulder against me, almost like a tackle, and sent me to the ground.

"Oi, what are you doing? You should be careful we're you're walking, American."

A group of three soldiers, all Japanese, scowled at me. I was walking by the wall and there is plenty of space in the hallway. They did on purpose.

"… Sorry, sir. Won't happen again." Calm down… They want a reaction, and I won't give it to them.

"Tch… Damn scum…"

Narrowing their brows, they kicked my ration's pack towards a wall. Biting my lips, I stood up and picked it up, yet they didn't leave. They still were snickering at me.

"By the way… I thought you were under a punishment, right?" One said, raising a brow and a smirk as he came towards my right..

"Yes, that is correct, sir."

"Then, what the hell are you doing here? You should be going back to the cells." Another said, circling to my left.

"I was called by a superior to their office, so I shall be on my way." Taking a few steps back, I try to leave. But the last one stood in front of me, the one who kicked my rations away.

"Oh, really now? So you tackled a superior despite being called here outside of your orders, huh?"

"… I didn't tackle anyone. We just bumped onto each other."

"Huh? Are you blaming me for that, American? You were the one who wasn't even looking where you were walking, as if you owned the place."

God… What is it with this world? What the hell are you trying to accomplish? We're losing a war and this it what our soldiers are doing. It's because of idiots like this that we never made progress. To think they had to die to save the hides of these assholes is making me retch. None of you are worth the sacrifices we had to make.

"And? Come on, say something! Maybe we should report this to your Instructor…" He smirks, they all chuckle.

Sigh… You people… You really are not worth it. But I can't snap, won't let this idiots ruin my efforts to right the leaks. Restoring peace to this land takes priority over my urge to sink your teeth in.

"Feel free to do that if you want. Now, could you kindly move aside?"

"Eh? Wanna say that again, cadet?"

"I asked you to move aside, because someone is waiting for me." His smirk gone, the bastard frowns at me. Well, what did I expect? I am a stranger here.

"Someone doesn't know his place in-"

"What is going here?" A female voice came from behind him. Takamura's voice.

Briskly walking up to us, squinting her eyes, she eyed the three men one at a time.

"Ahem… You see 1st Lt., this American tackled one of us just now. We wanted him to apologize, but he wouldn't-"

"Is that so? Then, why were you surrounding him just now?" Brushing some hair aside, if looks could cut she would have given them a deep one right now.

"Eh? Well, because we can't allow an American to-"

"Would you drop the pretending already? I saw how you surrounded him as he simply tried to leave after apologizing. Furthermore, I doubt Cadet Shirogane would have tackled anyone as you said. He was too exhausted, after all."

I mean, that's why I fell so hard in the first place. Haven't had anything to eat since morning. It's a miracle I'm standing and managed to not lose it just now.

The three of them exchange a gaze, their lips twisting as they did. Barely managing to return the look she was giving them, forced as my manners were their poker faces. She remains composed and cool, yet readiness oozed from her posture.

Is this all an act? Doesn't seem like one, though. Why would she be defending me? To build trust so that I don't doubt her? If not for that… Why would a Royal Guard show me sympathy? What does she gain from that? Makes no sense.

"He still tackled one of us before, that's why we were asking him to apologize properly."

"Oh, truly? Cadet Shirogane, could you show me your rations?"

"Huh? Oh, here."

After passing her the pack, she moves it around a bit. The small rugged part where it was kicked facing up, dust sticked to the package.

"If I'm not mistaken, one of you did this. If he tackled you then, how did this happen to the package?"

"Eh… Uh, you see, it was… He dropped it when he tackled us and-"

"I suggest you to not repeat this foolishness." Narrowing her eyes, taking a step forward, she sent a hand to her hair. "Otherwise, I shall report this misconduct myself to your superiors. Shirogane, whatever does the XO do with those who do not follow her rules?"

"… You don't wanna know." For real.

But, like, damn, I didn't expect Takamura to, well, act like Tsukuyomi-san did. I guess our interactions did make me think she was being too polite… And she was, going by this. So she also has a menacing Royal Guard within herself…

"Uh, we… we were just…" All of them are sweating buckets right now, knees rumbling under the gaze of Takamura.

"We shall be taking our leave. Shirogane, follow me."

"Ah… Yes."

Walking right behind her, the three men seem to stay frozen for a second, then they seem to begin to argue with one another. Looking away from the sad spectacle, can't help but to bite my lips. Because people like that fill our army, because idiots like the gray haired bastard and that red haired bitch get to be in places they don't have the head to be in, things are as they are. Sure, they're just pawns in the end… But overlooking their conduct like this is a mistake. Though, forcing them to change won't help at all… Sigh… Just what the hell is wrong with this world?

"Cadet Shirogane, would you be alright?" Pulling me out from my head, Takamura gave me a worried glance.

"Yeah, I'm fine. Just nettled about it all, to be honest."

"I see… It must be infuriating, to be treated in such a way."

"Nah, at this point I'm used to it. That's just how people see me here."

"… Well, but it shouldn't be the norm." The inner side of her brows coming down, her lips a small line, she held my gaze. "You shouldn't normalize such behavior against your person."

"Most people are still talking behind my back, and I can't blame them after what I did. It is what it is."

"… You don't have to endure such treatment. I believe it best for you to speak of this with the XO, since she is your legal tutor."

Already tried that. There's nothing else to do. Haters are gonna hate, no matter what others tell them to do.

"It's alright, really. Thanks for helping me out, though."

"No, it was nothing. I thought you were going to bring up the XO to drive them away, or just walk past them if they grew more aggressive. Surely you weren't planning on letting them hit you?"

"Sigh… What else could I have done? It's cool, really. Thanks for helping out, and sorry for the trouble." Giving her a bow, her gaze drops like a brick on water. What's up with her now? "… Is there something wrong, 1st Lt.?"

"Well…. That it seems you have a very negative image of us, to the point that no words seem to dissuade you." Is she… going to report that to Yuuhi, maybe?

"They have the right reasons to dislike me. Taking it as I push forward is all I can do."

"That might be so, however, their behavior is not justified. We shouldn't… display such hostility towards foreigners after all."

We reach her office, entering it she sits in her chair behind the desk, a cardboard box to her left with her dinner at the ready. Taking out my rations, I sit down in front of her.

"Well, let us eat in peace for now."

"Yeah…"

"… Is there something you would like to talk about?"

"Um… 1st Lieutenant, you seemed really angry about how they were treating me, especially about how I had a bad image of you guys in general. Is there a reason why?"

Her words don't seem like a trap, for now. And seeing how she reacted then and how she's being now, I wonder what could make a Royal Guard, and someone like her, sympathize with me after what I did.

She looks at me, then at her plate. Grabbing a strand of hair, bringing some food to her mouth and munching it real slow, she then sighs.

"Because I used to be the same as them, so I can understand why you would begin to hoist animosity towards the Japanese within you."

"You mean… you used to be that harsh towards foreigners?" Grabbing a piece of dough fused together with peanut butter, I eye her as she eats, waiting for her to continue.

"Indeed. I was most abrasive whenever I had to interact with anyone that wasn't a fellow. In all honesty, when the railgun was first proposed to be a joint project with America, I vehemently refused it." She chuckles, ruffling her hair backwards. "During my stay at Yukon I learned… how foolish I was being. Therefore, I would like to show the rest what I learned, and is why I won't allow such hostilities to brew in my presence." Looking my way, she again gave me a serious gaze. "Please do not normalize this treatment, don't assume everyone here will be hostile to you. You have lived abroad, so you can show many the boons of cooperation with the world. Which is why accepting this treatment won't do you any favors."

"… I know. It's just… hard to deal with, to be honest."

"I can understand, I was…" Hanging her head, she sighs. "… undeservedly harsh to many when I first arrived at Yukon. In any case, you should not tolerate such obvious abuse from anyone."

"… I guess you're right. Thanks, 1st Lieutenant."

"No, as I said, it is nothing. I know it might be hard, to live under such harsh gazes, but while I do praise your composure, do remember you do not deserve further punishments." I nod, she then smiles. "Also, may I… ask you a personal question?"

"Sure, go ahead." Too hungry to scan her face and tone. She sounds honest, so no need to refuse.

"Why do you not retort when they called you an American?"

"Well, it would only have served to anger them more. No point in screaming into the void."

"Huh… I suppose. However, well, I still do not fully agree."

"May I ask why?"

"Well… There was someone like you in my past squad."

"How do you mean?"

"Someone who was shunned due to being an outsider." Her hands stopping, eyes almost closing, it sounds as if her mood fell down from a hive's monument. "You see, you reminded me of him when you spoke with such doubt towards how those men saw you. I do not wish you to fall to the same sinkhole he was in. After all… You are Japanese as well, there is no reason for you to be treated as an outsider here."

Looking straight at me, no delay in her last words, she wasn't lying or anything.

"Thanks, for real."

"There is no need. After all, you chose to come here alone instead of staying in Alaska. Surely your family must be worried about you back in the US, if they heard of your hardships here."

"… Family, huh."

"… Um, would it be troublesome matter for you?"

"No, it's just… Well, I don't know where my family is."

"Have you… lost contact with them?"

"No, I… don't even know if they're alive." Her widening eyes, the hesitation in her tone told me she wasn't hiding anything. So I sighed, munching my dinner for a while as I thought over what to tell her.

"Oh, were they in Alaska, then?" Grimacing a bit, dropping her gaze, a falling leaf would make enough noise on the ground to drown out her voice.

"No, it's not that either. I don't… I don't remember if they're still alive."

"H-Huh?! Do… Do you suffer from amnesia?"

"… Yes. I don't remember much from my past. I woke up on Alaska by myself, and no one could find anyone related to me so I've no idea if my parents are alive or not."

Thinking about it… I wonder what kind of people my parents are in this world. Why was Maya-san looking after little me, anyways? Where are they now?

"M-My apologies, I didn't mean to… Well…"

"It's fine. So, since I've no one to call family here, I won't bother telling people otherwise if they call me an American." And my Japan is so different to this one I might look like one to people here, just like how Tsukuyomi-san saw me during the coup. "Still, I'm here to help and it's why I won't react. That's all."

"Is that so? Well… That is the right thing to do, however, don't simply surrender yourself to be the recipient of needless violence if another situation like that one were to happen."

"Yes, Ma'am. I'll just drop Sensei's name and that should be enough."

"… Sensei?" Oh, here we go again.

The remainder of dinner was rather peaceful, me telling Takamura of how to navigate the floor, where certain rooms were, and recommending her to order her food from Kyozuka-san's PX, as well as her best dishes.

Luckily for me, it seems she doesn't have any ill intentions towards me for now. So long as the General doesn't talk with her, I think Takamura won't act against me. Though, seeing how she was before, if she ever comes at me I'm going to be in trouble.

---

Same Day. Near 9 PM.

(B5F, near the Detention Barracks.)

---

Going back to the detention barracks, the new guard salutes me, giving me a small smile, unlike the other one who didn't even look my way.

No whispers, no mean looks, no nothing. The man unlocks my cell and opens the door for me, saluting me again once he had to close it. Returning the gesture, he then nods and takes his leave.

Stretching my hands up, moving sideways and hearing my knees and shoulders crack, I then tense up my back, shaking the stiffness I had on me. Sitting down on the bed, I take off my boots and massage my feet again. Throwing myself back, I look at the ceiling as I yawn.

Family, huh. Whatever the hell happened to my parents in this world? I wonder if my own parents are alright over there…

But, thinking it through, this world's me wasn't in good terms with the Pickles, but when I saw them yesterday I didn't feel anything bad towards them. His squad was supposed to stay away from as many eyes as possible, I don't know any of his squadmates, and I still can't remember who Amanohara was.

If he was a Royal Guard, was our family different? How did Maya-san end up taking care of little me? If there were no records left… then, does Sensei know and she didn't tell me? Or, did she just forgot to ask me about them for some reason?

At least I got some diagrams done today about the weapons I wanted to make. Now, all I can hope is that I can get some good sleep. Ever since I came back from the island I can't seem to be able to rest well. This heavy feeling lingers around me whenever I sleep, even now I can feel it on the lower part of my back.

Well… Nothing much I can do about it. I'll just ask her tomorrow. Maybe the pillow will help me clear my head a bit.

" Yawn… I'll ask Kasumi… to see if she can draw out any memories about them. But for now… Yaaawn… I'll call it quits for today."

Their Sacrifice

Chapter 34: Their Sacrifice

---

July 25th, 1968.

(Saionji Main House. Hiroshima.)

[Hidekatsu]

---

Neither of us said a word, silence filled the air of the room. The tea has run cold an eternity ago, the manju remained untouched atop the table.

Father has died, and without writing his will. This means we now have to decide who will become the next head of the Saionji family. Me or Tsunemori.

"I believe we must move forward to a world of unity. Considering the threat of these things known as the BETA, and the benefits the Empire could reap from this war if we manage to acquire part of their technology, I believe we should strengthen our relations with both the UN and the US. Brother, my connections will give our family the greatest benefit in our trade and production efforts." Tsunemori said, with his usual confidence.

"And yet, that would mean to surrender even more of our soul to the foreign powers. The Empire needs no further aid from the US, we should try to encourage our own industry to grow, to increase our exports and means of self-sufficient production. We have many a great number of small factories that create pieces and machines that are needed on many R&D departments all over the world. Me and my fellows will give the Empire its own industrial might, and we will sever the umbilical cord the US has encrusted into our economy, so that we never have to depend on any other nation for our economic stability." I return the glare, I will not flinch or back down.

To accept Tsunemori as the next head is to bow down to the Americans. Yes, we can make a great profit from opening our imports to American products and licensing their production, but in the long run that will make us even more dependent on them. We need to have at least one strong industry of our own. Yes, we cannot survive alone in these times, especially if the BETA are as fearsome as that report the UN sent us made them out to be. But we must not simply bow and obey, the Empire needs to rise once more.

"Hidekatsu, the Americans are the greatest power in the entire world. Only a fool wouldn't want to do business with them."

"As far as I know, kneeling down and giving head is not considered 'business' anywhere on the globe. I do not think that making us more dependent on them is what this nation needs."

"And trying to make a castle on the clouds is not what I'd call a solid plan. I believe we would reap bigger benefits licensing the Americans products and being the main distributors on the Far East, while also gaining more power within thanks to our relations with them." Your attitude disgusts me. What little love for our nation you have, choosing to see what is convenient to you.

"Brother, do you truly think the Americans see us as their allies? Look at how the Shogun is treated, it's nothing more than a figurehead these days. We're their pawns, puppets that move according to their whims. To give them even more power is to surrender ourselves completely to them!" I slam my hand on the table. Tsunemori narrows his eyes at me in clear disapproval.

"Hidekatsu, improving our relations with them does not equal a total surrender. We need them to finish the reconstruction of our nation, and we still don't know enough of these beings that were found on the moon. To bite the helping hand of the Americans might end up being our demise. We cannot decide our moves basing ourselves on emotional arguments. I also wish for the Empire to be free from foreign influence, but we must first grow strong again, find our place on the global economy."

"Tsunemori, we have been forced into servitude. They have completely changed the way we live and are constantly pushing us further and further away from what we truly are. Is this how you wish the Empire to continue? As slaves of the Americans? I refuse to accept this dichotomy of remaining as their servants or march to a certain demise. There must be a way for us to turn the Empire into a global power while slowly, but assuredly, cleaning the influence the Americans have imprinted into our culture since the end of the war. We cannot lose their aid, but we must not bow to their every demand. And for that someday to be a reality, we have to start working for it now!"

"I believe so too, but we also must make ourselves indispensable to the world, and improving our relations with the US is the better and fastest way to do so in my eyes. Without their aid, our industry would get stuck, and trying to compete with them would put us in a very dangerous position. First we should accept our weakness, and once we have done our own R&D on their products, we can start to develop our own brand, with higher quality or better pricing to sway the market to us. Lasting changes don't happen overnight, Hidekatsu. Your vision would send us into ruin, and would make all the sacrifices, all the concessions, all the shame we had to endure until now go to waste. That is why I should be the next head."

Again silence fills the air. We will never reach a truce. He wants to continue to bow down to the foreigners, with the hope that the Empire might one day stand up again. I want to make it stand up yesterday, severing this bind that has been placed on us. I expected more of you Brother. All of my life, I have admired you. You always seemed to be unfazed by all the problems we had to face, and always managed to come up with a clever solution to aid Father and His Highness. Yet, even if you are my older brother, if you wish to keep us in servitude…

"I think we won't reach an agreement, Hidekatsu."

"So it seems, Brother."

"Then, I suppose we should settle this with a duel, as much as it pains me to do so. One of us will live and become the next head, the other will have to join Father and Mother."

"I expected nothing less. However, you seem to have made a mistake Tsunemori." I say as I relax onto the tatami, covering how my right hand reaches for the inside of my sleeve.

"A mistake?"

"Indeed. The duel has already started. " Without a single vestige of hesitation, I throw two shuriken at Tsunemori's throat. In a flash, he drops to a side, holding his neck in pain. Crimsoness dirties the tatami as he wails pointlessly. "It pains me so much, yet I cannot allow you to live any longer. You have committed treason against our Empire, you deserve no honor but I shall give you mercy." I draw my blade and quickly end my older brother's life, to spare him from further suffering.

… You had good intentions, but you've forgotten that they're not as honorable as we are. Even if we are to remain loyal, in a gesture of goodwill to improve our relations with them, as soon as they see a better economical partner, they'll discard us away without hesitation. Who would trust in someone like that? If we can't even expect them to come pay their respects one a year, how could you wish to keep depending on them? Tis truly a shame, for you to have chosen their side.

I whistle three times in an odd rhythm, sending the signal to my men. Soon after that, the sound of the battle reaches my ears. If you're going to do something, you have to follow through without hesitation. Even if it means spilling the blood of some of my fellows and retainers.

The screams eventually die down. A knock is heard on the outside. I get out of the room and see my shinobi awaiting for me.

"How has the mission go?" She bows down, I see she has some deep gashes on her back and left hand. Your loyalty won't be forgotten, my fellow.

"All opposition has been cleared, Hidekatsu-sama. All those who were loyal to Tsunemori-sama have been silenced."

"Good. Let us give them a proper burial then, in one last show of respect. Tomorrow morning we shall notify the Emperor of the result of our… duel, and I'll be officially recognized as the head of the Saionji House at long last."

I leave the place, heading to the main bedroom and office of the house. The place that now belongs to me. I will not fail, I shall make the Empire into a global power. I won't let all the blood I've spilled today to go to waste, for I am honor bound to triumph in my ambitions for their sake as well. Tsunemori, you can rest in true peace. For I shall work for the both of us and bring about that future we both wished for, even if the Americans corrupted your judgment into a vassal-like mentality.

(Imperial Palace. Kyoto.)

"Raise, Hidekatsu. We have much to talk about."

"Yes, Your Majesty."

I have been called personally by His Majesty the Heavenly Emperor to his private chamber. With the passing of Kujo-sama last week, it may mean he has selected me as the next Shogun. However, I should not get ahead of myself.

The room is decorated with many delectable paintings of our own roots, the walls painted in a dark shade of deep purple, and filled with many fittingly beautiful golden decorations of Japanese origin. Behind a veil lies His Majesty, as I kneel on lower ground. There's also the special guardians of the Emperor, the Royal Guards that are dressed in pale red-violet uniforms, standing by His side.

"Hidekatsu, you've done many efforts to revitalize our industry. You've given priority to the needs of the Japanese, and despite all the setbacks that it has brought you, you have not faltered in your anti-American stance. You have my most sincerest respect for your dedication to our nation."

"Your words are is more than what I deserve, Your Majesty."

"Nonsense. Regardless, I am growing old. While I have been forced to endure many hardships for the well-being of my people, I would like to leave knowing that there's someone who can aid my son in bringing our nation back on its feet. Hidekatsu, if you were to become the Shogun, what would you do to make your ambitions a reality?"

I lift my face and look in the direction of his voice. I take a deep breath, and speak up slowly but firmly.

"I would first revise the Fundamental Law of Education, to shift the focus of our schools and systems to cultivate more surface pilots, engineers and mechanics. I believe the Akebono Program launched by Kujo-sama will become the root of our revival. With our own militar force rejuvenated, with an elite army ready to take on the BETA at the frontlines whenever we are called to aid the UN or when the threat reaches our shores, our nation will gain a strong foothold in the entire world as elite soldiers. This is the perfect moment to break free of the American's shackles, since no one could object to us reinforcing our military now. And once the UN becomes aware of our worth, we will gain a crucial ally in our negotiations with the US. If we make ourselves into the vanguard of the world even Europe might take our side in exchange for our efforts in the war."

I truly believe this is a once in a lifetime chance. We must become one of the world's strongest armies, and for that we need an elite, loyal force that's ready to halt the BETA advance when they're called to duty. The foreigners have chained us to their whims, but now we shall chain them to us, they won't be able to refuse our terms after we save their hides from these monsters.

"And pray tell, how would you reform our systems? Would you search for the gifted among us? Perhaps a focus on aptitudes, rewarding the citizens that willingly choose to serve?"

"No, Your Majesty. While I do wish to cultivate the innate talent of our people, I believe loyalty to be much more important in an army. Give me a box full of sledgehammers, and I'll do all I can to turn them into the finest blades you've ever seen. Give me someone who fails, someone who struggles and desires to be better sincerely, and I'll do all I can to make them reach their full potential. I'll move Mt. Fuji with my bare hands to aid my fellows in their struggles, stand along them under the wildest rain, and hone myself to be the best commander they could have. For I know they won't back-stab me, I can count on them not leaving my side when the need calls."

I take a small breath and continue.

"However, if you give me someone, no matter how skilled he is, that I cannot count on, everything falls apart. Someone who I can't even expect to arrive in time to a meeting, someone who no matter what I do for him, would always either turn his back to me or show ungratefulness towards all of my efforts towards him, does not have a place by my side. I know I might be sounding very prejudicial now to you, however I have been burned by the fire of betrayal and disappointment far too many times since I became the head of the Saionji family. I believe order and trust are the most important things in the army, and the latter in any relationship. Which is why I believe that those who are worth my trust, regardless of their origins, should be given priority on our training system. I would reform our systems to give them the chance they deserve, for I rather spend double the time on someone that struggles to hone himself but that values all I do for him instead of someone whose loyalty lies somewhere else and that I can't count on when I truly need his aid."

I finish and lower my head once more. After a brief moment, His Majesty speaks to me again.

"And how would you shape this army of yours? If all the ones that join the armed forces cannot be trusted, what would you do? If you had no choice but to cooperate with these untrustworthy people, which path would you choose?" He said, speaking as calmly as before.

The same dichotomy that Tsunemori once spoke about. That is a lie, the world isn't painted in black and white. There is always another road, even if it's darker and more dangerous than the obvious safe path that's laid out in front of you. And for the blood I've spilled I am obliged to triumph. Fear has no place in my heart, for I shall take this fierce, perilous road unwavering.

"I would look for those I can truly call my fellows. If I were to become the Shogun, I would reintroduce the Military Service Law, and send my most trusted men to scout and search for those who share my views, for the young ones whose hearts are looking for a new future, and I'll give them the best training this nation can produce. While I will have to coexist with those I cannot trust, I will not exclude them but I won't give them positions of power. I am sure you're aware of the many detractors that have resigned their title of nobility because they felt 'insulted' after we gave the just reward to some civilian families that had served us well, granting them the lowest title of nobility of our system."

Remembering all the talks I've had these last few months brings a bitter smile to my face.

"And it is most hilarious, how they spoke of our traditions and upholding the rightful honor, but then chose to do business with the Americans, selling their honor for some coin, becoming nothing more than dogs. It's that kind of people which I wish to expel from our higher echelons. After all, the civilians they so much despised turned out to be more loyal to you than they ever were. Of course, I do not wish to instigate a persecution, but I believe that we should give an incentive to many small enterprises owned by civilians so that they can compete and eventually triumph over these sellswords' businesses."

It is a truly sad state of affairs, how easily money corrupted our fellows. Many people who I called friends turned upside down the second the Americans dropped bags full of that dirty green poison known as dollars in front of them. Much like Tsunemori wanted to, they wasted no time in kneeling before their new masters. It's people like them that I wish to purge from this nation. How could we ever become a stable, independent nation with traitors who are constantly doing the foreigners' work in all areas of our economy and education?

"I see. You raise many good points, Hidekatsu. But let me ask you a crucial matter. How will you finance your nation? If you refuse the aid of America, how will you maintain the current order that our nation enjoys today?"

"Simple, Your Majesty. I believe the UN to be different than the Americans. With their support we will show the international community all of our skills. Once the world can see us for what we truly are, the US won't be the only one looking to do business with us. And even then we still are the only ones who might be willing to do business with the US, they won't have it easy to oppose us. Allow me to say this, I wish for us to someday be able to stand side by side with US instead of our current position as their vassals. So long as they do not try to intrude on our sovereignty, I will not show hostility to them."

"And what will you do if the UN is indeed like the Americans that have brought us to our knees?"

"That cannot be. It must answer to the international community and the well-being of mankind as a whole. If they are so frail that the corrupt faction within the US has a grip on their decisions, then mankind might as well be doomed to become the US's slaves. At which point their intentions of enlarging their influence over the globe would become apparent, and we would be foolish to simply ignore such a threat to our sovereignty. If such a case were to happen, I would first empower the military to be able to strike back at the slavers and drive them off our soil. I'm sure that the rest of the Eastern Nations would do the same, and I do not think Europe would simply allow the US to do as they please with their lands and people."

"Hmm… Becoming the first rebels against the tyrannical Americans? At that point, we would be left with very little choice indeed. Then, allow me to ask you my final question. You surely have noticed the increased hostility of the media towards the Royal Guard as of late. I am sure you agree it is due to the Americans' influence, trying to create a schism in our hearts. How would you counter this?"

"Tis a simple matter. While we most not reply to the provocations, we must take action to show the people we are worth their trust. With all due respect sir, I believe it to be imperative to allow commoners into the Royal Guard as well."

"Commoners? Hidekatsu, are you being serious?" His shock is apparent, but I must not falter.

"Yes, Your Majesty. Since we are on your private chambers, allow me to be honest with you. The shinobi that was assigned to me by my late Father was never one from a warrior clan. I believe all of our fellows deserve the same respect. It is not only a way to truly reward them equally. I believe that would greatly boost our sense of unity and appease part of the critics we always receive."

I take a short pause, clear my throat and continue.

"In the past, granting civilian families a title of nobility caused us much problems, but if instead of that they could earn it after many generations of servitude in both the Royal Guard and in a key part of our economy or industry, I firmly think it would greatly improve the sentiment that the people have towards us, and it would allow for those with a desire to serve to come to us, instead of us having to look for them. In these times, what we need the most is to strengthen our bonds with the people, to once again have a common goal regardless of our differences. And I am willing to do everything in my power to make this future a reality, no matter what the Americans do to hinder my ambitions. I will dedicate every drop of blood in me to this cause, whether you choose me as the next Shogun or not. My life shall be dedicated to this land until my very last breath, I assure you of that Your Majesty."

I take one deep breath and exhale slowly. I spoke with honesty, regardless of the consequences. I have no regrets, for I will continue towards my goals even if I am not the next Shogun.

"Hidekatsu Saionji."

"Yes, Your Majesty?" I look up in attention. For Him to have used my full name… What will it be?

"… I hereby appoint you as the next Shogun of the Empire of Japan."

May 2nd, 1986. Around 6 PM.

(Training Grounds. Nanao Base.)

[Kageyuki]

---

"And to no one's surprise, Tiger Squadron wins today." The operators laughed in my view as the last enemy was shot down.

"Well, that will be all for today. Return to the hangar." The Major said as he gave us a nod, his usual stern expression remaining unfazed at our results.

"Roger!" All of us reply and their faces disappear from my sight, and after a brief pause we take off towards the base.

"But damn it, Shirogane. You stole the show again. Leave something for us too, you bastard!" The Captain said with a grin on his face.

"Yeah man, it's always the same with you. How many did he beat today? Four?"

"Five, actually. I stole one of the Captain's kills when he ran out of ammo." I say jokingly to them.

"You dastard, next time it won't go like this!" The Captain says continuing the joke.

All twelve of us keep joking around until we reach the hangar. I gotta say, I'm getting better than I thought I would ever be. Honestly it's all thanks to the Captain's support, otherwise a simple guy like me wouldn't have gotten past basic.

We're briefed on the results and our numbers once all of us got together. After the necessary decorum is said we're free to go changed and hit the PX at last.

"But really, who would have said you would turn out to be such a trooper. Remember when he couldn't even finish running on our first days during training?" The Cpt. just can't contain himself, can he?

"I really thought about dropping from the Surface Pilot Training Program back then, if not for your help I would have abandoned it to be an MP to be honest."

"Heh, as if I'd let such a hardworking bastard be demoted like that. Isn't it like Saionji-sama always says? We gotta stick together, folk like us. It's rare to find a group of honest, hardworking guys like you all. Even if we're at the backrow, we gotta do our part to be up to par with what's expected of us."

All of us give a nod right before we enter the PX. While I don't disagree with what the Captain said, I do find myself wavering from time to time. Thanks to Saionji-sama's clear anti-American stance many things have changed in these last years. The price of imported goods is skyrocketing, the price of home appliances is also rising quite a lot, and not to mention the costs of good medical care or housing. I already had a house on my sight, in Yokohama. I had almost enough saved to take a credit to buy it, but then the American real state agencies decided to raise their prices, saying they were too good for the Japanese standard, in a mockery to Saionji-sama's decision to give aid to the national real state sector, aiming to have more houses built with our traditional design instead of the American's.

I really wanted to drop out of the Training Program. I would rather be home with Miho and Takeru, if I were an MP I could get more off days, but being a pilot only leaves me with the weekend off every two weeks. But I need the money, Miho is sick and I can't force her to work when she has to take care of Takeru too. Considering I've heard that even the IJA is thinking of conscripting women I cannot leave the army, or Miho will be the one getting dragged into this shithole. And if I don't start making more money, we will have to keep living in the slums, and her health may take a turn for the worse. If only I could take her to a decent hospital regularly…

If I could at least get us an apartment in a nice part of the city here to move from Nakanoto… But I'm barely a 2nd Lt. for now, and even with my best efforts I do not see a promotion in the horizon. Really, how much of a dick can these guys be? I've been breaking their expectations time and again, and all I get is a pat on the back. Sons of a bitch… I would have dropped out now that I finished my obligatory service years, but no work could match this pay. Between Miho's treatment and our savings to be able to someday move out, adding taking proper care of Takeru…

It doesn't help that we're in the middle of a restructuring. Now that the creation of the MDF was announced, we still don't know under whose wing we'll fall, and the worst of them is that I may end up getting sent to another base. And from what I've heard on the news, there's some tension brewing with the UN as of late for some reason. Something about them requesting to have a base under their command, and Saionji-sama refusing to do so for some weird reason. It was all over the news on the UN's channel, how distrustful the Empire had become as of late for some reason.

After finishing dinner and chatting with the guys for awhile, I go to sleep early. Waking up just a bit before five, I get in my fatigues and go report my leave. After getting the OK from the office, I leave the base and go towards the train station, and take a ride back home.

The town is still as it always was, desolated and run down. With how much the prices have been going up, I can't even rent an apartment in Nanao. Sigh…

Well, no getting depressed! Miho doesn't deserve to see me all gloomy. I reach our house and enter. It's early morning and I could hear someone on the kitchen.

"Miho? Are you there?" I see her slender figure preparing breakfast dressed in an olive green dress with her chestnut hair tied up in a hairbun once I go near the kitchen.

"Oh, Kage! Welcome home!" I approach her and plant a kiss on her forehead. Despite her wide smile, she does sound a bit weaker than last time.

"How are you feeling? Did the medicine make you feel better?"

"Y-Yes, I'm alright. So, how is everything on the base?" She smiles wryly at me, scratching the back of her head.

"Oh, you just won't believe it. Major General Ayamine ordered all the squads to do two runs every day and me and the boys have been dominating the mock battles since the start of the new regime, but we haven't got a single raise or promotion yet." I wrap my hands around her, resting my chin on her shoulder.

"That sounds rough. Are you eating well? You're not getting hurt, right?" I'm the one who should be worried here, with how worn down you look.

"I'm fine, don't worry. So, how's Takeru being doing?"

"As usual, he's full of energy. He reminds me of a certain someone when he doesn't want to practice his writing." She smirks at me playfully.

"It's not my fault he took after you in that regard."

"Oho? What do we mean by that?" She quickly moves one hand to my butt and gives me hard pinch.

"Ouch! Sorry, I was just kidding!"

"Fuhuhu, I know you were, silly." She grasp my chin with her hand and we share a kiss, sucking on each other's tongue.

"… Dad?" Always happens… The little shape of my son, wearing a white shirt and blue shorts, sleepily made his way to us. His hair that reached to his shoulders is made a mess, he should get it cut soon.

"How have you been doing, Takeru? Come here, give Dad a hug!" I lift him from the ground, giving him a tight hug. "So, how have you been?"

"Good, Mom brought me some new books to read me." He says with his usual smile.

"That's nice, and have you been practicing your writing? How many hiraganas can you write?"

"… Not many." He pouts and looks away. I was the same when I was little according to my Dad, it's so funny to see him trying to hide it.

"Come on, you two. The food's ready."

We enjoy a breakfast in family, and after changing into my casual clothes I read one of the new books to Takeru. After he goes to watch some show on the small TV, I start helping Miho with some of the daily chores. The house isn't so big, considering the taxes aren't so high in this area it might not have been a bad idea to remain here but…

"Miho, are you sure you don't prefer to go live at Nanao?"

"Kage, I can't leave Mom alone. Even if she's being stubborn in not wanting to come to live with us, I can't just go somewhere else and leave her all alone here." Miho returns another annoyed glare at me.

"Look, I'm just worried about you. We could give you better treatment if you could go every week at one of the hospitals in Nanao. Since I would be closer during my off days, I could stay taking care of Takeru, or I could go with you if we can find someone to look after him for a little while."

"I know that, really. But…" Her voice trails off, her gaze digs itself into the ground.

We continue talking, as I tell her of what I can of my daily life on the base and she tells me of how she and Takeru have been doing these weeks. The little one seems to be full of energy thankfully. But as we finished and went with Takeru to just lay together relaxing, I couldn't help to let my mind wander to the worries that plague my heart.

My parents didn't approve of our marriage and disowned me for it, they couldn't stand me marrying someone 'poorer' than me. I decided to live with her here, but literally two months after that the laws got changed and I got conscripted into the IJA. Considering I'm making more money now I don't see it as something bad, but Miho needs me here. But if we don't move to somewhere else… If only I hadn't doubted, I would have bought that house in Hiiragi. Now with all the inflated prices I can't get us a decent house.

We are lucky the Shogun is looking out for us commoners, trying to make housing conditions better with all of these new incentives. I honestly can't understand how people don't get it. Saionji-sama is doing his best to fix this hell of a mess the Americans are doing and everybody is shitting on him and the Regent Houses. The leaders are all presenting a lot of projects from what I've heard on the news, and everyone is repeating the same speech of the media. I mean, I know we have to cooperate with them and all, but the Americans really piss me off. The few I've met during some mock battles are the biggest jerks I've ever met.

Sigh… I know we shouldn't spend our savings, but at this rate…

We spent the day simply resting, reading books and playing with Takeru. When was it that he stopped talking silly? When was it that he got so big? What wouldn't I give to be able to see him grow by his side. I really don't see us getting a raise on the IJA or the MDF or however we're called now. If only I was better at something…

Ding!

"Oh, who could it be? Kage, I'm preparing dinner, could you answer the door?"

"Sure. Takeru, you wait here." He tugs at me when I leave him on the chair.

"You're leaving?" Don't look at me with those eyes, it's cheating.

"No, of course not. I'm just going to see who's visiting." He slowly lets go, and as I go to the door he follows behind me.

Ding!

Oh, for fucks sake! It hasn't been that long to ring a second time! It better not be the Captain again because I'm gonna…

"Hello? Who is it?" Opening the door, a familiar face greets me with a smile. Dressed in a pale gray dress of the Royal Guard, with his orange hair combed backwards, my old friend waved at me.

"Hey, Kageyuki! Long time no see. Hopefully I came at a good time?" Giving me a small bow, Koetsu Kurosawa greeted me.

"Koetsu, the hell are you doing here in your Guard uniform?!"

"Hey, that's the first thing you say?"

"Look, you can't just come visit in… You even brought your limo?!" The driver gave me a nod as our gazes met. Sigh… Koetsu, what the hell are you thinking? Poor Kobayashi-san, having to drive you here.

"Hahaha, what were you expecting? I can't just take a train now, can I? I was relieved of my duties for the day and I decided to pay you a visit, since I remembered you told me you would be free today. Can I come in?" He shows me a box by his side and a suitcase. What did he bring now? Always marching to your own drum.

"Of course, we don't really have much to offer though." I scratch my head, dropping my gaze to the ground.

"Hey, don't be so down. I did brought some souvenirs for you all. Hmm? Oh, is that Takeru?" Takeru was peeking from behind me, looking at him curiously.

"Takeru, why don't you introduce yourself?" I pet his head slowly, moving him from behind me. He looks at Koetsu and gives him a small nod.

"I'm Takeru. Who are you?"

"Pfft! Hahaha, he really is your son." Sigh… Much to Miho's disappointment he also took after me in how he speaks. "I'm Koetsu, an old friend of your Dad. Nice to meet you, Takeru." He grabs his tiny hand and shakes it slowly.

"Well, come in. Not everybody likes the Royal Guard here." His gaze turns serious as he looks around, and we spot a few onlookers who scatter as they realized we noticed their presence.

"Yes, let's go inside. Kobayashi, I'll call you when I'm ready to depart. You may leave." Kobayashi-san gives a nod, I smile and wave at him. And with a smile he speeds away.

We enter the house, with Takeru asking Koetsu many questions about who he was. But seriously, why did he have to come in his dress? Maybe he isn't used to be near people that are hostile to the Guard but he should be aware of the current situation.

"Miho, we have a visit."

"Visit? Who is… Oh, Kurosawa-san! Good evening."

"Good evening, Miho-san. Please, I think I told you to just use my name. So, here. I brought us some nice food to enjoy today." He brings one of the boxes he was carrying, showing us a nice assortment of sushi.

"Koetsu, you really didn't have to…"

"Come on, don't look like that. It's been ages since we got together, why can't we enjoy something nice every once in a while? And don't worry about how much it cost, it's on me." Sigh…

"If you say so, I'll take you up on the offer."

It's been so long since we could talk with each other. Ever since the new military law was passed, we have had less and less time to meet. With me on the IJA and he on the Royal Guard our schedules have not matched up for a long time.

We enjoy a calm evening, sharing stories and just laughing as we ate. Strangely, Takeru ate all the natto rolls. When Miho tried to find one, he was already eating the last one. I should remember to never underestimate Takeru's appetite, the boy is a true omnivorous.

"Takeru, when did you ate all the natto ones?" Miho looked at him worriedly.

"But they were tasty." My hearts melts as he looks at us with an apologetic expression. Just look at those tiny, shiny eyes of his, how could anyone get angry at him?

"Don't worry, Takeru. It's good to eat what you like, but you should eat something different from time to time." I stroke his hair and he giggles a bit.

"Hahaha, the little one seems to be healthy thankfully." Koetsu looked at Takeru as he grabbed yet another roll of sushi and kept eating.

Thank the Holy Emperor that he's so simple in that regard. No matter what Miho cooks, he always eats everything according to her. And anyways, her cooking is awesome so it's totally understandable. No one could refuse this homemade heaven.

"He never complains about food, but I can't believe he ate all the natto rolls by himself." Miho sighs as Takeru looks at her, munching sushi.

We watched some of the kids shows as we finished eating, and then Miho took Takeru to his room giving us a wink. Thanks for being always so considerate, dear.

"You could have called to tell me you were coming, you know?" Koetsu laughs as he opens a bottle of sake.

"Well, I wanted to surprise you. And there is another reason for that, actually." He got serious now, I wonder what he meant.

"Do the Guard not allow you to meet with members of the IJA?"

"Oh no, not that. It's a more… delicate matter. Say Kageyuki, you're not happy with your current position, right?" He looks at me in the eye as he pours each of us a drink.

"Of course not. With how much everything is rising in price, I can't find a decent house for us, and when I do the owner starts to put logs in the way, and suddenly they say the price might change due to 'market values' flowing up recently. It's the same in all areas of Nanao. Those damn American agencies that bought most of the land lots are abusing the loopholes in the law again."

"I thought that was the case. And how's Miho-san's health?"

"Just as it looks like. We can't take her to the hospitals in Nanao as often as I'd like, so she's receiving treatment in the local one. But well, you know how it is with the priorities in the chain of supplies." He nods as he sighs, and then drinks a bit.

"So everything's still the same. So, about why I came here without calling you." He straightens his posture, looking at me square in the eye again. "Kageyuki, would you like to join the Royal Guard?"

Wait, what did I just hear?

"Koetsu, did I heard that right?" He nods.

"Yes, I'm offering you an induction into the Royal Guard to my squadron." He takes out some papers from the small suitcase he brought with him. "You see, the people I work for in Osaka are in need of some more talented surface pilots for their test squads. Since we're in need of trustworthy people that are also skilled we have been searching to fill the spots, but of course it isn't an easy task. Inducting a civilian isn't out of the question but it's also not something that happens often. You, however, are a very capable pilot from the reports I've read, I asked your base's CO and he complimented you a lot. I believe I could manage to convince my superior to get your approval. I know this isn't something that you can answer easily, but I'd like you to think about it."

"… You do know that would mean being away from my family for a very long time, right? Royal Guards only get a break once every two months, and I would have to go with you to Osaka, right? I don't… I don't know if I could leave Miho alone like this." I drink from my small cup. This is a nice offer, and I know how much is at risk here. Koetsu is putting his honor and reputation on the line for me, and I have no words to thank him for this gesture. But…

"I know that. But you must know that our pay is much more better than what you're receiving on the IJA right now. And while you won't get promoted so easily, I assure you your skills won't go unrewarded. The Royal Guard values loyal people like you, I know you won't disappoint. Actually, I honestly believe you're already better than some of my squad's men, and that's with a base Gekishin."

"Don't think that I'm not thankful, Koetsu. It's just… I have barely been able to see Takeru grow, Miho needs me close to her. If I can only see her once every two months…"

"It's your choice. I owe you much for helping me when we were in school and everybody got against me for being a noble, I know you're someone I can trust. You haven't changed despite all that's happened to you, and I really respect your stance with your parents and your struggle to take proper care of your loved ones. I believe you would make a fine Royal Guard, and with the money you earn you could buy yourself a house. I'm willing to move some strings and call some people to make sure you can get a nice place, even if you don't accept my offer."

"Koetsu… I don't know what to say, really." He smiles as he leans back.

"You're one of the few people I can call friend, and I want my friends to be safe. It is truly infuriating seeing what the Americans are doing to our nation, to see how most people blame us for our current hardships despite the economic boom we're experiencing in some areas. And while the pieces have fallen in order for me to give you this chance, I just wanted to come and tell you that if you ever need anything, I'm here for you Kageyuki. So, I'll leave the papers with you here. I'll go talk with you at the base in a week." He pours more sake into his cup and drinks.

"And exactly what would I have to do if I join? I know you can't tell me much about your standing but, well, any hints or anything?"

"I think I did told you my family serves the Koubuin, right?" I nod, he did told me that when we were in high school. "Well, the new head is being more firm regarding our involvement on the war. What we're trying to form is a test squad to develop new maneuvers and tactics using the JIVES and some new data. The top performing surface pilots will join Koubuin-sama's personal squad to eventually be loaned to the UN when they ask for our cooperation." Wait… Why would we send a personal squad of a Regent House?

"Koetsu, if it's classified you don't have to tell me but, why are we not sending a Company or a Battalion from the IJA to the UN? Why send someone from the Regent Houses?" He sighs again as he looks at the ceiling.

"Because it seems like the UN is fooling with us." I didn't miss the tint of anger in his answer.

"What happened?"

"To us? Nothing, yet. But the horrible support they gave to Europe during last year was a mockery. If it weren't for the South American troops that were going to the UK in a show of friendship all the civilians would have gotten eaten by the BETA. It's funny that America did more for Europe than the UN."

"What?! America did… I didn't see anything on the news about this, save for the numbers of people that managed to escape before the BETA destroyed Lyon."

"Well, the Americans left a large Battalion of Thunderbolts to deal with the BETA. But most of them died and the BETA kept advancing, and the South American army barely made it in time to aid the Spanish forces that tried to go to Lyon in answer to France's rescue signal. It happened in a flash, as far as I was told. France was split in two after that, the northern forces got isolated and all contact was lost just a few days after that. It was a massacre. And the UN's French branch was more busy playing politic when they should have given a fast response to the threat." He closes his eyes as he slowly shakes his head.

"… Are you sure it's fine to tell me all of this?"

"Don't worry, this is all from an unofficial source." He gives me a small smile.

"Unofficial? Were you there when it happened?"

"Well, what can I say? Why do you think I was given those papers to induct you? We had some meetings with the British, and we shared some insight to aid each other's projects. Of course, we didn't let the UN on this since it seems to be slowly turning into a puppet of America. All the bravado they showed during the war of the '82 seems to have vanished, probably due to pressure and lobbying from the US. You know, the UN did ruin their plans to get more oil. Well, I simply helped someone very important and they now owe me quite some favors. I expect my uniform to change to the white one in a few months, and it's the reason I now have a squadron under me."

"Wow, just… Wow. You're really doing the hard work. Who would have said that laid back guy could be so serious?" I smirk at him causing him to laugh.

"Like you're one to talk. You were always fooling around, and now look at you. Despite everything, you're a model soldier and a responsible parent and husband at that. But it is a crazy thing, how quick time flies."

We pour some more sake into our cups and drink, reminiscing the times we shared at school before all this madness started. Neither of us ever thought we would be piloting these giant robots to fight aliens. Everything seemed so shining, like the future was opening up, full of possibilities for progress. And then, out of nowhere, a plague struck and we're now forced to endure all these things. I can't even start to think on how hard it's truly for him, having to go negotiate with foreigners and come back to be badmouthed by the general population.

Miho eventually managed to make Takeru fall asleep, and us three enjoyed some time chatting before Koetsu left. I couldn't bring myself to tell her of this offer in front of him, after all I don't really know if I should accept.

After we cleaned everything up, I went to Takeru's room. Opening the door slowly, I enter his small resting place. I silently get close to him and knee by his bedside. Ruffling his hair slowly, I remain like that for a long while. Unaware of what's happening to the world, he sleeps peacefully. I feel my hands tremble a bit as I tighten my lips, taking one long breath.

What kind of future do I want for him? I don't see any promotion on the IJA coming, and if things keep going like they have… And if we don't treat Miho properly… And yet, for that I would have to leave them alone. Even if I would send them most of my pay, do I want to be an absent parent? What would Miho do if she ever had a problem?

I rest my head by his side, how much has he grown without me noticing. What do I want to give him? I want to see him learn to write, to see him enter school, to give him what I was given. And yet… to let him have that life…

I bring him closer to me, resting my chin on his head, silently staying with him like that. Taking deep breaths to stop the shaking of my hands, my eyes start to show hints of water. What should I do?

… As time passed, the moonlight reached us. Opening my eyes and cleaning the tears, I move slowly towards the window. The sky is as beautiful as ever tonight. Seeing it like this… brought back a memory of Grandpa I had forgotten for some time.

"Grandpa, why is Father angry?"

"You see Kageyuki, people don't always get along. It's normal for anyone to fight from time to time." He said, petting me.

"But I don't like it."

"Well, what can you do to help?"

"I don't know. They don't want to talk."

"Come here, Kageyuki. Look at the sky."

"The sky?" I looked up, seeing a dark sky without the moon and filled with stars.

"See? It's really dark today, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"But you can still see the stars, right?"

"Yes, they're always shining up there."

"So, you have to be like them." He said, petting my head again.

"Like the stars?" He lifted me and put me on his lap, and then pointed again to the sky.

"Yes. You see, even in the darkest night the stars will be up there looking out for you. And like them, you have to try to give your light to others when they're lost or feeling bad. If someone you like is in pain, it's up to you to try to make them smile. Even if it isn't much, give them a hug, be by their side, look for a flower they might like. Sometimes you'll have to be like the stars, giving them your light from far away. But so long as you try to help and listen to them, you will be able to make them smile once more. Just know that people fighting and putting some space between them isn't something bad."

Making them smile, huh?

That's right, I want them to be happy above everything else. So… even if I have to be far away… My light will reach him, no matter how far apart we are. I won't leave him alone even if I'm not by his side. What wouldn't I give to see him grown, to see hear you learn and turn into a man.

When will we able to live in peace together? Am I an idiot for keeping a frail hope within, to someday be able to just be with you two living a simple, mundane life? For how much longer will I have to be apart from you?

And yet I'm not the only one. The Captain also has a little kid, and yet he can't go see his family until his next leave. Even Major General Ayamine must stay on base despite the fact that he also has a daughter around Takeru's age.

No one deserves this shit. So… If I help the Royal Guard, I would be helping my comrades too, right? Going to the place where I could have the biggest impact, right?

Going to him one last time, sowing his innocent face deep into my heart, I plant a kiss on his head and remain again close to him, our foreheads touching.

No matter where I am, the fact that I'll be living for them won't change. Everyday I'll stand up for you two, and no matter what happens I'll come back. Regardless of the distance between us, I'll make sure my light reaches you and Miho. And this fight isn't just for me, it's for all the people that helped me get here. So that someday we can all stop pretending to not care, so that someday we can cry our sorrow with our loved ones. And for all of those far away, who are stopping the BETA from reaching here, because it's thanks to them that I can spend this time with Takeru.

Even if the darkness comes to the Empire, I will brave through it. I'll endure any hardship, if it's to give you two the life you deserve. Because if your future is crying, it's up to me to make it smile.

I pat his head kindly and leave his side, going to our room. I stop right behind the door, thinking of how to approach her. No matter how I phrase it, I'm leaving her alone. My hands shake a little as I went for the doorknob, I inhale twice with my nose. A thin veil of sweat forming on my palms, I lick my dry lips as I open the door slowly, so slowly. Come on, Kageyuki. Have some balls for the first time in your life.

"Took you long enough. I thought you were going to end up sleeping with Takeru." Miho says with a playful smile, patting the side of the bed. As all the times I come home, she's wearing a thin dark night gown, making it hard to not look at either her bosom or the hints of her waist. Focus, dammit!

"It was a tempting offer to be honest." I chuckle as I sit by her side and she wasted no time in wrapping her hands on my chest, slowly rubbing them up and down. Resting her chin on my shoulder, she whispered into my ear.

"You're so mean, Kage. Today I feel fine for once, you can only be with me four days a month, and you choose Takeru over me?" I could feel the pout from her tone as I felt her breath on my neck.

"Are you jealous of your own son?" I look at her over my shoulder, she gives me a smile and whispers again.

"I just want to have you all for me tonight." She then starts to nibble my ear softly.

As tempting as this is… We need to talk.

"Miho, we can't do this right now." I grab her hands and face her, she looks at me rather puzzled.

"W-What is it? Don't worry, I'm on the pill silly."

"Oh yes, that. W-Wait, that isn't what I want to talk about. Please listen closely and let me finish, yes?" She nods, now looking concerned.

I tell her of Koetsu's offer, of what it would mean for us, of what I want for them.

"And that's the whole thing. I will give it some more thought but, well, I think this is a chance I shouldn't miss." Miho had her gaze looking at the sheets, her shoulders trembling a bit.

"So you won't be home for… almost two months?" Her voice creaked as she got closer, resting her palms on my chest.

"Yes, that's how it would be if I accept." I place my hand on the back of her head and pull her closer, embracing her.

"And you're accepting, right?" She looks up at me, her eyes turning moist.

"I haven't really… Well, I do want to give you two something better than this."

"Kage, don't lie. I know that once you set your mind to something there's no dissuading you. Takeru is just like you in that too, both of you are so stubborn."

"S-Sorry, I just… I know I'm leaving you alone, but… I want to finally get us a nice house of our own, and I want you to go to a good doctor, just in case." She grimaces as she closes her eyes.

"And what about me?"

"I mean…"

"What am I supposed to do alone for such a long time? I can endure this, I know you'll be near, that if anything happened you're just a train away. But going to Osaka? Coming home once every two months? W-What do I do if anything happens to me or Takeru?" She hugs her sides, gazing at me with frail eyes.

"Miho, I'll be sending you most of my pay and you'll be able to move to a nice part of the city. I know you don't want to leave your mother behind, but I don't want to see your health getting worse again." I place my hands on her shoulders "Please, I don't want to be away from you either, but to give you two a good future, I think I… should accept this offer."

"… I'm not changing your mind, am I?"

"I… well, I mean…"

Miho brought both of her hands to my face and with a smile, she lunged forward. Assaulting my relaxed mouth, her tongue danced on its insides, dragging mine along. Moving her tongue from one cheek to the other, so slowly, time and again dancing along mine. It took a serious effort to put my hands on her shoulders and pull her away, forming a string of saliva connecting our mouths.

"M-Miho, please stop. I'm trying to-"

"It's fine. You can join the Guard." She gave me peck this time, then kept gazing at me with a kind look.

"R-Really? You're not… angry?"

"I could never get angry at you for this. You're always thinking on our well-being, and I can see how much this pains you. I want to plead you to not go, I want to keep you here, but I know that… this is probably for the better." The shaking of her voice was slowly becoming more subtle, yet her eyes betrayed that effort, dropping a single tear down her cheeks. "Just… Just promise me one thing?"

"What is it?"

"Promise me you'll stay in that training squad. Promise me you won't join the squad of the Regent House." She bore her eyes into me, as she trembled again for a brief moment.

"That's beyond me, but I don't think they'll allow a commoner into the private squad of the head of a Regent House." She looks down for a while, but then returns my gaze again.

"Then promise me something else."

"What do you want?"

"That you will come back. That you won't have to stay there permanently like some of the rumors say. I've heard that some Royal Guards have to be always serving, without getting breaks." She clawed at my shirt, I pat her head to reassure her.

"I am coming back. Even if it's only once a month, I will come back to you. I swear it."

"… Then, you can go. But… You will come back, right?" It's so painful to hear her shaking voice, and those quivering eyes tear me apart from within.

"Yes, don't worry. If I choose to join, I'll return for sure. You're my family now Miho, I'm not abandoning you." She relaxes and slowly begins to caress my neck again.

"That's not… what worries me."

"What do you mean?" She exhales the pressure off her chest, and looks at me shaking a bit, fear clouding her eyes.

"I'm thinking about Takeru. If anything happened to me, he'll have to stay alone."

"Miho, don't say that. Nothing will-" She raises a finger and closes my lips.

"Kage, promise me you'll always take care of him. Please."

"Sigh… You really are an idiot." I hug her tightly. "I will always be here, for both of you. So don't go saying sad things like that again, got it?"

"Yes. But…" She kisses me again, first softly, then a bit more fiercely, and she ends up on top of me biting my lips. "Well, I'll believe you. So for tonight… Let me have you some more."

"You really like to be on top."

"Only because someone is too dense to not notice how badly I want him. And who knows when you'll be coming back this time. So Kage, you better get ready to give me all of your love tonight, and every night you come back to me. Every. Single. Drop of it."

"As if that's any different than what we usually do." I kiss her again, and slowly we let our hands wander again, resetting the ritual.

August 28th, 02:12 PM.

(Train Station. Nakanoto.)

I sigh yet again just before the train's doors open. With heavy steps I leave it behind and start walking towards home. I receive some weird glares, and a guy shouted an insult at me but he ran away when I sent him a glare. I have no time to deal with motherfuckers like you, coward.

I'm still not used to this dress. It's so unpractical to wear, it has so many different pieces, and it feels so, so bad to use it in the summer. How do they remain so calm all the time on this thing?! Do they have ice on their veins?

I finally reach my home. I have good news, bad news, and awful news to give them. I gulp and put the key on. It feels so heavy right now, I can barely twist it around. Hearing the sound of the lock surrendering to the key I exhale loudly and open the door. Calm those hands dammit.

I set foot into my home. The sound of footsteps approaching soon greets my ears.

"Kage, is that you?" Miho's face peeks behind a turn, her eyes widening as she seems me.

"Hey, I'm back. How have you been?" I slowly approach her, she recovers from the initial shock and gives me a hug as we kiss.

"Welcome home. But what are you doing on your suit?"

"We aren't allowed to leave it around. We must keep it with us at all times, even if we are not going to be wearing it. I did leave the katana back in Osaka, though. So, how have you been?" She breaks eye contact as she digs her face on my chest.

"Fine. Everything's fine."

"Miho, what happened?" Her frail tone gave her away, the way she seems to be trying to make herself smaller being a most obvious hint. She looks worse than last time too.

"… Mom died."

Oh… Oh, shit.

"Did she suffer?"

"No, she died in her sleep. Peacefully as anyone would rather die. It… doesn't make this any better." I wipe the single runaway tear that escaped her eyes, and give her a soft kiss on her forehead. I wrap my arms around her and we remain still for a while.

"So, feeling better?"

"Y-Yes. Thanks, Kage. I've missed you. A lot." She gives me a peck as we break our embrace.

"So, how has Takeru being doing?"

"Oh, fine. I couldn't bring myself to tell him what it means to die, so I told him Mom went on a voyage somewhere. He was really sad for weeks but he's alright now."

"Where is he?"

"Watching Chop-kun's show. Why?" I look at her straight in the eye, letting out a sigh.

"I have some things to tell you."

"Serious things?"

"Yes. Let's go to our room."

Miho nods and goes tell Takeru to be quiet, but the little one dashed to my side as he saw me with his eyes turned into stars. I gave him a tight hug and a kiss on his cheek.

"How have you been, Takeru?"

"Good. But Dad, what is this thing?" He says as he tugs at my black dress.

"This is Dad's new uniform."

"Ooh… Why is it black?"

"It's just my color, that's all." Explaining to him all the reasoning behind this would take too long, and he wouldn't get it either.

"But it looks like the ones the samurai rangers that appear on TV use. Are you a samurai, Dad?"

"Oh, yes. Something like that." His eyes sparkle up, filling with stars.

"So are you one of the black samurai? Do you help the blue ones?"

Sometimes I don't know if he's just very good at guessing or if he can actually see through me. Kids can be really sharp when you least expect them to.

"I guess? I'm not the only one though. There's many people were I work with the same uniform helping the blue samurais." He's looking so surprised I couldn't help to let out a laugh.

"Dad, you're great!"

"Hahaha, maybe I am." I give him a pat on the head, ruffling his hair tenderly. "Takeru, Mom and Dad have to talk for awhile. Can you stay here watching TV?"

"Yes." He nods and after I give him another hug he goes back to the TV.

"He missed you a lot, you know?" Miho says as she leans on me.

"I know. I missed you two a lot, too."

We slowly make our way to our room as we tell each other of our daily lives.

"So you're on Kurosawa-san's squad?"

"Yes, thankfully. It's been hard, adapting to the protocol."

"I don't see you speaking formally to anyone, Kage." She smirks at me, bringing one finger to her lips.

"I don't. I can't speak in Keigo to save my life. People just have gotten used to me being 'the rude commoner' of the squad." I drop my shoulders a bit as Miho giggles.

"Well, we're here." She opens the door and we go inside. She sits on the bed, I remain standing. "So, what is this about?" Her gaze and tone turned serious as she looked up at me.

"First, the good news. I made a deal with a landlord and got a nice apartment for you in Yao. The rent and the taxes are a bit expensive, but we'll be closer like this."

"Are you sure? What about saving for our house? And how did you get the owner to negotiate?" Thank Koetsu for that, he can be very 'persuasive' when he wants to.

"We just sat down and had an honest talk as adults." She gives me a side glance, not buying my excuse. "Well, that's that. So, then we go into the second thing." I couldn't keep the bitterness out of my voice, and that made Miho's face get filled by anxiety.

"What is it?"

"I… got the approval to stay in Osaka."

"Really?! But that's good, Kage! It means you're now officially part of the Guard!" Her smiling flowers suddenly vanished as she saw my face.

"It isn't so simple. You see… Apparently, some important people took notice of my piloting skills. And they decided to place me under the Osaka Guards. Which means a bigger paycheck, but it also means that… I'll only be able to take a week off in the entire year." Miho gasped at my words, color draining from her face.

"Only a week? But…"

"And the last bad news is that… The Osaka Guards is another name for… Koubuin-sama's personal squad. Since the Koubuin family is tasked with protecting the Osaka Castle, their Main House is close to it. Well, they're the ones who rule over Osaka and some neighboring prefectures for the Emperor. So… that means I'm now part of the House's vassals."

"… So, if the Koubuins have to go to war… you'll be going with them?"

"… Yes, I will have to march to the frontlines with them." Miho's eyes finally stop resisting and tears cascade down her face.

I get close and hug her, she grabs my arms tightly as her sobs pierce my heart. All the teachings of poise leave my mind as I cry alongside her. Sorry, to do this to you now of all times.

"… B-But the war is still far away, right? You won't have to fight now." My eyes meet with her, and as much as I'd like to lie to her, the gash on my chest flares up, telling me to be honest with her.

"Miho, we may get sent to aid the UN in the future." Her face froze, as if trying to understand the meaning of my word.

"Why?" After a moment of silence she asked. "Why are you being sent to the UN?! Why can't they do something about this themselves?! What are the Soviets or the Chinese doing?!"

"Miho, please calm down!" Her frown grows bigger as she grits her teeth.

"Why?! Where are the Americans or the Europeans?! Why do we have to go fight their war?!" She got closer and clawed at my dress, staining it with her endless tears. I embrace her tightly, pointlessly trying to stop her and my tears.

"It's our war too, Miho. If we don't team up all together, the aliens will tear us apart. And I do not want to let them get here. I won't let them take you or Takeru away from me."

"And what if they take you away from us?!" She looked at me, her eyes shaking as she wailed. I took a deep breath and returned her gaze.

"Miho… If that's what awaits me, I'm willing to die for you."

"Kage… Don't say that…"

"I'm willing to step into the battlefield, to put my life on the line if it's for you and Takeru. It doesn't matter what comes after me, I won't let them lay a finger on you." Her knees buckled and I had to hold her to prevent her from falling.

"Don't say that… Why do we commoners have to go fight?! We're just normal people. What can you do there?! Why do you have to go?!"

"Because… I ended up being a good pilot. Sure, when I started I was a failure, but… thanks to all the people that had patience with me, that lent me their shoulders, I became who I am now. So, while my fight is mainly for you and Takeru, I'm also willing to fight for those who have helped me. For Koetsu, for all of the guys of the Tiger squad, for my Instructors and my teachers. I thought I was useless back in the day, but this is what I can do best. For my friends, and for you two."

"But… What am I gonna do if you die? I can't… If I'm alone, I can't…" I lift her chin upwards and give her a peck.

"Miho, you're stronger than you think. And I'm not leaving you alone, because I'll always be with you. I'll leave behind as much as I can, so that you can keep Takeru safe." She wraps her arms around my neck, embracing me tightly.

We stand there, hugging each other as we silently weep. My heart is thrown into a tempestuous sea, typhoons roaring within. Every sob, every tear, eat at me. Please don't cry, Miho. I can remain strong because you always gave me the strength to move on, you're the lighthouse that guides my travels, that bright light which I always use to remind me that all of this isn't pointless.

Your brown eyes, teary eyes force me to bite my lips. Even if I'm chasing a gentle lie, even if in the end the BETA come here and devour us all, I just want… Please let me fight without regrets. I can barely breath as my lungs shrink, a tight chain wrapped on my stomach.

"Miho, please. It's not like I'm marching to war tomorrow."

"But you might have to."

"You know I want nothing more than to stay with you. I rather spend my days here with you and Takeru, teaching him all I know, working and coming home to you, to share kisses and jokes as before. But…"

She again rests her head on my chest as I stroke her hair.

The door creaks, startling us both. Peeking from the opening, Takeru's tiny eyes stared into the room.

"Dad? Mom?" He entered the room slowly, looking at us with worry. Miho broke the embrace and turned to him.

"Takeru, we're talking about something important. Go back to the living room."

"B-But…" I don't like this. I don't like the look on his face.

Miho is right. I might have to leave before I can see them again. This might be… and all the following visits… might be the last time we see each other. I go towards him, crouching by his side.

"Takeru, Dad has something really important to tell you." His eyes locked onto me, forcing me to hold back the tears.

"Why are you crying? Did you get hurt?" He rubs my cheeks with his tiny hand. That soft, gentle hand paired with his worried look is picking at my resolve. Get your shit together, Kageyuki. You have to be strong for him.

"You see Takeru. Dad is going to have to go with… the other samurai rangers to fight some bad guys in the future." His eyes open wide, clearly surprised.

"Really? Are you gonna win?"

"Y-Yeah, that's the idea. That's why I have this new uniform. But since we need to train a lot, I won't be coming home as often as before. But I want you to know this, I'm going to be always thinking about you." I grab him and embrace him tightly. "Dad is going to go beat those bad guys someday, and then we will be able to live together. So… please be a good boy and help your Mom, yes?"

"Yes, I'll be good. But when are you coming back?" The arrow pierces my heart, I ruffle his hair and give him a kiss on the forehead.

"I don't know. We might have to go help the other rangers any day, but you don't worry, okay? Dad is going to do his best and I'll be back here before you know it."

"You promise?"

"Yes, I promise. Because I have the strongest power in the whole squad, you know?" He again opens his eyes wide.

"What is it? What power?"

"Love, Takeru. Love is the strongest power in the whole world. That's why I always give you so many hugs. You give me strength, Takeru." I hug him again and this time he returns the hug.

"So hugs give power?"

"Yes, when you give them to the people you like. That's why… give your Mom lots of hugs for me when I'm gone, yes?"

"Yes, I'll give her a lot of hugs!" He smiles as I lift him, holding him close to me.

"So, now that we told you that, how about we go read a book or two?"

"Yes!" His honest, innocent gaze heals my tired heart, thirsty for this affection. Even if it's just for today, let's forget about the war. There's so much I want to ask you, so much I want to tell you.

"So, go find a book you like and wait for me by the table, okay?" I lower him to the ground and with a nod he dashes off towards his room.

"Please don't cry anymore, Miho." I wipe the tears off her face as she calms down.

"What do you want me to do? It looked like you were saying your goodbyes to him."

"You did say that I might be sent to war any day, so… I want to give him as much as I can while I'm still here. Tomorrow… might be too late, after all." She grasps my chin and gives me kiss, first kindly and then more passionate. I'm not the only one thirsty for affection, I'm sure she must be juggling a thousand emotions now.

"Please be careful, Kage. Please." I hug her again, softly this time.

"I will. Don't worry, I have no intentions of leaving you two behind."

[Mami Kobayashi]

---

"Sir, if I may, why are we going to this apartment? What business do you have with the commoners here?" I ask Kurosawa-sama as I look out the window while we're being driven to an apartment complex.

Kurosawa-sama had a hand of his placed under his chin, dressed in the white attire of the Guard. He looked at me and smiled, crossing one leg over the other.

"We're going to lend a hand to a fellow."

"What do you mean, sir? Is there an outpost of the Guard nearby?"

"No, a friend of mine lives here."

"And… why are we meeting up with this person?"

"You see, he's going to move to a new house, one that was on his sights since a long time ago, but his wife has not been well as of late. So, we're going to help him with the packing and other matters."

"Kurosawa-sama, forgive my rudeness, but you cannot use the resources of the Royal Guard for personal matters such as these. I might be your retainer, but I will have to notify Koubuin-sama of this." I cannot believe him… I knew Father was too lenient with him.

Kurosawa-sama, how can you make such an obvious miss? Your honor will be stained for this careless action.

"Oh, you might want to see this before you do."

He produces a paper from a suitcase he had and passes it to me. I read the words carefully, my grip loosening the more I tried to comprehend the meaning of the phrases that formed before me.

"… Are you telling me Koubuin-sama allowed us to come to this person's aid?"

"Yes, that is the case. I know you're still fresh out of the Training Program, but Takahisa-sama does tend to do these… seemingly irrational acts once his mind has been made up. So, I expect no more complaining from you." He smiles at me, taking the page from my hands softly.

"Forgive my insolence, Kurosawa-sama."

"Now, don't be so extreme. I am relying on you to keep me updated if anything does require my attention today, Kobayashi. By the way, did we receive word on the MDF's testings?"

"Yes, sir. The Northern Squadron was pleased with the F-15's performance even during this harsh weather. Once its elbow joints were strengthened it could very easily manipulate the Type-74 Blade, even when it started snowing strongly."

"I see, it seems we will end up adopting the Eagle in the end. Haha, Eiji is going to be mad at this turn of events." He looks out the window, laughing quietly.

"Eiji? Who do you speak of, sir?"

"Nothing you should worry about, Kobayashi. Now, let me ask you a question. Are you good with children?" He combed his dark orange hair backwards, resting his chin against his softly coiled hand.

"… I believe you already had a fiancee, sir?"

"No, I didn't meant it in that way. I meant dealing with grown children." His brows lower, but his smiles doesn't grow smaller.

"Oh… I don't really know. Being the younger of the family, I never had to deal with little kids. Why do you ask, sir?"

"Well, our fellow has one very active boy in his home. I will be asking you to help me deal with him until we finish with the packing."

Am I to nanny a peasant? I am afraid I do not know much of their customs or what they find entertaining. I don't watch much TV myself and I've been living in our bunks for the last three years during my training to be admitted into the Royal Guard.

It's thanks to all this sacrifice I have proved myself worthy of wearing this gray dress, prove that I am indeed worthy of my birthright. But I fear I might not be able to fulfill the orders Kurosawa-sama is tasking of me, I know next to nothing about how to properly deal with children. Sigh… Why must you always give me so difficult tasks to complete, sir? I rather be your test pilot or spend the afternoon behind a PC, but taking care of a kid…

"So, am I to look after this boy? Might I ask who are we helping?" I move my hair behind my ear, awaiting his answer.

"1st Lt. Shirogane of the Osaka Guards."

"Huh?! Shirogane… That Shirogane? That coarse member of Koubuin-sama's squad?"

"Kobayashi… You might feel however you like within, but I would be very grateful if you minded your language when talking about my friend." Kurosawa-sama's eyes folded inwards brushing away his calmness, replaced by the bluntness of anger. I quickly bow, it is rare to see him be this openly upset.

"My apologies, sir. But… I have not heard good things of Shirogane."

"Well, many hold a grudge against him. A commoner that's better than trained nobles… A peasant that's praised by Takahisa-sama more than our royal fellows… Surely you can see why such ugly rumors spread?"

"So, is he not as barbaric as described?" I have heard many unpleasant stories about the man.

That he never uses honorifics, that he doesn't follow our formations on the field, that he hasn't learned calligraphy despite the efforts to teach him, that he tends to oversleep and miss our morning meetings… And those are only the ones that come to mind as of now.

"He is rather rude, by our standards. But he has a golden heart under that rough exterior."

I don't know… Maybe he's only near Kurosawa-sama to take advantage of him. Using his skill within a cockpit, he worms his way into the Guard… The man might even be a spy of the IJA. I must remain vigilant, it might not have been half a year since I officially joined the ranks of the Royal Guard but I cannot allow someone like that man to suck our blood out.

I caress my hair as I let out some air. My face reflected in the window, my hair cut in its usual bowl shape with its light brown color, my violet eyes mired by tiredness thanks to our recent endeavors, and yet he asks of me to look after a child.

As I let my mind wander, I look at the scenery before me. The buildings outside my window reflect a state of life that one would not expect. Stores filled with technological appliances, others offering the most varied clothing options, large bookstores with both foreign texts and mangas… Yet, there is a part of our society that cannot even allow themselves one of such luxuries, that painstakingly trudges on just to make ends meet by the end of the month.

The Empire progresses, but for whose sake? What good is all this opulence for if our people are still suffering from the same problems of decades past? If the common folk fail to see we are the cause behind our current peace, instead some taking the side of the Americans… What a regretful state of affairs, such ignorance to have made nest in the people's hearts. And the same for this arrangement… What reason is behind bestowing Shirogane such special treatment? What has he done to deserve such deference?

The rest of the ride passed in a few minutes. Kurosawa-sama, me, and others of his personal servants dressed in their casual clothing arrived at the place. A large green building with many individual apartments, nothing out of the ordinary.

We have to take the elevator, and, after getting out and confirming the area is safe, I allow Kurosawa-sama to come into the hallway.

"Kobayashi, I am thankful for your protection, but I believe this might be a bit too much."

"Nonsense. As your retainer, it is my duty to ensure your safety." He sighs, shaking his head as he smiles.

I walk by his side, looking up at him and at what is around us as he goes towards the door with the name we're here for. After ringing the bell and waiting a moment, a man in a red and white sweater opens the door. He's almost as tall as Kurosawa-sama, with dark brown hair down cut short. Unlike Kurosawa-sama, however, his build was more resembling a soldier, muscular and lean. His gaze was a relaxed one, however. Or is he faking being amicable, perchance?

"Hey Kageyuki! How's everything?"

"Koetsu, I told you it was fine. How are you going to justify this to your superiors?" Hmm… It seems he's a reasonable person, he doesn't seem to be lying going by his tone.

"Don't worry, I got the approval of Koubuin-sama right here." He smiles as he hands this Shirogane the paper he showed me before.

"You have got to be kidding me…" The man's brows twitched, then he let out another sigh. He's honestly surprised, but there's also tiredness in his reaction for some reason. "I told you all this was my own problem. You don't have to do this. And… why did you bring this many people?"

"What are you talking about? Fellows support each other in times of need, right? Now, let's go in. There is much to do, I'm sure." Kurosawa-sama says, making this Shirogane sigh.

"Well, I can't just send you away after you all came here. Please, come in." The man bows to us, not as deeply as I would have liked, and we all enter his home.

It's a rather nice house, if I say so myself. A small A/C, a larger than usual TV, a good kitchen… Oh, and what of these books? Most of them… seem to be good choices. Hmm… At the least they have a good taste for literature.

Many boxes were on the floor. It seems the man was putting his belongings away by himself until moments ago.

"Sorry for the mess, I'm not even half done yet." Shirogane said, scratching his head and burying his gaze into the floor.

"Well, you leave this to us. You have to go to the hospital, don't you?" Kurosawa-sama said, the severity he usually displays when I give him sour reports present in his voice. What's this about a hospital?

"Hey, I can't just leave this to you all."

"Miho-san is waiting. Go, that's an order as a Guard."

"This is a personal matter, Koetsu. You know that she might-"

"Don't worry." Kurosawa-sama patted Shirogane's shoulder. "She'll be alright. You go on, I'd do her well to see you before the last treatment."

… What is this about? The man is just going to leave? We, public servants of the Empire, made nothing but the maids of a commoner? And, this must be about his wife. Whatever happened to her? They're supposed to be moving but she's in the hospital. With the salary he earns, his wife is in such delicate state?

"Sorry, Koetsu."

"Don't apologize, Kageyuki. Come on, go get ready. Everybody, start packing everything with utmost care. By the way, where is Takeru?"

"Oh, he's in his room. He says he doesn't want to start packing without Miho." Shirogane sighs, cracks spawning within some of his words.

"Alright, leave him to me. Kobayashi, follow me. Kageyuki, please don't worry and hurry to the hospital." Kurosawa-sama folded his arms and returned a bright smile at him, the man nodded after taking a deep breath.

"Yeah, I'll do that." Shirogane then looks my way, giving me a short nod. "Oh, and thanks a lot for helping out Kobayashi-san. Is Benmaru-san doing well?"

"Huh? You know Father?"

"Yes, I met him way back in high school." He smiles, his words filled with a breeze of sunshine. So he was fond of Father?

"Kageyuki and me go way back, so he met your father all the time when he went to pick me up."

"I see… Well, Father is doing fine. He's in good health, thankfully."

"That's good to hear. Tell him I said hi the next time you see him. Well, please be patient with Takeru. I know he might be… too rude for you." His face grew tense and tainted, as if an ink stain permeated his paling white complexion.

"Don't worry, Kobayashi might not look like it but she is very patient. Isn't that right?" Kurosawa-sama, I am thankful you think so of me. However, dealing with children is not part of the job description I signed up for.

"I will do my best in looking after him." I give the man a small, court bow.

Shirogane thanks me and goes into his room. The rest were already putting his silverware and books inside the boxes, some with clear, understandable displeasure rising in their faces.

"Well, let's see how he's doing." I follow Kurosawa-sama as he goes to a door to our left. Opening it, a small shape was laying atop a bed with blue and white sheets within the darkened room. "Takeru, how are you?"

"… Uncle Koetsu?" The boy rose from the bed as Kurosawa-sama went to open the blinds.

"Hey, how are you?" He got closer to the boy and ruffled his short hair. "So you finally cut your hair, huh?"

"I liked it more when it was long." The boy looks down, tightly gripping his sheets.

"Hahaha… Well, why are you not packing? Miho-san will scold you when she comes back."

"… Is she coming back?" The little one's voice became as small as his stature, his gaze crumbling in slow motion.

"Of course. Kageyuki just went to pick her up. Come on, let's start sorting everything."

"But… But if we pack before she comes back, nothing will be here…"

"Takeru, we're not leaving without her. But you have to be a good boy for her, yes? Let's make sure everything is ready when she comes back, then you'll have dinner without worrying about any more boxes." Kurosawa-sama hugs the boy, sitting by his side on the bed. "Don't worry, she hasn't left anywhere. So, let's help out with packing your stuff. What do you say?"

I didn't… I didn't knew Kurosawa-sama could be this soft with children. I am so used to him goofing around, but also being clearly serious when the need arises.

"… Okay. But Mom is coming back, right?"

"Of course. So, what do we start with? Let's put your toys in the boxes first. How do you want to order them?"

I see… By engaging him in this way instead of ordering him to do it, the boy might be more willing to pack his belongings.

"Kobayashi, come and help us out."

"Yes, sir. However, please let me handle this task. As your retainer, I cannot allow you to lower yourself to this meager work."

"Please don't be like this. I came here to help, not to stand looking at the rest. What would that say of me, forcing my men to work but standing comfortably to a side?"

"I understand your wishes, but as your subordinate I must voice my objection." He sighs, rubbing his forehead. Father was truly too lenient with you.

"… Uncle, who is she?" Guh… I had noticed his manner of speech, but to address an adult in such a way? I know he is but a child, however, he should have been taught better.

"She's Mami Kobayashi, she's like my assistant." I'm more than that, sir. I didn't train three years to be merely an assistant to you.

The boy got down from his bed and came up to me, fidgeting a bit.

"Hello Mami-san. I'm Takeru." He held out his hand to me and I took it, shaking it softly.

"Hello, Takeru-kun. I would rather you address me as Kobayashi-san, if you could."

"But your name is Mami…" He squints his brows, puffing his cheeks a bit.

"Takeru likes to address people by their names, Kobayashi. Please, he's a kid. Let him call you in the way he likes." Kurosawa-sama, we're the Royal Guard! We can't let someone address us so informally, why can't he use my surname?

"… Sorry." The boy pulled his hand away from mine after he seemed to notice my displeasure, looking down in silence afterwards. He looks most positively saddened now. Kurosawa-sama narrowed his eyes at me as he rested his chin on a hand, sending chills down my back.

"Ah… No, it is alright. So Takeru-kun, you may address me by my name if you like." He looked up again, his eyes imitating the dawn sky. "So, what might we help you with?"

Then, we both helped the boy pack his toys and books, despite my complains at Kurosawa-sama. Despite his rude attitude, Takeru-kun seems to be a friendly fellow with the quirks of a healthy kid. He is thankful despite his manners, so I can see he was raised well. And… I do wonder why he refers to us as 'samurai rangers'. Though, it is refreshing to hear a kid praising the Guard in these times, regardless of his manners.

"Mami-san, what kind of books do you read?" Takeru-kun asked as he ordered some stick figures before putting them in a box just opened.

"Me? I prefer long novels myself."

"How long?"

"Oh, the longer the better. I have very little free time myself, so I welcome an immersive world to dive into. It is fascinating to see all the details of the work when all the connections are explained." I say, caressing my hair behind my ear.

"But isn't that really, really long?" He said as he placed a book in the box. "Isn't it boring to read through all the conversations?"

"Has someone read a book of this kind to you before, Takeru-kun?"

"Uncle tried to read me one about pirates once, but it was boring." He puffs his cheeks a bit. "It was all about the past, and what the guys were doing before getting to this island full of monkeys… It was more funny when it was about the puzzles of the island." He says, making Kurosawa-sama chuckle.

Yes, he also recommended those novels to me. And while I generally welcome long stories, that one was a surprise indeed despite being about pirates and the simplicity of its wording.

"I found it good myself, truth be told. I know you might not like books of such magnitude, but I suggest you to review your opinion of it. I believe you'd be well served in asking your parents to read it with you whenever you can."

"You speak weird sometimes, Mami-san." He said, giving me a pout. I forgot he was five… He might not have understood me.

"Haha, Kobayashi remember that Takeru is just barely six."

"I know, and that is why I am suggesting him to not dismiss the book just because of its length." If his father is a Royal Guard, this boy has the chance of also gaining an induction if his academic performance is good enough. He is rude, but I can see why Kurosawa-sama holds them in high esteem. The boy has good intentions, he just lacks manners.

"But it was a lot… Who would read a book with so much stuff about the past? Everybody is going to end up bored." He said in a pouty voice, his cheeks puffing with the slowness of a moving cloud.

"Sigh… Well, it might be boring to you, but I enjoyed it much. When you enjoy something, you wish to share it to others, don't you?"

"… I don't have anyone to read with. The boys at school don't really like me, and Mom has been sick for a while." His gaze wanders to the floor, his shoulders wandering downwards like leaves in autumn.

Oh… I see… People here do value our traditions dearly. Someone so rude would most assuredly be looked at harshly by the rest. And those who dislike the Guard might also hold a grudge towards him due to his father's standing.

"Don't worry, Takeru." Kurosawa-sama patted his head. "You'll find good friends in your new school."

"Really?"

"Yes, you will. If I may, why don't you give that book a try again? Then you could talk about it with Kobayashi."

"Huh? Sir, we don't have time for-"

"I'm sure we can get a small break every now and then, can't we Kobayashi?" Guh… Why do you look at me so, my liege? Why go so far for this kid? I can see he at least has been raised with good values since he's thankful and polite, in his own childish way. But why go so far for him?

"Well, it is true that we could… However, our free time shouldn't…" Takeru-kun looked down again, Kurosawa-sama sighed deeply.

"You can exchange letters, recommending each other books you like. That won't be too much for you, right Kobayashi?"

"If it's an order…"

"No, it isn't. It's a suggestion."

"Uncle, why are you angry?"

"I am not, Takeru. I think Kobayashi needs someone to talk to, just like you do. So, why not have you share letters and books?"

I need someone to talk to? What is this about? I fold my arms, narrowing my brows as I inhale through my nose slowly. Pondering the idea as I lick the inner side of my lips, the currents of thought bring no answer to the shore of my mind. Why do I require of someone to speak to? No, why must that someone be this kid?

"Takeru, we'll go get some snacks. You wait for us here, okay?" Kurosawa-sama pets the boy again, Takeru-kun nods and Kurosawa-sama signals me to follow him out of the room. He then stands up upright as we walk into the kitchen, stopping near the fridge. Directing his gaze straight into mine, once more making me conscious of the difference in stature between us, he pours himself some water into a glass. "So Kobayashi… You seem to have something on your mind."

"Why are you recommending me to engage in such endeavors, Kurosawa-sama?"

"I said so just now. You need someone to talk to." He slowly drinks from the glass, closing his eyes.

"Why must that someone be Takeru-kun? What good could come out of this?"

"… Haven't you noticed what you lack, 2nd Lt. Kobayashi?" He folded his arms, addressing me as if we were in his personal office. "What is your most blunt side?"

"My most blunt side? I believe I have showed him enough patience today, sir. And I have engaged him in these talks about his toys repeatedly as we sorted his belongings. What do you speak of?" He sighs, shaking his head like the cup of a tree when a sudden gust comes its way.

"You are being held back by your prejudices, Kobayashi. You're looking down on peasants all the time. Do you think I haven't noticed it?"

"We nobles know more than them, so obviously I think they shouldn't speak up as often or as rudely as they do. Especially some of those 'experienced' NCOs from the IJA."

Kurosawa-sama shakes his head yet again, taking a few steps towards me. His gaze grows as harsh as winter in Hokkaido.

"Kobayashi, I cannot have a retainer that looks down on others based on their social status." His voice lost his ever present shine and friendliness, in it the fangs of my commander showed itself as clear as dawn. "I firmly believe you'd do well in trying to see their point of view. That's why I want you to do this book exchange. You'll be able to see what Takeru sees, what a commoner's child sees, how he sees our nation from his young, inexperienced eyes. You are going to be working for the future he will live, so you need to start thinking on how to address the people that you and I will affect with our work." He takes a breath, his eyes narrowing further as he sees my growing frown as doubt litters my shores. "If you value status so much, if you think we shouldn't try to understand what our common fellows see and think… Should I transfer you to the Horn Battalion?" A sting piked my heart of hearts, my pride and soul.

"K-Kurosawa-sama! I… I would never go as far as those serving House Ikaruga are willing to go. I am loyal to you, and to House Koubuin. I… I merely… Why did I spend these three years without learning of such an approach, if it is so vital to our endeavors?"

"Because General Makabe doesn't believe it to be important." He says, squinting his eyes. "However, I believe you'd do well in trying to bridge your misconceptions of our peasant population. Just because you received higher education at an earlier age, just because you had the honor of being born into the nobility, that doesn't make you any better than them. Remember that some of our common folk are more devoted and loyal to the Shogun than some of our noble fellows."

"Yes… I can see your point, sir. However…"

"… Kobayashi, did I ever tell you I was scorned back in school?"

"Eh? Scorned?" His gaze sails away from mine, a grim smile appears on his face.

"Yes, that was the case. Since I was a noble many were the people that didn't think too highly of me. Back then I also was a low ranking Tozama, so I wasn't allowed to attend to the private schools of the nobility. So, care to guess who stood up in between them and me when they wished to harm me?"

"… I suppose that Shirogane did, sir?"

"Yes, that's the case." He leaves the glass on the table, going to grab some cookies. "Kageyuki got truly upset at how people were unfair with me. He was the only one for those three long years I could call friend in that place. Even if after that life's roads took us to different places, I will never forget what he did for me. He taught me that commoners aren't all 'rude, uneducated sheep' that need to be guided by us, the high nobles. The praise we are given, the status we are born into, the honor and reverence we receive daily… If we don't manage it well, it may become a poison that will twist our vision into performing acts of madness. I am sure you have read about… the dark side of our history, and what this exacerbated, misguided pride made our grandfathers do." I nod, holding the urge to bite my lips. "You'd do well in learning to keep your ego in check, Kobayashi."

"… I see. However, why do you want me to share letters with this boy?" I can see the importance of your words. But that is something I can work on by your side in our daily endeavors under yours and our fellows' gaze.

"I am sure you saw it when you spoke with him. Takeru doesn't have many friends. He… doesn't have that someone his father was for me." Grabbing two packs of cookies, he looks towards me again with half closed eyes. "If you can learn to see what our common fellows see, and if Takeru can gain someone to talk with, even if only once in a while, I see no reason to not do this. That's why this isn't an order but a suggestion."

If this is so important for Kurosawa-sama, it would do me well to be receptive of his advice. If he believes I am lacking, then I could try this out. It is merely a letter a month, it isn't such a demanding endeavor. And, who knows? Maybe some of Takeru-kun's recommendations might be interesting to read.

"Then, I will try. I can't promise you he'll like my suggestions, but I'll do what I can."

"I see. Thanks, Kobayashi. Come on, let's go back."

We return to the room. Takeru-kun had filled the box with his toys, and was now sorting some books.

"Here, some cookies Takeru." Kurosawa-sama hands him one pack, and they pick some from it after it was opened. "By the way, Kobayashi agreed to share book suggestions with you."

"Eh? Really?" He then got closer to me, again looking as happy as a puppy.

"Yes, if you'd like to we could share letters."

"Yay! Thanks, Mami-san!" He then leaped at me, giving me a hug.

"Um… Takeru-kun, my uniform will get-"

"Haha, Takeru does like to give hugs." Kurosawa-sama, lend me a hand here please! How will I explain my appearance when we return to your office?

"So, what books do you want to talk about?" Takeru-kun said, smiling as brightly as the sun now.

"Well, I suggest you to read that novel we were talking about before."

"Huh? But it's so long…"

As we finished tidying up his room, he told me what he thought of the book, and of all the books we saved as we ordered the boxes. He seems to be more focused on what happens rather than in the teachings of the books, but he also can sometimes say interesting things, especially regarding how he justifies the hero's actions.

"But there's one book I really, reaaaally don't like." He said, moving his tiny hands up and down.

"Which one?"

"This one here." He goes to pick up one of the books we had yet to put in a box, and he then comes to my side, holding it with both hands to me.

"… Mayal's Gift?" A picture book? I fail to see what can be conveyed in such simple manner. What could this be about?

"It's really, really sad. It's so cruel…" He squints his eyes at the book, plucking his lips.

"We're almost done here. I'll put his clothes in the last boxes, why don't you read it together?" Kurosawa-sama said, smiling at the kid.

"Sir, as your retainer, I-"

"Then it's an order." He turned his back to us, going to the small wardrobe of the child. Sigh…

"However, what would it say about me if-"

"Kobayashi, did I just heard you don't want any more soy sauce in your lunch?" He said, smiling like a hyena at me.

"N-No, sir! I said no such thing."

"Then, you know what to do."

"Mami-san, what is this about soy sauce?" Takeru-kun pulled my sleeve, tilting his head to a side.

"Nothing you should worry about. So, you think this book is sad Takeru-kun?" I sat down on his bed and he came to my side.

"Yes, it's really sad. I don't like how it ends."

"Well… Let's see what it's about."

Mayal, a small fairy, lives alone in a forest without any memories of the past… meets a girl from a nearby village…

They become friends and begin to play together, the girl bringing more friends to play… But, eventually, the kids grow up and stop visit Mayal, who, as a fairy, matured slower than humans.

They were too old to play with the child fairy anymore. But the first girl didn't forget about the fairy and she kept visiting her.

And then, Mayal remembered something. And so, the fairy gave her first friend one last present. One final…

"Goodbye."

That's because Mayal was the fairy of farewells, fated to teach the little kids that visit her the meaning of those words. She had forgotten her role, and so, people lived on without knowing how to say goodbye.

And so, the girl moved on. Knowing that word, it is said she became the kindest person in the land. And Mayal is left once more alone in the forest, knowing that no matter how many good friends she makes, she will always have to be left behind in order to teach them… the meaning of farewells.

"See? It's so cruel… The fairy ends up alone, everybody just left her in the forest." Takeru-kun pouts at the last page of the book.

"I… don't think so."

"Why?"

"I think this book actually showcases a very important teaching. One must not be afraid of change."

"Afraid of change? What change? They just left the fairy alone in the forest! They're so cruel!" Takeru-kun puffed his cheeks, squinting his eyes.

"How can I explain it to you?" How would he understand? This is actually a very nice way of explaining this matter to little kids… But he missed the message entirely. "Let's see… You're going to be leaving this house soon, won't you?"

"Yes, but there's no fairy here."

"That's not the point… Moving forward is what you always do. That kid that still went to visit Mayal didn't want to move on. She had to grow up, but she didn't want to."

"Why can't she be an adult and visit the fairy?"

"It's a way of saying that once you grow up, there are things and places you won't be able to return to. And, even if you do, it won't be the same. Let's say that in ten years you tried to go to the same swings you go now, you wouldn't fit on them anymore, right?"

"Yeah…"

"Does that mean you abandoned the swings?"

"… But that's not the same. The swings aren't people." Sigh…

"But you won't be able to play with them anymore, right?"

"Yeah, that's true."

"In that way, the kids couldn't play with Mayal anymore once they grew up. That's why they had to leave, to say goodbye." I say, fixing my hair.

"But that's sad."

"It may be so, but people have to grow. One day, you will have to move on from your house, from your school. When that day comes, you will have to leave your own Mayal behind."

"… I don't get it." I pat his head softly, smiling at him.

"That's okay. When you're older, try reading this book again and see what you think of it then."

It is a very nice piece of advice. Someday, he will have to move on. All of us have to.

Leaving our innocence behind, marching on without looking back. It isn't rare for someone to wish that happiness to last forevermore. Even if one's childhood could be extended to eternity, even if that wish could be somehow fulfilled, it would only be a matter of time before reality wakes you up from it. Holding tightly onto it, refusing to let go… it will only chain you down.

No one can mature without losing something. And trying to avoid that loss or to reclaim it, trying to extend that eternity you so desperately wish to never end, will never lead you to a good fate.

All of us had a Mayal that we had to abandon, some earlier than others. As a member of the nobility, my family's warmth was quickly replaced by the fierce competition to see whether we were worthy of inheriting the rank of Tozama. Takeru-kun will also someday have to leave his own Mayal behind and accept that part of his life has come to an end. This shimmering time called childhood is precious because it is short, we can't live forever in it. And the same can be said for all stages of life. One day, he will have to leave his parents behind to live his own life, whether it is by choice or by fate.

"I still think it's cruel. Why can't they send a letter to the fairy?" He's still pouting, resting his chin on both of his palms.

"Sometimes you'll be far away from your own Mayal. It's not like they didn't like her, but they had to leave."

"… That's sad for the fairy."

I guess… if you're the one getting left behind, it is sad. In a way, it is the same for our own endeavors. Those left behind by the world… must live their days in agony.

"But they could say goodbye. So, the fairy won't be so lonely now that she remembers. What would you do if there was a fairy here, Takeru-kun?"

"I wouldn't leave, it would be cruel."

"But what if your parents leave without you?"

"I'd convince them to not leave." He retorts quickly, puffing his cheeks.

"And if you can't? What if your family has to move elsewhere due to your father's job with the other samurai rangers?"

"Then… Then I'll send letters!"

"She's a fairy, Takeru-kun. The mailman won't give her letters, and you might have to go somewhere far, far away where letters wouldn't reach here."

"… That's cruel. You're so cruel, Mami-san." I hadn't noticed it, but he was slightly shaking.

"Sorry… But all of us had to go through something like this. Sometimes, all you can do is say goodbye."

He remained sulking in silence, I suppose that he's too young to understand. Once he grows, I'm sure he'll realize how dear the teaching of this book is.

We finished packing what was left of his belongings, the rest were also finished with their tasks. Being already late into the afternoon, Kurosawa-sama dismissed them, asking me to remain behind with him.

He ordered some food and we ate as we waited for his parents to come back, watching kids shows. Before the clock hit the 1800 hours mark, the sound of the door spurred the little one's feet to action.

"Mom! Welcome back." He threw himself towards the woman.

A petite, slim, and… very pale looking woman, with her hair in the same color as Takeru-kun's done in a hairbun. She looks very weak… Frail as paper, might I say.

"Hello, Takeru. Have you been good?"

"Yes. How are you? Does it still hurts?" The boy rubbed his mother's stomach softly in circles, she giggled at his worry.

"I'm fine, don't worry. Oh, Kurosawa-san… Thank you for your help." The woman bowed to us, Kurosawa-sama smiled wryly at her.

"Miho-san, I told you Koetsu was fine. So, I ordered some food already. Serve yourself something."

"You didn't have to, Koetsu." Shirogane says, scratching his head and lowering his gaze.

"Don't give me that. Kobayashi, help me warm the food."

"Yes, sir."

We spent some more time with them. The woman couldn't eat much due to her medical prescriptions, but she still showed much thankfulness towards us. They're truly warm people, despite the males' manners. Shirogane apologized to me time and again about this turn of events, with Kurosawa-sama telling him to stop repeatedly. He doesn't seem to be as bad as the rumors portrayed him to be, and he also doesn't seem to be trying to take advantage of Kurosawa-sama.

After chatting for a moment, Kurosawa-sama decided it was time for us to leave and contacted our men to rendezvous where we had left our rides.

"Well, I hope life in Hiiragi can be better for you two. And, if you need anything, my phone is always open." He said with a small smile towards the Shirogane. Kurosawa-sama, I am the one who has to deal with phone calls. Don't make this harder please.

"No, we can't keep bothering you for everything…" The woman said, smiling weakly. "Kobayashi-san, thanks again for your help and for keeping Takeru company."

"No, it was nothing."

"Mami-san…" The little one came up to me, offering me his hand. "I'll try to find a book you might like."

"Yes, I will too." I shake his hand slowly. "Well then, goodbye Takeru-kun."

"No." He pouted.

"Huh?"

"I don't like goodbyes. So it's see you later, because we'll see each other again. See you later, Mami-san." He shook my hand with more vigor than me, smiling widely.

"I see… Yes, see you later Takeru-kun."

"Yeah!" His smile flourished, a sunrise in his eyes.

"Be a good boy for your mother, Takeru." Kurosawa-sama crouched down and hugged the boy tightly. "I'll see if we can make some time to go visit you for your birthday. If I can't, I'll send you something nice instead. So be a good boy and don't fight with any other kids, okay?"

"… But the others are all bad."

"Haha… Just do your best, yes?"

"Yes… See you later, Uncle Koetsu." The boy strengthened his hug, they remained like that for a short while, and then Kurosawa-sama patted his head and stood up.

"Well, I gotta go. Kageyuki, we'll see each other eventually in the halls. Tell Takahisa-sama to stop sending trouble my way, if you can." He laughs, folding his arms while Shirogane sighs.

"I doubt it'd be possible to convince him of anything once he gets an idea in his head." How can he speak so casually of Koubuin-sama? There is not an ounce of tension in Shirogane's posture. "Thanks a lot, Koetsu. I'll repay all these favors someday, I swear."

"There's no need. Now then, stay safe. And you know, if you need me… All you gotta do is call." He shares a handshake with Shirogane, I bow towards them, and then we leave towards our ride.

After checking the elevator, and later the lower hallway, was safe, we made it to the street, and we walked to our limo as I kept watch around us. Our men were all rested after getting their free time, so we took no time to depart.

"So, do you still think the same about Kageyuki, Kobayashi?" Kurosawa-sama asked, looking out the window as the limo started to move.

"No, it seems the rumors were baseless." Even if he is less respectful than I would prefer. A surprise, to be sure. "I do wonder how should I deal with these letters you asked me to write." Takeru-kun is a young child, I will need to mind my wording and prose.

"Hahaha… Well, just do what you can. Remember to make an effort to see his point of view too."

"Kurosawa-sama, if I may… Why are you so insistent on aiding the Shirogane? From their words, it seems you've been helping them much."

"I told you already. Kageyuki helped me greatly when we were younger."

"That cannot be the only reason. I am sure you know what will be said about you if word of this gets out." And not only about your honor. Others might go as far as claim that you have other… interests in play, considering how you're delaying your marriage.

"Well… Can you keep a secret?" He closed his eyes, resting his head on the seat.

"… What kind of secret? If it's something I should report then-"

"It isn't, calm down. It's a personal matter, something that's been on my mind for a long time." He runs a hand over his face, letting the exhaustion he managed to hide seep away. His eyes dropping like trees to an axe, his tone weary like a traveler in the desert.

"Fine, I can promise you I won't speak of it in that case. What is troubling you, Kurosawa-sama?"

"I want to break my engagement."

"Huh?! But… But your fiancee is from a Shinpan House! Your standing would suffer-"

"Rank isn't everything, Kobayashi."

"… Then, why did you accept in the first place?" I don't know what kind of woman your fiancee is, but making such a vow isn't something to take lightly. I don't think he's the type to play with a woman's heart, however…

"I didn't. My father gave her my hand without my consent. For the longest time, I thought that I had no choice but to do what my father told me to, to follow the path that was expected of me… But, thanks to Kageyuki, I can now see the light. I don't want to marry that woman."

"… And what did Shirogane do for you?"

"He just did what he thought was right, and his acts showed me I had another choice available to me. Seeing him sacrifice so much of his own life, all to tend to the ones he loves…"

He looks out the window, his tone growing hoarse, almost regretful.

"His parents disowned him, he got conscripted into the IJA, then joined the Guard, and now Kageyuki spends so much time away for them while he sends them most of his pay so that Miho-san can take care of her health instead of being forced to work. All that sacrifice, all of it is for his family. All for his love. That's why I want to support him, because he taught me it isn't a crime to follow your heart." He inhales deeply, entwining his fingers. "So… I decided to break off my engagement, and then I'll see if the woman I love still thinks me worthy of her affection."

"… I see. I… don't know what to say. My parents are also planning an arranged marriage for me. Being nobles, we should put our own interests to a side in favor of our house's one. However, if you wish to do this so strongly… I doubt your chosen one will reject you."

"Haha… I hope you're right."

"Why were you scared of doing so, if I may ask? I know hostility might brew between your houses, but who are you after Kurosawa-sama?"

"… Someone of common birth. I'm sure you know that I tend to look her way in our office much, since you scold me all the time when I do. I suppose you can see why I'm still shaking in my boots at the consequences."

I shivered at the words. Rejecting a member of the Shinpan, those who serve directly under the Regent Houses and the Shogun as our red guards, for a peasant… I doubt this will be taken well by whoever his fiancee is. It's as if one were to spit directly in their faces after drinking sake, it's tantamount to throwing mud towards the name of their house. To be chosen to marry someone of the Shinpan and discard her for a peasant… Kurosawa-sama's standing will be jeopardized, some might even push to lower his rank as well…. Or to remove him from the Royal Guard altogether.

"Keep it a secret for now. We have more pressing matters to attend after all. By the way, did we receive any reports?" He hunches over, looking forward.

"Yes, it seems your design of the elbow joints for the Eagle was the most well received overall." I say after looking at my PDA.

"That's good to hear. Sigh… I wonder how much time will take us to finish working on this frame…" He relaxes again, stretching his legs as he folds his arms.

"I understand the need to make our first TSF a machine up to the standards of the 3rd Gen., but are the requirements so steep, sir?"

"Yes, after all we'll have to rely on this frame for a good two decades, if not more." His tone grew slower and slower, weary as a dry leaf. "And we already have trouble brewing, what with Takahisa-sama and the other heads wanting to request a project to make a different TSF for the Royal Guard instead of sharing models with the IJA."

"Is that so? Oh, is that the reason behind our collaboration with the IJA for the Kagerou's joints?

"Indeed. The Royal Guard is evaluating making an enhancement at large of the frame, or the F-16, to base the successor of the Zuikaku on it."

"However, wouldn't it be for the best if we used our domestic frame for it, sir?" He sighs, truly heavily, while I curve a brow at his reaction.

"It would, but the IJA has kept the project under wraps for too long, and it has been delayed many times already. The TSF resulting from the Youkou Project has to be able to fulfill all roles we might need it for, so testing is, and will likely continue, to be hell until a working prototype that satisfies all parties involved is presented. And that's not even delving into the new OS it will need, we can't just expect to use this frame with our current system. It's getting delayed more times than I could count with my hands, so it also needs to be worthy of the time we spent on it. However, because of said setbacks, some within the high echelons of the Guard are casting doubts towards the results the project could bestow us."

Going by his low tone… I suppose that there are other matters revolving in this choice. Perhaps because of ill blood between the Guard and the private industries making this domestic frame?

"I understand, sir. Let me remind you that there is a meeting scheduled for-"

"Kobayashi, please let me rest until we arrive home." He briefly covered his eyes with a hand, letting a long, heavy sigh out. "So, what did you think of little Takeru?" He recovered his good spirits in a matter of seconds. I suppose there will be another time to discuss this subject.

"He was quirky, but too rude for his own good."

"Yes, that is true sadly. But it was good to see he's still fine despite everything." He smiled softly, curving his eyes with a glow in them reflecting affection I've almost never seen in him.

"… Do you like kids, Kurosawa-sama?"

"Yes, he is truly funny to be around. I know that we're at war and that I might get in a lot of trouble by breaking my engagement, but I am looking forward to being a parent someday. I hope you can learn to deal with children by then, Kobayashi." He grins at me, resting a cheek on his palm.

"Sigh… I will try, sir." And I will not let them end up as rude as Takeru-kun, and I certainly will not be as lenient as my Father was with you.

Though… It wasn't as bad as I thought it would be. Looking after your children… It will be an experience to look forward to, and a valuable lesson for when it is my time to give my house some heirs.

In that way, perhaps this book exchange could help me grow in that regard as well. I do wonder what kind of books he would prefer, however.

"Kurosawa-sama, might I ask if you know of Takeru-kun's literary tastes?"

"Hm? Well, he certainly prefers action mangas, with samurais if possible. Also, folk tales seem to entertain him much."

"I see… Perhaps I should instead recommend him something he hasn't learned yet?"

"That would be a good idea, but do keep in mind he is barely six." He smiles, then returns to looking out the window.

Hmm… Something that could interest him, while also bestowing him a teaching as that picture book did. Perhaps something that could polish his manners? In any case, I shall go to the library when I have some free time. Perhaps I should ask Father for advice, considering he knew Shirogane when he was young.

… How a common child sees the future we're building, huh? The mere act of entertaining a thought for this book is enough to bring forth how little I know of our common fellows. Sigh… I shall try to not disappoint. And, for all I know, Takeru-kun might recommend me an interesting book.

Reading the mails on my PDA to later inform Kurosawa-sama of their contents, the sounds of our ride back home became but a pleasant background noise as time went on.

Chapter 35: Turning Points

---

January 9 th . A bit past 8 PM.

(Hospital Hallway.)

[Kageyuki]

---

I quickly move towards the place Haruna-san mentioned. I didn't even bother getting out of my uniform, I took the fastest train that could get me here. Thankfully, Takahisa-sama allowed me to come here. If he had refused… I was ready to quit the Guard then and there.

"Please remember that she is very weak. Remember to speak softly to her." A nurse that was accompanying me told me.

"I know that well, thank you very much."

Room 147… I softly bite my lower lip as I stand outside of it. I close my eyes, wincing as if in pain. It isn't entirely false, my heart is killing me right now. I never had a gash on me, but this is what it must feel like. After a moment where my hands twitched when going for the doorknob, I inhaled slowly and opened the door.

Miho was laying on a bed, frail, fleeting… As if she were made out of snow, made to melt as soon as winter ended.

"Miho… How are you?" I slowly got closer to her, she looked my way and gave me a pained smile.

"Sorry, Kageyuki… I made you all worry." Miho tried to rise from her position, but I stopped her.

"Don't be stupid. What happened?" I sit by her side, softly clasping her hands. Her cold, soft hands.

"I was just going to start preparing dinner… Then, all of a sudden, my chest started to hurt…" She grimaces as her head again lowers onto the pillow. Her voice resembled a bird chirping away, further and further away. "I tried to scream, but my throat shut close. It hurt to breathe… Everything was spinning… I don't remember anything else. I woke up this morning here, and I didn't know how I got here, or how much time had passed."

"She was very weak so we had to provide her with some imported medicine. She has reacted well to it so far." The nurse tells me.

"I see… Do you feel fine now?"

"… I still feel dizzy. But I'm fine, don't worry." She smiled, trying to lift her spirits a bit.

"What about Takeru?"

"Haruna-san came by earlier, she said she has him staying with her. Please go see him, Kage. Tell him I'll be back in a few days."

"… Yeah, I will."

We talked a bit more, me telling her I was fine and that my life back at Osaka was going well. Visiting hours soon came to an end, so I had to say goodbye shortly after.

As I got out, the doctor that was in charge of Miho told me he wished to discuss something with me, and so we went to his office.

"Please, sit down Shirogane-san." He said, pointing to a chair. "Well, I'm sure you've noticed, but your wife's condition isn't a good one."

"I believe her records should be available, Doctor. When do you think she'd be well enough to go back home?"

His eyelids descended, he gathered some papers and handed them to me. I had gotten used to seeing her medical reports, but I fail to see the difference between this and the other times.

"Doctor, these are her usual numbers. I don't see how this explains anything."

"We told you we used the best medicine we have at our disposal. Her treatment last night was the most that we could do for her. As you know, this hospital has many specialists in heart diseases… However, her condition barely improved."

"… What are you getting at?" I felt a tremor similar to the one of a shaking cockpit in my gut.

"Frankly, I am afraid to tell you that Miho-san's condition won't improve, on the contrary… I fear it will only get worse from here on out." He closed his eyes and spoke in that detached tone doctors take when bad news come pouring.

"Eh? What do you mean? The last doctor that saw her before moving said… They said she would get better! That she would be able to live a normal life!" I hit the desk with the papers he gave me, unable to restrain my voice from resembling a scream.

"Please calm down, Shirogane-san. Read the papers again. Her condition was improving, but… her heart seems to be getting weaker and weaker. If she had started to receive this treatment before, I am sure she would have reached the point where a single pill was all the she would need to live a normal life. But as things stands now, I cannot guarantee that she has the time for the procedures to heal her body."

"… What do you mean? Do we need a more expensive medicine? Will she recover if she's transferred to the Capital's hospital?" He shakes his head, making a knife pierce my throat slowly.

"If she doesn't suffer from any more relapses, she will slowly regain her health. However, in her body's current condition, after so many years of not receiving the proper treatment…" He closed his eyes, his hands tightening and softening in a small rhythm. He exhaled slowly through his nose, and opening his eyes, but not looking at me, he continued. "Please remain calm to what I'm about to tell you. If Miho-san's condition doesn't improve in the next few days… The chances that her heart will stop working are very high, and in her current condition… we might not be able to do anything to save her, since she might not survive another operation."

… Huh?

Miho's heart will… stop? And there's nothing we can do about it now?

I felt my insides being emptied, that feeling when you have a lapse in your memory forming in my head, I couldn't accept what I was told.

Every since we moved her from Yao to Osaka she had been receiving the best treatment we could pay for. Sure, she still didn't improve as much as she could due to how the neighborhood was. She couldn't stop worrying about me, thanks to the political climate of Osaka, and she wasn't welcomed there either, due to her upbringing as a peasant. That's why the doctor recommended us moving away from that environment, for her mental health to truly improve. But this month in Hiiragi she… she said she was feeling better than ever. Why… Why now, of all times? I can't help to tighten my fists so much it hurts, gritting my teeth at the words the doctor spoke. It feels as if the floor had vanished and a TSF was falling on my shoulders.

"But… But… But the specialist in Osaka said she was going to be fine, that all she needed was to take her medicine to help her heart pump blood as it normally should! That if she could find an environment where she felt at ease, everything would be under control."

"Yes, that was the case in her last visit. However, as I told you before, they gave her a medicine made here, in Japan. While in the vast majority of cases it would have been enough, Miho-san began her treatment in adulthood. The signs of her heart problem were not detected until she was pregnant, if the records are correct."

"Yes, that is the case. We both were surprised when we found out." Miho was never very athletic, and I always had to take it easy on her during sex and do most of the heavy stuff back home, but I always thought that was just how she was. That's why I always insisted on moving away and on having someone help her out in the daily chores, but she didn't want to. She wanted us to save all of our money for Takeru's future in case I ever died in the battlefield.

"If she had started treatment at an earlier age, she wouldn't have gotten to this point." The doctor said, looking to the ceiling. "And, had you treated her with this American medicine at least a few years ago, her condition would have improved much faster. However, as it stands now… Her heart is growing weaker and we might not have enough time for the medicine to affect her before it's too late."

"Is the pacemaker she had until now not enough anymore?"

"There is little a pacemaker can do when the heart stops beating completely. She is alive now thanks to it, that's why she managed to arrive here alive after she fainted. However, considering the strain that she was put to endure… Let me remind you that CRT does not cure heart failure, and in her case, I believe she has lasted longer than what any doctor would have expected her to live. I know this is cruel to say… But I believe Miho-san won't make it to February."

You gotta be kidding me… I knew this day would come, we both knew it. But she was getting better, the medicine and the pacemaker had made her so much good…

"We will do all we can to treat her, but please keep in mind what I've told you."

"… I will. Thanks for your honesty, Doctor." I bow to the man and, after taking one breath, exit the office.

All the way back home, I could do nothing more than stare at the ground. My gloves might tear up any second now, since I'm clawing at my hands so strongly. The floor might be crumbling away for all I care, I feel as if I would turn to dust the second anything hits me with some strength.

… I was ready to die. I was ready to march to my death, knowing I had left you two everything I could. I always hoped you would get better, at least to be with Takeru until he was old enough to learn to take care of himself.

… But how am I supposed to live without you? How am I supposed to carry on? What will I tell Takeru? If I die now… He'll be sent to an orphanage. Thanks to being in the Guard now, I was able to learn a few secrets about… our bureaucracy. Not all orphanages are warm places… Many are run by people that have to make sure no kids get adopted, all to ensure the IJA has enough fresh recruits in a few years, all to allow the people with money to save their children from the obligatory conscription.

… How can I keep fighting… if everything I've done until now… is going to crumble down when your heart fades away…

I got out of the taxi I called, my house comes into view.

I inhale through my nose a few times, looking up to the sky. Feeling my chest filled with the cold air, I clean off the tears that wanted to run away. I open my mouth and draw one final, long breath. You gotta be strong, Kageyuki. Now, you can't die. That's all there is to it. Takeru needs you, so get your shit together. You know how hard it is, to live without your parents. So, stop being pathetic… Hic… I just gotta survive if I have to fight. That's all I gotta do.

… Takeru will need me by his side, though. I guess that means… my journey in the Royal Guard has come to an end. Leaving now, when I established myself as a core member of Takahisa-sama's squad… might be seen as treason.

Who gives a shit? My son comes first. If it wasn't for the stupid arguments with the Americans, Miho would have received the better medicine and…

"No… It's not their fault… Sigh… How the hell am I supposed to take care of Takeru like this?" I exhale, shaking my head as I bring a hand to my forehead.

Come on, you were prepared for something like this since a long time ago. You gotta do what a man's gotta…

No. I have to do what a father has to do. You can cry on the way back to Osaka, but for now… You have to be strong for Takeru.

I went to the Kagami's door with heavy step, each one feeling as if I were stepping in mud, as I was going to slip and fall at the moment my attention dulled for a second. I gulped again before ringing the doorbell.

A short moment was all I spent in wait.

"Kageyuki-san! Did you made it in time?" Haruna-san came out in a rush after seeing it was me.

"Yes… Is Takeru still awake?"

"Yes, please come in."

I enter her house, the difference in temperature making me shiver a little. Soon after entering, the sound of the stairs guided my gaze towards them.

"Dad! Where is Mom?" Takeru rushed to my side, almost falling at the last steps.

I crouched and hugged him, holding him in silence for a moment. Caressing his back, I felt my chest tightening as I held back my tears at the sound of his voice.

Come on, Kageyuki. You can… You have to do it.

"Are you okay, Takeru?" I say, ruffling his hair softly.

"Yes… Where is Mom?"

"Mom is still in the hospital. Don't worry, she's fine now. Will you go visit her tomorrow?"

"Yeah! But… She'll come back home, right?" He looked up at me, his creaky tone driving more knives in my gut.

"Takeru, listen closely to what Dad has to say…" I licked my lips, softly letting some air out. "Mom will have to stay in the hospital for some time again."

"Eh?! But… But she said she wasn't sick anymore!"

"… It seems this winter… was too harsh for her, Takeru."

"Is it because of the snow?"

"… We don't know. The doctors are doing all they can to help, so let's be positive about this, okay? You gotta smile for her when you go see her tomorrow."

"Y-Yes… I'll cheer her up and give her lots of hugs. Are you coming too, Dad?" His grip on me tightened, and despite how tender his hands are, I could only feel a crushing force piking at my heart.

"We'll both go at morning. After that… I have to go back to the samurai."

"Eh? But… But Mom is sick!" I know… Please Takeru, don't make this harder on me.

"Yeah, but… The samurai are the ones who allowed us to take Mom to the hospital, Takeru. But don't worry…" I again pat his head, biting the inner side of my mouth strongly enough that it began to hurt. "I will do all I can to talk with them, and then I'll come back home. We'll wait for Mom to get better together."

"Really?"

"Yeah, I promise. So, you gotta go to sleep early today. Let's go home, Takeru." I stood up, grabbing his hand. "Haruna-san, can I ask you to look after him while I'm gone? I can leave you some money if-"

"Don't you finish that!" She said, pointing a finger at me. "You can leave Takeru-chan in my hands. We'll keep him company until Miho-san gets better. Right, Sumika?"

"Yes… I'll help too." The little one nodded, despite how her hands were trembling.

"… Thank you. Really, thank you."

"It's nothing. I'm sure you need a good rest. Takeru-chan already ate, so don't worry about that. There's still some food leftover if you want."

"No, it's alright." I don't think I can stomach anything right now. "Well, we'll be going. See you tomorrow, and thanks again for helping Miho yesterday. Truly… I can't thank you enough."

She nods and we go towards the doorway. Takeru hugs Sumika before saying his goodbyes. As he did, I approached Haruna-san and spoke in a hushed tone.

"Haruna-san, I'll come back once he's asleep. Is that alright?" She nods, giving the kids a look.

We go out into the street and return home. I take Takeru to his room and got him into his bed.

I remained by his side until he fell asleep, he didn't even need a story. All he asked from me was to hold his hand, and now he doesn't seem to want to let it go despite being asleep. I didn't make much effort to release myself, instead I started caressing his forehead and fringe. Slowly, calmly, he sleeps. And now that he can't see me, a few tears get out from my eyes as I bend over and kiss his forehead.

What will I say to him when Miho dies? Can I… tell him that she's dead? He's seven, he isn't that little anymore. But Miho always kept him from the news, and we never remained in contact with our relatives. How do I explain to him… what it means to die? How will I answer when he asks me if I'm going to die too?

That last thought was enough to make me choke on empty air. I feel as if I had swallowed hot sand, and then tried to clean my mouth with boiling bleach. Rubbing my chest in circles, I release my hand from his and again clasp his cheek. I simply sat there looking at him, as the minutes went by, as the clock disturbed our silence, as I stopped feeling pain and it turned to hollowness.

After some time, I left his side and went towards my neighbor's house once more. Once inside, she made some tea for both of us and explained to me what had happened in detail. How she found Miho, that the kids were the ones who found her first, what the doctors told her, and how Takeru was today.

"I know it's a personal matter, but… how is Miho-san's health?"

"… The doctors said she doesn't have much time left."

"Huh?"

"They said she was lucky to live so much despite her condition. The doctor who treated her told me… she probably won't make it to February." Every word drains a bit of warmth from my world.

"… Oh, I didn't… I didn't knew her condition was…"

"Sorry. Could you look after Takeru until I return from the Guard? Again, I can leave you enough money for around a week. And no, I am serious. If you hadn't helped her… Miho would have already died." She grimaces, heaves a sigh and drinks some more tea.

"… There's no way I wouldn't have helped her. You all did much for me in the short time you were here."

"Huh? Really?"

Her gaze lowers, losing itself in her cup of tea. While I haven't spoken much with her, she and her daughter seemed like very warm, bright people. To think her face could be clouded in such grief… Sigh… All of us had it hard at some point, what am I saying?

"Sumika was… being bullied very badly at school." Her tone cold as snow, her gaze unmoving from that cup of tea. "I also didn't have anyone to talk to here at the time. But when your family moved here, Takeru-chan helped Sumika in school, and thanks to that she recovered her smile and no one bullies her anymore now. As a mother, I cannot express how much I thank your son for that."

She looked at me, smiling faintly as the radiant warmth returned to her tone.

"And Miho-san has been very kind to me, sharing their house and food with us despite me not being able to contribute as much to the dinner when cooking together. She never said anything about it, she sympathized with us when people brought up my husband's death, she was always… so positive and nice. I truly… I truly think of her as a good friend, despite the short time we have know each other."

She closed her eyes and smiled, drinking more tea. She then returned my gaze, again in a serious way.

"So, please don't worry. I'll look after Takeru-chan while you're away, Kageyuki-san. I assure you that he will be safe with me."

"… Thank you, Haruna-san. Really… I have no words to thank you enough."

"Please, stop that. Is there really nothing that can be done?"

"No… We already did everything we could. Before moving here, she was in the hospital for around a week. The doctors there told us she would be fine from now on, as long as she took the medicine. Sigh…" I run a hand over my forehead again.

"I see… Well, in any case, you can trust in me. Takeru-chan will be safe until you come back." I nod, finishing my tea.

"Thanks. Oh right, let me tell you my base's number. If anything happen, call for me and I'll try to come as soon as I'm able."

After noting down the phone number, I thank her again and go back home.

I carefully got out of my suit and, without energy left, I slowly changed into my pajamas, that Miho still kept washed and clean in case I ever came back on a break. I then collapse onto the bed, barely managing to get under the sheets. And yet…

This absence of heat, this void I feel when my hands move forward… The emptiness by my side didn't let me fall asleep as fast as my fatigue made me think I would.

The coldness of the bed made me claw at my sides.

The thought that this will be the way I'll sleep for the rest of my life was too much to bear.

Knowing I'll never feel her breath on my neck, the comfort of her closeness at dawn, the sight of her eyes before me whenever I wake up gone forever, I simply remained still, eyes closed as tightly as the knot forming around my neck.

Crying in silence, somehow, I eventually fell asleep.

"Mom, how are you?" Takeru walked up to the bed, giving Miho a hug.

"I'm fine, Takeru. Mom is just a bit dizzy."

"Really? Then, are you coming home soon?" Miho's smile vanished for a moment, quickly returning in a dulled way.

"… I don't know, but you be a good boy until I come back, okay?"

"Yes." He nodded, holding her hand.

"Miho, how do feel today?" She looks at me as she slowly caresses Takeru's hair.

"I am feeling a bit better. Don't worry so much, Kage."

We spent a little time chatting, Takeru telling her he was fine with the Kagamis, she apologizing for 'falling asleep on the floor', and me telling her Haruna-san was going to be looking after Takeru until everything got back to normal.

I asked one of the nurses to watch Takeru for a while, to give us some space.

"… What is it, Kage? What happened?" Her tone finally stopped lying, decreasing in vigor and speed as suddenly as a summer rain.

"Well… The doctor told me you were informed of your condition as we were coming here."

"Yes… It seems I'm… short on time." She then laughed weakly, moving a strand of hair behind her ear.

"Well, we don't know that… You still might have more time than what the doctors think. After all-"

"Don't, Kageyuki." She looked into my eyes, and despite her weakened complexion her eyes were sharper than what mine feel. "Holding out for a miracle… is only going to make it worse. There won't be any more 'See you laters' between us. This… This time it will be 'Goodbye'."

I closed my eyes, drowning a sob under the back of my throat. I know… I know that it will hurt me more… But you can't just kill my hope like that, dammit. And using Takeru's words, too.

"Then… How am I going to carry on without you?"

"You told me before, remember?" She slowly raised a hand, I got closer so that she could reach my cheek without effort. "You're stronger than you think. It will be hard, I'm sure. But you can do it, Kage. You're still healthy after all, and you're part of the Royal Guard too."

I clasp her hand that was caressing my cheek softly. I close my eyes, simply feeling her warmth, her fading, distant warmth.

"Miho, I… I'm going to quit the Guard. Takeru needs his father close by, and if you get better somehow you can't keep taking care of everything yourself." Her eyelids lowered, she sighed and returned my gaze again.

"… Then, what about work?"

"You don't worry about it. Focus on getting better and don't worry. Everything will be fine, I will be here from now on. And if I am called to fight and die, you know what will happen to Takeru. So… You leave it to me, I'll-"

"Kageyuki, you… you shouldn't do that. Don't quit the Guard."

"Huh? But then-"

"If you do, many will call you a traitor. Then, you won't be able to find another work that pays as good as you would need to keep living in Hiiragi. I know you're not good with numbers, but even you can see that, right?" She smiled, giggling at me.

"… Then, who takes care of Takeru?"

"You always insisted on hiring a nanny, didn't you? Well, you can do that now."

"… You always opposed that. If we had done that before you-"

"Kage, don't." She put a finger on my lips, and this time I couldn't prevent a few tears from running away. "It's fine… The doctors said it too, right? I lived more than what one would expect. I got to see Takeru grow up, even if it's a shame I won't see him become a man. You gave me a life better than what I ever expected to have. So please, you have to do my share from now on too. You can't quit the Guard."

"… If I die, that's it. No nanny will prevent Takeru from being taken to an orphanage."

"I know… Couldn't you ask Kurosawa-san to help, in case the worst happen? I think you said he-"

"Koetsu broke his engagement last week."

"Huh? Is that so?"

"Yeah, the whole House was in an uproar. Koetsu seems happy now, despite everything. But he himself told me he was going to wait some time before proposing to the woman he loves." I am happy for him, to have taken that step. The amount of trouble it brought him, and he still rejected the 'proposal' to throw everything under the rug if he backed down and accepted to marry his former fiancee.

"But then, that's fine. So far you weren't called to fight. Don't be so negative, Kage." She again caressed my cheek softly.

"… Sigh, I'll try. Anyways, at the least I'll ask for some time off. Takeru will need me with him if… the worst happens. And I will need to look myself for someone trustworthy." I can't bother Haruna-san with this, even if I would welcome them looking after Takeru.

"I see… Please look after yourself, Kage. And don't worry, I'm fine for now. You already… did more than enough for me." I caress her hair softly, kissing her forehead.

"Don't worry, Miho. Nothing is set in stone yet. Well, I have to go back to Osaka for now. I'll try to be back as soon as I can." She nods and, after caressing her cheek one last time, I stood up and went to the door. I stop by it and look back. "You just rest and get as better as you can, okay? See you later, Miho."

"Yes… Have a safe trip." She slowly waved at me.

So… You don't want to say it anymore…

I get out and slowly walk away. What should I do, Miho? You told me to keep working… but who will look after our Takeru if I'm not here?

Resign myself to keep being a pawn to safeguard his future. Risk becoming a traitor to heal his heart.

… I guess in the end it's up to me. My honor or his smile, which one would I rather lose?

[Takahisa Koubuin]

---

"Rejected."

"May I ask why, Takahisa-sama?" Shirogane retorted, tensing his brows and looking rather upset.

"You are a key part of my flight. I cannot have you gone on such a short notice. We have many important trials against the soon-to-be adopted Kagerou, and I require your presence in them, Shirogane. That is all."

"Then…" He inhaled deeply for a moment, his lips moving in an odd manner. "If you won't allow me to take some time off, I suppose I should present a formal document requesting my detachment from the squadron?" His words almost generated a reaction in my face, for him to be this adamant in leaving his post.

"What are you saying?!" Kazora loudly said, rising from his seat. His turquoise eyes seething with venom, his tone mired by blazes. "You want to simply turn tail and leave, Shirogane?"

"My son needs me by his side. I have made myself clear enough. If I cannot get your approval for a small time off my duties… I suppose my stay here has come to an end."

"Pah… All you peasants are the same." My retainer folded his arms, driving his turquoise gaze into Shirogane, who didn't flinch. "You received much from the moment you were admitted here. How can you be so selfish when all you have now is thanks to the Royal Guard?"

"I understand that well, Col. Tsukuyomi. However, my personal situation is one that requires me to be by my son's side now. Please, I believe I am making myself clear on this matter."

Kazora and me both lowered our brows, Shirogane almost never is this court and stiff with us despite how much he's been reminded to use formal speech in my presence.

"Should you decide that I cannot return to his side while I am serving in the Guard, then I believe it best for me to simply leave. It wouldn't do Takahisa-sama any good to have a pilot whose mind is elsewhere during these trials, would you not agree Col. Tsukuyomi?"

"You speak the truth, however, you should be aware of your position in our ranks." Kazora continued while I brought a hand to my chin, carefully watching their exchange. "You are the sole commoner in the squadron's permanent members. This honor that has been bequeathed onto you is a rare one, and in these days we are in need of your abilities. Yet, you wish to abandon your position in such a hasty manner… I can't see this as anything other than treason." He again folded his arms, his tone severe as the swings of his blade. Shirogane, however, remained as collected as if he were receiving his customary morning briefing.

"It is regretful if you decide to see it as that. I will not back down, however. My son needs his father, so I shall be by his side."

"That is not for you to decide, 1st Lt. Shirogane." Kazora said.

"You also cannot reject my resignation from my post, Col. Tsukuyomi. See it as you will, I have notified you of my situation and of my plans."

"Hmph… Such insolence, it seems that training you was a waste of resources in the end." My retainer folded his arms again, scowling.

"Should I take your words as the formal answer, Colonel?" It is not rare for me to relay orders through both Tsukuyomi brothers at times.

However, this is something I cannot do this time.

Shirogane is not such a serious person. He dislikes formal speech as much as I dislike Yohime getting inside a kitchen. I already asked about this matter, I know of his wife's condition. In spite of this, I cannot bestow him this favor for my House requires Shirogane by my side for the trials to come. We need to determine the new strength of the IJA, to further enhance the Zuikaku as needed. And he's one of my best men, the thought of losing him… If House Koubuin is the lone House that loses in these trials, our standing will suffer.

However, should I use my standing to keep him here, the unyielding resolution within his eyes tells that such a course of action will only make everything worse. Hmm… Whatever shall I do… I cannot turn a blind eye to my fellow's plea, yet I cannot allow him to go to his son's aid…

… A moment, why is it that I cannot do both? Hmm… Yes, what exactly prevents us from having Shirogane visit his son while also being here in time for the test battles? Logistics? I can have him use one of my personal trains, and it's not like I cannot deal with a few issues coming from letting him use it, for they're mine to command.

"Shirogane, am I correct to assume you do not wish to leave the Guard?"

"… I do not, Takahisa-sama. However, if left with no other choice, I will place my son's well-being first."

"So, were we to find a method that allowed you to be near your son, you would have no more reason to present these papers of resignation, am I correct?"

"My liege, I am sure you know Shirogane's son is in Yokohama. We do not-"

"Tsukuyomi, our private trains are more than enough for this task, are they not?"

"Sir, we cannot let a commoner use them! Even less so for this matter. What would it say about you if word gets out you're using the House's resources for the private matters of a commoner?"

"A commoner that happens to be a core member of this House's pilot squadron. My resources are mine to administer, and I deem Shirogane necessary for the following tests. Are you questioning my judgment by any chance, Tsukuyomi?"

"No, sir, I would never." He closed his eyes and bowed shortly.

"Then Shirogane, what do you say of this arrangement?"

"I mean… Ahem, is it alright, Takahisa-sama? I do not wish to bring trouble to you or the House." Sigh… It is strangely uncomfortable, hearing you being formal.

"I said it is fine, and so, fine it is. I do try to not delve into my fellow's private matters unless they come to me for advice, but I suggest you to focus on what shall come. The Koubuin House needs you for the tests that will come in only a matter of days, but allow me to cut to the chase. What will you do after your wife passes away?"

He did a good effort to conceal it, yet his lips curved unnaturally. An ever so slight tremble of his fists, happening with the hastiness of a humming bird's wing flaps. Shirogane is holding his facade well, but it is clear as daylight. If I fold my hand on this matter, I will lose a good fellow.

"… I cannot say what I'll do, not when my feelings have not been sorted out." Finally, his gaze receded from ours and retreated towards the ground.

"Hmph, what kind of man are you?" Kazora said, the sting of a scorpion in his tongue. "You are a father and a husband, you should already have an answer ready, Shirogane. It is most shameful to hear you display such weakness."

"… If that is what you think of me, I suppose there is no more reason for us to exchange words." Shirogane's gaze narrowed again, meeting my retainer's.

"Now, now, let us not be hasty." I extended a hand and direct a gaze at my retainer, so that he calms down before words that cannot be taken back are pronounced. "Shirogane, I wish for you to stay in my squadron. While the following months will be busy and you won't be able to visit your son as often as you'd like, I can look for someone trustworthy myself that can take care of him in your absence. Of course, I will keep your income in mind, but I can guarantee you he will be in good hands."

"Sir, I am grateful for this… However, this is a personal matter. Col. Tsukuyomi is right, I do not deserve this deference."

"The one who decides whether you do or not is me. I am the Head of the House and your superior, the one who decided that your services as a permanent member of my squadron are required as of now, and I would be wishing for you to start seeing yourself as a permanent vassal of my House. It has been brought to my attention that some of our fellows do hold… some conflicting views towards you, however you are one of us nonetheless. And as your lord, it is my responsibility to assist you in your hour of need. What would it say about me as a Head of a Regent House if I treated you as nothing but an expendable piece?"

"Even so, looking for a caretaker is something I should do. And I wish to be by his side, I-"

"Then, all you need is someone who can properly take care of your son, someone who will put your mind at ease. Then, you won't have to leave your post."

"However, that isn't the only problem…" His gaze lowers and sinks, filled to the brim with the depths of a trench.

I suppose he worries that, after his death, his son will be sent to a certain type of orphanage. If we are called to fight, that might as well be the case.

… The code would normally bind my hands. We should not show favoritism towards any of our fellows. Yet, I cannot help but to sympathize with his plight. He does not know of it, and yet, his worry for a son that will be left alone is similar to mine towards Meiya.

Were I to die, Yuuhi would become the next head. I already made that clear and wrote my will in advance for it to be a reality. And yet… If I die, only Raiden will be left to look over her. And he also has not much time left. Furthermore, Meiya will be fated to forever live in isolation as a pawn of the Shogunate, forced to be a body double for Yuuhi, stripped of any freedom or joys. I am the only one that can lift the accursed brand I put above her head the second she was born.

Going as far as he can for the sake of his heir, disregarding social norms without missing a heartbeat. I wonder, could I do the same for Meiya? To give her something for herself, something besides living in the shadows? It is a mystery to me, how could my ancestors cut away their sons and daughters with such ease? Or, perhaps, I am the one in the wrong? Am I giving my heart too much importance?

And yet… I cannot help but envy your freedom, Shirogane. Family customs notwithstanding, I sent Meiya away despite Yohime's pleading. If you have taught me something, is that there is always a solution where you least expect it to be. Your peculiar maneuvering has proved vital in many of our mock battles after all, and your honest and forward demeanor, despite being coarse at times, has made me realize how many foul adulators used to surround me in my inner circles.

So… This conundrum feels less like aiding him with these problems, and more like Shirogane is but fate's mirror showing me the inner, uglier side of myself. That side I wished to seclude deep inside my mind, the cold side that doomed one of my daughters to live trapped in a cage.

"… Shirogane, allow me to say this." He looks up, I entwine my fingers slowly, inhaling as a weight comes off my shoulders, giving me a so foreign feeling of stillness. "If you were to die in the field, I will do what is in my power to make sure your son doesn't fall in the wrong hands. I assure you of this."

"Takahisa-sama, what are you saying?!" Kazora's eyes were widening, the trembling of a leaf as a ladybug lands on it present in his tone for but a moment. "You should not show such gestures to anyone. More so to someone who is but a inductee, someone from a family without a history of service to our House. What would be said about you if-"

"In the worst case scenario I am describing, Shirogane would have served me well, up until his death. That would give me enough reason to look after his descendant, as the heir of a fellow of mine."

"Well, that is true, however-" I again interrupt Tsukuyomi, narrowing my eyes and taking a slower, clashing tone similar to my blade strikes, making him take a step back.

"And must I remind you that Shirogane is a permanent member of my squadron, something I myself have decided. To oppose this would mean to oppose me directly, which I cannot have one of my retainers do, Tsukuyomi." He nods slowly, bowing in apology, his gaze repositioned upon the floor. I lean back on my seat, smiling again and dulling my edge. "If I recall correctly, Saionji-sama is always insisting on keeping one's most trusted fellows close. I am just following the Shogun's advice, if anyone ever poses a question towards my actions."

"But my liege, he's but a peas-"

"His status matters not. He is one of us, Tsukuyomi. So Shirogane, you can rest assured. Do give me some time to find someone worth your trust to take care of your son."

"Um… Takahisa-sama, I am thankful for your worry. But I believe-"

"Do you happen to know of someone better than me to take care of this matter?" I say, leaning forward. Unlike Tsukuyomi, however, Shirogane shows no taint of apprehension or fear in him. Only his gaze lowers, and with the same worry I once saw in mine as I left Meiya to her luck.

"No, however, my son needs me by his side. What would it say about me as a father to abandon my son in this way?" His words cut a gash deeper than any blade ever could. A vile taste spreads on my mouth, I close my eyes and take a moment to inhale through my nose.

"If I allowed you to leave, people will assuredly begin to see you as Tsukuyomi said they would. Even if I tried to clarify the matter, many shall say you're a traitor, especially in this climate we're living."

Many are the ones who do not like the adoption of the F-15, even more within the Guard at the prospect of it becoming the successor to the Zuikaku as well. I myself am not entirely pleased, but one must be aware of one's own limits and shortcomings. Sadly, this schism won't be going away any time soon, not while American troops remain stationed in the Empire. As much as I'd like to support our domestic frame, I must avoid furthering the tensions. And to that end, I need to maintain my position while I continue to provide results. And to make results continue to appear, I need all of my fellows in top condition. So, I cannot simply let this rest.

"While it seems you see this as a black or white choice there are many options available to you, Shirogane. You do not have to choose between remaining on the Guard or safeguarding your son."

"… May I ask why are you willing to go so far for me, Takahisa-sama?" He lowered his head slightly as he asked the query. I place a leg over another, a strange shiver spawning on my neck at his forced manners.

"I said so before, you're a fellow of mine. My House requires your services, and, as your superior and lord, I cannot turn a blind eye to your hardships. I would suggest bringing your son back to Osaka, but it seems he has found good fellows in Hiiragi. As such, fret not and do rest easy for I will find someone that can watch over your son while you continue to work here. I suppose, you do not have any other reasons to wish to leave your post, am I right?" I ask the sole doubt that could be claimed against him, yet I see no wavering nor ripples in his eyes as he returns my gaze. The honest, frontal Shirogane has never been found lying, not even once. And that is one of the reasons I cannot lose you, my fellow.

"Of course not, sir. I am truly thankful for all you've done for me since I arrived, and for even considering inducting me in the first place."

"I see. Then, please do return to your activities for the day. We can have another talk at large tomorrow. Tsukuyomi, please go look for the number of the child care services."

"Takahisa-sama, are you serious?"

"Did I stutter, perhaps?" I narrow my eyes, Kazora gulps, shakes his head and then gives me a small bow.

"Um… So…" Shirogane rose a single brow, folding his arms. "Regardless of who you send now, will you truly… look after Takeru if I do die in battle?" His words were as heavy as Mt. Fuji, it seems it took a severe effort for him to ask that.

"Yes, I assure you of that. As your lord, I will extend a hand towards your son. Of course, there is little we can do once he's taken to an orphanage, however I'll make sure we can have a talk with him before that happens. You're one of us, Shirogane. And it is my duty and obligation to look after my fellows as the Head of the Koubuin House. Worry not, your son will be safe." Again, the facade almost broke off. He bowed to me, stiffness permeating his whole body.

"… Thank you, Takahisa-sama. I… I don't know what to say…"

"It is alright, you may rise. You've been through many a great hardships these days, return to your room for now. We shall continue this conversation tomorrow."

"Yes, sir. And again, thank you very much. I swear I'll redouble my efforts from now on, Takahisa-sama." He bows deeply to us again, and then goes his way out of my office.

I sigh, content to have seen Shirogane honestly relaxing into his usual posture before he left. Leaning back on my seat, my gaze wanders towards my retainer, whose face twisted around into a frown.

"… What do you wish to say, Kazora?"

"Takahisa-sama, you cannot do this."

"And why would that be?" I close my eyes, resting my interlocked hands on my chest.

"First, Shirogane is still not a fellow of us. He's but an inductee, regardless of his position in your squadron." Sigh… His efforts have earned him that honor, why does everybody opposes him so strongly? It cannot be only because of his manners. "Second, to involve yourself this deeply into his private matters is not a wise move. Would you do the same for the rest of your fellows?"

"If I recall correctly, we have given many loans to the Fudai and Tozama families that serve directly under us so that their endeavors could bear fruit. Some of their heirs are now part of my squadron as well, others serve us in other areas beyond military matters. I believe this situation is actually a rather simple showing of appreciation towards Shirogane compared to what we've done for others in the past." Kazora's eyes narrow, his head slowly shaking from left to right.

"Those families proved themselves trustworthy after generations of serving. Even those who rose from the peasantry were tested before such gestures were given to them."

"And I've tested Shirogane's character many times already. He keeps almost no money for himself, he sends most of it to his family. He has no desire to leave, he is merely stricken with worry for his son. And he has never asked for any preferential treatment or any reward for his services, not even once. And let's not forget that he has maintained a composed behavior since he arrived despite all the unplesantry that is said behind his back. I believe he is to be trusted." I met Kazora's gaze with the serenity of a pond's surface. Closing his eyes for a moment, a hand rose to his chin as a few fingers softly ran over his thinly shaved beard.

"And my last concern is…" He starts, then looks upwards towards nowhere. "I believe Shirogane is right. The boy needs his father, especially so at a time like this."

"… Oh, I see. And, pray tell, why is that?"

"They're peasants, Takahisa-sama. Their families mean the world for them, probably more than what the Emperor or the Shogun mean in their hearts. No caretaker will ever replace the gaze of a father, the warmth of a mother. And furthermore, to claim you'll look over the child after his father's passing… is the same as saying you'll put him under your care, my liege."

"And whatever is the problem with that? We look after the heirs of our fellows all the time."

"However, Shirogane isn't a noble. The weight of the other's looks will surely make the child's life here undoubtedly hard. The freedom he will lose, the hardships he hasn't been prepared for that he'd have to face…"

Kazora sighs heavily, his gaze squinting with the intensity of the blazes that follow suit after Yohime enters a kitchen.

"I do not believe the child deserves any further troubles, not after what he's going through as of now. Leaving him in the freedom of the peasantry is what would do him better. The boy will crumble under the pressure of the expectations he'd have to meet, maybe even start to resent us for forcing him to lead such a life."

He takes a pause, I remain as calm as always. He clears his throat, placing both hands behind his back.

"You should know it well, Takahisa-sama. Commoners have freedoms we cannot enjoy. And to take that away from the little boy… The ways of life of peasants and nobles should not mix, each of us has a way to serve, a way to live unique to our standing. While you can act to make sure the boy doesn't get sent to a cruel place if his father were to die, I believe he would live a happier life alongside his commoner fellows."

"… Your personal experiences wouldn't be hampering your judgment, would they Tsukuyomi?"

"Of course not, my liege."

"I see. And, may I ask why did you not speak in this way with Shirogane? I may be the Head now, but you're still my retainer. I would have welcomed this honesty as opposed to the hostility you displayed during our talk." I move my fringe away from my eyes as I look at him well. He averted his gaze after a moment.

"… I believe we nobles must remain steadfast and stoic, never to waver in front of our fellows. We are those who embody the soul of the Empire, we cannot show cracks."

"Showing emotion doesn't make you weaker, Tsukuyomi."

"I stand by my words, my liege. And even so, you cannot allow yourself to send a caretaker to his home. If such an arrangement were to be tracked, some of our rivals might use that intel against you."

"Sigh… So, what you're saying is, I have to send someone nobody can track? Hmm… Thanks for the suggestion, Kazora."

"No, I wasn't-"

"Now then, in that case, that means we need to find a way to aid this little boy without anyone detecting our moves."

"Takahisa-sama, please listen. We shouldn't-"

"Which means, we need to send someone we know won't divulge this intel, someone of our inner circles."

"My liege, something of the sort would-"

"However, I can't just send someone I already have employed in another project. Kazora, do you have any further suggestions?"

"… I am not going to dissuade you from this course of action, will I?" He says, placing a hand in his forehead, rubbing it in circles.

"Did you not say just now that we nobles should not waver?" I smile, leaning into one of my palms.

"That is not what I meant. Sigh… I believe Yohime-sama would know better, since she watches over the Main House and all of the vassals there alongside the Grand Chamberlain."

"Yes, a good idea. Alright, I shall discuss it with her tonight. By the way, has Bazora sent his report already?"

"Not yet. I believe the meeting with our fellows has not yet ended."

"I see… Well, little we can do. Let us go check up on our crew. It is rare for me to have free time, after all." I get up, making my way towards the door. "Oh, that's right. Would our private train be in working condition?"

"… Yes, if you require it. Where do you wish to go, Takahisa-sama?"

"To pay Raiden a visit." Kazora's turquoise eyes filled with ripples, his face blooming with wrinkles similarly to when we spar in the dojo.

"Sir, there were no reports coming from Raiden. There is no need to-

"I wish to visit him. Is there a problem with that, perchance?" I cut his words as if I were using my blade, he stands in attention and bows.

"No, my liege. Shall I order the train to be prepared?"

"Yes, I wish to depart after dinner. I do need to speak with Yohime about this little matter as well. Let us go."

I open the door and walk out, towards the different offices in my care. It is so rare, for me to have a bit of free time. I almost always get reports from both Tsukuyomis, so I rarely see the state of things in the castle and my house with my own eyes. This should be a fun end to the afternoon.

(Raiden's House. Living Room.)

---

"Welcome, Takahisa-sama. What can I do for you?"

"Please, Uncle. Nobody is here to spy on us." Raiden stops bowing and smiles, holding a chuckle.

"I see… So, what has brought you here today? I believe I have relayed all of my reports through the Tsukuyomi brothers."

"Yes, and they have reached me. And I am pleasantly astonished at the result of your endeavors. However, today I am not here to discuss business. I have come to you for another matter. Let us have some tea, we need to talk."

We both go to the table, where a warm kettle was waiting already. He pours the tea into our cups, and as he sits I drink a bit. Looking around, I see what Meiya calls home. A house with very few windows, filled with our classical decorations and furniture befitting of Uncle's station, but surrounded by tall walls on the outside. Unlike Yuuhi, who sometimes accompanies us to our travels, Meiya has never set foot outside these walls. This small house is her whole world…

"So Takahisa, what is the matter?"

"How is your health, Uncle?"

"Haha, I am as sane as a young horse. Banish all worry in you." He puffs his chest, laughing a bit.

"Yet, you're not the one tending to the house anymore."

"Well… Being alone is harder than I thought." He says, with the longing of a buried seed for spring to come. We drink some more tea, us both directing a gaze at a drawing of his late bride, the original heir of the Mitsurugi House.

Raiden Koubuin, my father's younger brother, was forced to give up his last name to avoid any succession discussions by his father, my late grandfather. Luckily, he and Father were always in good terms. Unlike me and my late brother.

"If I may, what do you say of letting someone watch over Meiya's learning from time to time?"

"Hey, pampering Meiya is my last joy. Don't you dare to take that from me, Takahisa." He smiles as he reaches for his cup once more.

"Hahaha, I wouldn't dare to do such a thing. I merely think you need some aid, that is all. By the by, how has Meiya been?"

"… There is nothing to say, nothing ever happens here." His tone somber, like the shadows of a full moon night. "She sometimes asks what lies beyond the walls, but those questions are becoming more rare and distant with each passing day. I believe she might be coming to realize she is never setting foot outside of the house."

"I see… What of the teachers you assigned to her?"

"All of them are under secrecy, do not worry. She's progressing as well as she should. Though, I can't say I enjoy her listless gaze towards the sky at night." He then drinks slowly, extending the silence in the house.

"… Say Uncle, what do you say of having one of the younger Tsukuyomi come here as a retainer to Meiya?"

"Huh?… Are you serious? This is a taboo, a twin must never be recognized in the Koubuin Family."

"I am the Head, and I am the law in the House."

"Your cousins won't agree with you, you risk getting into an argument with them. It may fracture the House's unity."

"If they were in my position, I am convinced they would agree. And I am not saying I'll allow Meiya to return to the House." Not for now, at the least. "However, it is clear you are in need of a helping hand. And what better person than one of the Tsukuyomi?" Uncle closes his eyes, stroking his beard. For a moment he ponders in silence, I drink some more tea as I await his answer.

"Hmm… However, our fellows won't take this kindly. They will ask where you sent the one you choose. I am glad to hear you worry so about Meiya, but you should ponder this once more."

"If you say so, that I shall do. In any case, my orders are absolute. And I can keep this arrangement as a secret mission of sorts." In the same way I'll need to keep Shirogane's situation. I finish my tea, relaxing for a moment. "Well then… Before I leave, may I ask a troublesome favor out of you?"

Uncle's brows lower slowly, taking a moment to delve into my gaze. After folding the inquisitive stare, he nods. I take a second to inhale and fill my lungs, to relax the cicadas in my knees, to banish the snakes circling in my neck.

"Can you take me to her room?"

"… Are you sure of this? What if she wakes up?"

"It is past the 2200 hours, I doubt she'd awaken this late in the night."

"You do realize the damage it'd do to her to see you, even if only for a moment? How will I explain this to her? She's still too young to learn of her banishment."

"… Then, we only need to carefully survey her room. If she's sleeping soundly, would you allow me to see her?"

Uncle again stares at me, a silent barrage coming from within his eyes at me. Again, we remain in silence with only the tickling of a distant clock tainting the calm night.

"… Very well. However, I'll enter her room first. There's next to no light there, so you won't be able to see her well. Is that alright?" I nod.

"Shall we?" I stand up. Uncle Raiden sighs with a smile as bitter as the gash in my heart, then he guides me to a set of stairs in the farthest side of the house. Stairs that take one to the basement.

Descending the long set of stairs, at the end of it a steel door awaited us. A door resembling those found in prisons, robust and sturdy with a small rectangle at the top to see further into the room. Uncle unlocks it and opens the door, we walk into the large room with the serenity of a feline.

What first greets my view as the dim light was turned on was something that resembled a living room. A book shelf, a small table with four small chairs, a sofa, a fridge further in, lodged in a corner. A table with a Shogi board and pieces lined up and ready for a game, a few paintings on the wall, a music box… A rather well decorated room in extravagant blue as Uncle likes his decorations, as in the rest of the house.

"That door to the left is the way to her room." Uncle guides me, opening another of those bulky steel doors.

A long, dark hallway extends forward. Grey walls and floor, concrete without any paint out in the air, just a few dim, muffled lights on the ceiling shine our way. A smaller, normal door was at the end.

Uncle unlocks it and brings a finger to his lips. He carefully opens the door, as carefully as if he were practicing his calligraphy. A moment of loneliness assaults me as he entered Meiya's personal chamber.

After so long, after so many years… I'll see her features once more. I have no right to feel these cuts all over me, in my chest, my neck, my palms. It's as if I could feel a subtle pulse of electricity all through me. The daughter I banished is only a few meters forward…

Uncle comes out and signals me to enter. I gulp and exhale, a heaviness in my boots far more severe than the few times His Highness has called for me to a private meeting. I delay my entrance by a second, closing my eyes and recalling what she once was all those nights ago. One deep breath later, my feet trespassed the veil that my heart was still doubting to pierce.

I slowly step into the room, lighted only by the dim shine from the hallway. I couldn't make out my surroundings at first. The room was mostly empty. A smaller bookshelf, a wardrobe and a bed, and a small wooden table with a lamp near the it.

And within the darkened sheets… A figure slept peacefully.

Imitating the speed of falling snow, I approached her side. A small face rested one of its sides against a pillow, her hair loose and a bit messy.

I crouched, and with the hesitation I once had when I raised my blade to the BETA in my first simulation, feeling as if my fingers had been tied one to another, I eventually reached her hair. And stroking it softly, my lips betrayed my mind.

"… Meiya."

Nothing but a whisper. What if not my melting heart.

The small shape stirred softly in the bed, welcoming the kindness atop her head. So peaceful and serene, just like a calm night in new moon. Despite the low light in the room, I could somehow make out her features. She truly is similar to Yuuhi… However, something was different in her resting complexion. Yuuhi tends to sleep with a faint calmness. Meiya on the contrary was clutching her sheets close to her chest, as if she were afraid of the shadows that surrounded her.

Terrified of the solitude that awaits her every time she enters her own room, at the prospect that perhaps no one will open the steel door in the hallway. Terrified of being abandoned within the darkness.

… Why did I wish to see her? A blade hits my arms as I release her head.

If I had the power, what would I do for her? The blade now hits my abdomen.

Were it possible… Would I set her free? The edge pierces through, reaching my heart.

When a child needs it, a parent should be there. Shirogane didn't doubt, not even in front of me, the Head of a Regent House… If he is able to display such bravery, despite his heart being so gravely wounded… What it is that generates this fear in me? Why did I let some old prejudice tear me apart from my daughter?

I stand up, moving like a leaf on a stream away from Meiya, away from my daughter without knowing when it is that I'll see her again, away from that lonely shape and towards the door.

"Uncle, do you truly think it impossible to break this taboo?" I ask as he closed the door, locking Meiya away from me.

He says nothing, and so, we walk through the hallway.

"… You would need to perform a feat that is valued by the Shogun, a feat that gives the House a great benefit or honor." He said in the middle of the way. "Only through it your relatives will bow down to your wishes. That is our way of life, honor and standing is what makes you a Head, a leader. Should you desire more power, more influence… Then you must elevate the House to further heights."

"… Forgive the inquiry, it was most foolish of me." I reply, the stillness replaced by a new, slowly surging heat in my chest.

We leave the hallway and climb the stairs once more. Before I took my leave, however…

"Uncle, do take good care of Meiya."

"You don't need to tell me that, Takahisa. And don't worry about me, I don't need a retainer here. My attendants are enough."

"That might be so, but still, they're close to being admitted into the Guard. Furthermore… I believe it will do good to Meiya to get acquainted with our teachings."

"… Are you determined to release her from the taboo?"

"Yes, I am. Look after her until I gather enough feats to my name, Uncle. I swear to you now, Meiya will one day return to her rightful place. I will correct mine own mistake myself. Until then… I will keep counting on you."

"I see… I hope you are aware of the consequences that await you should your cousins reject her return."

"… No one will be able to speak of it. I do have an idea on how I can perform a feat no one has managed to claim."

"… And what is this feat, Takahisa?"

"Forcing the UN to recognize the might of the Imperial Army. If I bestow victory to them, if I bring glory to our nation through a successful international mission… Who would dare to speak against my wishes?"

"While that is true, am I sure you know what you would have to fight against. The missions the UN will ask of you as a Head… they won't be something to scoff at. You will be sent to the frontlines, probably as a Vanguard."

"I am no amateur, I already had a small tour thanks to those meddling Americans. Fear not, Uncle. Our endeavors will soon bear fruit. Believe in my words, for I am not one to lie."

"That I know well." He smiles again, faintly so. "I wish you good luck, Takahisa. Until we meet again." He bows slightly to me as I take step outside of the gate.

"Yes… Until next time, Uncle. Take care."

[Miho]

---

"Mom, are you really okay?" Takeru grabbed my hand tightly, his gaze darkened and shaky.

"Yes, don't worry. I only need some more time to rest." I stroke his head slowly, feeling his warmth.

I am so thankful to Haruna-san… If not for her, I don't know what would have been of you, Takeru. His lips twist, he lays his head on my arm.

"Then, when will you come back home?"

"… Mom has to be careful. I don't want to end up sick again. So, you be a good boy and behave well, yes?"

"Yes, I know."

We stay like that in silence for a moment, me petting his head, he hugging my arm. I slowly exhale, feeling the faintness of the tip of my fingers. For one last time… Let me feel his warmth, let me see Mom in his gaze.

"… Takeru, come on." I say and he looks up. "You have to go back home, don't you?"

"No, I'm staying with you until you get better." He pouts at me, Mom's stubbornness in his gaze.

"You can't do that." I ruffle his hair once more, going down to his cheek slowly. "You have to go to school and study. You promised me you'd do well in school, remember?"

"Uuh… But-"

"Now, now…" I place a finger on his lips, smiling. "Mom might have to stay in the hospital for a while longer… And I might need to go somewhere for some time." Foolish as it might be, I just can't bring myself to tell him I will die.

I'm sure he will understand once he grows, time will heal his heart. But I fear he will suffer much from this truth, that I will never be by his side again. He doesn't need to know now, there is no need to make this worse.

"Where? Where will you go?"

"You don't worry about it. Takeru, promise me you'll be good and that you'll study much, okay?" He nods, not letting go of my arm.

I know he isn't that smart, but still, I can't help but to hope he somehow manages to be spared from this awful war. Even more considering Kageyuki is in the Guard now, Takeru might end up enlisted in their ranks. I shudder to think what harsh conditions he'll have to face considering his attitude.

I hug him, bringing him close to me. If one wish could be granted to me, I would like for this moment to be eternal. The calmness of having him in my arms, I could nod off right now. Despite how cold I've been feeling as of late, despite how hard it gets to breathe sometimes, all of that is gone. As if a warm blanket was now covering me, as if I was suspended in between cotton.

"Promise Mom you'll stay smiling, okay Takeru?"

"Yes, I will. But when are you coming home?"

"… You don't worry about that. You study hard and do your best. You now have a lot of friends with you, right?" I keep ruffling his hair, taking a moment to look into his eyes again. "Keep being a good boy and getting along with them, yes? And no more fighting. Don't give Dad any more trouble while I'm gone."

"But the other boys are-"

"If you're bad, I will get really angry when I go back home." I fake a pout, pulling one of his cheeks softly. "So, be nice from now on even to those you don't like too much. The samurai don't like people that are mean, you know."

"So if I'm good you'll come back faster?"

"… Maybe. I'm sure things have been rough while I was gone, but you need to keep doing your best. Remember to be nice to your friends and Sumika, and always listen to what Dad says, okay?" He nods. "And what do you have to say when someone is nice to you?"

"… Thank you very much." He says, puffing his cheeks. It's the only thing I managed to teach him to make him be polite… Thankfully he hasn't forgotten it.

"Yes, that's right. So, remember to show thankfulness when you receive help, okay?" He nods and I pet his head.

"But can't I give hugs to the people I like when I'm thankful?" He asks, tilting his head.

"Hmm… You can, but only to those you really like." I never thought Kageyuki's words would make him start giving hugs so often. I only hope he realizes he doesn't have to do that all the time.

"Okay, I'll do that then."

"That's good to hear." I again bring him to me, hugging him as I ruffle his hair. "You keep being a good boy, Takeru."

"Takeru, it's time." Kageyuki entered the room again and got closer to the bed. "Mom has to go for another checkup."

"Eh? But…" He looked up at me, his hands tightening around me.

"Don't worry about me, Takeru. It's getting late, you have to go to school tomorrow, right? What did you promise me?"

"… I know." He slowly lets go, then he gets closer and gives me a kiss on my cheek. "Get better soon, Mom." I ruffle his hair one last time, and give him one last kiss on his forehead.

"Yes… Goodbye, Takeru."

"It's not 'Goodbye', it's 'See you later'." He narrowed his eyes at me, bitter as when I made him do his history homework.

"Yes, that's right…" I lick the inside of my lips, a tremor spreading on my chest and not because of my sickness. I know I shouldn't, but I do not want to tell him the truth. This must be how a flower feels as the last of it's petals is plucked away, it feels as if my body was pierced by many hooks. All of them pulling at me in different directions, I can barely keep my smile up when I returned his gaze. "See you later, Takeru." He smiles and gives me one last hug. Then, he released himself and went to Kageyuki's side, who directed Takeru towards a nurse.

After our son left the room, Kageyuki sat down near the bed. No longer having to lie, he grimaced and let his shoulders fall off like a rock slide.

"… Why do you not want to tell him, Miho?" His voice barely reached my ears, almost as if he were the one being hospitalized.

"Can you allow me one last selfish wish? I don't think it will do Takeru good to learn of death now of all times. Once he grows up, I'm sure he'll understand."

"He isn't a little kid anymore."

"But I don't want to have him hurting because of this. Takeru is too attached to me, and you have to stay in the Guard." His brows lowered, the space between them disappearing. "Just give him some time. I don't want him to be as sad as he was when I came back after I was in Yao's hospital for a few days. Can you do that for me, Kage?"

He takes some breaths, running a hand over his face. Shaking his head a bit, he rests his arms on his knees.

"If that's what you want, I'll do it. Though, I still think I should quit the Guard."

"The laws say you have to keep serving, so even if you somehow managed to find a job at Hakuryo Base you will end up being scorned as a traitor. No more of this, Kage. You have to-"

"Sorry… If only I had taken you to Yokohama sooner…" His gaze sinks, I hear a few muffled sobs coming from him.

"Kage… Kage, please…" I reach out to him and he gently grasps my hand, moving his chair closer. No longer hiding his tears, he brings my hand to his face and gives it soft kisses.

"Sorry… Sorry…"

"There's nothing to apologize for, Kageyuki. You always did all you could for me, even when I didn't have anything to properly repay you."

"Don't be stupid… I love you, and I don't regret anything I've done." His tone got a bit louder, muddled by the tears. "You and Takeru are my happiness, I wouldn't trade you two for anything in this world. I don't care if I could have been spared from the war of if I would have gotten rich if I stayed with my parents, I don't regret anything. Expect for not having a helper in the house, or moving to Hiiragi faster."

"Then don't apologize. Let us say goodbye with a smile on our faces, Kage."

"… I don't think I can do that, Miho."

I move a bit, enough to put my arms around his back. Letting his scent fill my nose again, planting a kiss on the side of his neck, I simply let time pass as I enjoy his closeness.

"Kage, the doctors said it will happen soon. I can feel it too, it's getting harder to breathe every day, the pain is becoming too much when it appears. There will be no miracle."

"I know… I know…" His hands grasp me tenderly, as if I were an injured pigeon. "But I'm scared. How will I take care of Takeru? How can I keep fighting with all I've got if you're not there for him?" His voice creaked like ice during the last days of winter, his hands trembling as he grabbed my back.

"… Can't you talk with your parents again?"

"You know it. Last time we talked they screamed at me as soon as I mentioned having them visit you in Osaka."

"I see… Can't you ask anyone to look after him?" That is the only regret I have left. If Kage is sent to fight and dies, Takeru will be left alone. And in this day and age… That means a life full of suffering every single day.

"I don't know. I can't bother Koetsu with all he's dealing with now, and I don't know if he'll be in a position to take care of a kid when I'm called to fight."

"Last time you said something about Koubuin-sama offering his help to you. What happened with that?"

"Oh, that." Kage breaks the embrace to face me, wiping his tears away, some staining his black suit. "Takahisa-sama again insisted that he would look after Takeru if I were to die, but frankly I doubt he's being serious."

"Is he someone that tends to lie often?"

"No, all the contrary. I just don't see why he would go so far. He only wants me in the squad for these trials, he's just trying to make me calm down."

"Kage, stop being so negative. Takeru sometimes gets like this too. Why can't you accept that he might value you much? Didn't you say he insisted on having you in his own squad of the Osaka Guards?"

"I mean, yeah… But I just… Considering how both Tsukuyomi brothers think, how much they value their honor, standing and image, I doubt they'll let him help Takeru. At least, I don't think they'll save him from the orphanage."

"Sigh… But they said they would help him, right?" I grab his face and force him to look at me, with those eyes now clouded and reddening.

"… Yes, that's what he said. That he'll extend a hand to him, that he'll make sure Takeru is safe in thanks for my services as his fellow."

"… Then, that's enough for me." I know Kage can be too dense, especially when he gets down. If a noble said that, they wouldn't be lying. Takeru will be safe… I sigh, lying down again. I feel as if I was just released from a heavy chain on my back, like when I bring a lot of bags from the super. The weight that was crushing me is gone, nothing but a gentle, relaxing breeze spreading on me.

"Are you okay, Miho?"

"Yes… I'm fine now. Don't worry, Kage."

"Sigh… So… You think it'll happen soon?"

"Yes, I can feel it. Kage, don't look so sad please." I raise a hand again, he leans onto the bed and lets me reach his face once more.

"All these years… I've been very happy. Even if we were apart most of the time, I am truly grateful for all you've given me. So, please be strong. You still have your job and someone will take care of Takeru."

"It's not going to be the same and you know it." He grasped my hand again, his lips shaking.

I slowly rise and hug him again, feeling his breathing by my ear.

"One of these days, I will leave. Remember when you had to leave for the Training Program and I had to stay behind? You told me everything was going to be fine so long as I remained strong." I can hear his muted sobs as his grip on me tightens slowly. "This time, you'll be the one that has to remain behind. You'll be the one looking after our Takeru, so you have to do my share too."

"… I will. I swear I'll be there for him when he needs me, even if I have to leave my post in a hurry."

"Hehe, you'll get in trouble for that. You and Takeru really can't follow the rules."

"Hahaha… It can't be helped I guess." His laughter mixed with hiccups, he rubbed the back of my head.

"… All I ask is for you to keep your promise. Be careful out there, my love."

"Yeah… I'll do my best to return alive." He breaks the embrace, grabbing my chin. He gives me a soft peck, which turns into a slow, warm kiss. "… You have no idea how much I'll miss you, do you?"

"As much as I've missed you when you were away." I give him another peck, this time on his cheek. "Thanks Kage, for looking at me, for choosing me when I had almost nothing to my name, for always coming back home."

"… No, thank you. Thank you for seeing more than just the son of a wealthy family in me. And for teaching me what a real family was like, Miho." Again, we share a warm kiss as we indulge in one last hug, running our hands on the other's back.

We delayed our separation, we stalled fate for but a fleeting moment. However, every pigeon has to fly away before winter comes. And like how the sun always has to leave, our embrace came to an end.

I wiped his tears, he leaned on my hand. I caressed his cheek, he played with my hair.

"Takeru is waiting."

"I know that." He said. Leaning forward, he gave me a final peck on my lips. Running his hand through my hair as he did, then to my cheek, and finally grasping my chin on his hand. His eyes locked onto mine, they wavered for a second.

When I noticed he wasn't able to move away, I clasped both sides of his face and, with an effort too painful for my heart, I pulled his face away from mine. I smiled at him, and gave him a soft hug. Then, in a small whisper, leaning on his body to speak to his ear, and to hide my tears from him, I said what would end our time together.

"Goodbye, Kageyuki. Thank you darling, for everything."

Unable to say his goodbyes, Kageyuki cried on my shoulder for a minute until he could regain some composure to leave. Between sobs, apologies, and tender words he managed to say it just once. And so, after kissing my hand one last time, he took his leave.

You'll be fine, Kage. You really are stronger than you think. Not all men can be so open about their feelings after all. And knowing Takeru will be in good hands even if something happens to you…

… Means that I can now finally stop worrying. I can leave to Mom's side without fear.

[Native Takeru]

---

The sun is already going down and it's really, really cold. Dad took me to this place, there are people bringing flowers to these rocks… This is all so weird. But there's something that's even more weird.

"Why does this rock has Mom's name written on it, Dad?" I pulled at his hand, he was looking up so I couldn't see his face.

"You see Takeru…" I could see a tear running down now. Why is he sad? "Mom went on a voyage."

"Huh?"

"She was really sick, you see." His voice sounded like when I got a radio close to the TV once. "So, the doctors said it would be for the best to take her somewhere warm and nice so that she can heal faster."

"But… But why couldn't she wait until summer? Is she coming back soon?"

"Yeah, once she's completely cured she'll come back. It's bad for her to end up in the hospital so often after all."

"But… Why didn't she say anything?" It feels as if something was poking my chest right now. Like when those mean boys at Yao threw small pebbles at me once.

"Well, the boat was going to leave soon."

"… Can we call her then?"

"No, she's… We should let her spend her time alone." Dad rubbed his eyes and crouched by my side. "So, we have to wait for her patiently, okay?"

"Okay… But where did she go? Did she go with Grandma?"

"Grandma?"

"Yes, Mom said Grandma went on a voyage once, but then she always said she was too far away for our calls to reach her." Dad's lips move weirdly as he pats my head.

"Yes… Yes, that's right. Mom went with Grandma, so you don't worry about it. Let's wait together until she comes back." He then grabbed me and hugged me really, really tight.

"Dad… Mom didn't leave forever, right?"

"… Of course not, Takeru."

"Then, why are you crying? Why did she leave so soon without telling us?" His hand ruffles my hair, slowly caressing my head.

"Well, she's going to be away for a long while… Even if she left now, everything is going to be alright." He rubbed the back of my head, giving me a kiss on my forehead. "So, you be a good boy until she comes back."

"Then… Where will I stay? Are you coming home with me?" His eyes grow smaller.

"… I have to go back to the samurai, sadly. I will be busy with work for a while, but I'll try to come back more often from now on. Haruna-san will be looking after you for a while, so please be patient and don't give her trouble."

"… Really? You'll really come visit more often?" I grab his black dress, he rubs my cheek as he smiles.

"Yes, I'll try to be home more often. Dad will have to hire someone to look after the house while me and Mom are gone, so you're going to have to be nice to this person."

"Hiring?"

"Yeah, someone will have to clean and do stuff in the house. You know, it would get dirty otherwise."

"I see… Is that someone going to stay home?" His eyes grow smaller again, his lips pluck in a weird way for a second.

"I think." He hugs me again as he lifts me off the ground. "Please be patient with Dad, Takeru. I'll do my best to take care of the house." He sounds really sad now.

That's weird. Dad is never sad. He sounds like Mom when Grandma went on a voyage. Mom… Mom didn't leave us. So, why is Dad so sad?

"Yes, I'll be good."

"That's my boy." Dad smiled and gave me a kiss on the cheek, then he lowered me to the ground again. "Let's go home, Takeru." Softly pulling my hand along, we left the weird place.

These days I've been staying in a room in Sumika's house, with Haruna-san saying I could stay there until Mom came back.

But now that Mom is on a trip… When will I go back home? Will Dad someday stay with me? Who is this person he'll hire to take care of the house? When will Mom come back?

As we made our way back home, I hugged my sides. I don't like this. Something feels weird… Mom was weird the last time we went to the hospital and Dad was as sad as he's been today. Mom would have told me she was leaving on a trip, she wouldn't have left without telling me. Something is really weird here.

Mom… didn't leave forever, right?

I shivered a little when I thought about that, it felt as if someone gave me a hug after touching snow.

(VIP Room. Hotel. Kyoto.)

[Kurechika]

---

The small room was dimly lit by a small set of lamps, the small circular table between our sofas adorned by one such lamp atop a small white and olive green mat. The walls of the hotel room were just like the ones one could see on those five-star hotels that sometimes appear on the American channels, nothing like our traditional inns.

"Trust me on this one, Sakaki. If you lend me your support, we can make big things happen in this country. You come with me, and I bet we can get you a nice position during next elections. With your skills, you might end up as the Prime Minister on the near future." Hoshimori, an old politician wearing a black suit and matching trousers spoke as we finished our coffee.

"It is a most tempting offer." I tap my glasses, resting my cup on the table. "However, what makes you think we have any chance to turn this wheel around? You must know more than I do, and I doubt things are looking pretty from high above. There's also the matter of our adversaries. I am sure you must have heard of Hikami's raising popularity." I entwine my fingers, feeling the coldness of my ring as I do.

Ever since Lyon fell, the war took a turn for the worse. It looks like Africa might fall next if things keep going like this. Saionji-sama also completely overhauled the Fundamental Law of Education last year as the situation in the Eurofront worsened, preparing to further bolster our army with new recruits.

And to make matters even worse, the UN is split between the demands of improving the living conditions of refugees or cutting off certain areas to form better defense lines. I've heard Britain is pressuring the UN to allow the BrArg Army to get deployed to the Arabian Front, and considering that I've heard they wish to use some experimental weapons to boot… The war is soon to turn ugly, rearing its head at all of us.

And on the inside, our skirmishes are not easy either. Between those who wish the old entitlements to be restored, those who desire the Empire to free itself from the shackles of America to stand by its side as a partner and not under it as a servant, and those who voice their opposition to that, saying it is for the best for us to remain under their protection, that we should instead further develop our relations with them in all areas, our people have been growing more and more distant.

The common folk seems to look at the nobility with distrust, and they do little to placate those prejudices. The Royal Guard may be the last remnant of our glory of old, they have to act resolute and unwavering to light the fire in every Japanese soul, but sadly, not all nobles follow the same principles. And some people are not pleased with their privileges, many are the ones that have spoken against them in recent years. Some have gone as far as raise their voices at the limos, demanding them to do more for the Empire.

"Hoshimori, I truly don't know what can the Empire do in such a situation. The US has been rolling out new machines and advancements with great speed, and even the Soviets have managed to develop many domestic TSFs, tanks, and… other especial technologies of their own."

We both take a pause to drink, since there is the possibility that there are mics on this room. Regardless of anyone's opinions, the psychic dolls are, without a shred of doubt, the most impressive piece of weaponry developed by the Soviets, despite the… controversies that come with them. Resting my cup atop a cloth, again tapping my glasses, I look at the paintings of our own nation on the walls, some resembling what one could buy at a gallery as opposed to a renowned piece befitting of the room we are currently in.

"Us, on the other hand, only have the Zuikaku to our name, and a few contributions to decade old projects. Our army is made up mostly by F-4 models and already aging tanks and support vehicles, and the replacements are being delayed time and again." While in some aspects there are new models already adopted, they are not yet enough to properly replace all of our units, and the new tanks were delayed for next year, yet again. "We wouldn't be able to make a difference on the war as things stand now. Many are the ones that are beginning to think that we should desist on these endeavors of trying to make our industries thrive on their own, instead seeking aid from America. What do you have in mind to change this situation?" He leans back on his sofa, looking at the ceiling.

"There is much in need of change, I won't deny it, and as far as I know Saionji-sama thinks the same. It seems he found a key to reach his goals, despite losing more and more power every day."

"And how do we play into that? The unrest has been growing for some time, the common folk don't see the BETA as a threat for now. To many of our fellows they're a far away problem of the Europeans. I've heard quite a few that believe that they're nothing more than an American ploy to keep intruding on our sovereignty." His eyes narrow briefly before moving his shoulders up and down a few times.

"Well, we know it's not like that, and it is our responsibility to ensure the worst case scenario doesn't come to pass. What we require as of now is a way to get the UN on our side. Regrettably, Saionji-sama's plan to revitalize our army didn't follow through with the expected dates of deployment, so we will be importing some F-15 from America to buy us some time, as well as other armaments." I suppose more MLRS and Apaches along the maintenance gear, since our industries didn't quite manage to develop affordable alternatives to those. "His Highness negotiated for a truce to the hostilities in exchange for a few favors. The Americans don't want to ruin their relations with us, as much as they dislike our prideful way of doing things." He then laughs quietly as while standing up to pour himself some more coffee.

"Some favors?" For Saionji-sama of all people to have resorted to the Americans… What kind of deals have been sealed?

It's true most people now see most foreigners, not just the Americans, quite negatively after all the reforms His Highness did to aid the people and were met with a wild competition by the American companies that do business here. The involvement of the Royal Guard on keeping the peace in many areas has cleared the image some people had of them, but the schism is there.

And Hikami has voiced his opinion a few times, enough that many are starting to openly agree with him and use the same words in their speeches. While the man does wish the Empire to stand proud by itself, Hikami does believe we should we should try to sign varied projects with the American companies as opposed to continue to struggle to procure an all-domestic defense force. All to get insight on their technology, to then have our industries be able to deliver better developments in the future. This was his approach to convince the right people in the IJA to import another TSF despite the opposition once the TSF-X Project was again delayed.

I also agree with the motion, nothing good will come out of isolating ourselves. However, how can we convince our people that making peace with the foreigners does not equal surrendering our resources to them?

Hoshimori clears his throat after drinking some coffee, and then looks straight at me.

"The Americans asked the Empire to lend a hand to the UN in their efforts to maintain the Far East Frontline. Plans to send a Task Force are being made as we speak. However, the Shogun hasn't surrendered himself to them. We have one ace up our sleeve to turn this around." He smirked, the glint of all the eyes of Orochi rekindled in his eyes.

"And what would that be? All of our current plans seem to lead to a dead end. Europe is in tatters, Africa is doing all it can to stop the BETA, and I believe nobody wants to let the South Americans enter a battlefield ever again now that the rumors of them wanting to deploy some Top Secret weapon have been going around for some time. Our relations with Australia and the Oceania block aren't what I'd call pleasant, and there are a few countries in the COSEAN block that still hold their fair reservations towards our nation. Also, we're technically still at war with the Soviets. So, how do we strengthen our position? And, what can we do to help our nation?" His lips curve upwards, looking like he had a Royal Flush and I had decided not to fold.

"It's true that Plans A and B have ran into many obstacles, but we have a fourth plan at the ready."

"A fourth plan?" Whatever happened to the third one, then?

"Sakaki, allow me to tell you something that Saionji-sama always says. The world isn't painted in black and white. Even if at times it might look like you're at a crossroad between two choices, you have to look further than what lies beyond your eyes. There is always an alternative road available to you."

The word wasn't lost on me. Fourth… Alternative… Is the Empire going to bid for the hosting of the next plan?!

"And do we… have some groundwork done?"

"Yes, we do. It's still rough, but we're working hard day and night to make a firm proposition. But we are running into a roadblock as of now. A certain nation also wishes to make its vision into the fourth plan." His squinted eyes as he looked at the decorative flags that were hanged on the wall were full of venom.

The flag of the US, that was what he was looking at. We're going into a diplomatic war with the US for the right to host the next Alternative Plan… Of course, Saionji-sama wouldn't let this chance pass him by, if we manage to convince the UN of this and we succeeded, we'll turn this situation upside down. The recognition, the funds, the support we would gain… This is the turning point we as a nation have been waiting for.

"But the fact that you're calling out to me means that things aren't going so smoothly, right?" He nods slowly.

"Indeed. I'm aiming going to run in this year's elections, I want to become the next Prime Minister. And when I make it there, I will need support. You have many allies, a good image, and are neither too young nor too old. I believe you would make a fine addition to my team. I know our goals coincide in this matter, so that's what I wanted to tell you today."

"I see. But… What are our chances against them? Can we… Do we stand a chance to win the bid?" I entwine my fingers and look at the flag once more. The US would be our biggest ally, regardless of our complex relation. Going against them would leave us in absolute isolation.

"Their plan is… controversial, to say the least."

"… More than the Soviet one?"

Hoshimori nods as he folds his arms, leaning forward. I do the same, and then he continues in a hushed tone.

"Europe won't go along with it, the Middle East and the rest of the Asian nations also won't. The Soviets are against it, for obvious reasons. That's where we come in. We can appeal to the European nations, and try to make a truce with both Canada and Australia, who also seem to wish to place a bid. If we sell ourselves as what stands between them and the American plan, they might consider backing off. The lobbying of America has been going strong for some time now, if any other nation goes against the US for the bid… Chances are there will be… certain inconsiderate actions towards them."

Certain… Inconsiderate… Actions, huh? He stops to drink some more coffee, leaning back into the sofa.

"So, if we manage to… dissuade a sector of the Americans into lending us their support, we have a good shot at this." Smiling once more, he looks at me. "And if the US ever wishes to back-stab us all we have to do is deliver results. America won't be able to act against us if the rest of the nations are backing us within the UN."

"It sounds like we have a… solid foundation done. I have heard nothing of this, though." A rumor of this importance would have been kept shut behind a thousand doors, but this sounds as if we were almost ready to place the bid.

"We have a solid groundwork done, indeed. I want you to know that we aren't making castles on the clouds, we have hard data that needs just a bit of polishing to convince the UN's Security Council. But I have overstayed my welcome here. I know this is a sudden proposition, but I want to make this clear. I want you in my cabinet, Sakaki. I know that… you are also a parent, but I do think you would make a fine candidate in the future to replace me. I'll say it again, I want you to be my dolphin, Sakaki. I shall be awaiting your answer."

He raises from his sofa and, after sharing a handshake, I open the door and he leaves.

I return to my seat, crashing down onto it as I run a hand over my forehead, letting out a long sigh. The next Alternative Plan… with us as its host. This is a one in a lifetime chance, but… am I up to skill? Hoshimori did seem confident in me, and of course I know many people that would be delighted to lend us their support and funds for the campaign. And yet… That would mean us leaving Hiiragi. No, I would be the one leaving. Sigh…

The sound of footsteps brings my gaze upwards. Saeko was standing on the hallway that lead to our room, leaning on the wall. Wearing her night attire with her long brown hair tied up, she took some steps towards me.

"Kurechika, what was that last talk about?"

"Nothing, dear. Just sharing some pleasantries as a way to show friendliness." She crosses her arms and moves to sit in the sofa that was in front of me.

"You promised me you would remain as a member of the Congress, that you wouldn't go any higher."

"I know, and this isn't about that."

"Then, what is this about?" She throws an accusing glare at me as her lips tremble a bit.

Of course, I can't tell her of the Alternative Plan. But then, how do I explain it to her? An arrow pierces my chest as I try to find an answer, and am forced to look away from her eyes.

I promised I'd be more present in the house, that I would put our family before my political career. But now duty is calling for me, Hoshimori needs my help in the Diet. We need to become the host of Alt. IV at all costs, and yet… Am I willing to sacrifice my family to this goal?

No, if we don't make it a reality, we will have a very dark future indeed. What am I compared to our whole population? If my sacrifice serves to water this seed of hope, then I am willing to follow through.

So then… Why are my hands shaking? Why do I feel a shiver on my back? Why can't I look at her eyes?

"Kurechika… If you… If you go back on your word, I will ask for the divorce." My throat tightens at her words as my gaze digs itself into the floor. "You said we'd make this work, you told me you would help me so that I could keep working. I can't be the only one trying to make this boat sail."

I gulp and run a hand over my hair. I can't tell her no matter what, so I don't really have a justification if I decide to accompany Hoshimori besides platitudes. Seeing I was keeping quiet, she let out a long, heavy sigh. Shaking her head, she locked her eyes onto mine.

"So, give me a clear answer. Are you going to commit to our relationship? Or, does this end here?" The blades on her words made a gash on my ears and an even bigger one on my heart.

"Look, Saeko. This isn't… This time it's different. The scene has changed and we must react accordingly. I am only pledging my support to what I believe is our most tangible solution to our current dilemmas." Her frown turns into a scowl as she now clearly bites her lower lips.

"Do you think you can dissuade me with pretty words? Are you going to run for the Parliament or the Diet? Yes or no?"

"I… I don't know yet."

"Don't lie to me!" She hit the table, letting me see her gritting teeth. "I'm always alone back home, you always come back late into the night. All I asked of you was one day, for you to stay home with us one day."

"Saeko, please. I've been doing what I can to support our relation."

"Oh, really? Where were you during Chizuru's last birthday?"

"The session extended for over ten hours, I couldn't-"

"And where were you from then on? You don't even ask me how I'm doing as of late. It's as if you didn't even care anymore about us." She narrowed her eyes at me, her tone littered to the brim with gasoline. She was holding a match in her hand, ready to explode at me any second.

"I always come back as tired as you do. And I bring dinner home half the time."

"You think that is enough? You haven't kissed me in months, you don't spend time with Chizuru at all, you barely even talk with me. And now this… What's next? You're going to brag about coming home once a month?"

"Sigh… What? You need to vent this at me now? You knew we were coming for a meeting, I told you I would discuss important matters with my fellows."

"I've been saying this for months, MONTHS now, Kurechika! Looks like someone isn't even paying attention at his wife's words." She runs a hand over her forehead. "If you won't start doing meaningful things for our relationship, then have the balls to tell me it's over!" Her words pike at my heart. Feeling a vile taste fill my mouth, I cross my arms and furrow my brows at her.

"I have been doing many things for us! I cut my meetings short, I lost many opportunities to scale the inner ranks and forge many connections. I come home after nine, when the sessions don't extend past midnight that is, I am as tired as you are. Why can't you see all I'm doing for you two?" Some of my words tainted by Chin poison, I glare at her.

"Oh, so now I'M the one who doesn't see your good deeds? It's my fault now that things are the way they are?" Her scowl grew larger, Mezuki incarnate in her gaze.

"No! God… Why are you being like this? I stay home during the weekends, don't I?"

"Sleeping! You barely help with the chores, you barely spend time with Chizuru, you're always on the phone, and we always have to eat what YOU like!"

"Again with this? I told you I don't like tonkotsu sauce."

"Well, you could try it once. Like I've tried everything you wanted me to. But no, it's always the same with you." Sighing heavily, licking my lips slowly, I grab my cup and finish the cold coffee in it, that seemed to be boiling compared to her glare. "So, what comes next? You're running for the Diet? Is that it?"

"… I was offered that, yes, it's true. And things are different, this time I have to think it over."

"Think it over? So you were planning on accepting…"

"I… No, I was… You're being unfair, Saeko." Fully endowing the poison, my heart maimed by her distrustful gaze, I squint my eyes further.

"Oh, I'm the unfair one now?" She folded her arms, the sting of a hundred snakes filling her words.

"I pay the taxes, I pay the rent, I pay Chizuru's school. I sacrificed many chances to escalate further in my career until now for you two. Yes, I am not a perfect father. But I do what I can."

"You know that's not true. You could spend some more time with us, you could talk with us more, but all you do is worry about your job. I need my husband with me, your daughter needs her father!"

"And what do you want me to do? I… I can't just not work. My job is as important as you two. Now more than ever, you should already know how this is!" I narrow my eyes at her, she does the same.

"And I'm telling you, I'm tired of this!" Every word slashing at me like the Murasame, cutting my heart wide open with ease. "If you won't try to make this work, just say you don't care about us anymore!"

"How can you say I don't care after all I've done?!"

"You're absent most of the time, and when you're home you barely talk as of late. You do nothing for our relationship. Nothing, Kurechika!"

"I pay for almost everything, I gave you the house you live in now. I supported you how I could, why do you have to be like this when it's about my job?"

"So now I'm the one who isn't supportive, huh?" Again, her scowl grew larger. The monster spawned in her complexion resembled none of those found in our folk tales. A darker, sharper beast with narrowed, watering eyes and gritted fangs. "All I wanted was to have you with us, and even that seems to be too much for you."

"You knew who you were marrying. Don't you dare feign ignorance. You always knew I was a politician, you knew what kind of path I was on."

"And you promised me you'd be there for me. And look at you now, running for the Diet!" Screaming like a banshee, she pointed a finger at me.

"I have been trying!" I hit the table, returning the scowl. "And I told you, the situation has changed. That's why I have to think this through. Be an adult, Saeko. Screaming over nothing but a doubt… God, how immature can you be." I know you're on your mid twenties, but please… At your age I was already living by myself, working in the town council.

I get up and go pour myself some more coffee. I work day and night, I do all I can to be at home for dinner, I reserve my weekends to be there at home so you can rest… And this is what I get? Is this how you repay me after all these years?

"… I am the immature one?" Her voice low, nothing but a barely audible whisper. Her hands extended limply to her sides, fists coiled tightly. Her face, however, remained unchanged, scowl and fangs sharpened further. "How can you say that… How can you say that when you're the one who's never around. You're the one who's constantly shirking his own responsibilities as a father and as a husband!"

"I work all day for my daughter! And for you too!"

"Well, being a parent is more than bringing money to the table. You're completely useless when it comes to everything else!"

Useless… I am not… I am not useless. My fists begin to shake, my brows lower and curve, revealing a hidden Gozuki in my face. I am not inept, I am not useless… How dare you… How dare you spout such insults at me after all I've done for you.

"I am not useless." I take some steps towards her, she holds my gaze unmoving. "I have done all I could, I literally can't cut any more time from my work."

"Oh, sorry mister politician. It looks like nobody told you your wife needs your help to raise our daughter! You never help in anything regarding Chizuru, and I can't do everything by myself while I work every weekday. You don't even realize that isn't enough, that's why you're a useless father, Kurechika!"

Shut up… Don't you dare… to call me like that…

"… Well, maybe you would have been able to keep working normally if you hadn't got me drunk that night!"

"What? Are you blaming me for this now?!"

"As if what happened was my fault! You got both of us drunk, that's why I didn't wear protection."

"We were dating for three months and it was my birthday! And you were the one who pushed me into the couch!"

"You invited me over to your apartment, you got undressed as we drank vodka, and you didn't resist when I started caressing you!

Don't play victim with me now after all this time, you weren't a little girl anymore!"

"Victim? I'm not playing victim! I'm asking you to do your share as a father, since you're so inept at it. Why did you even form a family with me if you don't want to do your part?!"

"Because maybe I wasn't planning on forming a family with you in the first place!"

"Don't give me that face. We were only starting out our relationship, we hadn't seen whether we could live together back then. I did like your hard to approach persona, but we didn't have time to see whether it was real love or not between us. That's why this doesn't work, because we've been winging it this whole time. Neither of us wanted to have Chizuru at that time, you know it." I drink my coffee and sit down back in my sofa. I run a hand on my face, biting my lips. Unable to stop, I spit out one last drop of venom out of me."… And there's no more love between us after all this time, it seems."

There, I said it. Come on, scream at me again. It's always the same as of late. All you do is bitch at me regardless of what I do. When I'm home, because I don't talk much. When I'm not, because I'm absent. When I try to talk, you're tired. When I'm tired, you complain I ignore you two. I'm tired of this stagnant air that fills my house…

Where is that strong, resolute woman I admired so much? The one who used to face me unflinching, that understood my burdens? Crumbled to dust, its remnants scattered by the wind.

This is the price we pay for being foolish, for being careless. Sigh… There should have been no reason to get to this point if we had been responsible adults.

"… I do love you."

"Huh?"

Saeko's eye lost all edge and glow, the eternal night of yore mired her complexion now. Hanging her head and holding one of her elbows tightly, all draconian bravery was gone from her voice, nothing but the wails of a small, wounded imp were left in her words.

"… I know you're always busy. I always liked that serious side of you. How you could seize someone with just a gaze, how you could always know how to deal with large groups."

"What is this abou-"

"I do love you, Kurechika. But I can't go on like this anymore." Tears bursted out of her eyes as she held herself tightly. Shivering in place, she sat down again, as slowly as the last leaf falling off a branch. Words fused with sobs, cheeks tarnished by tears, and marked rivers in her complexion. "I know how important your work is, that's why I don't interrupt your calls, that's why I don't bother you at home when you come home late. I know you're working hard everyday, and I am truly thankful for what you do. But I just can't do this anymore."

She sobbed in place, I could no nothing but stare. I have never seen Saeko cry. No words could describe the piercing pain in my chest, I feel as if my tongue was retreating into my throat, as if I would gulp it down if I lost my focus. I winced at her words, yet I couldn't look away.

"They keep cutting our budget, they keep making us work more and more… I'm exhausted. Last month the army kicked us out of Hakuryo High School because they were going to make a base there. I tried to shield some of our students as they forced us to leave and I got a bruise on my arm… Hic… You didn't even ask me how I got it when you came home that day…" One hand grasps her face, the other rests atop her chest, trying pointlessly to calm its oscillation.

"You had a bruise? I didn't… I didn't notice…"

"Hic… I always loved you, Kurechika. I wouldn't have let you into my house if you were just a pastime to me. But I can't do this anymore…"

Now, holding her sides, she looks up at me. No sign of the monster from before, a wounded animal trying to reach a source of water amidst a barren wasteland, that's what she looked like.

"People at school keep telling us to change the curriculum, we're being paid next to nothing while having to work twice as much. I have to get out in a rush to go pick up Chizuru, do all the chores by myself, and when you come home you don't even greet me, you don't even talk… I need you, Kurechika. I need my husband by my side. I can't endure all this by myself…"

She hunched over, hitting the table with her forehead softly, burying her head in between her arms.

"I'm tired of holding out for something, anything. If you simply don't care… Hic… Stop giving me hope that someday you'll start caring. Just be honest with me, Kurechika. Because I… I can't take this… U-Uuuhh…" And then she started crying without any semblance of restrain.

… A whole armory was thrown at my heart. No longer looking for water, Saeko cried in agony. The desolate cries, similar to those of an infant pleading for the mother to arrive. In her case… She was pleading me to notice how she was suffering. A deep crack in a wall being treated with a trebuchet, that was what just happened here. Me being the trebuchet, of course.

I never noticed anything. All I did was focus on my job, on the agreement we had established so long ago.

Saeko was strong, she doesn't need me lending an ear to her worries. She's always so confident, she never asked for advice during our first years together. That's why… I assumed she could take anything, just like how I can take stuff in silence.

She's there, she isn't saying anything so she should be fine.

She always takes care of the chores, she doesn't need help with that.

I don't know anything about teaching and she doesn't like politics, so there's no point in talking of our jobs.

So I never asked how her day was. Since she always took care of her own problems in stride I assumed she was fine, or at least not bothered by it.

… And I screamed at her when she was trying to tell me she needed me by her side, not only physically but in mind as well. She wanted my heart and gaze on her and Chizuru… And I… I…

I stand up, slowly moving towards the door.

"Kurechika?" I don't stop at her call. "Kurechika, where are you going?"

I don't mind her words and slowly go to the door. I need to get some air, I need to clear my head. God… What have I done?

I feel a tug, almost hesitant, on my arm.

"I'm sorry… I'm sorry for screaming at you…"

"You don't have to apologize, Saeko. I'm just going to get some air."

"Please!" She hugs me from behind, clawing at my chest. "I'm sorry… I… I'm just tired. Please don't leave me… I wasn't being serious."

"You and I both know you were." And I can't blame you. I deserved every single word you hurled at me, and then some more. You went easy on me, I know you can be more poisonous when you so wish. And you had all the reasons to do so.

"No, I wasn't." I feel something wet on my back, Saeko was still crying. "I won't complain anymore… So please don't leave us." Raindrops filled her words, raining over wetness. What she was holding on released itself as her grip on me tightened. "I can't take care of Chizuru if you leave me… She needs you, Kurechika. I need you… I'm sorry… Hic… I'll keep taking care of the house, I won't complain anymore, I swear." Every word is another knife into my chest. Now I'm the one on the receiving end of the trebuchet. I made Saeko hurt like this, so I shouldn't complain.

But… It's clear she doesn't deserve this. Saeko did nothing to be apologizing to me in this way. I should let her rest and we can talk this out tomorrow before going back home. This is clear as day, this… this relationship is over. Saeko doesn't deserve this.

"I'm going to get some air, Saeko. Let me go."

"… I'm sorry, Kurechika. Please don't leave us… I…" I release myself slowly from her grasp, I hear her hiccups increase.

I grab the doorknob and open the door. Again her hand reaches my arm.

"I love you, I really didn't mean to scream at you. I know…" Her voice trailed off, turning into a distant echo, a fissure dwelling in every word she uttered between sobs. "I know I might not be enough for you, I know I may not have been who you wanted to marry but… Chizuru needs us, both of us. Kurechika, let's… Let's talk this out once more, please?"

"I'll be back in a while." I move away and she doesn't try to stop me. As I close the door, I hear her crying once more.

Dragging my feet and gaze, I make my way to the mini bar. I can't believe it… This time I deserve the word in full force. I am useless.

No matter how much I apologize, it won't change what I did, what I said, or how I've been feeling. And considering what's at stake… It might be for the best to end this here.

I took my time, slowly gazing out the window, looking at the Capital from the height of the floor. If I accept Hoshimori's offer, I would have to start living here. Forcing Saeko to either live alone in Hiiragi or quit her job to come to Kyoto… Biting my lips, no good outcome comes to mind were I to ask that of her.

I guess… this relationship truly is… over.

As I reach the place, I found someone there besides the bartender. A Royal Guard, one in a black dress with trimmed dark hair, was sitting drinking something.

"Oh…" The man noticed I was staring. "I thought I would be the only one drinking alone at this hour." He smiles wryly. A fellow commoner, huh.

"Forgive me, I was just in need of some air. Bartender, a beer please."

The man opened a can and served me a glass. I drank it slowly, feeling the coldness down my throat.

"Must have been a long day for all of you, huh." The bartender said as he chuckled.

"Yes, the negotiations… were very tiring." Not as much as what just happened to me.

"I didn't have much to do, just watching over the building." The Guard said. He looks worn down, however. His speech is… peculiar for a Royal Guard.

The man in question finished his drink, sighing heavily. His gaze lost in the infinite loop of the cup's rim, cheer shining in his eyes due to its absence, the Guard's features reflected emotions of anguish as he grimaced slightly, eyes and mouth growing smaller every passing second.

"Did the negotiations not go well for your side, my fellow?" I ask the man, trying to clear my head.

"Huh? Oh, no. I think that went well in the end. What troubles me is… a more personal matter." Unlike the other Guards this man feels… common. Normal. I don't feel that pride, that arrogance some members of the Guard display at all times.

"Love problems?" The bartender asks, the Guard nods. It's as if the night was adamant in not allowing me to run away today.

"I am not the best person to deliver love advice, sadly." I say as I chuckle bitterly, drinking some more beer to clean the taste in my mouth that refused to leave.

"Haha… Love advice is not what I need."

"… Did you already break up?" I couldn't contain my lips. I thought I had seen some resemblance of me in the man, but the way in which his eyes closed, as tightly as a lock in a bank, proved me wrong.

"No… My wife died a few days ago."

"… Sorry, that was insensitive of me."

"No, it's alright. We could say our goodbyes, so it's not like I had anything bottled up…" He gestures for another drink. The bartender serves him what he was drinking and he goes for another sip. "If that's all there was to it, this wouldn't hurt so much."

Seeing the man hold the cup rather strongly as he kept drinking, the bartender leaned on the table.

"What troubles you, my fellow? Was something left unsaid?"

"No, it's…" The Guard sighs, shaking his head a little. "My son was left alone. I can't be with him due to my position in the Guard."

"Do you not have anyone to leave him with?" I ask, to which the man nods.

"Thankfully I do, but that's not the problem. He needs me by his side, and yet here I am. What a useless father I am."

"… I don't think you deserve such a strong word. You are worrying about him, after all." Unlike me, who didn't even think of Chizuru these last few days. So long as she's in good health and scoring good grades… I never truly cared to get closer to her.

"Still…" We both finish our drinks, the man looks up lost in thought. "Back when I joined the Guard, I thought I was ready to die. I thought I could face anything the world threw at me for my family." The passion was apparent in his words and in the way he clenched his free hand. "But I never expected something like this to happen."

I see… If he dies now, his son might end up in an orphanage. Luckily, women are not going to be conscripted into the IJA, or so it seems for now. Even so, I can buy Saeko and Chizuru an exemption draft with some effort. They will never be dragged into that side of the war.

"If I'm not by his side, how will he be at ease after all this?"

"Even if you're not there, you can talk with him if he's not too young." I say, tapping my glasses. "A parent has to do what he has to for his child, doesn't he?"

"Yes, I agree. However… My absence will hurt him more than anything else." The man's words piked at my heart. "The feeling of being left behind will leave a scar in him that no time will ever heal. He needs me there, and I am here."

Being… left behind? Ending up abandoned, ignored by those you love when you're in pain… Saeko, is this how you felt all this time?

"You can ask for some leave time, right?" The bartender asked.

"I already have, these months will be full of activity so I can't take any time off."

Yes, the testing against the Kagerou are soon to come. Such a saddening state of affairs… He seems to truly value his child, yet he cannot be with him. I, on the other hand, have neglected my daughter while having the chance to spend my time with her. And now… it might be too late for me.

"I won't be able to face Miho if anything happens to him while I'm not there."

"I believe you shouldn't punish yourself needlessly." I say, leaning my arms onto the table. "You do what you can, that's… how it is sometimes."

"That might be so, but it isn't enough. If his future is crying, it's up to me to make it smile." Huh? If his future… What an odd phrase. Yet… Some of it resonated like a scream in a cave within me. "And yet here I am, drinking in a bar while he's probably sleeping alone."

"I agree with the man here, you shouldn't be so hard on yourself." The bartender said. "All of us have had to make conflicting decisions sometimes."

"Yes, that's true." I say, rubbing my forehead. "I believe your wife wouldn't blame you for this, not with how strongly you feel about it."

"… Thanks. Sigh… I do wonder if I'll ever be able to move on from this." His gaze sinks again into the cup, his shoulders descending like snow.

"Were you two in love?"

"Yes, she was all I ever wanted. She made me feel cherished for the first time in my life, she didn't like me because of who I was or what I had. And now… There are words and jokes I will never be able to say again. There's food I'll never have again, there are things I won't be able to do for anyone else, things no one else but her would appreciate. She's gone…" Then, closing his eyes, he grimaces. "And I wasn't ready to be the one left behind."

The man was valiant enough to pour out his heart raw in words. I wouldn't be able to do that, not in a hundred years. To lose that closeness forever… To lose your partner, to be forever forbidden from saying and doing things one enjoyed…

Beep!

"Oh, seems like I'm being called back. Sigh…" The Guard slowly stood up. "Sorry, I didn't meant to dump my troubles onto you two." He bowed to us, grimacing again.

"No, a bartender's job is to hear the customer's woes too."

"It was a surprise to see a Royal Guard in such honest fashion. Don't apologize, you've done no wrong. Your heart is in the right place, my fellow."

"I see… Thanks, really." He pays up his due, and leaves after a short, polite bow.

"Another beer, please."

My cup is filled and again I drink. I close my eyes, going back to those days. When I was but a fresh member of the local council.

Back then… Back then I only saw Saeko as a sort of prize, of prey. She was very prideful and snarky on the meeting I met her while I was working on Hiiragi.

I thought she was too prideful and I wanted to prove her wrong. I wanted to show her our position was the right one. Eventually, somehow, that turned into me wanting to… well, fuck her. I wanted to wipe that smirk of her face, to see her flushed face in embarrassment as she undressed for me.

Sigh… I do not envy my younger self's motives to do things.

The more she rejected me, the more I desired to bring her down to all fours. I wanted to make her admit I was right, to see her admit defeat. It was a power struggle on both sides, she did tell me she wanted to make me acknowledge her position in front of the rest of my colleagues, that's why she put up with me at the time. Of course, she had no sex in her mind.

I was too prideful back then, I only saw her as a meat bag to bed, an adversary to defeat. Her words had no place on my ears, she was just another opponent to surpass, another meat bag to fuck.

… Turns out our literary tastes were similar. I once ran into her in the library, and we tried to outsmart the other with our knowledge. From time to time, we met up there by coincidence and I found myself enjoying our talks. Instead of confronting her or trying to seduce her, I found myself earnestly asking for her opinion and giving her my own, no layer of sarcasm or double meanings in my words.

When was it that we started hanging out to talk about books? Our discussions about the teaching politics she was pushing became smoother, we could debate without the other snapping, without her making any snarky remarks, without me making any sexual comments or dismissing her opinion.

… I don't even remember how that matter of the school policies was resolved in the end. All I know is that we kept 'running into each other' in the library, and ended up talking about books for a while.

… Eventually, I realized I wanted her, but not like before. Well, I still desired her, but not in… that way only. I wanted her to accept me, not to force her to knee. I wanted to see her smile more, not just to use her to satisfy my own urges. I began to like Saeko, to earnestly like her company.

It almost feels like a time lost to me so long ago. As if the river were we once stood was eroded and now a cliff was in its place. I don't think I was being serious back then. I wasn't thinking on marriage, I simply wanted to be with her, to enjoy our time together.

It took some mutual effort for both of us to come out of our masks, after a year of… not dating but dating, of meeting up to talk about books and then going to eat together. We both had different views on how to tend to the house, on how to deal with life. I admired her resolute way of dealing with her problems, but I thought that… maybe she wasn't the right one for me.

She wouldn't be able to live by my side if I were to continue on the path I was at the time. We both tried to make it work during those months, it wasn't bad. I did have my doubts on whether I wanted to go further with her, but all of that went out the window… when she told me she was pregnant.

I pay the bill and go back to my room, slowly walking on the hallways as I gaze outside the windows. The city looks so small, so bright from here. As distant and beautiful as those days are to me now.

The first years weren't bad. We made our agreement and worked well under it. Dealing with Chizuru when she was a baby was… a challenge. Waking up midnight wasn't something neither appreciated, but we somehow survived that by clearly establishing who got which days. And me coming home late wasn't bad then, I was still high in adrenaline after the sessions so I could take care of Chizuru, allowing Saeko to rest well.

I supported her so that she could go back to her work as a teacher, she didn't want me to sustain her life. I liked her prideful opposition, her determination to not rely on anyone for her own life. So, we formed our new pact. The one we're still using today.

Saeko gave me a reason to look forward to coming home, a reason to not stay overnight in my office. Something besides my work, something that cannot be measured in any kind of value scale. Those first three years… were truly happy ones.

… Things started to get worse once the new education laws became more and more twisted due to the war. Saeko never asked for help and my meetings got longer.

I promised her to be home early, so I had to deal with as much as I could before that. These last years have taken their toll on both of us, and we never tried to talk with the other about work. I thought she was fine, she was always prideful and never asked for help.

In between her sobbing, she said she didn't want to bother me because I was tired, despite how I've been neglecting her these last months. Knowing her, her heart is probably in tatters right now. The profession she so much loves is being bastardized thanks to the needs of the war, her pride smashed to pieces as her hopes of being self sufficient vanish into thin air. She wanted to ask for help, but didn't. Because she held the hope I would notice? Because she wanted me to make the first move? Because she didn't know what to do?

It doesn't matter. I wasn't there for her, that is the truth.

"… If their future is crying… It's up to me to make it smile, huh."

Now that I think about it… I didn't ask that Guard his name. Damn…

The man had his heart in the right place. If I leave her alone… What will Saeko do under the pressure? She knows she can't take care of Chizuru with her salary alone, if I leave her… even if it is for the good of the Empire… even if I keep sending them more than enough money…

There has to be a way for me to help Hoshimori while remaining with her. It's the least I can do. If… If anything happened to her, and Chizuru ended up alone like that Guard's boy…

"You're just a useless idiot! You'll never get anywhere in life, you dumbass. Now shut up and go get me another beer!"

My father's words return to me, making me grimace. I run a hand over my cheek, there is no bruise on it now but the sting of the belt is still there. A gash no time will be able to heal, huh?

Saeko made my home a place I wanted to come back to. She and Chizuru… mean the world to me, they truly do.

Regardless of the platitudes I use to excuse myself, I would be abandoning them by accepting the offer I was given. And that… is something I cannot do.

Reaching my room, I delay my entrance for a moment. Taking a deep breath, looking at my hands, there's a second of hesitation as my feet wanted to remain firmly planted where they are. Smiling at my foolishness, I exhale through my nose. I then take one step forward and open the door.

Saeko wasn't in sight. I went to our room, a figure was under the sheets. She slowly rose up, looking at me.

"… Welcome back." She said, her tone similar to a tree in winter. Dry, lifeless, dulled.

"Saeko, we… need to talk."

"Yes, we do."

I sit on the edge of the bed, I feel her getting closer. Before I could sort out my thoughts, she wrapped her hands around me.

"I'm sorry. Kurechika, I didn't mean all I said."

"Stop." I grab her hands to prevent her from keep rubbing my chest. "Saeko, you don't have to do this." I turn around to face her, she was shivering slightly.

"I'm really sorry… I shouldn't have screamed at you in that way. Forgive me, please." She lowered her head, her hands together by her waist.

She looked up at me, awaiting my answer. The shifting light of a candle battered by wind, that was what her body's movements resembled as she stared at me, with eyes that retained traces of red.

In the past, I would have jumped at the prospect of such a docile Saeko being in front of me. Now, however, I can only reprimand myself for allowing this to happen.

"You have nothing to apologize for. I was in the wrong, your worries were fair and your points valid. I have not been doing what I should have as your partner. I'm the one who should apologize."

"Eh? You're not… angry?"

"Not anymore. I was tired and reacted inappropriately. I am the one at fault here. I'm sorry, for leaving you alone all this time." I grab her hands and kiss them softly. "Can you give me another chance, Saeko?"

"… Are you being serious? You're not upset? You won't leave us?" Her quiver made me bite my lips, I pulled in, wrapping my arms around her shoulders.

"No, I won't leave. I won't run for the Diet either, I'll find a way to help my fellows while remaining close to you and Chizuru. So… Could you forgive me for being so insensitive towards you two?"

She slowly returned the embrace, ending up clutching my back strongly and once more softly, silently crying on my shoulder.

I remain there, simply hugging her. After some time, she calmed down and ended the contact between us.

"Kurechika, you truly… will stay with us? You'll try to be more present from now on?" She looked up at me, eyes still filled with uncertainty but having regained some of her sturdiness.

"I'll try, and if I don't make it just nag at me like you used to. Remember?" I smile at her, caressing her cheek and cleaning the remnants of tears in her eyes. "I won't ask you to forgive me now, but please be patient with me. I'll make an earnest effort from now on to be a more present parent and husband."

"Then… You'll stay with Chizuru during the weekends instead of being on the phone?" Part of her usual inquisitive stare returned, grabbing my chest.

"I will have to make calls, I'm sure. But I'll be by Chizuru's side from today onwards. I don't know as much about her as I should actually… But I'll take my time to get to know her better."

"And you'll help me with the chores? You won't complain about the food I make?"

"So long as you don't ask me to cook, I will. Cleaning the dishes, buying groceries or doing the laundry is nothing I can't do. And if it makes you happy, I'll try out any food you make for me, Saeko. Just… don't overdo it with the sauce."

"And… And can I… Can you listen to what I have to say? Will you start looking at me from now on?"

"… Yes, I'll make a conscious effort to be by your side. And even if I don't notice, come and talk with me. I might be tired, but that doesn't mean we can't talk things out."

She did her best, narrowing her eyes tightly, yet the tears ran away regardless. I hugged her kindly again, she returned it as well.

"I'm sorry for saying something so hurtful before, Saeko. I truly do not deserve someone as patient as you. So please give me a chance to right my wrongs."

"Kurechika… I have to ask… Did you ever love me?" She asked, the monster resurfacing again. Her eyes now squinted, the sadness subdued slightly. "Be honest with me. Don't say these kind words just to please me. Did you ever-"

"Yes, I did. But not in the way you think."

"What do you mean?"

"I… I really enjoyed our talks about books. When we officially started our relationship, I had my doubts about us to be honest."

I close my eyes, leaning onto her.

"But during our first years together, even after Chizuru had grown, I admired how you dealt with everything. My work and my own assumptions made me close up and look away… And I am sorry for that. The frustration of our quarrels of late made me forget why I chose to marry you instead of just acknowledging Chizuru as my daughter."

I move back to look into her eyes. Holding out some of their defiance like a small fence against a rainstorm, she returned my gaze.

"I love you, Saeko. I love how you challenge me to be better, how you face everything unfazed, and how you can deal with so many heavy burdens on your own."

I run a hand over her cheek slowly, feeling the minute quivering in her, wiping the tears from right under her eye.

"I used to think you could take it, that's why I didn't ask if you were fine. And seeing you waver… made me think less of you sometimes, I admit. So all I ask is for you to give me another chance to regain your trust. However… If you deem me unworthy after what I've said… I won't oppose your wishes."

She closed her eyes, bringing both hands together. Her lips moving and twisting, she then held my gaze in complete seriousness.

"… You will be back home early, right?"

"Yes, I will."

"And I can rely on you to help me in taking care of Chizuru?" I nod. "And you'll take care of her no matter what happens between us?"

"Of course I will."

"… Even after I'm gone?"

"What are you saying? Are… Are you sick, Saeko?"

"No, it's just… You won't leave Chizuru alone if anything happens to me, right? You won't do that, right Kurechika?"

"Your doubt hurts me. I know I said many hurtful things to you tonight but I would never abandon our daughter. I know it wasn't enough, but I have been living with you two in my mind." I didn't want to have a daughter at the time. Chizuru wasn't in my plans. But that doesn't mean I'll abandon her. I won't be like my own father, I will keep my daughter safe.

"I see…" She looks away for a moment, rubbing her hands together. "And… you will… start taking our relation more seriously? I can… believe you, right?"

"Yes… I don't know how soon I'll reach what you need of me, but I will do my utmost effort to support you from now on, and not just with money. Can you give me another chance, Saeko?"

She looks away, pursing her lips. Bringing her hands together again, she took a moment to look at me again. When she did, she grabbed my face and kissed me.

"… If you were lying…. I swear you'll pay for giving me hope again." Her body still doing hiccups, her eyes seemed to have a few tears left in them. I hug her, our foreheads touching.

"I wasn't. I promise you I'll start to properly support you from now on, dear."

[Takahisa]

---

"Regarding the negotiations, we have received confirmation from Tamase that he has arranged a meeting for next Thursday with some members of the UN's High Council." Bazora notified me of the news.

"That is good to hear. Who will be coming with us?"

"Takatsukasa-sama, General Makabe, and a small retinue from their families."

"I see. Hopefully this can be a pleasant meeting. What else?"

"Tomorrow you have a meeting with the representatives of Mitsuhishi Industries. Some of the parts our fellows have designed for the enhancement of the F-15 were chosen for the final model, and so, you have to be there for the customary bureaucracy."

"Well, that is also good to hear. Anything else of note?" He shakes his head, placing his notebook under his arm. "Now then Bazora, about… my request of some days ago…" I entwine my fingers and rest my elbows on my desk. He sighs, then ruffles his emerald hair softly.

"Yohime-sama has already arranged both matters. Mana shall be going to tend to the Mitsurugi girl while Maya has been selected as the caretaker of Shirogane's son."

"Oh? Is that so? I was convinced your daughter would be the one sent to Hiiragi."

When Yohime told me she thought the young Tsukuyomis would be good candidates for the tasks I needed to be tackled, considering both of them are part of our most trusted fellows, have been trained to be our counselors were we to need their guide, and they're used to looking after little ones due to also having to take care of their younger siblings from time to time, I paled at my shortsightedness. The answer was in front of me and I didn't see it, at all. Thankfully, I have my dear Yohime with me, for whenever I make such obvious blunders.

However, I was convinced Mana was to be the one selected to take care of Shirogane's boy. Maya has been influenced by Kazora's prejudices, after all. He has imprinted into her that unnecessary habit of bottling up feelings, of separating oneself from our common fellows. Yohime has decided it, so I shall trust in my lady wife's judgment. There must be a reason for this arrangement.

"Yes, I was also of the same opinion, my liege. However, Mana has developed some… troubling habits as of late."

"Troubling? Has she become colder to our peasants?"

"No, nothing of the sort. She seems to… wish to have a more close relation with her sister. She has tried to make Mion refer to her in less formal ways for some time now."

"Forgive me Bazora, I fail to see how this could impede Mana from performing the task I asked of her." I send a hand to my short ponytail, caressing it as I ponder once more his words, yet find no answer within. My retainer's eyes squint, his lips twist into an uncomfortable shape.

"Well… As it stands, Mana seems to wish to… be able to display her affection more openly. When in her trials, she's still as unwavering as she always was. However, thanks to those books she reads, she has expressed her disagreement over how I continue to further push Mion to hone herself." I reiterate, I cannot see how this could be an obstacle for her. "In fact, she has been showing a propensity to embrace Mion quite often. The little one has not yet been up to what I expect of her, I fear Mana has become too soft."

"So you believe she would spoil the boy?"

"Yes. She has said she wanted to be closer to Mion, and I don't doubt she would pamper the kid if she were to be put in charge of him. My apologies, Takahisa-sama. I have been careless as a father, I let Mana be swayed by these cheap sentimentalism displayed in those pages." He bows to me. Bazora, you're as resolute as ever I see.

"Now Bazora, don't be so extreme. I see no wrong in Mana wishing to express her feelings in private. While I do agree she has to learn when and how to do so, I see no need to show such restlessness over this. Do try to have a talk with her when you find the time, so that she doesn't forget when to draw the line."

"If you so order, I shall try to speak with her about this." He again stands upright, the bull back in his gaze. "However, I do have something else to mention."

"What is it?"

"Are you sure sending Mana to the Mitsurugi girl is wise?"

"… Are you doubting my judgment?"

"Yes, I am." He narrows his eyes, folding his arms behind his back. "Twins should never be recognized in the Koubuin House. The risk of entering into a succession dispute is very high, our unity would be put in jeopardy. Learning from the mistakes of the other Houses, we have been stalwart in this matter. Were Mana to grow attached to the girl, and if the girl were ever to desire to regain her heritage… Your scar in your left hand should remind you of the risks you're playing with." I grimace, instinctively clenching my left hand.

"Tsukuyomi, that will not repeat itself. I have told you I wish to have Meiya rejoin the family. She will not be a hazard."

"We do not know that, my liege. We cannot foresee how she might react, how she might feel inside. If she were to rally some of our fellows against Yuuhi-sama, our power would be diminished. We cannot allow House Koubuin to crumble in these times."

"Meiya will not do anything of the sort. She has been raised well, and I will be here to guide her."

"… Your brother also had your father guiding him, and he still raised his blade at you when you were appointed as the next head."

"Me and Jinkuro never were on good terms. It was an obvious outcome. Meiya harbors no such foul feelings in her."

"For now. We cannot allow that to repeat itself, especially considering their resemblance. Think of all the problems that would cause Yuuhi-sama if the Mitsurugi girl were to plot against her integrity."

"That will not happen. Raiden has been raising her well."

"Surely you know what is said of twins. One gains all the good qualities while the other is left with only the foul traits. Considering how Yuuhi-sama is everyday…" He closes his eyes, leaving his words unfinished.

"You say Meiya is truly the shadow to Yuuhi's light?"

"Precisely."

"Then tell me Tsukuyomi, whatever shall I do? How do you suggest I should proceed in this predicament?" I lean back into my seat, sharpening my tongue against the inner side of my teeth.

"I have already voiced my opinion on this matter, on the night they were born." His brows tense downwards, as do mine knowing what he's about to say. "There is only one solution to this problem, only one path will ascertain the stability of the House. You have to kill Meiya before it's too late, before she either rises up against us or she is manipulated by other Regents to suit their agendas."

"I refuse. Do remember you're speaking of my daughter, exiled or not."

"Do remember you're speaking of a cursed child, do not forget what you yourself went through. Me and Kazora took your side, but we lost many of my own family in that struggle."

"You need not remind me, I know full well Jinkuro had the vast support of the Tsukuyomi elders. I know what you two had to do during that night. But this time it's different, we're united as of now."

"… I fear Mana might bring cracks into our hearts, my liege. No, anyone who gets attached to that girl will become a hazard to the family. Takahisa-sama, even if you desire to keep her alive, there is no reason to send anyone to her."

"Then, what happens once Raiden is too old to take care of her?"

"… There is a vast network of dungeons in the underground. We have many places to keep her locked up where she can't harm the House, where we can discipline her to fulfill her role as a body double." He said with remarkable aplomb, as if his own veins were filled with the night gale of December.

"And what has Meiya done to deserve such a fate?!" I hit my desk, rising from my seat. "Can't you see that this attitude is what will cause her to despise us? This unnecessary paranoia is what forced Father to drive away Jinkuro during his early days. That is why he despised me, my brother felt that he didn't have a place in the family. He… His final words were not ones of greed, they were those of hatred and sorrow." I close my eyes, pain returning to my left hand as my brother's bloodied, crying face in his last moments returns to my mind. Such was the reason why he sought the dark parts of our story, why he embraced the accursed legacy of the shinobi that my late Father had pledged to forever seal. "I will give Meiya a place in this family, even if it's the last thing I do in this life. I won't let her heart be corrupted by the isolation I forced upon her in my weakness. And if you oppose me…" I put my left hand in my waist, moving the handguard of my Minaru Kamui upwards with my thumb. "I will remove you from my side, Tsukuyomi."

"There is need for such hostility. I am loyal to you, Takahisa-sama." He bows down deeply, remaining still and undaunted. "I cannot help but to bring this matter to you in this time. If you still desire to follow through, it is your decision. Just know that what I described might one day come to pass, so you should first meet the girl to see for yourself who she is. Yours, Yohime-sama's, and Yuuhi-sama's well-being will always be my priority, but I shall follow your orders on this regardless."

"… Sigh. I am thankful for all you do, Tsukuyomi. For all you had to do for me." I sit down, sheathing my blade. "But please understand. I want Meiya with us, I want to break this taboo. Are you with me, Tsukuyomi?"

He looked at me, narrowing his eyes. Giving a firm now, standing as firm as a mountain, enduring my gaze without so much as a quiver. The currents in his eyes showed no ripples nor taints, shining as clearly as the morning sun.

"To my last breath, my liege."

"I see… Thank you, Bazora. And please do try to… see Meiya in a different light. She has committed no sin, she's but a little girl left to her own luck." By her own Father, no less.

"… I cannot make any promises. But I will see with mine own eyes her worth if such a time comes."

"That is good enough for me. Now then, there was nothing else to tend to for today, was there?"

"No, nothing else sir. Dinner should have been prepared, do you wish to go now?"

"Yes, let us. I do need to speak with Yohime about how she'll relay the news to both Mana and Maya."

"Are you not going to do it yourself, Takahisa-sama?"

"Remember that we have the tests in the afternoon. I wish to spend some time with my squadron before the fights. Now then, let us go."

I stand up, letting out a long sigh. I always knew both Tsukuyomi brothers did not agree with me leaving Meiya alive. After all we went through when Jinkuro tried to usurp the position of Head that night… All of our fellows we had to bury… Even my own shinobi turned against me. I look at my left hand, where the wound I suffered that day lies. The wound my most trusted fellow once inflicted me in hopes of letting Jinkuro score a certain hit to my throat.

Meiya isn't my brother. That little girl won't be like him, because I won't leave her alone like my father left my brother. I will not allow you to fall to the darkness, Meiya. And that is why… I pray for Mana to be able to become someone Meiya can trust.

Sigh… Now, all that is left is to see how Maya adapts to taking care of Shirogane's boy.

Chapter 36: His Sisters

---

February 11th, 1989. 0 7:36 AM.

(Head's Room. Koubuin Main House. Osaka.)

[Maya]

For Yohime-sama to have summoned me personally, I wonder what does she need of me? Maybe she's going to assign me as Yuuhi-sama's retainer? As calm as I want to be, I cannot stop sighing, clenching my hands or continue to throw glances at the doorway.

It is true me and Mana have come toe to toe in our efforts, even as TSF pilots, and that the possibility of both of us being assigned as her retainers was being considered, yet there is part of me that wishes to finally come out on top of her. We have just been accepted into the Royal Guard, and placed on the Security Forces no less. I honestly had my doubts, I thought they would most certainly test us first, even if we are part of the Shinpan I was sure we would need some years in service before being assigned as guardians of the main house. I do not negate that being entrusted with this duty fills me with a warm feeling, yet it feels surreal to have attained it so quickly.

A sound makes me tense up, making me stand in attention. The door opens and Yohime-sama along the Grand Chamberlain enter the room. I stand up and give them a bow.

"Good morning, Yohime-sama, Grand Chamberlain."

"Good morning, Maya. I thank you for coming to meet me in such a short notice. Please sit down." Yohime-sama says as she stops by my side.

I sit again as they go to their usual spot. Yohime-sama was wearing her usual long, cyan kimono decorated with white patterns of flowers. Her cascading lily hair done in her ponytail, she sat down and stared at me with that gentle smile she always has on her face.

"First, let me tell you that I have nothing but praise for your efforts in your trainings, Maya. The results you and Mana have achieved have left me and many others pleasantly astonished." It is rare for her to give honest praise so openly, even more considering she called for me alone to this meeting.

"Thank you, Yohime-sama. It is an honor to know I am up to par with your expectations."

"Haha, you're going far above them, my dear. Now that I have made that clear, let me tell you of the reason why I have summoned you." Her smile subdued, her amethyst eyes met mine unwavering as her gentle voice spoke slowly. "I have decided to entrust Mana with the duty of being Yuuhi's sole retainer."

I couldn't help to grip the edges of my dress and to gulp as the meaning of the words sank in. She surpassed me. What it is that I did wrong? What is it that I lack?

"It is a shame. May I ask what made you take such decision?"

"Well, Mana is more calm and kind. You take everything much more seriously than her, and she has a… certain trait that made me decide for her." Yohime-sama closed her eyes as she finished speaking, a troubled sigh escaping her lips.

"I see. Regardless, I shall continue to serve you as I have been doing so far." I bow again to them, they must be testing my resolve.

I cannot negate that I am upset. No, scratch that. I am most positively angry. What is this trait of hers that makes her a better fit than me? All of our results are similar, I have been sparring with her for as long as I can remember, I even developed my own twist on our lessons with the Mugen Kidou to be able to defeat her someday. And yet…

"Now, Maya. That isn't the sole reason I called for you today. I have a special mission for you." I look up, she was again staring at me gently. Her calmness, that sweet smile she always has, she isn't lying. She still has a special use for me? Maybe… being the Mitsurugi girl's retainer?

"What would that be, my liege?"

"There is someone else I wish you to take care of. You shall depart immediately as soon as this meeting is finished." I knew it. She's sending me to aid Raiden-sama. "You shall head to the Hiiragi district in Yokohama, to protect a certain someone for an undefined amount of time."

Huh? The Hiiragi district? Yokohama? Why is she sending me to a commoner's slum outside of our area of influence? Oh, I see. An undercover mission! Of course, I am more fit to be on the field than Mana.

"Understood. And who would this person be?" It must be a VIP to send someone of the Security Forces as its backup.

"You shall be this boy's retainer. I consider you to be the best fit for this situation, and I expect you to take good care of him." The Grand Chamberlain hands me a folder. As I opened it, I felt a frozen cascade fall on me, just as it did during my training with Daizaburou-sama back on that mountain.

… They're sending me to take care of a commoner's child? Me, a member of the Tsukuyomi family, one of the personal guardians of the Koubuin Household, sent to be the retainer of a peasant?!

Where did I fail? What caused this punishment to befall me? This stain… This humiliation… To be sent to be the nanny of a baseborn… What have I done to deserve this?

"You seem rather displeased, Maya. Is there a problem with the mission I have entrusted to you?" Yohime-sama looked at me with narrowed eyes, sharpening her amethysts at me. When? How? What did I do to upset you so, my liege?

"Yohime-sama, why am I being sent to be the retainer of this peasant? Am I not part of this House's Security Forces?"

"Because I believe you to be the most fit for this task. While he is a commoner, he's the son of a member of our ranks, so I wish you to take care of him." Even if one of his parents was inducted into the Guard… "You shall be there not as a member of the Guard, but passing as his caretaker. The rest of your briefing shall be available to you on the documents that will be given to you before you depart. That shall be all."

"Excuse me, Yohime-sama. What do you mean I won't be sent as a member of the Guard?" It cannot mean what I think it means…

"That you will not go dressed with your uniform and won't take it with you, and obviously you won't have your katana with you. You shall pass as a commoner while you're there."

… Am I being kicked out of the Guard? Sent to mingle with commoners? This is… Father said me and Mana could coexist, that we could work together, and the same for Shion and Mion. And yet… Maybe they'll contact me with the real mission once I'm there? Please tell me it is so.

"I see. I acknowledge my mission, Yohime-sama. Is there any goal I have to achieve while I'm there?"

"No, your sole objective is to take care of that boy. Nothing more, you shall go meet the Captain of the guardians here, he'll give you the rest of the details. That will be all." She signals to the door. I stand up and give her one deep bow, probably the last I'll ever give her.

It seems like I have been discarded. As painful as it is, all I can do is follow my orders. I can only pray that Shion manages to triumph where I have failed. I slowly leave the room with heavy steps, I cannot lift my gaze from the ground. Shining rays seep from outside, contrasting with my shadow full of gloom. What have I done to deserve this? Where did I fail? Why?

"Oh, you look most certainly down my cousin." Mana was coming towards the room I had just left, bearing her usual small smile. My fists clenched at the sight of her, I couldn't help but to look away. No, do not snap. The blame lays solely on me.

"Good morning, Mana. If you'll excuse me, I am busy right now."

"Hm? What is it? You look troubled, are you sure you're fine?"

I stop after a few steps, this may be the last time we will ever talk with each other as equals. For as much as I resent that she was the chosen one, I cannot negate that our rivalry is what made me who I am, what made me search for another path in the way of the sword. Even if all of it was pointless…

"Mana, allow me to speak frankly with you for just a moment." She opens her eyes wide, clearly surprised at my tone. "All of our bouts have been nothing but a pleasure to me. It was an honor to be able to spar with you all these years. I thank you from the bottom of my heart." I bow to her, which makes her flinch.

"M-Maya, what's the meaning of this? Why are you-" I face her again, unable to pronounce the words I wish to say, as a tickling sensation makes its way to the back of my head.

"I wish you the best of luck in your endeavors from now on. Now then, I must leave. Farewell, Mana." I take one last look at her in the eye and resume my way. I did not stop when she called out to me, for I have no more words to give her. You shall get your answers in mere moments.

'You have bested me. Congratulations.' As foolish as it is, I couldn't bring myself to say those words. My lips refused to part, and a pair of shadowy hands kept me in place.

Is this truly how it ends? All my efforts… just to be sent to take care of a commoner?

---

Same Day. 07:44 PM.

---

I make my way to the house I was told he lived in. If he's alone, why wasn't he sent to an orphanage? Why am I being sent to him, instead of placing another commoner to be his caretaker? No, why is Yohime-sama concerned with the well-being of this baseborn peasant?

Am I a fool for holding onto the hope that this is all just a cover, a smokescreen to avoid a leak of intel? This ungraceful dress I have been forced to wear, this coarse crimson cloth shouldn't even be considered a dress. This morning I wore our red uniform proudly and yet now… I arranged my hair on two bums, instead of leaving it free as I always did, and picked a different pair of glasses. I brought just the minimal necessities, despite being told that I should take anything I wanted with me. It truly felt as if I was being kicked out.

Let's see… This should be the place. All of its lights are out, I wonder if the little one is asleep? Is there anyone taking care of him at the moment? I ring the doorbell and wait, yet the minutes pass and no one answers, no matter how many more times I press the button and hear the noise.

… Did I came to the wrong house? I didn't take a wrong turn, did I?

"Excuse me, miss." A rather energetic voice addressed me.

Looking to my right I saw a small, slender woman with vibrant red hair at shoulder length, dressed in a crude cream colored blouse and orange worn down pants.

"What is it?" She doesn't seem to mind my stare and approaches me slowly.

"Do you have any business with the Shirogane?"

"Yes, I do. Who would you be?"

"Hello, I'm Haruna Kagami. I was good friends with the Shirogane when they were here, I still have the number of Kageyuki-san with me if you had any business with him." The woman spoke amicably and without a grain of respect. Do all peasants speak in such a crude way?

"Forgive me, but I do not have any business with him. I am Maya Tsukuyomi, I have been sent here as the caretaker of Takeru Shirogane. Do you know if he's here?"

"Oh! So that's what it was!" The woman clasped her hands together, drawing a huge smile for some reason. "If you're looking for Takeru-chan, he's in my house right now. Since his mother passed away last week, I've been taking care of him, thought it's hard to do so alone." She sighed and looked worn down for a second, but quickly recovered a bright smile. What a weird fellow.

So his mother died… And why am I being sent to take care of him then? Just send him to an orphanage, why do I have to waste my time here? No, focus Maya. This may be some sort of test.

"I see. Allow me to take this burden from you, I shall be taking custody of him from now on."

"Custody?" Kagami-san made a complex face, narrowing her eyes at me. "Hey, I don't know who you are or where you're from, but you better take good care of Takeru-chan!" She raised a finger at me. The gall… How dare she speak to me like that? A mere commoner telling me what to do? And so rudely too? Where are her manners?

"Kagami-san, please refrain from hurling words that could be misunderstood. I am his caretaker and I will be keeping watch over him. I do thank you for looking after him." I give her a small bow, which seems to ease her temper a bit. "Let us waste no more time. Can you bring him here?" The less time I spend talking with her, the better. It's enough that I will have to endure living with this child.

"Hmm… Why don't you just come on in? We were about to have dinner, and I don't think there's anything on the fridge on their house. If we're to be neighbors let's start with the right foot. It's a pleasure to meet you, but you better not hurt Takeru-chan, you hear me?" She briefly narrowed her eyes at me, trying to intimidate me with the small embers that came out from her orange eyes. Sigh… What have I done to deserve this?

I nod at her, choosing to remain silent. She shows me to her house, it's nothing more than a simple construction based on the American's houses painted in white. The inside of the house was painted in light green, with only the minimal furniture on it. Some simple sofas and a small rack with books on what should be the living room, further in there was a small square shaped table with four small chairs lined up on each side of it, and nearby there was the kitchen with nothing out of the ordinary about it. A 14" inch TV was placed on a small wooden rack near the table, it was tuned to a news channel where they were badmouthing the Royal Guard once more. So she's that kind of person…

"Hm? Oh, is something the matter?" The woman asked me, as I noticed a single hair of hers twirl somehow.

"No, nothing. I was merely focusing on the news." I look away from the screen, setting foot into the dining room.

"I'll go call the kids, please wait a while." She goes up the stair and I can hear some shouting above. She said kids, so I suppose she must have a little one too. Well, it doesn't matter to me anyways.

A few moments later, Kagami-san comes back with two small shapes hidden behind her.

"Come on, don't be shy! Why don't you introduce yourselves?" The woman patted their backs, and after looking at her they came out towards me.

"H-Hello, I'm Sumika Kagami, miss." Her daughter seems to have learned some manners.

She was wearing a matching attire with the same colors as her mother's, though she has longer hair and it's tied with a yellow ribbon. She seemed to be scared of me as she fidgeted in place. The other one however stared at me firmly, with a look that mixed anxiety and expectation. He has his hair at shoulder length, just like in the picture of his profile. He's wearing a black sweater and blue pants, as he looks at me directly he takes a single step forward.

"I'm Takeru, who are you?"

I cannot… How rude can a person be? You're telling me the person that raised this boy is now working on the Royal Guard? This is… Sigh, how immature of me, to get so worked up at a child.

"I'm Maya Tsukuyomi, your new caretaker. We will be living together from now on."

"Caretaker? What's that?" He looked at me with a confused expression.

"It means I'm tasked with your well-being, think of me as another relative of yours."

"You speak weird." Ugh, to have to endure such insolence. How dare he speak like that to an adult?

"Takeru-chan, this lady came from far away to be with you, you know?" Kagami-san crouched near him, patting his head. "You have to be good with her, yes?"

"I know." He pouts at her, rising both of his hands that were clenched into little fists.

"Now, don't get upset. You have to thank her for coming to be with you. I'll start serving dinner, so you talk with her a bit, yes?" He gives a nod and Kagami-san sends me a smile. She then goes to the kitchen.

Now, how should I approach the boy? He seems to be really rude, so I may have to reeducate him in many areas. I was told I also had to supervise his homework, so hopefully he-

"Um…" The boy came to my side and tugged at my dress.

"What is it?" He looks down for a second, but then looks up once more

"Where did you come from?" I doubt he knows what the Regent Houses are at his age. Hmm…

"I was employed in a similar place to where your father is working now. I was then tasked with taking care of you, for an undefined amount of time." The boy made another conflicted face.

"So, you were working with Dad? Is he coming home too?"

"No, I was in a similar place. I have never met your father, so I do not know whether he'll return or not." He looks down again, I suppose he must want to know of his whereabouts, but I cannot tell him that his father might not be able to come see him more than a few times a year, if at all.

"And for how long you'll stay?" Again he stares at me as his lips tremble a bit.

"I told you that I'll be with you for an undefined amount of time."

"Undefined?"

"Sigh… It means that I'll stay with you until further notice."

"So you won't leave?" His eyes shone a bit, looking at me expectantly.

"Not for the time being. I shall be keeping watch over you, so I expect you to behave accordingly." He pouted at my last words.

"You speak weird." I will have to change this rudeness of his.

"Shirogane, I would like you to address me with the proper respect. Surely you were taught how to speak to an adult?"

"Takeru." He said, rather angrily.

"Hm? What is it?"

"My name is Takeru. Don't call me Shirogane, I'm Takeru." Sigh… A kid being a kid, what did I even expect?

"Fine. Takeru, do you promise to behave correctly?"

"… Yes." He didn't sound honest and he broke eye contact.

"I'll have you know that Takeru-chan is quite the troublemaker. He's always doing something, can't keep himself quiet for a second!" Kagami-san says as she severs the dinner, some rice, miso soup and some simple vegetables with fish as a side dish. All synthetic obviously. So he's a troublemaker, my luck couldn't be worse.

Dinner was surprisingly not bad, though Kagami-san kept making up random arguments about the food's origins and some of the news that appeared on TV. I should be patrolling our residence, not being stuck here with this peasants. I finish my dinner and prepared myself to leave.

"Well, thank you for your hospitality. I shall not burden you anymore. Takeru, let us go home." He tensed up as he looked at the little girl. She was holding his hands quite tightly.

"Don't worry Sumika, we'll see each other tomorrow and go play at the park!"

"… Really?"

"Yeah!"

They seem to be close, even if he lived here for a bit more than two months. We go towards the door, he says his goodbyes after giving a hug to Sumika, and then comes towards me. I give a court nod at Kagami-san and we leave.

As we entered his house and flickered the switch on, I found a similar state to the other one. A small table with four chairs, a small TV by the wall, a small normal kitchen. So this will be my home for… for how long? Until when do I have to stay on this shack?

"Um…" The boy pulled my sleeve, looking at me worriedly.

"What is it?"

"Um… You seem sad. Are you okay?" Sad? I suppose he's more perceptive than I thought, or was I being too obvious?

"I am fine. Now then, Takeru. I was told there was a small spare room here."

"Oh, the one in the back. That's where Uncle Koetsu stayed." He points towards the hallway beyond the stairs. After following him, I find a really small room with a futon and a small wardrobe. Well, simple is best as they say.

"Takeru, where is your room?"

"Mine is up, the one by the window. I always talk with Sumika there before going to sleep." He gives me a small smile.

"Hm… I see. Well, I suppose you should head to bed, we'll check everything tomorrow." I turn around but he tugs at my sleeves again.

"Um… Can I call you Maya-nee? I always wanted to have a brother or a sister." He says as he looks at me, again with a weird glow in his eyes.

"No, you shall call me Tsukuyomi. I am not your sister."

"But you said you were like family before." He seems a bit upset as he slightly puffs his cheeks.

"No is no. You shall call me Tsukuyomi. It would be troublesome for me if people thought we were related. Now, be a good boy and go to sleep." Honestly, how rude can he be? Are all peasants like this?

He lets go of my sleeve rather dejectedly and without another word he goes towards the stairs. Sigh… I was not ready for today. I awoke on my room on the Koubuin Household, being called by Yohime-sama to a private meeting. And I'll go to sleep on a common futon on a peasant's house, made into nothing more than the nanny of a baseborn.

I sit down as I leave my bags on top of the table and bring once hand to my forehead. Where did I go wrong? Why was I sent here? This year I turn eighteen but I'm still technically a minor, if not for the special permission I got I shouldn't even be able to be here taking care of him. I should be defending my liege, not this boy. I only hope he behaves accordingly and doesn't give me much trouble. Now, let's check what's in this house, I might need to buy some new things with the money I was given.

Around a week later. 05:37 PM.

(Street.)

"Maya-nee, don't pull me!" I was again holding his wrist and taking him home by force.

He insists on calling me that. People of the neighborhood already think I'm truly his sister, or a cousin at best. He's been nothing short of a bother. His grades are bad, his attitude is awful, he's always trying to run off to a nearby park. And he hasn't learned anything about poise or respect. I have tried to teach him how to properly address people, but my efforts are wasted on this boy.

"Maya-nee, why can't we go to the park?"

"Because you're behaving horribly. You got into another fight with that Gouda yesterday at school and you failed a test. You do not deserve to go to play, we shall be studying until you have to go to sleep."

"Eeh?! Don't be mean, I'm bad at math!"

He kept complaining until we reached his house. The only good trait he has is that he eats pretty much anything without complain, though I suppose peasants do not have much choice on what they eat. This synthetic food is truly disgusting, even if it is Rank C. Even if this is a rather nice part of the Hiiragi district, it's still a far cry from anything remotely decent. Add to this all the rude peasants and it becomes hell. I can't believe people here blame the nobility for everything, they blindly believe what the media says. Such insolence…

"Guh…" Takeru was groaning as he read a book.

Much to his displeasure, I had him practice all the things he got wrong, and put him to do all of his homework too. However…

"I don't get it! This is useless!"

"Takeru, history is not something I'd call useless."

"But it's boring." With such disrespectful peasants it is no wonder our nation is crumbling. I can't believe that most people here have a bad image of the Regent Houses and the Shogunate.

We're the ones that are taking care of you, providing for your needs. Yet, they speak like the Americans, saying that we should have 'more equality and freedom'. Pah! If you wish to have privileges you have to earn them. The Shogunate and the Royal Guard are the vanguard of the Empire in many areas. Trade, research, industry, militar security, all of it is thanks to the nobility. Only a few peasants have managed to reach the intellectual level of the nobles to be admitted into college according to Father. For how much longer will I have to stand this punishment? I wish to believe Yohime-sama is using this boy as an excuse to have me here without arising suspicions, to get a clear view of our people's hearts.

Takeru is slumped on the table, pouting. He's a waste of time. Nothing more than a waste of resources and effort. I cannot understand why I was sent to take care of him, I have received no words, at all. I got some funds deposited on a bank account, but nothing else.

I shouldn't be here… I didn't train for this… I can't help but frown, grabbing the knife tighter as a feeling like having ants crawling all over me made its way to me.

"Takeru, finish your homework."

"I don't wanna. This is boring, and I have until next Wednesday anyways."

"Takeru, that is an order. Finish your homework." I send a glare at him, making him rise from the table again, but he keeps staring at me.

"It's almost eight already. I did a lot today! I really did my best!"

"No, Takeru. That is the minimal effort that is expected of you, you should always be striving to be better. Becoming complacent just because you can solve what's put in front of you is something you must not do. You have to always try to be some steps ahead, especially when it comes to your education. And your grades are horrible, you need to start scoring better numbers or you'll regret it later." I spoke seriously to him, giving him honest advice.

"That's impossible! I can't do so much homework everyday!" However, my efforts are wasted as always.

"Regardless, you have to finish this today."

"… But I'm tired." He slumps into the table again.

"Sigh… Fine, do nothing if that's what you want." Why do I even try anymore?

"… Maya-nee, are you angry?" He comes to my side as I was cutting some onions.

"No, and I told you to not address me in such manner." It's humiliating enough to have to be here, I do not want people to keep assuming I'm a peasant.

"… But you said we were like family." Sigh… If only you had one praiseworthy quality, I could see some meaning behind this.

"Takeru, I am your caretaker. And while I am here to protect you, I am not your family. Now, if you won't continue with your homework, put everything in its proper place and wait for me to finish dinner." Looking to the ground, he goes and picks up his stuff and puts everything on his bag, and then goes his way back to his room.

I turn on the news, choosing a decent channel. It seems that there's a heated discussion on which TSF the IJA is going to buy next. The F-15 versus the F-16, huh. It is an obvious choice here, the F-15 is the better machine and is close combat ready. The journalists go on and on as they debate, passing over many topics in a very simplified manner.

Well… This is about done. To think that I would settle for something so simple… Anyways, I can only do my best. I'm sure Yohime-sama wouldn't leave someone like me here for too long.

Ring! Ring!

Hm? The phone? At this hour? Who could it be?

"Hello, Shirogane residence."

"Good evening, Maya. I hope everything is fine?"

"Y-Yohime-sama! Forgive the rude greeting!" S-She called me! Finally, my new orders! Can I return at long last? I can't keep my hands from grasping the receiver tightly and close to me as they shake a tiny bit.

"Do not be so alarmed, I have taken no offense. Now, Maya. Can you tell me how have you fared until now?"

I meticulously inform her of everything that has occurred in my time here. From the important details such as Takeru's awful performance in school and his usual routine, and my and Takeru's relation with the peasants, to the more mundane ones like the peasants opinions and customs, and the attitude of the boy towards my teaching efforts.

"I see. I thank you for your efforts, Maya. Please be more patient with the boy, I can sense you're displeased with him but do not let that get in the way of your work." She says with her kind, silky tone.

"Yes, Yohime-sama. However, allow me to ask you. Until when will I stay here? When will another caretaker be sent?"

"No other caretakers will be going there, Maya. Why do you ask this?" Her tone changed to an astonished one.

"I was referring to my stay here, my liege. When will I return to my post in the Royal Guard?"

"Maya, you seem to be misunderstanding something. You won't be returning to the Guard."

Huh? I must… I must have heard that wrong.

"Excuse me, Yohime-sama. Did you just say I won't be returning to the Guard?"

"Yes, that is what I said. You're Takeru's caretaker. I won't send a replacement nor will I call you back." Her words left me apalled. I'm no longer… I'm no longer…

My shoulders dropped, the cold cascade again fell on me. Despite having my glasses on, my vision grew blurry. I parted my lips but no sound came out from them.

"Maya, I entrusted you this duty. I believe you're the most fitting person for this task, so please do not be so shocked." She said in a matter-of-fact way, almost… almost as if she were scolding me.

"… Why? Why have I been sent to be a peasant's caretaker? Was I not trained to be one of your guardians?" Please, tell me. If you give me a reason… If I failed to meet your expectations, then I'll surrender to my fate. But please…

"Maya, please be calm. You seem to have taken offense at this mission so allow me to tell you, you should not be ashamed of this, for it is a task I can only ask of you. Now, my time is running short.

Do not worry about money, I will be sending you the same amount every month. Do take care of the boy. That shall be all. Goodbye, Maya."

She was clearly upset. I angered her. Something she can only ask of me? Something only a reject of the Guard could do? No other member of the Guard would disgrace its name with this task.

The dead tone resonated from the receiver and into me as I stood there in silence. After a few moments, I put it back and went to the table. Slumping into a chair, I buried my face between my arms, hitting the table with my chin. The ants again start crawling all over my back, I quiver in place trying to bite back the frustration.

I'm not even worth a confirmation. For someone of the Tsukuyomi family to be such a failure… They must want to erase my records, leave no trace of this unworthy student. All I'm good for is to be the nanny of a peasant. When? When did I make a miss?

Drawing a long breath I somehow calm myself. It could be worse. I could be dead. Or sent as a 'comfort corporal' to a base. All I have to do is deal with the boy. But, what about his father? Why hasn't he come to take care of him? Maybe the man… asked for me? Was I sent here as his next spouse? The idea made me clench my fists in anger.

… No, banish the thought out of your head. I'll never allow a peasant to lay a finger on me, much less the father of that crude boy. I'm not… I'm not…

"Maya-nee?" Looking to my left, I saw Takeru looking at me, eyes downwards and worry painted all across his face.

"S-Sorry. I was just resting my eyes. Dinner is ready, allow me to-"

"You're lying." He said glaring at me, slowly getting a bit closer.

"Takeru, it is rude to interrupt people when they're talking. Haven't I told you that?"

"You're crying. Are you hurt?" He didn't budge and remained looking at me with worry. He's right, however. For me to be so weak to shed tears… Maybe Yohime-sama saw this weakness of mine and that's why she sent me away? A blade that bends so easily cannot be trusted, perhaps.

"That is none of your concern. Come on, let's have dinner." I stand up and try to go to the kitchen, but Takeru stops me as he grabs my arm. "Takeru, let me go. I cannot serve us our food if you-"

"I do care." He says as he pulls my arm, clearly angry this time.

"What?"

"You said I didn't care, but I do. Why were you crying?" His tiny hands grasp my arm tightly. Sigh… Don't make this more difficult.

"As I said, you shouldn't worry about that. Let go off me, now."

He slowly lets go of my arm, but after that he hugged my waist, laying his head on my stomach. I try to release me from him, but she grabs my dress strongly, not wanting to let go

"Takeru, stop this foolishness at once. If you don't, I will have to hit you." You're usually a bother, but this is too much. All because of you… If you weren't here…

"Maya-nee, why are you sad?" He looks up at me, furrowing his brows. Why does he care? It's because of you that I'm…

"I am not. And for the last time, I am not your sister. Takeru, let go off me. Now." I push his face away, but he starts struggling.

"I won't let go until you tell me." His tiny hands tug at me with surprising vigor.

Why do I have to waste my time with you? Why won't you listen?! I always… I trained… I lived for… I didn't spend my whole life training… to end up as the servant of a coarse peasant!

"I told you to release me!" I raise my hand and slap his face away. He falls back with a loud thud, the sound making me conscious of what I just did.

I smacked him seriously. I hit a children. There was no reason for me to do so, I could have got him off me easily without resorting to violence. The ants again crawl on my back as I shudder.

I'm calm and composed all the time, I didn't knew I could… Yohime-sama must have seen through me, she must have noticed during my bouts with Mana how I bottled up my feelings, how someday they would release, and decided that I wasn't fit to be on the Guard.

If I snap so easily, and at a children no less, how could I ever protect Yuuhi-sama? Or anyone of the Koubuin family? I always thought it was my best trait, that I could remain cool regardless of the situation I was confronted with, and yet now… I truly am not fit to be on the Guard. I'm… When did I…

Takeru was rubbing his cheek on the floor. As I tried to take a step towards him, my throat dried up. He looked at me trembling as tears started to come out of his eyes. I tried to speak up, to move towards him, and yet my body didn't react to my commands. Until the noise pierced my ears.

"Oooh… Waaaaaaaaaaah!"

He started crying, quite strongly at that. W-What do I do? How do I calm him down? A stinger struck on my heart, making my chest hurt. I go to his side and I place my hands on his shoulder, telling him to calm down. However no words seem to reach him.

All I was taught to do was to get results. I was trained in every thing a Royal Guard or a retainer might need to know. Dealing with sad children is not something I was taught, feelings were never part of the equation. I was not taught how to overcome this kind of situation. I learned how to aid others in case they were troubled, but it was related to my mission in the Guard. How to guide Yuuhi-sama, or the Mitsurugi girl, to her full potential, to support her from the shadows, and to be her consultant when she needed advice.

However, I was never taught to deal with a crying children. I can't just send him to sleep. I can't just tell him to stop crying, and there is no advice to give him. What… What can I do for him? Is this… the trait that I lack? Am I too cold to be a retainer?

"Takeru, please… forgive me. I didn't truly wish… to hurt you. Please don't cry."

"Oooh…. Waaaaaahh!" He remains on the ground, crying nonstop.

What can I tell him now? My mind searches pointlessly for words, my arms feel heavy all of a sudden. I wasn't trained for this. I… How can I calm him down? There isn't a surefire way to… Wait… Right before I hit him, he was…

I slowly sit by his side and wrap my hands around him, pulling him to me. He puts his tiny hands around my neck as he continues to sob. I never really gave a hug to anyone so I don't know if this is enough to calm him down, but I have no other idea right now. I'm such a failure… to release my frustration onto a child…

"Takeru, it's alright. Please don't cry, I won't hit you again. Please… forgive me."

"Maya-nee, are you going to leave too?" He didn't break our embrace, so I could hear his tattered voice right on my ear. I do not wish to cause him more pain, and I'm not going back it seems.

"No, I am not leaving anywhere."

"Liar." He sniffed, I patted his head and broke our hug, bringing him to face me.

"Takeru, I won't be-"

"You said you wanted to go somewhere on the phone." He looked at me, hands and eyes shaking.

… He was listening? I doubt he knows what the Royal Guard is but… He must have heard me complaining about him. He may have seen how apalled I was after the call. Is that why he approached me?

"See? You're leaving, right?" He clawed at my dress, and once more tears ran down his cheeks. I gulped as I closed my eyes. I have to give him some reassurance, I did enough wrongs today. I clear my throat and speak up in my usual, calm tone.

"Takeru, I am-"

"Is it because I'm bad? Do you hate me?" He kept staring at me worriedly as his voice seemed to break again.

"No, it's… Sigh… It is true that you leave much to be desired. But I-"

"Please don't leave!" His scream froze me mid speech, I couldn't look away from his pleading eyes as he cried, grabbing my dress. "I-I'll get better! I'll study more! So please don't leave!" His voice was muddied by the tears, his hands trembled on me. The stinger fell deeper, making my chest hurt more with every word he uttered.

I was careless to say I wanted to leave on the phone, but I never expected him to be listening. But what can I… D-Don't look at me like that.

"T-Takeru, I'm not going anywhere. So don't cry anymore." I pat his head, talking to him slowly. But his tears don't stop and he doesn't let go.

"Dad said the same. A-And he left too."

"Your father will come back."

"When?" A knot forms on my neck as his eyes stared right back at me. "See? He left too." His tears fall down unrestrained.

I have no idea where his father is. For all I know, he might really be dead. Then, what can I do? He doesn't seem to be listening.

"Takeru, I don't know where your father is, but I am not leaving."

"Liar! Mom said the same, Dad said the same. You're gonna leave me too! Ooh… Waaaaaaaah!"

I once more try to hug him, but his wailing doesn't stop. His trembling frame on my arms, how sad he sounds… How did I not notice this? How did I not see how sad he was?

During this week we spent together I wasn't truly looking at him. I'm sure there were signs in his behavior, signs I didn't pick up. No, the very first day… He asked me if I was going to leave him. And he insisted on treating me like his sister, he always did everything he could to go play with his friends. It was in plain sight, he didn't want to feel alone. And all I did… was push him away. And yet, he still worried about me after hearing me wanting to leave him, and then I harmed him. I… I truly am a failure if I couldn't see something so obvious, letting my frustration control me.

"Takeru, it's alright. I'm not leaving you." He looks at me, his eyes made a tempestuous ocean.

"R-Really? You promise?"

"Y-Yes, I promise. I won't go anywhere. So please, calm down."

He again hugs me, but his sobbing is now more calmer. I don't know how much time passed, I just remained hugging him, sitting on the ground, stroking his hair slowly in silence as the stinger drove itself into my heart. At some point I also had to start taking breaths to calm myself down.

"Takeru? Have you calmed down?" He nods. "Forgive me. I didn't… mean to hurt you. I am not used to… well, dealing with other's feelings."

"So you won't leave?" He breaks our hug and looks at me, his eyes reddened as the mark of my hand on his cheek.

"No, I will stay with you. C-Can you forgive me for hitting you? I swear I will never harm you again."

"Yes." He said between sobs, and then he moves back and rubs his eyes slowly.

"Well… Let me go warm our food. Please wait a moment."

He didn't speak up, not even when I served him his food. We ate in an awkward silence, since I'm now used to him always talking about something at the table. When he finished he took his plate to the sink, and then came to my side hesitantly.

"Um… Thanks for the food, Maya-nee."

"I-It is alright. It's my duty to take care of you." I never thought talking to a child could be so hard.

"Um… You really won't leave?" His eyes again locked on mine.

"No, I'm not leaving." He took a step forward, rising his tiny fists up and spoke up with a creaking voice.

"I… I'll get better. I'll really study more, and I won't fail any more tests! So… So please…"

"Takeru." He flinched when I addressed him with my usual tone as I tapped my glasses.

"Y-Yes?"

I shouldn't chase after dead ends. Yohime-sama was clear, I am not returning to the Guard. Even if I mend my mistakes, even if I grow from this experience, she may already have made her decision. So… If I am to remain here, I shall perform my orders to the best of my abilities. For a Tsukuyomi, failing like this is nothing short of a punishment in and of itself. However… I found a stain on me. And I do not like this side of myself I saw today.

So, my first step to overcome it is to help him honestly. I pat his head and return his stare. I am his retainer and guardian, regardless of who he is I have to try my best. And… baseborn or not, I was trained to protect my fellows, I won't keep dirtying the Tsukuyomi name with my inexcusable behavior.

"If you wish to get better, you can rely on me. I am here to take care of you, I am your guardian. So, forgive me for harming you today. Let us do our best together from tomorrow on." His eyes regain a bit of light as he nods.

"Yes, I'll do my best. So… Can I keep calling you Maya-nee?" His stare again changes to one of worry. I suppose… that trying to give him some emotional support is going to be my first real challenge.

"Yes, you can. I… will not object to you calling me that."

"R-Really?"

"Y-Yes, really. You can… refer to me as your sister, Takeru." He jumped at me, hugging me tightly again.

"T-Thanks, Maya-nee! I love you!" He may be a kid… But it's still embarrassing to hear him say that so honestly.

"A-Alright, it's fine already. Calm down, please?" He nodded and let go. "It's really late, so you go to sleep. I'll clean the plates. Even if tomorrow is Sunday, you shouldn't stay up late. So, don't cry anymore. I will remain with you."

"Yes, I won't cry. So you don't cry anymore, Maya-nee. A-And if you feel sad, just tell me. I'll give you lots of hugs when you feel bad." Hugs? Did his mother gave him hugs when he was sad? I… suppose physical contact does work as a form of reassurance.

"Takeru, why do you like hugs so much?"

He looks at me confused at first and then rather annoyed, and puffing his cheeks he answered something I did not expect him to say.

"Because that's how I can give you my love so that you can feel better." Wha… What did he just…

"L-Love? Takeru, why do you… No, who taught you of this?"

"Dad did." Ugh, what was the man even thinking?! "Dad told me that hugs give people the power of love, and that I should give hugs to the people I like to give them strength when they're sad." Huh? Strength? Was this his father's way of cheering him up?

"And you'll give me strength when I feel sad?" Such a childish idea. Though I suppose that for them their families and friends are all they have. But still…

"Yes, because I love you." He doesn't even know what he's saying, but even so I deserve no sign of affection from him. How can you show me kindness after I… "You're always talking with me, you always cook super good things for me, you help me with my homework and you're my sister! So I don't want to see you sad. A-And I will do my best in school too! So please smile, Maya-nee." Is he… praising me? Despite his shivering frame, he still looked at me with the same kind light his eyes had all these days.

"Smiling is… something I don't do. I do thank you for your compliments." It is nice to hear he isn't ungrateful. I suppose he was taught a good thing or two. Despite what I did to him… he still…

"But you never smile and you always look so sad. And after the call you were crying. Why? Did someone you like go away?" Go away? He did say that he didn't want me to leave him… Is he talking about death, perhaps? Did his mother cry in front of him before passing away?

"No, no one has left. But… Why do you ask that?"

"Because Mom cried a lot when Grandma left somewhere, and Dad cried a lot when Mom didn't come back from the hospital. They took me to this really weird place and there was a rock with Mom's name. Dad told me she went with Grandma." His tone changed and grew small, as it was clearly painful to him to say this things. I slowly stroke his hair for a brief moment.

"Takeru, do not worry. I was… merely shocked. It was a grave mistake on my part to have harmed you. Can you forgive me?"

"Yes. So… You really won't leave?"

"No, I will keep living with you here. Don't worry, I'm not going anywhere."

"And you're not sad or angry?" I give him a nod. I won't falter again, I will not let my temper hinder my judgment ever again. And I definitely won't harm you or let you cry again.

"I am not. Now, let's go to your room." I grab his hand and we go to the stairs together. He grabbed my hand very tightly and leaned on my arm. He refused to let go and asked me to stay by his side until he fell asleep. I remain by his side, softly stroking the cheek I hit him with the back of my hand.

I can't believe myself… Takeru, I'm sorry. I won't… I will do a better job in taking care of you. Regardless of my standing, I have a mistake to mend.

A Saturday around month later. 07:12 AM.

(Takeru's House.)

---

Breakfast is almost ready. The news drone on the same usual stuff with their anti-nobility propaganda. How do the common folk not get tired of these blatant operations?

"Takeru, breakfast is ready."

Why isn't he answering? I already woke him up. Sigh… Is he upset that I made him do so much homework yesterday? I go to his room and knock on the door, but he doesn't answer. I open it, and yet I'm met with an empty room showered by the light that comes from the window.

"Takeru? Is he asleep again?" I go towards his bed but… those are just his sheets and pillows tucked together.

I look inside his closet, under the bed. He's not here. W-Where did he go?!

… Did he run away? What am I… What will I do if anything happens to him?! I have to find him! No, deep breaths Maya. Maybe he went to the Kagami's house because he was bored.

As I go down the stairs, just before I went to grab the keys, I noticed the door to the backyard was slightly open. As I went towards it, I could hear something hitting the ground. Looking into the backyard from the opening, I saw Takeru holding a wooden sword, one that was too big for his tiny hands, trying to swing it very awkwardly.

"Takeru, what are you doing?" He flinches at my words, as he turns to look at me I see him tense up and his hands trembling a bit.

"N-Nothing. Just playing outside."

"And when did I allow you to do so?" I say, tapping my glasses. He looks down to the ground, as he speaks up in a low tone.

"… You didn't told me I couldn't go outside." Sigh… Takeru being Takeru. At least tell me you're going outside.

"So, you were playing with a sword?"

"Y-Yes." He averts his eyes, slightly moving the wooden blade to a side.

What am I gonna do with this kid? Imagine what he could do with this if he took it with him somewhere. I can see him attacking someone in one of his random fits of anger.

"Takeru, give me that sword. I do not know where you got it, but you have to give it back." He takes some steps backwards, hiding the blade behind him.

"No, it's mine." He says firmly, returning an angry glare.

"Takeru, do not lie. I know there is no such thing in this house, breakfast's ready too so hand that over to me now." Why, you're always causing trouble. I'll have to lock the backdoor too. I can't believe I made such a miss for so long. What would I do if you got hurt with that thing?

"I'm not lying, Dad left it for me!" He pouts at me, puffing his cheeks. His father?

"What are you saying? Did your father practice kendo?"

"Kendo?" His looks at me curiously as he tilts his head sideways. He doesn't even know what that is?

"I'm asking you whether your father knew how to use a sword."

"Oh! Yes, he did. He told me that Uncle Koetsu taught him when they were in school. He said that he thought that the samurai rangers were really awesome, and that's why he learned to use a sword." He says with a smile. Are this 'samurai rangers' the Royal Guard? So his father admired them, huh. I thought he would be like the rest here, who despise the nobility.

"So, you admire the samurais? Did your father also look up to them?"

"Yeah! He told me once that the blue ones are the smartest and strongest people in the Empire! And that the purple Grandpa is the one that takes care of all of us!" Did he just…

"Takeru, you can't call the Shogun a purple Grandpa. It is extremely rude and unproper to refer to our ruler in such a way." How did you get raised to end up like this? Going from admiring the Guard to badmouthing the Shogun… That's par for the course for you, I guess.

"But he looks like a Grandpa and is always dressed in purple…" I tap my glasses again, making him flinch.

"Takeru! I do not wish to hear you saying that again, understood?" He nods nervously twice. At least he listens sometimes now. "Anyways, breakfast is done. Let us go back inside." He looks at me fidgeting a bit.

"You won't take my sword away?" Sigh… Why did his father left him that blade anyways? Did he not think all the problems it could cause? I mean, I'm sure he knew his son better than me.

"No, I will not. Come on, let's go." I go up to him, grab his hand and take him inside again.

As I took him to the bathroom to wash his hands, I noticed his arms were full of bruises again. I didn't see those when he got back from school yesterday.

"Takeru, where did you get hurt like this?" He looks away pouting as he drops his wooden blade near a wall.

"… I was practicing and fell over."

"Why were you practicing with it? Do you want to learn to use a blade?" He looks at me as we enter the bathroom, eyes shining.

"… Maya-nee, do you think that I'll see Dad again if I'm good with a sword?"

"Why do think that?"

"Dad told me he was going to fight with the samurai rangers, and that only people that are reaaallyyyy good with a sword can go with them." So that's what he told him about his induction in the Royal Guard. "So if I'm good, do you think I'll be able to see Dad again?"

… The chances of him joining the Guard are nonexistent, with his bad attitude and average skills. Yet, who am I to crush his dream?

"Maybe, if you train enough. But just like with your homework, if you don't put in effort daily you won't truly excel at it."

He washes his hands, looking to be thinking about something. Hmm… Couldn't I use this to motivate him a little more? It's not like I lose anything by trying.

"Say Takeru, would you like me to train you?"

"Huh? Train?" He closes the water and looks at me confused.

"I could teach you how to use a blade properly. That way, you could get closer to seeing your father again."

"Really?!" He comes up to me, staring at me with stars in his eyes. It took some effort to speak up under his gaze.

"Yes, but only if you promise to be a good boy, do your history homework and reread your lessons everyday with me. What do you say?"

"Yes, I'll do it! Thank you, Maya-nee. I love you!" He jumps at me and hugs me tightly.

How many times have I told you to stop doing this? He seems to be truly happy… so I suppose I can let this go this time. I certainly didn't expect him to start showing his thankfulness in this way. I pat his head slowly as he looks up at me.

"Alright, you can release me now. We can start your training after we eat."

"Yes, I'll do my best!"

We went to the table and as usual he devoured everything in his plate. Now he looked honestly happy, unlike the first week were he was happy but also somewhat sad, and I didn't got a clue. I suppose I could try to teach him the basics of swordsmanship, but I should take it slowly. I do not think he could learn how to fight with the necessary skill, he's too rough, has not an ounce of grace on him, and with his temper I cannot see him being able to attain the mindset needed to truly master the sword. But it might do him good to learn what discipline is. And I prefer him when he smiles like this, even if it means more hugs.

"Thanks for the food." He says as he finishes and then leans back on his chair, eyes closed.

"It's good to see you never lose your appetite."

"Um… Maya-nee, you really will help me train?" He again stared at me with those glowy eyes again.

"Yes, I shall train you. But I expect you to be serious about it and to keep your promises. Are we clear?"

"Yes! Thank you, Maya-nee."

"Now, let's go to the backyard." He nodded in excitement as he followed behind me.

Though, it is a relief to have learned that his father saw the nobility with good eyes. I suppose they did check his background before inducting him. Takeru will eventually have to serve in the army too once he gets older if the situation doesn't improve, so this might be a nice chance to give him a head start.

---

A few hours later…

---

"Sei! Hya!" Takeru cried as he kept swinging the sword.

… I can't believe my eyes. He's… He's good. At first, he was truly rough, his movements were as unconnected as they could get, his footing was nonexistent, yet after seeing me move twice and heeding my advice… By the late afternoon, he's already following a pattern on his slashes, his steps now are somewhat coordinated, even if his overall stance is still rough. He learns fast but most importantly…

"Urya!"

He doesn't seem to want to stop. Determination is the core of everything, but it alone isn't enough. Yet… Seeing him right now, swinging that sword despite how tired he seems to be, I somehow think I might have lacked motivation when I started. However, as his guardian, I have to prevent him from overworking himself.

"Takeru, this is enough for today. You did very good for a first day." He smiles at me as he comes closer.

"Really? So, you'll keep training me?"

"I suppose. Will you start studying history seriously?" I tap my glasses, which is something that usually scares him, but this time he smiles widely at me, stars filling his eyes.

"Yes! I'll do it!" How odd, to see him so motivated. But it is good, I found his trigger.

"Then we have our deal. I shall train you, Takeru."

"Thanks, Maya-nee!" And again he hugs me. W-Well, if it makes him happy…

"Well, let's go back inside. You need a bath and I have to prepare dinner."

He nods and we return inside. It truly is surprising, he does have potential to be a decent swordsman. That alone is not enough to join the Guard, but I suppose that it's enough to keep him motivated. He has been doing an effort to study more so with this I'll round up all of his weak points. Fixing his manners does seem to be an impossible ordeal though. Sigh… If only he could show a tiny bit of respect… Well, he's still a kid. I'm sure he'll change once he matures.

Ring! Ring!

"Hello, Shirogane residence." I said as I picked up the receiver, but the voice who replied was one I certainly didn't expect.

"Maya, is that you?"

"M-Mana?! Why are you calling?!"

"Why are you so surprised? D-Did I call at a bad time?" She sounds concerned as she spoke in a hushed tone.

"No, it is fine. But why are you calling me?"

"Ahem… Well, Yohime-sama ordered me to call for you. She wishes you to return to the Main House tomorrow."

"… Huh? She wants me… back in Osaka?"

"Yes, that is what she said. I wasn't told of where you were or what you were doing, but I suppose it must be an important mission. I'll be waiting for you at the train station with a limo, just tell me at which hour you-"

"Mana, I'm… I wish to speak with Yohime-sama, if it's possible."

"Um… She's in a meeting right now. I was told to get confirmation from you, so will you call us back or-"

"I have a… report for Yohime-sama. I wish to tell her of this before I return." What am I saying? Why… do I feel the stinger on my heart again?

"Understood. I will inform her of it. And, you're alright I hope?" Always so kind. Now that I think about it, she might have been a better fit to be his retainer than me. No, that would have meant me staying with Yuuhi-sama. Sigh… She was better after all.

"I am fine, yes. How is Shion?"

"No changes. She's still beating Mion soundly and is still giving us quite many problems. You were the only one she ever listened to, so she's been very quick to show her anger as of late." That is nice to hear. Shion coming out clearly on top is a good sign, even if her temper is still giving her problems.

"Thanks for the data. Well, I shall be awaiting my call. Goodbye, Mana."

"Yes, goodbye." She hangs up and I rest the receiver down.

… Why did I refuse to go back? Because of Takeru? I mean… I just found a way to motivate him, he's showing decent results on his studies, and today's training was…

His crying face resurfaces within. The stinger picks at me, making me bite my lips.

I promised I wouldn't leave him alone. Despite how much I loathed being here, he taught me a valuable lesson and he has been doing an earnest effort to be better. And… I do not like it when he cries, and if I leave he will cry like that again. It is most foolish, I resented this from the very beginning and now that I have been given the chance to return to my old life…

No, all these days we've spent together left a mark in me. All that came before that should stay aside, for I must decide whether I wish to… to remain here with him. I mean, if I was called back to Osaka there are two different outcomes. One, she's calling for me to pick up my belongings and to never return, or she wants me back in the Guard.

But in the second, what will happen to Takeru? My trembling shoulders, my tense breathing… I let out a sigh as I drop my shoulders. Why do I feel a knot on my chest? Why can't I stop tightening my lips?

Deep breaths. I will worry about that when-

Ring! Ring!

Seems like now's the time.

"Hello?"

"Hello, Maya. Mana told me you had a report for me?" Despite her voice sounding with her usual silky tone, I could feel a hint of annoyance lurking behind.

"Yes, Yohime-sama. I wished to inform you of what has transpired since our last talk." I told her of what happened this weeks, yet I couldn't bring myself to tell her that I hit him.

"And Maya, why is this worthy of my attention?"

"B-Because you're calling me back to Osaka, my liege. What will happen to Takeru while I'm gone?"

"I thought you didn't want to be there?" She replied instantly, showing her blade through every word.

"… It is true that I did resent this mission you've given me at first. But these days I've begun to see some merits in the boy. I believe he may be worth the effort. As I said, he adapted very quickly to my teachings these last few weeks. And, if I were to leave, who would take care of him? Will his father come back?" Her tone remained slow, but now I felt no anger in her.

"So, am I right to assume you wish to remain as his retainer?"

"I… I just wish to know who-"

"Maya, if I ordered you to return to your duties in the Guard right away, what would you answer?"

… Is there no middle ground available? Isn't this an irony? If… If it's one or the other, then this is my chance to return to-

"Please don't leave me!" His voice echoed within me, making me clench my fists bitterly as I bit my lower lip softly.

He taught me much, he isn't an ungrateful boy like the other peasants, to leave him alone… The damage it would do to him… I…

"Yohime-sama."

"Yes?"

"Are you… telling me to choose between returning to the Guard or remaining as his retainer?"

"That shall be enough, Maya." Eh? What is she- "I shall be expecting you to visit me tomorrow. I wish to speak with you here. You can bring the boy if you wish. That is all."

"W-Wait, Yohime-sama. What do you-"

"Maya, you shall remain as the retainer of Takeru. However, allow me to tell you that I used your doubts to test you. You were never kicked out of the Royal Guard."

"Huh?! T-Then, why was I sent here?!"

"I shall answer that question tomorrow. Well then, I will be expecting you two. Goodbye, Maya." She hung up before I could interject.

I was never… kicked out? That means… I lashed out to him unnecessarily? I put the receiver in place, breathing a large sigh.

What a fool I was. I truly was blinded by my pride. In a way, this might have been for the best. If I ever had to deal with peasants I would have reacted very aggressively to them. But now that I got to see and interact with them, I can see them a bit differently. And more importantly, I learned that just because I thought I was better doesn't mean I actually am.

Takeru is in a way stronger than me. From his eyes, he lost all of his family and when I hit him instead of growing resentful, he tried to apologize for a wrong he didn't commit, and once I started to properly support him he began to show results. He's also very kind, most of the time I have to go make him sleep, if I don't he would just stay talking with Sumika all night long. The Kagami already know Sumika's father died during an accident on his base, and Takeru is always keeping her company. He's also lonely and yet he's always doing his best to make others smile. Giving others strength with the power of love, huh. As foolish as it sounds, he does seems to be able to do just that.

Well, enough introspection for today. Dinner has to be made, and tomorrow we have to go to…

For the Holy Emperor, I have to take Takeru to the Main House. He's going… He's going to go around greeting people like he usually does, maybe even giving them hugs. No, what am I going to do when he calls me sister?! Considering what I heard of Shion, if she hears him calling me Maya-nee or sees him hugging me… or both…

"Sigh… Tomorrow will be a tough day…"

---

The Next Day. A bit over noon.

(Osaka Train Station.)

---

"So, where are we going Maya-nee?"

"Takeru, please. I told you to not call me that for today." He pouts again. What am I gonna do with you?

"But you're Maya-nee. And where are we going?"

"Sigh… We're going to meet the person that sent me to be your caretaker. So please be polite and behave well. If you don't I won't train you."

"Eh?! Why?"

"No more questions. You be a good boy today, yes?" He seems troubled as he gazes at me but he gives a nod.

We leave the station and I look for either a limo or Mana. Nothing's on sight. Maybe they're still not here?

"Maya-nee!" Takeru pulls at my sleeve.

"Takeru, I told you to-"

"Look! A samurai ranger!" Hm? What did he-

I see towards where he's pointing and see Mana walking to us dressed in her red dress of the Guard. Compared to her, I must look like a… No, banish those thoughts.

"Long time no see, Mana. We're ready to depart." I greet her as she got closer, but her eyes weren't focused on me. Is she… Is she blushing?

"Maya… Who is that?" She spoke in a hushed tone, staring at Takeru.

"Hm? You weren't told of him? He's Takeru Shirogane, am I currently his retainer. Takeru, introduce yourself."

"I'm Takeru. Who are you?"

"Takeru…" I tap my glasses, he flinches and gives Mana a bow.

"M-My name is Takeru Shirogane. Who would you be?" Finally. See? It's not that hard to be polite.

"… I'm Mana Tsukuyomi, I'm a cousin of Maya. It's a pleasure to meet you, Takeru." Mana spoke to him softly, smiling and blushing all the while. What is wrong with her?

"You're Maya-nee's cousin? Maya-nee, are you a samurai ranger?!" He looks at me with stars in his eyes. I told you to not call me that! Sigh… Takeru being Takeru.

"Sigh… Yes, one that was recruited not so long ago." His eyes widen as I see a galaxy on them. It's… surprisingly hard to endure his glistening gaze of adoration.

"Maya-nee?" Mana looked at me in shock, with her mouth slightly open.

"Ahem… You see, Mana. Takeru likes to address people informally, and despite my best efforts he does not want to change his ways of speaking. He also decided to call me that and no amount of scolding could change his decision." I tap my glasses as I spoke. Mana switched glances from Takeru to me.

"I see. Well, let us go to the limo. This way." I nod, and grabbing Takeru's hand we go towards our ride.

We enter and we start making our way towards the Main House. Takeru tried to stare out the window, but I grabbed him and kept him in place. With two rows of seats opposite to each other, Mana was in front of us giving her back to the driver, as I tried to keep Takeru in place.

"So, Maya. Can you explain to me what is the reason for you being his retainer?" Mana seems… weird. She was slightly leaning forward, clearly staring at Takeru.

"I wasn't told. Yohime-sama said she would explain that today."

"Well… Takeru, do you like living with Maya?" He drew a big smile and, without surprise, he hugged me again.

"Yes! Maya-nee is the best sister ever!"

"… Sister?" Why is Mana looking at him with that weird glow on her eyes?

"Y-You see, he said he wished to have a sister, so I agreed to let him call me that."

"… So Takeru, can you come here?" Mana patted the side of her seat and Takeru slowly made his way to her. She started to stroke his hair with a smile as she gazed at him. "Takeru, can you tell me how's your life?"

He nods and starts telling her of what he usually does. Surprisingly, he said only good things about me. It is… truly nice to hear him describe me as someone 'awesome'.

"And yesterday she taught me how to use a sword!"

"Oh, I see. So you want to learn swordsmanship?"

"Kendo." He corrected her instantly.

"Yes, indeed. Say Takeru, can we be friends?"

"Yes! Let's be friends, Mana-nee!" Sigh… Of course he would call her that. The boys knows no-

"Ah! How cute!" Mana's reaction left me speechless. Her face filled with flowers, she stroke Takeru's cheek with a wide smile on her face.

"Mana-nee, it tickles! S-Stop…"

"Oh, did that tickle? Forgive me, Takeru. Say, can I be your sister too?"

"Yes! So I can call you Mana-nee?"

"Why, of course you can!"

"Thank you!" Takeru went and gave her a hug.

"Just look at you. What a cute, soft, little cinnamon roll you are." She tightened her hug as she pulled Takeru closer.

"M-Mana-nee, it hurts…" Reacting to his words, she loosened her grip on him, but didn't let him go.

"Takeru, are you alright? Sorry, I didn't mean to hurt you." She spoke to him softly, slowly stroking his cheek.

"Y-Yes… But you hug to strongly. Hugs have to be soft, you can't give people your love like that!" He scolds her, pouting. He had to go and say it. Sigh…

"… Giving love?" Mana's eyes shone with a weird glow again. Takeru then explains her the same he said to me. "I see. Then, can you show me how to give a hug properly?"

"Takeru." I sent him a glare, tapping my glasses. Then, I pat my side. Takeru comes to my side again as Mana sent me a bothered glare.

"Are you angry, Maya-nee?"

"No, I am not."

"You look angry though."

"Takeru, I am not upset. That being said… Mana, a Royal Guard cannot act in such a way. Please, do try to behave according to your rank." She returned the glare, just as she did during our bouts.

"Maya, I am just being friendly with little Takeru." What is going on here? Why is she acting like this with him? "So Takeru, can you teach me how to hug?" He looks at me, I let out a sigh and give him a nod.

Takeru goes again to Mana's side, as she smiled widely. He put his hands over her neck, and just like he does with me he slowly tightened his grip. "See? This way it doesn't hurt." Takeru's innocent voice contrasted with Mana's flushed face, she looks like she's in Heaven right now. What… is wrong with her?

"Y-Yes, you're right. You're so smart, Takeru." As Takeru broke the hug she started petting him, smiling like a fool. "You're so cute…"

"Takeru." I call him as I tap my glasses, he flinches and comes back to my side.

"He's a very good boy. You must be so happy to be with him, Maya." Mana smiled sweetly at Takeru. I didn't knew she was like this.

"Yes, he has been making good efforts everyday."

"I was referring to receiving his hugs though. Sigh… I want a cute little brother too." Her shoulders dropped as she kept gazing at Takeru.

"You want… to have a brother?"

"Yes, just look at how cute he is! Mion is a good girl, but she's too polite. She's always so stiff and formal with me. And even if I have had to look after her since you left, Shion is… well, you know." I nod slowly in acknowledgment "I would like to have a cute brother like the ones in the mangas. I mean look at how affectionate he is! I couldn't get Mion to give me a hug even if I asked her." She now looks genuinely sad. Considering how much she works… I suppose everybody has their own ticks.

"And what is this about manga?" Mana slowly strokes her hair as she looks up.

"Well, it's one of my hobbies. Reading cute mangas is one of the few things that I use to loosen up. You do not have hobbies?"

"Cooking, I guess? In my case, I just rather read a history book if given the choice." Mana sighs shaking her head.

"That does sound like you. But well… Ever since I've started reading manga, I started to want to have a more affectionate relation with Mion, but Father is teaching her very harshly since she never wins against Shion. You have no idea how jealous I am…" She said as she gazed at Takeru, who was now hugging my arm again.

After some more time the car stops, signaling our arrival at the Main House. We got out from the limo and passed through the gates after the security checkup. As we approached the building Takeru gazed at the place in wonder.

"Maya-nee, why do they have a pond there?"

"It's for decoration, Takeru."

We arrived at the main entrance to the house, where a few guards in black greeted us. Behind them right besides the door were Father and Shion waiting for us.

"Welcome back, Maya."

"Good afternoon, Father. How have you fared since we last spoke?"

"I have been fine, mostly. Let us go inside." He shot a glare at Takeru, who was holding my hand. Of course they wouldn't approve of him. As we went inside, Shion kept looking at me and Takeru with a frown on her face and fire lurking within her eyes. I knew they wouldn't see him well, but then, why was I sent to him?

We reach the head's room and Father nods at me. I go to the door, and taking one last breath, blinking a few times, I open it and go inside along Takeru. Within the room Yohime-sama was waiting for us, and sitting besides her was Yuuhi-sama. Both of them wearing a matching white and cyan dress.

I go in front of them and bow, petting Takeru's head to make him do the same.

"I have returned, Yohime-sama."

"Good afternoon, Maya. You may sit." I do so and Takeru sits by my side, looking at them curiously. Please, don't say anything rude.

"First, you're Takeru Shirogane, right?"

"Y-Yes." He looks at her in awe, maybe she reminds him of his mother? "W-Who would you be?" Sigh… He did it, for once.

"I am Yohime Koubuin. I'm the one who sent Maya to you, and this is my daughter. Yuuhi, dear, introduce yourself." Yuuhi-sama gives Takeru a bow before speaking up softly.

"My name is Yuuhi Koubuin. I am pleased to make your acquaintance, Shirogane-sama." Perfect. So graceful, so serene…. Yuuhi-sama is truly a wonderful example of-

"Don't call me Shirogane, my name is Takeru!" Aah! He had to do it!

"Takeru, do not be rude!"

"But my name is Takeru. Yuuhi got it wrong." He pouted as he crossed his arms.

One thing is to scold her because you don't like to be called by your surname, but you can't call Yuuhi-sama by her name without any honorifics.

"Takeru, you shall address Yuuhi-sama with the proper respect." He narrows his eyes at me, pout still in place.

"But she isn't an adult."

"Takeru…" I tap my glasses, making him flinch.

"Now, Maya. There is no need to scold the boy so."

"Yohime-sama, Yuuhi-sama, please forgive his rudeness! He's too used to speak informally." I bow at them, and again I make Takeru bow too.

"Um…" Yuuhi-sama tried speaking up as she stared at him. "Forgive me, Takeru-sama. I didn't mean to insult you." She gave him a bow.

She's so well mannered. She's just perf-

"Takeru is fine, Yuuhi. I'm not an adult." Why must you scold her like that? Don't give me that pout.

"… I see." Yuuhi-sama said and remained staring at him silently.

"Well, why don't you tell me of how you have been these days? Now that we're comfortable, tell me the details." Yohime-sama said as she smiled at us.

I send a gaze at Takeru, to tell him to remain quiet. He tenses up a bit, and I proceed to tell her of our daily life and answer the questions she sends. I can't help to notice that Yuuhi-sama kept firmly staring at Takeru as he looked around the room. When he noticed her stare, he waved at her, making her widen her eyes and try to imitate him. Yohime-sama raises her hand, signaling me to stop.

"Well, that was enough from you. Now then, Takeru-kun?"

"Y-Yes?"

"Can you tell me how you felt living with Maya?"

"Maya-nee was really kind to me." He had to go and call me that. "She was really sad at first, but she was always good. I'm really happy to be with her, she cooks really tasty food, she always helps me with my homework, and she's gonna train me. She's the best sister ever." I am happy to hear him say that… But I do not know how they'll react to the training.

"Train you? What is she teaching you?"

"How to use a sword! I wanna see Dad again, so I have to learn to do Kendo." He says smiling brightly.

"Maya, what is the meaning of this?" I explain to her what happened yesterday in detail, and instead of growing angrier I saw her complexion soften. She gazed at Takeru sweetly as she smiled.

"And he showed decent progress for a first training session. I believe he has potential." Takeru smiled as he hugged my arm. Sigh…

"So Takeru, would you like Maya to keep training you?"

"Yes! I wanna learn!" His instant reply made Yohime-sama giggle a bit.

"I see. Maya, how about you come back here once a week to train in the dojo?"

"Huh?! B-But… But the dojo is for-"

"It would be more fruitful to train there, wouldn't it? And you could spend some time with Shion again, she has been very upset since you left." I know it would be better, but to allow him to train there… Takeru isn't one of us. He's a commoner, I doubt the rest will treat him well. And… I do not know how I would react to that.

"I can see what you mean, my liege. But he isn't one of this House's vassals, many people would-"

"Do not worry about that. His father has been performing above our expectations, so I believe this is nothing more than a just reward."

"Dad? You know where Dad is?!"

"Takeru, do not raise your voice!"

"But…" Don't give me that sad look, I do not like it on your face.

"Maya, be at ease. Takeru, I do know your father but he isn't here. He'll go to meet you sometime in the future." His eyes shone brightly at her words.

"Really? He'll come back?"

"Yes, I promise. So, would you like to come train here?"

"Yes!"

"Takeru, what did I told you about manners?" I tap my glasses and he opens his eyes wide. He then gives Yohime-sama a bow and asks her again, this time a bit more politely.

"I see, then you can come here to train with Maya. Now, Takeru. Can you keep Yuuhi company? I have to speak with Maya in private." He nods and Yohime-sama stands, gesturing towards the doorway.

We leave towards the garden as I hear Takeru approaching Yuuhi-sama and addressing her as rudely as always. Takeru, please do not hug her.

"So, Maya. It seems you have grown attached to the boy." Her smile melted my defenses, I had no retort to her sudden words.

"Huh?! That's…"

"You see, his father was broken when his wife died." She looks towards the garden, speaking slowly as we walked. "He was very adamant about dropping out of the Guard to go back to his son. But Takahisa-sama did not wish him to leave, for he is a crucial part of his squad. It took us a great effort to convince him to stay."

"Excuse me, Yohime-sama. Takeru's father is a member of Takahisa-sama's personal squad?"

"Yes, he is his favorite Strike Vanguard. Kageyuki Shirogane was truly a surprise, despite his rough manners he has a natural talent to adapt himself to new situations very quickly." So Takeru is just like him, huh. "So, of course he wished for him to stay. But we couldn't leave his son in the hands of someone untrustworthy. We needed someone who could protect him, tend to his needs, support him in his studies. That is why I suggested sending a retainer to him, and why I chose you in particular. Someone as serious and dedicated as you would make a great retainer for the boy, who was innocent, inexperienced and probably as rough as his father. While you took offense at it, I decided to keep you in the dark. I had never seen you showing displeasure so openly, so I thought that perhaps you could use this as a learning experience."

"I see. It has been a nice experience indeed." She stops and looks at me again, with shadows emerging from her otherwise kind eyes.

"But I had my doubts after our last talk. I contemplated who could I send instead of you if you were to grow resentful towards the boy. So, that is why I made Mana call you yesterday. However, it seems my worries were unnecessary. I am most grateful to you for finding patience for him." She smiles kindly at me. No, Yohime-sama. He was the one who had the kindness to forgive me.

"So, I am to remain as his retainer?"

"Yes, I shall rely on you to take care of him. It is rather refreshing to have people like them around, compared to all the buffoons we have to deal with daily, who only try to shower us with compliments." I guess… I can see how it is nice to have honest people around, even if their manners are coarse.

"Understood. So, when will I be allowed to come to the dojo?"

"Hmm… How about during weekends? You can either come at night during Friday or early during Saturday, and leave on Sunday. We can arrange your transportation so do not worry about the train schedules." Even if he is the son of a promising Guard… And even if I see talent in him…

"Yohime-sama, why are you giving him this privilege? Is there a reason I don't know about?" She gazes at me softly, closes her eyes, and then returns her gaze towards the room.

"Takahisa-sama simply told me to aid the child, so I decided to do what I could for him." Yohime-sama is going overboard again. Even so, he might… truly accomplish his dream this way. I couldn't have hoped for a better outcome.

"I see. I will do my best to aid him."

"I surely hope you do. Now, let us go back to the children. I wish you to take him to the dojo, and maybe you could introduce him to Mion and Shion. Shion in particular has missed you much."

"So I was told." We make our way back to the room, where we found a surprising sight.

Takeru had somehow managed to bring a spinning top with him without me noticing and was showing it to Yuuhi-sama, who stared at it in wonder.

"See? You need to put some force in your fingers to make it spin more, Yuuhi." Did he just… call her by her name without any honorifics again?!

"Takeru!" He flinches at my voice, his eyes widening in shock as a drop of sweat went down his forehead.

"Maya-nee? Why are you angry? You didn't tell me I couldn't bring toys."

"Well, yes, I didn't… But let's leave that for when we go back home. Takeru, you have to show Yuuhi-sama the proper respect." He furrows his brows at me.

"But-"

"She's a noble, Takeru. She's the daughter of one of the blue samurai you like so much, so you have to-"

"Really?! Yuuhi, you're a blue samurai?" He looks at her with stars in his eyes, ignoring me completely.

"Um… My Father is one, I'm not a samurai. Takeru-san, do you like the samurai?" She spoke to him without signs of being offended. Yohime-sama patted my shoulder and put a finger on her lips, gesturing me to remain quiet.

"Yes! They're amazing, right? I mean, they're the most awesome people here. But I told you to call me Takeru."

"But it would be rude for me to-"

"If you don't call me Takeru, then we're not friends." He pouts and looks away. Yuuhi-sama looks down as clouds appear on her eyes as she hangs her head down. She then hesitantly spoke up with her silky voice looking straight at him.

"Then… Takeru? Can we be friends?" He immediately looked at her with his usual smile and nodded.

"Yes, let's be friends Yuuhi!" Yuuhi-sama in turn smiled widely at him, her eyes regaining their usual shine.

"See, Maya?" I looked at Yohime-sama, who was smiling as she looked at the kids, who were again trying to make the toy spin. "Takahisa-sama saw in Shirogane someone worth our trust despite his origins. And I think that his son might be someone who Yuuhi can rely on when she grows into the head of the Koubuin House. She will need as many trustworthy people by her side as she can get. So, can I entrust him to you?"

"You wish me to train him to be one of Yuuhi-sama's retainers?"

"No, I just wish him to be her friend. A confidant, if you may. If he's as skilled as his father, then he might be a good addition to our guards, but we already have many retainers with you four. However, you will need people you can trust, and if he sees you as his family, then I suppose he may become someone you can rely on to protect Yuuhi when the need calls." She then gazed at the kids kindly again.

Of course, the future does not look good. If things continue like they are… But… This still feels wrong. Using his dream to see his father to induct him into the guard? I mean, if he wishes to fight… I look at him as a strange oppression finds its way to my heart. He looks so happy, teaching Yuuhi-sama how to use the toy.

"See? It's really fun once you can make it spin fast, then you can see which one stops spinning first, and if you guess you keep the candies!"

"Candies?" Yuuhi-sama tilted her head to a side, making Takeru look at her rather surprised.

"Yuuhi, you never ate candies?"

"No, what are they?"

Yohime-sama laughs as they continue to talk. I have never seen Yuuhi-sama being so curious about someone, I certainly didn't expect her to like him despite his usual attitude.

"He really is very relaxed. Maya, just to be clear, I do not wish to force him to enlist into the Guard. Only if he wishes to join us we'll induct him. However, even if he doesn't become our fellow, I wish him to be someone who Yuuhi can consult. I'm sure you realized how far apart we are from our common folk during your stay in Hiiragi." She says as she caresses her ponytail slowly.

"Indeed. So you wish him to be a bridge?"

"Yes, sort of. Well, I suppose you should go to the dojo now." She approaches the kids and pats Yuuhi-sama's head. "Yuuhi, Takeru has to go now. Say your goodbyes." Yuuhi-sama looks a bit sad as she looks at her mother, but then looks back at Takeru and grabbing his hands she says her goodbyes.

"Thanks for visiting, Takeru. Goodbye." However, he frowns at her words. Takeru, what are you going to say? Please don't give her a hug.

"Yuuhi, that's wrong. This isn't goodbye. When you can't play with your friends anymore, you say 'See you later', because you'll see them another day to play again." He put his hands above hers and smiled brightly. Yuuhi-sama seemed astonished at his words, even Yohime-sama was looking at him a bit surprised as she brought a hand to her chin.

"So you'll come visit me again?" She asked meekly, blinking in wonderment.

"Yes! Maya-nee, can we come visit another day?" Sigh… Look at him, being his usual self with the daughter of a noble. I guess his kindness is his best trait after all.

"Yes, we can come visit someday." He smiles widely and then faces Yuuhi-sama again, moving his hands up and down.

"See? So it's 'See you later', not 'Goodbye'. Oh right! Yuuhi, I'll give you the top. You didn't have one, right?"

"Eh? You would truly give it to me?"

"Yes, don't worry I can get another next birthday. And Jouji has two, so we can keep playing. So this one is for you." He grabs the toy and places it on her hands. Yuuhi-sama remains looking at the toy, eyes filled with stars.

"Thanks, Takeru. Um… When is your birthday? Mother, can we give him a present then?"

"Why, of course we can." Yohime-sama was watching their exchange with a pleased smile. "Takeru, when is your birthday?"

"Um… It's on December 16th." Huh? But that day is…

"My birthday is also on that day." Yuuhi-sama said as she got a tiny bit closer to him.

"Really? Then, let's celebrate it together!"

"Takeru, what are you talking about?" He looked at me with a wide smile so clearly happy one could see flowers around him.

"I mean, we can come visit and then we can have a party, and share cake, and then we can play together!" How do peasants celebrate their birthdays? I mean, we are given a small present and we do meet up with our close relatives, but it's nothing like a party and there is no cake.

"Mother… Can we have our birthday together?"

"Haha… Do you want to, Yuuhi?" The little one fidgeted a bit, looking at the toy in her hands. Then she looked at her mother and nodded.

"Yes, can we… can we celebrate our birthday together?"

"Well, if you want to. Takeru, will you come visit us during your birthday?"

"Yes! My friends can't come visit me back home because they live far away, except Sumika. So can we celebrate together?" He looked at me and Yohime-sama. I sighed while she gave him a nod. "Yay! Then it's a promise! Let's celebrate our birthday together from now on, Yuuhi." I shouldn't be so surprised at his usual… Wait, from now on?!

"Yes, let's have our birthdays together. Um… Thanks for being my friend, Takeru. I will find a nice present for you." Yuuhi-sama… I've never seen her smile like that. She's genuinely happy.

Now that I think about, she never had 'friends' in the same sense Takeru has. She only interacts with Mion, Shion, and the sons and daughters of the people that come to the meetings here. No one has been this openly friendly to her. So, Takeru is her first friend. I didn't think… she would need something like this. I had Mana as a rival and later as a form of confidant, but Yuuhi-sama didn't have anyone who treated her like an equal.

"Don't worry, I'll bring you a nice present and then we can play together!"

The kids remained talking happily for a while, Yohime-sama didn't want to interrupt them so we waited until they said their parting words. Giving people strength with the power of love, huh. Yuuhi-sama never looked as happy as she did now. He might be rude and stubborn, but he's a good kid deep down. He does show thankfulness and he's kinder than I originally thought he was.

My protegee, huh. As we make our way to the dojo, Takeru is happily humming a song. I suppose… I could get used to being his retainer.

… And his sister.

[Mana]

---

I stood in front of Father, who was sitting behind a desk. Words seemed to have ran out between us, the air in the room was so stagnant it could be sliced with a knife.

"Mana, my dear daughter, how many times must I remind you to stop this foolishness?" He had his hands entwined, leaning back onto his seat.

"I do not believe I am being foolish in the slightest, Father. Praising Mion's efforts is not a mistake."

"She has done nothing worth of praise so far. Her veneer so easily bends when in front of Shion, her voice is barely audible as she suffocates in her own insecurities during the lectures. What can I do, other than make her realize her own shortcomings?"

"Mion is doing a great effort to measure up to Shion every day. Her scores are not that far behind her cousin's in the subjects she surpasses her in. In most of their classes, they are evenly matched. And Mion never gives us trouble, Shion's anger is an issue we have no idea how to solve. The teachers of the school say she tends to get upset at the smallest details, you should know how many times Kazora-sama has been called by the Principal. I believe you're being unfair with her, Father. Mion deserves our support, she is not as spineless as you believe her to be." I tense my brows downwards. He does the same, letting some air out from his nose.

"Shion is still the one on top, and her personality isn't an inconvenience to me. She has to learn to restrain her temper, that is true, however she is what all members of the Tsukuyomi House should aspire to be. Imposing, resolute, and above all… unforgiving. We are guardians of a Regent House, we show no mercy to our enemies. You should know that well, my Mana."

"However, what would we gain by pushing Mion so harshly? You barely speak to her of matters not related to her studies, you keep her in the dojo after the lessons end when she's exhausted… Why must you do so, Father? You were not such a relentless teacher with me." He was harsh, he put great expectations on me during my time in school and in the dojo. I managed to pierce through my weaknesses and answer to them, earning his praise.

However, the current situation cannot be compared to what I experienced. Maya was never as aggressive towards me as Shion is to my sister. I never was harmed during our bouts, yet Shion has left Mion with bruises on many occasions when you and Kazora-sama made them spar without any protective gear. To continue to push her so… What good can come out of this? Mion won't improve with more shouts and berating, if she's bending under the pressure it is because she's being overwhelmed. She needs your acceptance and support, Father. You cannot make that something she has to earn.

"You know it well, my Mana. We are few in the Tsukuyomi House, therefore all of our heirs must be as capable as they could be to guide and support our leaders." He sends a gaze upon me, what but a myriad of arrows flying into my eyes. "If Mion is lacking, I, as her Father, must force her to redouble her efforts. Undeserved praise will only make her complacent, it must be made clear to her that she's disappointing us with these meager results."

"Father, with all due respect, I do not think her efforts are such a let down. Shion is merely ahead of her, and if you compare Mion's to mine own efforts at her age you'll see she is progressing fine." I bow deeply to him, clawing at my palms. "Please Father, could you kindly consider revising your approach to her training?"

Father closes his eyes and vanished the storm clouds in his face. Breathing in tranquility for a moment, his eyes opened and he leaned forward slowly with the serenity of a leaf down a river.

"Mana, dear, can you tell me what boons you think your proposition would bring us?"

"As I said before, it would lift a great deal of unnecessary pressure off her shoulders. Mion already knows how important her training is, by further pushing her to match Shion's performance we are only eroding her self-esteem. Mion does not need to fight like Shion, just like how me and Maya found our own styles and preferences. There are certain aspects and details that she does better than her cousin, but those are ignored by you because the end result she gets is not as good as Shion's. Mion needs to hear, to see you accept her. Her place in the family cannot be tied to her performance." Father shakes his head, grimacing.

"Winning is everything, Mana. The will of those who lose is forgotten by history. Our Empire would have been a different land today had our ancestors not prevailed on the Battle of Sekigahara. If Mion is not up to skill, I shall push her further. Until I see her cleaving through her own phantoms, I will not recede."

"What good will it do to her to receive more abuse, Father?"

"She should know we do not tolerate failure here. Mion will be trained as I ordered until she attains the necessary skill."

"… Mother wouldn't have agreed to this." An effort equal to enduring my first time in a sim pod I had to make to restrain my tongue.

"I am the one who decides how to train my heirs, I am the one with Tsukuyomi blood in his veins. I am your father, and you should know better than to use an emotional argument against me, Mana. Is this how you plan to defend our rulers? Shame on you!" His eyes squinting, fire stronger than the sun's burned my stance, melting the plating of my resolution. Before I knew it, I had bowed in apology. I had surrendered to him. "Good, looks like you understand."

"No… Father, please reconsider. Why won't you heed my words?"

"I do heed them, I am not dismissing your worries after all." He folds his arms, the sun setting in his glare. "However, I must make you two strong. My lack of determination almost costed Takahisa-sama his life when his brother betrayed us. And…" Taking a moment to breathe, his hands constricted as if he had touched a source of electricity. "It was my own lack of skill what caused your mother's death. My hesitation took her from you and Mion, when the little one was but a year old. You surely remember all we've been through since that fateful day of treason."

"Father, do not continue to punish yourself. That… Nobody could have defended the House against such amount of adversaries. That you protected Takahisa-sama and our fellows was a great feat in an of itself." To employ such an attack, under the guise of a duel, was nothing short of madness. To think all of our cousins in the Tsukuyomi House took Jinkuro's side… It is truly a miracle that Takahisa-sama's faction was the one to prevail.

"And yet, I lost my partner forever that night. You two lost your mother forever because of my shortcomings and complacence." A full eclipse reached his gaze, his brows tensing strongly as his fists. "It is my obligation as your father to make sure you two are as strong as you can be before I pass away. I am sure you have heard many a great deal of unpleasantries being said about you behind your back during your brief time as a Guard."

"… Yes, that is true. But that has nothing to do with-"

"Yes, it does my dear. You two are women and our fellows will not admit to you being superior to them so easily. Those of your same age may not hold such prejudices in their hearts, but those who are older won't look kindly at you. I must ready you to guide Takahisa-sama and Yuuhi-sama for when I am gone. And if I have to harm the gifts your mother gave me to prepare them for what is to come… I shall do so unwavering."

"You will not change your mind, Father?" He closes his eyes again, letting a sigh out. After a moment of pondering, he opens them again and locks his gaze onto mine. This time, however, I resist the recoil and return his stare.

"I suppose you could try to show me if your ideas are right." He raises his hand, extending a single finger upwards. "One month, that's all I'll give you my Mana. You have one month to prove to me my approach is mistaken. If Mion doesn't show positive signs, I will continue with the current regime once more. Do we have an agreement?"

"Yes, thank you very much for giving me this chance Father." I bow to him, he gestures me to raise not a second after.

"Now then, regarding this matter of the Mitsurugi girl… Why do you wish to take more books to her again?" His tone sharpened this time, hands entwined yet again he leaned forward.

"As I have said before, Meiya-sama needs to know more of the world if she is to play her role one day."

"Yes, you said so last time. However, aren't the books you already took more than enough?"

"I find her education lacking in the matter of common sense. It would be quickly noticed if she were to not know of something that is obvious to anyone who has lived in contact with society. For that reason, I believe I should teach her about how to deal with people outside of formal meetings and the customs of our peasantry."

Father narrows his eyes, staring at me in silence. Shards of glass danced around my hands, making them quiver. Nonexistent pebbles found their way to my feet, some to my throat. A pressure tantamount to the cascade where Guren-sama once had me meditate falls upon my head as Father extends the silence.

"… Mana, you know well who that girl is."

"Meiya-sama is someone we must protect."

"No, she is someone we must keep under surveillance. She might one day bring ruin to this House, just like how Jinkuro did. You should keep your heart locked, my Mana. I do not wish to see you being led astray by that accursed child."

"Father, with all due respect…" Enduring the waterfall, I feel a geyser surge from within. "Meiya-sama would never do such an atrocity. Her kindness is just like Yuuhi-sama's."

"Mana, you risk making the same mistake I once made. What would you do if she ever wishes to become the Head of the House?"

"Meiya-sama needs a guide, were she to harbor such thoughts. Scorning her for a sin she didn't commit will only drive her to despise her roots. I am of the opinion that she needs to learn our values, so that she is never led astray by anyone wishing to use her against us."

"Is that so?" He narrows his eyes at me, resting his chin on his hand. "You wouldn't be influenced by those strange books you've been indulging in as of late, my Mana?"

"… Perish the thought, Father. My hobbies are just that, pastimes to entertain myself with. Nothing more."

"Good. Regardless, I shall review myself the books you desire to take to her. And, as much as it pains me to say, you should remember something my dear." He stood up and walked up to me, staring at me with a scowl on his face. "Were you to take that accursed girl's side in rebellion, I will not hesitate to end you in mere seconds. Do not forget where your loyalty lies, Mana."

"And you would do well in not judging a little girl with the same eyes as you would a traitorous pig. Meiya-sama is not Jinkuro, she will not be a traitor. I myself will make sure she remains on the right path."

"… I see." He holds my gaze for a second, the sun burning my skin. My eyes started to hurt under his stare yet I refused to blink or look away. "Then, that will be all. Mion should be returning from school soon. I will be leaving her in your care for the coming month."

"Understood. I shall take my leave then." I bow to him and then exit the room.

… I let out a long sigh, my mouth remaining open. Why, Father? Why must you despise Meiya-sama so strongly?

She hasn't done anything to deserve anything of the sort, nothing but kindness lies in her heart. How could I convince him of her innocence?

I go towards the gate, sitting by a window as I await for the two little ones to return from school. I look up, this day has been buried under clouds just like this last week for my endeavors. Maya left somewhere, I wasn't told why or where, I have been tasked to monitor Meiya-sama, and I also need to oversee Mion's and Shion's trainings after they come back from school in our dojo. Sigh… I know this is what is expected of me, but it is tiring.

I have been trying to show kindness to my sister yet she remains as stiff and formal, afraid of upsetting me. And Shion doesn't listen to me. Kazora-sama also is at a loss on what we should do. She's getting good grades in all subjects, her efforts in the dojo are going well. Nobody has anything to complain about her, yet she's always in a bad mood.

The sound of the wooden door being opened pulls me from my worries. Our retainers bring them both to the entrance. Mion was, as always, looking down with not a hint of emotion on her face. Shion was the opposite, her brows arched and her lips plucked, she walked with strong steps as she had her arms tightly folded.

"Welcome home, Mion, Shion. How was your day?" I say, opening the door and stepping outside. Both of them bow to me.

"I am back, Sister. Today was another good day." Mion's voice resembled our weather. Her eyes could not meet mine.

"It was the same as always, Mana-sama." Shion said, displeasure floating in her unchanged expression.

"I see. Come on in, the dojo should be getting ready as we speak."

After they leave their bags in their private quarters I take them to the dining room, and us three are served a light meal.

"Tell me Mion, how were your classes today? I believe you had a group project to present today." A brief, isolated tremor assaulted her hands.

"… It went well, Sister."

"Liar, you scored below 90." Shion said with the same poisonous sting of Maya's anger. Mion's head lowered again, her hands halted movement.

"Now Shion, if she passed with a good score isn't that good enough?"

"Father says we need to be at the top. Mion again failed to be in the top ten of our class." 'Failed'. Why does she insist on using that word?

"Shion, that is no failure. You two go to the most prestigious school in Osaka. If she's scoring good grades there, she's already meeting our expectations."

"Father says the opposite. Bazora-sama also says the same as Father. I scored a 96, Mion is the one who isn't studying enough." She says with a wide grin, rising a finger upwards. My sister's lips began to twitch.

"Mion, it is alright. You only need to keep improving. Have you scored a higher grade than your weakest performance?"

"Yes, I have. My lowest in geography was an 83, I got an 88 today." Eyelids falling like a rock slide, her head crashes down in the depths of a canyon. "I'm sorry, Sister… I still didn't score what I should. Some of my partners got an answer wrong during our presentation and our total score got lower because of that." I see, all members of the group share the same score… Even if she did her part as good as she could, blaming her for other's faults is pointless. And regardless of that, an 88 is a marvelous score for how harsh her course is.

"You should not apologize. It is a good score, Mion. Your efforts were not fruitless." I smile at her, nodding in approval. Mion recovers a faint smile, and as slowly as dawn break fills the land with light she starts to eat again.

"Excuses won't get you anywhere. Shame on you." Shion's frown got bigger, and, just like Father had done to me, she was staring at Mion with a gaze that could melt mountains. My sister avoided it and looked down, sweating a flood of tears, eating in silence.

"Shion, that is no excuse. Mion did well and you would be well served in not being so adamant in finding faults in others." Why is she like this? Maya is very critical, but only when asked for her opinion. She rarely shows her harshness so openly.

"I did better than her, I am the top of the class. And I study with the same books she uses."

"Stop comparing yourself to her. You are not Mion, each of you have your unique strong points."

"I always score better grades. Mana-sama, Mion doesn't deserve special treatment. We should both be compared using the same rules." She pouted, despite keeping her manners she was still pointing that lone finger around.

"Sigh… It's not special treatment Shion. You two are different, that is all. Mion doesn't have to match your performance. Your attitude leaves much to be desired, you should know better than to be this hostile to your family." She frowns, looking away. "Mion, do not take Shion's words as an insult. You still have room for improvement, use this small pebble that got in your way today as a learning experience. Next time, you would be well served in aiding your partners so that this doesn't happen again." I smile at her, gazing into her eyes.

"Yes, Sister. I will try harder from now on." She sits up upright, her gaze again not meeting mine. Sigh…

The rest of our time in the dining room was spent in silence as I watched the news while we ate. Once we finished and the girls had some time off in their rooms, I took them to the dojo. However…

"Sei!" Shion shouted as she again sent a barrage of swift attacks at Mion.

I had told Mion to not overworry before, that she should just focus on trying to counter Shion's moves. Looking at her stance, Mion is again doubting. Her feet are distancing themselves too far from each other, her posture isn't as it should be. She's barely parrying the attacks… Shion then took a step forward and knocked Mion to the ground with one downwards slash.

"Alright, that will be enough." However, before I could even more…

"Stand up!" Shion shouted. "You weakling… Stand up, the match just started!"

"I already gave up! You won this match." Mion said, not standing up and covering her head with a hand despite how she's wearing the protective gear.

"Stand up already. I'll show you what a good performance is like, Mion." Shion's eyes took a hawkish tint, as when me and Maya do when we become truly upset.

"Shion, you're behaving horribly. Shame on you, how can you be this coarse?" I go to Mion's side, sending a glare at the turquoise one. "The Mugen Kidou should never be employed to harm others or to further one's own goals, it is used to protect our fellows. You should not let your emotions cloud your actions."

"Why are you scolding me? I won! I'm better than her!" I approach her and place a hand on her shoulder, shaking my head.

"Winning isn't everything. The method that takes you to victory speaks volumes of your inner self." Biting her lips, she held my gaze. "Is this how you wish to live, Shion? Screaming at everyone else? Harming your fellows because they are less than you? We taught you better than this, you should know this isn't the right path." Hanging her head, she clutched the bamboo sword tightly. The frown and wrinkles spread like wild fire within the headgear.

"… I'm the better fighter. Why do you scold me, Mana-sama? Mion is the one who isn't good enough."

"Shion, Mion is doing what she can to measure up to the gap in skill. You, on the other hand, are not keeping your poise and have not yet learned to restrain your strength. This is not your limit, I know you can keep your emotions in check. No one is faulting you for your performance, Shion." She, however, shook off my hand and walked away back to her position. "Mion, can you stand?"

"… Yes, Sister. I can still fight." Mion stood up slowly. She dusted her red gi and took her position again, retaking the Mugen stance. Despite the visible quiver in her hands, her feet were firmly planted on the ground.

"Shion, please manage your strength this time around. Was I clear?"

"Yes, I heard already." She was again gritting her teeth. Why is she so upset?

I take some steps away from them, returning to my position. Shion is obsessed with high grades and power, if she continues in this way she'll end up being a close minded, prideful person. This month's task is not only for Mion, I must also try to aid Shion in her troubles.

Sigh… If only Maya were here to aid me…

"Alright… Begin!"

---

Some time after that.

(Yohime's Room.)

---

"So Mion can't even force a draw?" Yohime-sama asked, combing her hair.

"No, she couldn't. Shion also was unable to restrain her anger once Mion seemed to be getting her off guard." She again tried to harm Mion's arms, thankfully I had them use arm-guards in case this happened. When I scolded her, Shion once more began to scowl at me, saying I was being unfair. "I do not know why Shion is obsessed to such degree with results nor why she dislikes Mion so strongly. If it weren't for her temper she would be a role model. I cannot see what causes her to flare up in such a way."

"Do not worry so, Mana. I do not believe this issue to be tied to her grades or training, it seems something is troubling Shion's heart. If only her mother were still here… However, that will soon no longer be a problem. Mana, here." Yohime-sama handed me a small piece of paper. It had some numbers written on it. "Please contact Maya and tell her I wish her to return here tomorrow."

"I see… Yes, so I shall do Yohime-sama. However, where is Maya at the moment? Should I use a secure line?"

"Yes, you should. Her mission's details are a secret but you should limit yourself to informing her of my order." She finished tying her lily hair once more. "Now Mana, might I ask how your endeavors with Raiden-sama have been?" She closed her eyes, resting her hands on her lap.

"They have been fruitful, Yohime-sama. The Mitsurugi girl is learning in a similar pace to Mion and Shion in her sword lessons, I have confirmed her education has been progressing as fine as what one would expect of her. Worry not milady, she is learning as well as she should."

"I see. Takahisa-sama will be pleased to hear that. Now… How is she on her everyday life? Is Mei… the Mitsurugi girl healthy, I hope?" Yohime-sama bit her lips as she halted her speech, her eyes were still closed, her hands softly intensifying their hold atop one another. If you suffer so for her, why must it be this way?

"She is well accompanied, Raiden-sama is always keeping watch over her. She's a healthy young girl and she herself has said she is pleased to be with her grandfather. In these few days we've spent together, I could see she is a very kindhearted soul. Very curious about the smallest details but also surprisingly stubborn once she gets an idea in her head. Mitsurugi is in good hands, Yohime-sama."

"That's…" She finally opened her eyes, inhaling slowly, submerging the ripples in her complexion. "That is good to hear, Mana. I shall report this to Takahisa-sama. You can go now."

"Yes, milady." I bowed and exited the room.

This is such a sad state of affairs. Yohime-sama does not wish to keep Meiya-sama away from us, that much is obvious to me now. If Takahisa-sama sent me to aid her, it means he also isn't entirely pleased with this arrangement. If only we could surpass this old superstition… Well, I shall do all that's in my hands to aid Meiya-sama.

Now, I am to call Maya. That day… She was most strange, going as far as saying she enjoyed our sparring sessions. It is so odd to have her be open about how she feels, Kazora-sama has imprinted his stoic side into her since we were little after all.

I can only hope she is alright and that my call comes at a good time. I dread thinking that I might be interrupting her when duty is calling, even more to receive news of her being injured or worse. Well then, I shall know soon.

After going to our private phones and making sure everything is in working order to not leave traces of this call, I dial the number I was given.

Next Day . Around 3 PM.

(Koubuin House. Dojo.)

---

"Shion! You're putting too much force in your swings. Mion, focus on your footing."

Yet despite Mion's attempts, she again finds herself overwhelmed by Shion's assault. Nothing has changed. Mion is still doubting, I can't break through her facade. Shion's temper has been flaring up as usual, but today she is in an even worse mood. Seeing little Takeru with Maya must have struck a wrong nerve.

… You do not know how much I envy you, Maya. To be by that kind boy's side… I wish I could have managed to reach Mion's heart, what wouldn't I give to be able to give her such reassurance. I do not know how you did it… but I wish to learn how you managed to get that boy, a peasant no less, so attached to you. I sigh as Mion once more succumbs to Shion's attacks.

"Alright, that is enough. Mion, are you alright?"

"Y-Yes… Do not worry about me, Aneue." She slowly stands up using her bamboo sword to support herself.

"No, that I cannot do. Are you truly unharmed?"

"Yes, I am fine. Forgive me, I cannot give Shion a good duel." She bows deeply, as she always does. Raindrops reverberating in her tone, afraid of seeing disappointment in my face, just like in Father's, she cannot lift her face.

"Sigh… Very well. Shion, I believe we had a talk about how you should fight." She looks away, clicking tongue.

"… Why am I the one who always gets scolded?"

"You know it well, you are too aggressive in your approach."

"But I win. And I get better results than her. You should be praising me!"

"… If you only care about the result, then you are right. We should be praising you." For a moment, I think she smiled behind her headgear. "However, that is not all that matters. The way is almost as important as the goal, if not more."

Shion looks down, gripping her blade tightly. Why is her so fixated with results? If only she wasn't so prideful… What could I do to aid you in this matter? To see beyond this, to allow you to understand why you can't be so individualistic… What can I say to you when you have reacted badly to any and all advice I've given you?

My thoughts are interrupted as the door to the dojo opens. Me and the little ones stand in attention and bow to Kazora-sama as he enters, Maya and little Takeru following behind.

"Mana, how has the training been going?"

"… As usual, Kazora-sama." He sends a look at Shion then shakes his head.

"I see. Yohime-sama has ordered for Maya and the boy to train briefly with you today. I shall be overseeing this myself." He then shot a glare at Takeru, taking some steps from us.

A moment… The boy will train with us? I look at them, Takeru was curiously looking around, his mouth slightly open. Looking back, Mion was staring at him while Shion once more was letting a frown spread in her face.

"Well… Maya, what's going on here?" I ask, getting closer. She taps her glasses and takes a moment to inhale.

"You see Mana, Yohime-sama has allowed Takeru to come train here on the weekends." Simple and direct, as if she were talking about nothing but a formality.

"Eh? Truly? Why has she decided such a thing? Is he well trained?" Maya's lips pursed for but a second.

"… He has potential. So, since we shall be coming every weekend here, she suggested that we took this chance to give Takeru a taste of what's to come." Every weekend… However… What happened to you? Saying you're his retainer, bringing him to train here… This feels as if I had been awakened by a splash of cold water, I just cannot compute how she's keeping her composure at this turn of events.

"Maya-nee…" Takeru pulled Maya's sleeve. "Why are those two in that armor?" He pointed towards Mion and Shion, who were taking off their headgear and getting closer to us. Shion was still frowning at him.

"That is the gear that one must use when practicing Kendo, Takeru. You will be using it too from now on." Maya answered with her composed tone, making little Takeru puff his cheeks.

"Why? It looks hard to move in that."

"Takeru, the gear is there to protect you." I say, crouching near him. "If you were hit with a sword it would hurt much, wouldn't it?"

"Yeah…"

"So, that's why you must use it. Did Maya not tell you about it?"

"No, Maya-nee only told me she would train me. Maya-nee, will I use one of those things back home?"

"No, Takeru. You will only use them when you come here."

It is… rare to see Maya like this. Being this patient with a kid that uses the commoner's speech. He also insists on calling her Maya-nee, and she isn't opposing him doing so. Sigh… How come you, the cold and direct one, could attain such closeness with an unknown face and I cannot do so with my own sister?

"… Well, should we start the training Maya?"

"I don't see why not. Takeru, let's get you inside your gear." Maya grabs Takeru's hand to guide him to the changing room that's nearby.

"Maya-nee, who are those two?" He asks, looking at the two girls who were now right behind me.

"Oh… I suppose we should introduce you to them." I step towards them and direct a finger when referring to each. "This is Shion, Maya's younger sister. And this one is Mion, my younger sister. You two, your greetings."

"Good afternoon, I am Mion Tsukuyomi. It's a pleasure to make your acquaintance." Mion stepped forward and gave him a bow.

"… Sister, who is this crude peasant?" Shion, however, had not an ounce of patience for Takeru.

"Shion, I believe you were introducing yourself." Maya said, tapping her glasses. Shion stood in attention, still glaring at Takeru, and gave a short bow.

"… I'm Shion Tsukuyomi. It's a pleasure to make your acquaintance."

"Hi, I'm Takeru. Let' be friends!" He stepped towards them and gave them a handshake full of vigor.

Mion was befuddled, eyes wide open at the clear show of friendliness and the little care the boy had for her personal space. Shion…

"I'm not your friend. I am a noble, a member of the Tsukuyomi Family. Who do you think you are to be like this towards me?"

"… I just told you I'm Takeru." He said as he narrowed his eyes at her. I had to drown a chuckle at the way he answered. Maya let out a sigh, bringing a hand to her forehead. "Maya-nee, why is she this angry?" Shion's brows twitched, her lips shook for a moment.

"I've told you many times you have to be polite, haven't I Takeru?"

"But she isn't an adult."

"Takeru… Sigh… Shion, please do not mind him. He simply refuses to be polite." Maya said as she got closer and tenderly put a hand on the boy's head, forcing Takeru to do a short bow.

"Sister, why are you with this… peasant? Why does he refer to you in such a way?" Shion stared straight at her, Maya closed her eyes for a moment.

"… I have been tasked with the duty of looking after him. I am his retainer as of now." Shion's eyes slowly widened, she dropped her blade. "Takeru refuses to be polite and proper regardless of my efforts in teaching him to speak properly, so please do forgive his rude speech."

"I'm not rude, I'm just being friendly!" He says, pouting at Maya. Her eyelids slowly descend as she ruffles the boy's hair.

"Sigh… Regardless, you two shall be joined by him in your weekend trainings from now on. I hope you can treat him as well as you would to another fellow."

Shion silently lowered her head. Maya then took Takeru to the changing room. It seems Kazora-sama said something to her when she was near the door, she stopped and threw a glare at him before entering.

… What is the meaning of this? Maya never liked our common fellows much. Regardless of what I was told when we went to speak with Yohime-sama, why was she tasked to look after a commoner? Even if his father is a member of Takahisa-sama's squadron… It is rare. She didn't even mind his displays of affection when we were coming here.

Shion is staring right at the door to the changing room. Seeing Maya being this supportive of a peasant, after how she's been acting these days… I gulp once and approach the little turquoise girl.

"Shion, you-"

"I know. Don't get angry, don't lose your poise. I know, Mana-sama." She folded her arms tightly and shook my hand off her shoulder.

"Shion, you shouldn't be like this. Maya has been tasked with this mission for a reason."

"… That boy is a peasant. What can he know? Why was he calling Sister in such a way?" She looks at me as her tone creaked like an old door that needed oil.

"You shouldn't judge a book by its cover. I'm sure Maya can explain why this is the way it is."

"I wonder about that…" Kazora-sama said, folding his arms as he got closer. "It does look like you two are too soft."

"… Kazora-sama, whatever do you mean?"

"Heh… Do not play dumb, Mana." For a brief moment we stared at each other, his squinted eyes saying what Father said without pronouncing a single word. "Shion, face that peasant with all your might. Show Maya she's wasting her time with him."

"Yes, Father."

"… And what do you expect to gain from this course of action, Kazora-sama?"

"… My daughter. Maya should return to her duties as a Royal Guard, it is an embarrassment to the Tsukuyomi Family for her to be turned into nothing but the nanny of a baseborn. I am merely going to show her the boy doesn't belong here, that it is better for him to not involve himself further with the nobility. Shion… I am expecting you to perform as you should." The girl stood in attention, readiness in her stance as if she were to pounce upon prey at a moment's notice.

Shion will end up misguided… Mion is looking down, not saying anything. Sigh… What will Maya do when Takeru gets hurt by Shion? I do not believe the boy is as skilled as these two. Should I stop this? If I do… Kazora-sama will assuredly report my 'misconduct'. What do I do?

They come out of the room, Takeru is still complaining about the gear.

"I can't see well, Maya-nee. How can I train with this?"

"You'll get used to it eventually." She said as calmly as always.

"But why do I have to use a skirt? I'm not a girl."

"To conceal your legs' movements. I shall tell you about it later in detail." She said, patting his headgear and leaving his side. "Well, should we start? Who will Takeru face first?"

"Shion shall be his opponent." Kazora-sama said, going towards a wall. "Let's see if this Shirogane is worth our time."

"I'm Takeru! Don't call me Shirogane." The boy loudly complained, moving a hand towards Kazora-sama. Maya sighed yet again.

"Very well. Takeru, you do remember what I told you?" He nodded at Maya twice in quick succession.

"Yeah, don't worry." Maya then handed him a bamboo sword and he took his pose, an unpolished version of Chudan.

As Maya comes to my side, I get closer and speak in a hushed tone.

"Maya, are you sure this will end well?"

"Of course not. However, Takeru is very stubborn. I doubt he'd give up even if Shion defeats him soundly in mere seconds." She said as he tapped her glasses.

"You sound… strangely confident in him."

"… Do I now? What do you mean?"

"It's as if… you had changed. You didn't speak in such a way when you were training Shion before."

"Well… I've learned a few lessons while I was away." She layed her eyes upon the boy, who was trying to do his pose well despite how uncomfortable he seemed to be.

"He might end up hurt. You know how aggressive Shion can be."

"Mana, there is no need to worry. I think… No, I am sure Takeru won't be intimidated by a few hits. He is in the protective gear, there is nothing to fear. Shion might have trouble with her temper but I refuse to think she would lose herself in anger to the point of harming someone." Well… It is true she hasn't injured anyone. So far. However, if she says as much…

"Well then… Begin!" I shout and Shion goes on the offensive not a moment later.

The boy barely manages to parry her first two attacks, but then Shion manages to break through him and delivers a strike to his chest. Takeru ends up on the floor, rolling to a side.

"Uuh… What was that?!" He loudly complained as he tried to get up.

"Is this all you can do?" Shion looked at him, resting her sword on her shoulder. "Sister, why is he so bad? He doesn't even know how to wield a blade!"

"Maya, if he's a novice I think it would be for the best if he didn't-"

"No Mana, you are mistaken." She narrowed her eyes at me, then she directed her gaze towards the boy. "Takeru, are you giving up?"

"No, I'm not!" He was already back on his feet, taking his pose again. "I didn't lose yet!"

"… You think you can defeat me?" Shion took some steps back, taking the Mugen Kidou stance this time.

"Maya, they boy might truly get hurt at this rate."

"Mana, I am thankful for your kindheartedness. However, you shouldn't underestimate Takeru. Defeats are more empowering than victories, after all." She said, smiling for a second.

"… How have you trained him? What is the secret to have such bond with your trainees?" If I could do the same with Mion… If I can show some results before this month passes… Maya, just what methods did you employ?

"I am afraid you are asking the wrong person." She said as she tapped her glasses.

"Eh?"

"Mana-sama, should we begin?" Shion asked, as impatient as ever.

"… Yes. Begin!"

… Takeru kept challenging Shion, yet he kept losing in mere moments to her. He was able to parry a few of her strikes by the end, but it couldn't be called a good result. That being said…

"One more time!" He got up once more, pointing his sword at Shion.

"Fine… Just one more." Shion returned to her position. I looked at Maya, who gave a nod, then I sighed and allowed them to begin yet another duel.

This time, however, Shion's attacks took a slower approach. Going for his left side, she delivers a softer than usual blow. Allowing Takeru to reply and attack for the first time, they start exchanging a few blows.

However, when Takeru when for a frontal strike Shion took a step back, just like Maya does, and then lowered her blade as she did. Pressing forward, she sent a rising slash at the boy. His sword knocked away, Takeru staggered backwards. Shion didn't let up the pressure however, and before we could stop her she took one step forward and sent a downwards attack at the boy. Hitting his head, she sent him into the floor.

"Shion!" Maya hurried along me to their side. "There was no need to push for another strike, you had already defeated him." As I scolded her she avoided my gaze.

"I merely did my best effort. Shirogane should have known when to quit, he should have seen I was better and that he stood no chance of winning."

"Shion is right, Mana." Kazora-sama said, smiling faintly. "This only proves the boy shouldn't be allowed to train with them, he would only hold them back."

"Kazora-sama, with all due respect, there is no reason for such hostility. This is setting an awful example for both Shion and Mion. Would you have them treat all peasants in this way?"

"… If they challenge us, we should remind them of why we have a position of privilege. Shirogane has nothing to do here, he shouldn't be allowed to train alongside us."

"… Father, did you order Shion to do this?" Maya slowly stood up, helping Takeru. I felt as if a trickle of cold water were running down my back. Maya's eyes were sharpened as blades towards her father.

"Do you have a complain, Maya?"

"Yes, I do. As Mana just said, it is embarrassing to see this… petty vision of yours and how you try to taint Shion with it. Should I report this to Yohime-sama?" Kazora-sama flinched at her words, his arms slowly undoing the cross they were in.

I couldn't help but to stare at her just like Shion was doing, Maya never contradicted her father before. Never, no matter how harsh he was nor what he was ordering her to do.

"Maya, what is wrong with you, my daughter? Can't you see he's but a peasant?"

"A peasant that managed to deflect the attacks of Shion after mere minutes of sparring with her."

"Anyone could parry a strike or two, we do not fight with deadly intent in our style."

"I have to agree with Kazora-sama, Maya." Feeling as if a chain was pulling at the nape of my neck, I could no nothing but lower my head as my lips moved to produce my words. "While I do think he doesn't deserve this treatment, I do not think it wise of you to wish for little Takeru to train here. This won't do him good." He'll end up like Mion if she forces him to train here. That sweet, kind boy… I do not wish to see him getting hurt. We should look over our fellows, and we shouldn't push unnecessary burdens onto them.

"Takeru is still not giving up. Isn't that right?" Maya's tone was brimming with confidence, with such fierceness as if she was a recently lit bonfire.

I looked at the boy and was surprised at his expression. Furrowing his brows and puffing his cheeks as much as he could, his nose full of wrinkles and his eyes returning Shion's gaze squarely.

"Yeah! That hurt a lot… But I'm not giving up! I just need to get better and that's it."

"… Just get better?" Mion perked up at his words. "You barely can lift your sword, what can you do against Shion?"

"Maybe not today, but someday I will win! I'm not giving up. You just wait, with Maya-nee training me I'll beat you one of these days Shion!"

Shion's hold on her blade again tightened, not longer able to stop it from shaking. Mion was left with her mouth agape, as I am, at the boy's defiance and sheer confidence. Or should I say foolishness? Maya remained as composed as usual, however.

"You heard him, Father. Takeru is not giving up yet. So, since he still wishes to train… I see no reason to not allow him to try."

"… You will make yourself responsible for him, I suppose?" Kazora-sama squinted his eyes at her, Maya nodded. "Then it's none of my business. Shion, one last match."

"… Yes." She again took her stance.

"Takeru, are you sure of this? You might get hurt." I do not know what is wrong with Maya, but I can't just let this continue. He's but a common kid… He might get injured.

"Don't worry Mana-nee, I'll be fine." He returned a smile my way, coiling his small hands into fists.

"… Mana-nee?" Mion again reacted at his words. She first took a glance at me, her lips trembling as much as a ladybug's wings when they fly, then she gazed at him, narrowing her brows in confusion. "Why do you call them in such a way? You're not related to us."

"Huh? Maya-nee is my sister and Mana-nee said it was okay." He simply answered. Such simplicity and warmness is something I would welcome in my daily life, however… someone wasn't that pleased with his answer.

"Pah! What have you been teaching him in this month, Maya?"

"Father, please keep quiet. The match should have began already. Mana, if you would." She glared at me, tapping her glasses with only one finger right in the middle.

"… Takeru, you truly wish to keep fighting?"

"Yeah, I'll keep trying!"

"… I see." I take a few steps back once more. "Then, take your stances… Begin!"

And again, Shion pressured Takeru with fast attacks. Yet, this time… Takeru kept his feet firmly planted on the ground and limited himself to just parry her attacks. I saw him moving his lips, opening them a bit… as if he were counting aloud.

Once Shion had to take a step back, he went after her in a frontal swing. Sadly, Shion could deflect his attack without much effort. Even if he is a boy Shion is probably in better shape than him, he won't be able to overpower her. In a fluid motion, Shion sent another upwards slash at him and got him off balance once more. However, he didn't let go of his sword and tried to not fall back. Shion had to settle for a hit to his chest again. She once more put too much force on her swing, the boy once more ended up on the floor.

… He could tell when Shion would take a step back. If… If he were on equal terms of skill… I look at Maya, who simply remained staring at him. The glint in her eyes told me she was as satisfied as when we used to finish our day of work. She… What did she teach him?

"See?! I'm better than you! I'm better!" Shion, who wasn't satisfied yet, raised her sword again ready to do a follow up but I reacted quickly and reached her side, grabbing the blade.

"Shion, there is no need to continue. You won, that is all." I could see her eyes taking the shape of those of a wolf from within her headgear.

"… I won. He should know when to quit. He's nothing but a peasant, he should pay for even trying to duel with-"

"Shion!" Maya raised her voice, making her sister fall silent. "It is disheartening to see how little you seem to retain of my teachings about poise."

Shion's hands slowly, oh so slowly, started shaking. They fell down as I loosened my grasp on her blade, free from any hostile intentions. Maya went to the boy's side as he tried to stand up.

"Takeru, you did well. I do think this was more than enough to prove your point." She helped him up as she held his hand, Takeru was groaning again. "Are you unhurt, Takeru?"

"Yeah… I'm fine, Maya-nee."

"Good. This last time you did better than before. It is good to see you remembered my advice about waiting for the right moment to attack." She took the headgear off him, ruffling the boy's long hair.

"… Why do you praise him?" Shion said as she removed her headgear. "Sister, why do you praise this peasant? He didn't do well, all he did was flail his blade around! I was the one who-"

"Shion, you didn't restrain your strength in front of a clear novice. And I see no changes in your technique. That is all."

Shion lowered her gaze as her hands started to shake once more. Shion has been always pursuing the best result she could achieve. To be told such words after these bouts, by Maya no less, must be a shock to her pride. A most odd tincture made its way to my mouth, a taste of mint mixed with too much salt made me bit the inside of my lips as Shion was performing a great effort to not show her tears.

"Why do you scold me? I'm doing… my best…" She barely managed to squeeze out the words. Had I not been by her side, I would have missed them. Hanging her head, she tightly clutched her sword again.

… Could it be? Scolded… Wanting to be praised… When was the last time we praised Shion for something she did? We have been pushing them to be better, but when did we congratulate her efforts openly? Is she… the same as Mion? Do both of them look for our acceptance in their own way?

Then… if that's the case…

It is a shock, to see that Shion hasn't improved. Mana did tell me her temper was still giving her trouble, and I didn't expect her to treat Takeru well, but to show such aggressiveness? Mana is right, this will only make her resent our peasants. She'll end up as I used to be a month ago. I cannot praise her efforts, not when she has this attitude.

I inhale deeply, searching for a way to convey to her what Takeru taught me that night where I allowed my weakness to control me. Perhaps a talk in private before we leave would do her good, so that she can reflect on what she did.

"Shion, do not look so upset." Father said. "You fought as you usually do. Maya, I find it most odd. What could this boy gain from this? It is clear he isn't on their level."

"Father, I am Takeru's retainer. And so, I shall decide how I teach him. If you desire to speak of it, we could share a cup of tea later." I cannot allow Takeru to be put in his sights. He is very emotional, after all. And knowing him, he will probably speak up against Father if he were to get upset.

"… Yes, that is a good proposal. Should we be going? I doubt sparring with Mion will make a difference appear."

"I have to agree." Mana said as she caressed her hair. "Maya, I believe this was enough. Perhaps you could give Shion some advice regarding her endeavors? I believe she could use some time to speak with you now." Shion's head slightly arched up at her words, Mana gave her a pat in the back and then she took a few steps forward.

I inhale through my nose again and veer my gaze away from my sister's. She might misunderstand my words and I cannot explain to her why I am with Takeru. And until now my words weren't of use for her, I never managed to find why she fails to restrain her feelings. Not now, let her anger die down. Once she's calm again, then I'll approach her.

"Shion is still the same as she was, and I already have given her advice while she and Takeru fought. I have to speak with Father for the time being." Upon hearing my words, Shion's gaze again sank. Her shoulders also descended as slowly as a feather that had went on a ride with the winds of spring.

Sigh… Maybe I will have to speak with her before I leave. At the very least I need to bestow upon her what Takeru taught me. I cannot let her fall into the same hole I-

"Shion, you were amazing!"

I flinched at Takeru's voice. He had suddenly gotten closer to her and, after grabbing Shion's hands, he looked at her with a gaze that could stare right back at the sun.

"Huh? Amazing…" Shion remained still as Takeru shook her hands up and down with a smile on his face.

"Yeah, can you keep practicing with me when I come visit?" He asked her as earnestly as he usually does.

"… Why would I? You're just a peasant." She released herself from his grasp, folding her arms and looking away. Sigh… As much as I wish to stop him, perhaps this will do her good. If I can let her learn by interacting with him, it will be easier than to explain what I realized that night I hit him.

"But you're really good. I wanna get better so fighting with you will help a lot. Come on, don't be mean!" Takeru again got closer, perhaps a tad bit too close, and Shion was once more at a loss of words at his forwardness.

I threw a glance at Mana, shaking my head as I saw her moving towards them. She pursed her lips and nodded. Father, however, had a hand in his chin, some of his displeasure vanishing from his face.

"… I don't want to. You're weak, and you're just a normal person." Shion again looked away from Takeru's eyes as she released herself from his grasp.

"I'll get better then!"

"… You won't get better than me. I don't know why Sister is training you, but you're weak."

"Well, I'll do my best. And Maya-nee is with me, so it'll be fine." Shion's brows arched downwards at the words.

"Why does she have to stay with you? Leave Sister alone, you're a waste of time!" She pushed him back with quite some force. However, when I was about to scold her again… Takeru puffed his cheeks but didn't seem to want to fight with her.

"I'm not a waste of time. It's not my fault that you're awesome with a sword." He folded his arms and looked away, pouting. It's… endearing, how honest he is. Instead of getting upset, he's praising her honestly.

"… Awesome? Are you making fun of me?" Shion, who didn't understand commoner terms, took it as an insult as her frown got bigger.

"Shion, it means he thinks you're truly good. Takeru is praising you." Mana told her as she put a hand on Shion's shoulder. "He's only trying to be friendly with you."

"Yeah, that's true." He nodded at the words. "I wanna get better with a sword, so will you train with me?" He again got closer and stared at her with that shining gaze of his. Considering how he was around Yuuhi-sama I shouldn't be surprised.

"… Why? Why should I train with you? Why are you coming here?"

"Yohime-san told me it was okay." Did he just…

"Takeru!" I went to his side, pulling his ear. "How many times have I told you to be polite?"

"I used a -san this time, Maya-nee!"

"It's Yohime-sama for you, Takeru. You have to address her with the proper respect."

"But she didn't say anything when we talked."

"Stop being so contrarian." He puffed his cheeks at me, I cannot help but to sigh. "What am I going to do with you?" I let go of his ear, patting his head softly.

"Sister, why are you this kind to him? I am… I am your sister. Why are you with this boy? Why do you-"

"Shion, that matters not. You have your own mistakes to polish, as does Takeru. We shall be coming here every weekend to train. I hope you can start to act as you should when we do." Shion bit her lips as she hanged her head once more. I was about to say something else, but then Takeru pulled my sleeve.

"Maya-nee, why are you angry?"

"I am not."

"But you haven't praised her. She was awesome!" He narrowed his brows as he said that.

"But she was too aggressive." I know you are stubborn to a fault, but I can't let Shion keep going on like this. I will have to have a talk with her later.

"Yeah…" He rubbed his head as he narrowed his eyes. "But she still was awesome." He said, rising a fist to the air. "And why does she call you Sister? Your name is Maya."

"Takeru, that is the proper, formal way to refer to one's older sister." He squinted his eyes as he tilted his head.

"Why? Why can't Shion call you Maya-nee?"

To let Shion… Hmm… I suppose I could try to be closer to her and support her as I do with you. Perhaps some kindness will help her with her anger? Hmm… Would Father even allow me to? I do not wish to keep getting into arguments with him, considering how he sees you. And… she might begin to think less of me were I to suggest such a thing. Shion is very dedicated to her training after all.

"Well… That would be inappropriate. She should address me with respect." I tap my glasses again, Shion's eyes narrowed as I did. Once more, the ants march on my back at the sight of her face.

"But I call you Maya-nee all the time." Takeru didn't let go of the idea, however.

"That is true, however-"

"And why can't you praise her? She's your sister, right? She fought really, really well too!" Takeru again puffed his cheeks, my lips twisted slowly as I looked at him.

Giving you emotional support was my first hurdle to overcome… And I suppose you weren't only receiving said support this month. I do think Father will oppose this, quite strongly at that. Sigh… But Shion is my sister, and she… also needs me just like you do.

"… Fine, you are right." He smiled and then I went to Shion's side.

The little one slowly looked up at me, a foreign shiver running on my chest as I gazed at her. I slowly placed a hand atop Shion's head and caressed her hair. She flinched when I did, as I had never done this for her. Her eyes looked up at me, wide and surprised as they never were before while her mouth remained slightly open.

"You fought well Shion. You should still try to manage your temper, but it is clear you're still as sharp as you always were. You… must have been training with all your might to retain your edge with me gone."

"Yes… I have been doing my best, Sister." Returning my gaze, Shion's lips betrayed her mask and rebelled against her formal act, twisting their edges in hopes of drawing a smile. So she did need some kindness…

I gulp what clogged my mouth, though it was not physical what tormented my throat into constriction. You can say it, Maya. Even if Father is against it… there are things you have to teach her. I cannot fear their rejection, not when it's about my duties as both a retainer and a needs to be bestowed kindness without it being tied to her duties as a member of the Tsukuyomi family.

… Hm? Without it being tied to…

Who said those words to me? I squint my eyes, trying to recall. And then, as if it were so simple… I remembered. There was someone who used to give me such warmth when I was younger. Someone Shion never got to meet.

… Mother. Mother used to argue with Father about how harsh our training was. She used to comb my hair whenever I was resting from my bouts with Mana as we read some books. I… Why did I forget about it?

Shion… I never gave Shion anything of the sort. No one ever did. I inhale deeply to calm the raging salmons that were jumping at my heart from within, shredding themselves and my composure with every passing second.

Giving people strength with the power of love, huh? It seems your words held more weight than I gave them credit for, Takeru. In that case… There is only one path I should follow going forward.

"… I suppose you could call me Maya-nee, when we're within the walls of our house." I said, eyes closed as I tapped my glasses again while letting some air out softly.

"Huh? I can… Sister, do you mean it?" Her tone now incredulous, her gaze widening. I then crouched by Shion's side, still patting her head.

"Yes, I am your older sister after all. That makes me your guardian too, even if Father is with us. It is clear you have continued to excel while I was gone, Shion. I hope you can make an effort to calm that temper of yours, otherwise you're on the right path. Well done, my sister." Shion's eyes stared back at me unblinking, her lips folding inwards.

"I… Thank you, Si… M-Maya-nee?" Shion awaited my response, her legs slightly swaying and her lips tightly sealed. When I nodded at her words and ruffled her hair once more, Shion finally allowed herself to smile, even if it was as small as a spark. "I will keep doing my best. Will you train with me again, Si… Maya-nee?"

"Yes, I shall. I'll come on the weekends so please keep up the good work during the week."

"Eh? Why… Why can't you come back home? Why are you with that peasant?" Shion shot a glare at Takeru, who simply tilted his head again as he rose a brow at her.

"Shion, listen. Takeru might be a peasant but that doesn't make him any less important than anyone else. We train to protect and help our fellows, no matter their standing. Takeru needs me by his side for now. Can you help me train him, Shion?" I stopped petting her, stood up and tapped my glasses once more.

Shion looked down, bringing her hands together. Delaying an answer, she looked over at Takeru. Narrowing her eyes, her lips plucked a bit. She finally looked at me again, her brows still low.

"If you want me to, I'll help you. Maya-nee…" She grabbed one of my hands as she came a bit closer. "… Will you look over my tests before you leave?"

"I suppose I could. Could you keep Takeru company while I speak with Father?"

"… Yes, if you so want I will do it."

"You won't be harsh or rude to him?"

"No, I won't. I promise." Seeing she was being honest, going by how she held my gaze, I patted her head one last time before turning around.

"Takeru, let's go get you changed."

A few minutes later.

(Tea Room.)

[Mana]

---

Sitting by Maya's side with Kazora-sama in front of us both, each of us drank some tea that was just served. I looked at my cousin, who returned her usual blank, cold stare.

"Well then…" Kazora-sama spoke up. "Maya, can you explain yourself? What is the meaning of this? Why are you content with being the nanny of a peasant?" The moon had appeared, the wolves howled deep into the forest of his complexion.

"I am not a mere nanny, Father. I am Takeru's retainer. I suppose Yohime-sama has informed you of why I've been entrusted with this mission."

"Yes, she did allow me to discuss it with you." He lowered his cup, groaning for some moments.

"Excuse me, but I still don't know what's going on here." Maya finished drinking and looked at me.

"As it turns out Takeru's father is a member of Takahisa-sama's squadron." Yes, that was what I was told just as we arrived. "Due to his mother passing away, his father wished to quit his post in the Guard to be by his son's side."

I don't know how to feel about that. On one hand, I can understand his feelings. Being the one who looks after Mion and Shion, I can sympathize with his intentions of caring for his son. On the other, I feel somehow… betrayed. To leave us in such short notice, despite how hard this situation must be on him, is nothing short of a betrayal to the trust we placed on the man. He could have hired a caretaker to look after little Takeru. Wait… Maya is Takeru's retainer now… So, how did this happen? She then tapped her glasses before continuing.

"However, Takahisa-sama wished him to stay in his post, and so he requested someone be sent to his son to look after him. Yohime-sama simply chose me to take that role."

"You are the last person I would think of to perform such a task." I say as I caress my hair.

"Do you have a complain, Mana?" She narrowed her eyes at me as she usually did in our bouts.

"No, it's just… You never liked to be near the peasantry. What made you change your mind?"

"That is a good question indeed, Mana. Could you explain yourself, Maya?" Kazora-sama then picked up his cup and drank without letting go of Maya's gaze.

"Well, one could say…" She closed her eyes, taking a deep breath. "I learned a valuable lesson during my stay in Hiiragi. Father, Takeru taught me we should not be so harsh towards commoners. Nothing good will be gained through such actions. So I must ask you, why do you oppose him so strongly?"

"… Commoners and nobles should not mix. Maya, I have taught you that since an early age. The boy doesn't belong here."

"The same could be said for his father, yet he's one of our best pilots." I say, gaining Kazora-sama's frown on me. "When I asked around after my return, I was told many things about him. But regardless of the rumors about his manners, everyone agreed that Kageyuki Shirogane is one of our best men."

"… Even so, his son's situation is a different one. The boy should be left alone in his life, we should not grow too used to mingling with the peasants. Should we do so, we one day might falter when confronted with a problem that has no easy solution." Me and Maya frown at his words. "What could he gain from this? What good will it do to him to come here to be soundly bested time and again? What do Mion and Shion gain from this 'training'? Nothing, that's what this leaves to all of us."

"Father, I am sure you saw how Shion reacted to his praise." He grimaced at Maya's words. "Shion needed recognition. We never tried being kind to her, we only evaluated her based on her performance in school and in the trainings. If not for Takeru, I doubt I would ever have tried to bequeath her with kindness and simple praise. It is clear she needed us to be by her side, not only physically."

"If I may add, I believe Mion also needs the same. Seeing her reaction to Maya's talk with Shion, how she couldn't stop staring and twiddling her thumbs together while twisting her lips, I believe our faults have met an answer at last. Mion and Shion require us to be more than mere teachers to them, they need us as family as well."

He folded his arms, groaning. After a moment, stroking his beard and looking upwards he let out a long, heavy sigh.

"I am sure you know who we are. We cannot be flaccid in our teachings. We need you four to be as strong as you can as the guardians of the Koubuin House."

"And we also should be able to guide our lords in all matters that they might need. Shion cannot do so in her current condition and Mion also won't be able to do so if she doesn't gain some confidence." Maya nodded at my words, making her father squint his eyes even more.

"Mana, the one who has been watching over them, believes we should proceed in this way. Father, is an opportunity so much to ask of you?" Maya then silently returned her father's gaze.

"… If Yohime-sama allowed it, my opinion doesn't matter. However, you two will be responsible for anything that might happen. If Shion and Mion lower their performance, if the boy is unnecessarily hurt, you two will be made to bear the punishment. Even so, why must you stay with the boy Maya? Why can't his father hire a caretaker himself?" I also look at her, she moves her fringe out of her face as she waited a moment to answer.

"Well, Yohime-sama said she was entrusted by Takahisa-sama with the duty of choosing a caretaker. So if you have any complains, you could voice them to her, Father." The man again grimaced, grabbing his cup and drinking.

"That I shall do. That will be all. You can leave."

"You… do not wish to discuss anything with me, Father?"

"You seem to be in good health. That's all I need to know."

"Maya, shall we be going?" I said as I stood up. She nodded and after we bowed to Kazora-sama we left the room.

Walking towards the room where the kids were taken to, I sigh loudly after some steps.

"You seem unusually tense, Mana."

"Can you blame me? I have never seen you contradict your father. What happened to you, Maya?" She looks down, slowly relaxing her gaze.

"What do you speak of?"

"Please… What has made you change your mind in such a way?"

"I… Could you keep a secret?" I nod. "One day, Yohime-sama called the house." She stopped walking, closing her eyes. "I had believed she had kicked me out of the Guard due to her words."

"Huh? You, kicked out? Why did you even ponder such a thought?" She of all people getting kicked out? Preposterous, how could she ever reach such a conclusion?

"Well, you see… I didn't take the orders well at first."

"I see… Yes, considering how hard you trained I can see how hard you could take it." It is a surprise she even accepted the orders, to be honest. "Then, how… What made you change?"

"That night… I cried." Maya's eyes wander away, her shoulders descend in synchrony with her chest. She… She cried? Maya? Crying? "Takeru saw me and tried to ask me why I was sad. I was most upset at the situation I was in. I couldn't control my emotions… and I hit him."

"Huh?! Maya you… You hit a children?" Seeing her bitter smile as she winced made me feel as if I had just swallowed a thousand needles. Maya… never allowed her emotions to surface in her complexion. Just… What vile parasite had nested itself on her heart?

"I did. He cried loudly his pain out, and yet in the end he apologized. He simply… didn't want to be alone. I cannot explain what it felt like, hearing him pleading me not to leave him in between his tears." I lick my lips over, inhaling slowly, as Maya chuckled for some reason. "Takeru taught me how foolish I was being. I looked down on him, I didn't try to understand his woes, and I leashed out to him to ease up my own suffering. Yet, he didn't scream at me, he didn't grew resentful. I'm sure you realized it on the way here but he's… perhaps too kind for his own good." Maya tapped her glasses and returned to her usual demeanor.

"So… What happened after that?"

"I promised to aid him earnestly, and since then he did many efforts to be better." We resumed walking towards the room. "He still gave me many troubles, mind you. However… I started to see good traits in him, despite his manners. Since then I started to see him and our neighbors differently with the passing of the days. And…" Closing her eyes, she again played with her hair. "As shameful as it is to admit, I do believe he wasn't the only one who received help during this month."

"What do you mean? Don't you tell me you enjoy his hugs, Maya." I was merely poking fun at her… Yet, she closed her eyes and nodded. "… Are you being serious?"

"I hadn't pondered it until moments ago, however… No one ever bestowed such kindness towards me. Not since… Mother died."

"… I see. Yes, since they passed away… our fathers have not been the same."

"At first I was truly upset when he kept hugging me out of the blue. However, for some reason, I stopped complaining at some point. It is shocking, to be honest. I hadn't made the connection but… To act like a family, to be by my sister's side made me remember Mother. I suppose Takeru simply noticed how sad I truly was, how fixated I was on my duty and tried to be kind with me."

"… He sounds like a good boy."

"He is, despite his manners."

"I suppose that means you wish to give that same kindness to Shion?"

"No, not only to Shion. As retainers, we also need to provide emotional support to our rulers. They won't be able to openly show their feelings, so it falls to us to accompany them in their privacy if they were to require guidance when their hearts are afflicted."

"It's good to see we finally agree on something, then." I finally relax and allow a smile to form.

"Indeed. Then, what do you plan to do regarding Shion?"

"That's what I want to ask. I do think having Takeru visiting them may do them good, but Father only gave me a month to prove to them that we can train them differently."

"I see…" Maya closed her eyes and rearranged her glasses as she thought and we took a turn. "Mana, what day is today?"

"Huh? Today? Isn't it March 18th? Why do you ask?"

"What happens in a week's time?" She asked as she looked into my eyes. One week from now… That would be the-

"Oh! Shion's birthday is next Saturday. Are you coming to visit her then too?"

"Yes, however I believe… Takeru might have an idea to help you." She joined her hands together again, stoic and composed unlike that small inkling of shine that was present in her voice now.

"So you think he can help us with the little ones?"

"Considering our talk with Yohime-sama before we went to train with you, I believe our sisters need a… friend. I'm sure that Takeru can make Mion realize how good she truly is and give Shion someone who she doesn't need to compete against. With him simply being himself and us watching over them, I'm of the opinion he can be that presence that they lack in their life. Someone who they don't need to be on their guard all the time."

"… It's truly nice to see how you've changed, Maya."

"What do you mean?" She now lowered her brows at me.

"Well, I never would have thought you would consider someone's feelings so throughly."

"I am more than capable of such a feat, however." She narrowed her eyes at me, I smiled at her.

"That seems to be the case."

"Why are you smiling in such a way?"

"I'm just… happy to not be alone in this anymore." I stop walking, looking upwards.

"Mana? What do you mean?"

"Well… Father hasn't been very… supportive of my ideas as of late. I'm working until night all the time, I haven't seen those two improve at all since you left… I'm glad to see I can count on you two helping me now."

"… Were you that preoccupied?"

"To be frank, yes, I am. Seeing Shion lost in anger from time to time, seeing Mion's gaze sinking deeper every day…"

Feeling the food clogging my stomach, unable to properly sit down to eat as work kept piling up. Constantly arguing with Father and Kazora-sama about my teaching methods. Seeing Meiya-sama trapped in the basement, hearing what is said of her by Father every time I made a report.

"At times it feels as if I were trying to reach the stars by climbing a mountain, only to realize that they where farther away than I thought as I reached the summit. Unable to aid Mion and Shion or have my words reach them, as if I was left on the shore and they sailed away to the horizon, Father's acceptance equally distant… I truly feared you would agree with them." I said letting some air out, feeling the trickle of cold water all over my back as it did during my training on that mountain.

"You… feared it?"

"Yes… If you agreed to them, Shion would follow your example. If she did so, nothing I could do would be enough to aid Mion with her self-esteem. It is truly a relief, to see you share my thoughts." I smile at her honestly, Maya's brow furrow slightly.

"I see… I never noticed you were under such pressure while I was here."

"No, while you were here I was managing fine. Who do you think is doing your share of work while you're gone?"

"Wait, you aren't getting any help?"

"We don't really have any hands to spare for the work you used to do. I do not know how you managed to file all those reports on time."

I frankly don't. Not only I can't read your handwriting but those odd signs and drawings you use to sort the reports are simply beyond my understanding. And that's not delving into what I had to do when your program stopped working all of a sudden. The code you wrote to automate the mails and computer related tasks you did is simply beyond my understanding.

"Well, you'd do well in learning how to automate the simpler tasks." Look at you, taking pride in having your code in such disarray.

"Sigh… Well, in any case it is good to hear you're on my side for this. Can you tell me what Takeru might suggest for Shion's birthday?"

"If he reacts the same as before… I believe he'll suggest us to bring a cake and presents for her." Maya said as she caressed her fringe.

"Cake? Oh, maybe I should bake one myself?"

"Hmm… That would make it more personal, I suppose. I do not recall if Shion liked such sweet food however."

"I am sure she will be pleased, and since a cake can be shared we could try to have her give some to Mion. Perhaps then they could use that to start becoming closer." Maya nods at my words. It is truly good to see we can now talk in this way. Finally, with a long sigh in the middle, the boulders that were bound to my shoulders eased up their hold on me.

"In any case, I am sure Takeru will insist on having cake on her birthday. I will leave it to you if you can do it, but if you don't have the time do contact me. I may not be as good a baker as you but I can manage."

"Hmm… Yes, receiving a cake from you would be the best present Shion could ask for now. I will let you take care of that then." Considering all I have to do I won't have the time.

However, I should prepare in advance for Mion's birthday. I am sure she will be happy, and if I can show her how much she means for me that will do wonders for her confidence. And if Shion can also start to be a bit more supportive towards her I'll be able to prove to Father that there are other pathways available to us in regards to their training.

Approaching the room where the children should be, an attendant came to our side and gave us a bow.

"Tsukuyomi-sama, we have been awaiting you."

"Thank you for your hard work. How are the children?"

"They seem to be fine. We brought some sushi for them to eat just moments ago."

"Sushi?" Maya's brow's twitched. "By any chance, did you bring natto rolls to them?"

"Yes, I believe some were brought to them."

"Maya, what is this about-"

"Who is watching over the children as of now?" Maya took a step forward, the attendant lowered his gaze at the sharp tone of her words.

"I was watching over them, but I was told you were arriving shortly and they were behaving well so-"

"You left Takeru. Alone in that room. With natto rolls near him?"

"Maya, what's the matter?"

Before I could react, she dashed to the door. And as we entered, we saw little Takeru sulking on a chair as he ate a natto roll. He looks so cute…

"Oh, Maya-nee! Where were you?" Noticing us, he came to our side.

"Takeru, how many of those did you eat?" Hm? Why is she so worried about that? Little Takeru's brows arched as he looked away.

"… Just a few of them."

"Shion, how many did he eat?" Maya asked her sister, she got closer as she had her arms folded.

"He ate most of them. Only two or three are left. I cannot understand how he could eat so much with the smell they have." Shion grimaced at Takeru, who puffed his cheeks at her.

He ate… most of them himself? Maya pulled his ear and he started complaining.

"Takeru, what did I told you about moderation?"

"They told me I could eat them if I wanted to!"

"Just because you can do something doesn't mean you should. Your stomach is going to hurt much later." Maya released him and glared at him. He looked away as he rubbed his ear.

"But they were tasty…" Aww… Just look at those eyes…

"Maya, I believe you could be a bit more lenient with him?"

"I am his retainer, Mana."

"Well, but you could try to be less abrasive in your scolding."

"If I do, he wouldn't mend his mistakes."

"Were I his retainer, I would approach him in a more patient, understanding way. I fail to see what good will pulling his ear do for little Takeru."

"… Thank you kindly for your suggestion. However, I will teach Takeru in the way I find most appropriate."

"Hey, aren't you going to eat?" Takeru pulls Maya's sleeve, breaking the clashing of our stares.

The children were taken to a small living room where guests usually wait before meetings, they had some tables, a few sofas and a bookshelf filled with varied offerings. Some food was still on one table, and we sat down and ate for a moment. I couldn't help to notice how the boy seemed unwilling to look at the girls for some reason. Mion and Shion had opted to sit in front of him, they were also avoiding looking at him.

"Takeru, what is the matter? It is rare for you to be so quiet." Maya said as she looked at him, he remained sulking however.

"… I lost all the times."

"Lost? At what?" I asked but soon got my answer as he pointed towards another table. A Shogi board was set up, some pieces already moved.

"I won all the matches. He is severely lacking in his Shogi skills." Shion said, arms folded and with an air of superiority as if she were merely gazing at an animal doing tricks to her whim.

"Even I could beat him without much trouble." Mion said before drinking some water.

"But I then bested you too." Shion quickly retorted.

"Shion, do not act in such a way." Maya directed a gaze at her, Shion tensed up and sat straight as she did. "You should always remain humble regardless of your results. Now, why don't you try your luck against me?"

"Truly?" Shion quickly dropped her edge, happily moving to the table to spar against Maya.

I instead moved to sit near the still sulking boy. Looking at him, he looks so innocent. To think Maya hit him… Even if she felt left out, how could she harm such a cute boy? Look at him, who would ever harm such a sweetheart? It's the same with Meiya-sama, I cannot comprehend why people would scorn them.

"Say Takeru…" I say and he looks at me. "Have you ever played Shogi before?"

"Yes, a few times with Maya-nee."

"I see. Did you have fun as you played?"

"Yeah… But I lost." He slightly puffed his cheeks.

"Well, you can always try again. By the way, did you know that next Saturday is Shion's birthday?"

"Eh? Really?" His eyes immediately regained light as he rose, all displeasure cleared from his face as if a sudden wind had banished all clouds from the skies. "Are you having a party?"

"Party?"

"Yeah, a birthday party. Like with books, and music, and cake. What are you going to give her as a present?" So Maya was right.

"Hmm… That's going to be a secret."

"Huh? Why?" Hehehe… He really does look cute when he furrows his brows like that.

"Well, it's not going to be a surprise if she knew, right?"

"Ooh… Yes, you're right."

"Well, you will come visit next Saturday, won't you?"

"Yeah! Ah… I can come, right? The old people won't get mad?"

"No, it is alright. So, you'll be here for her birthday?"

"Yes, I will. Thanks for inviting me, Mana-nee." He then got closer from his seat and gave me a hug. Uuh… Patting his back and feeling his small hands on me pikes at the stones on me, sending them crashing away from my body. If only I could do the same for… Hm?

"Say Takeru, what do you say of playing some games with Mion while Maya is busy?"

"Are you sure? She didn't seem to have fun with me."

"Mion, would you like to play something now?"

"Eh? Play?" Mion was sitting some distance away from us, her hands joined by her lap. Again, looking down and expressionless as usual.

"Yes, why don't we play some Shogi? Or would you like to play something else?" I went to her side, trying to pat her head. However, my hands halted as I once more saw her tense expression as if she were frozen in place.

"No… I don't want to bother you, Sister. Please rest easy, I am fine."

"Why is she calling you that?" Takeru came to my side and peeked at Mion with his brows furrowed.

"… That is how I should call Sister. I am not as rude as you."

"I'm not rude, I'm friendly. So, you wanna play something else, Mion?" He also got closer, Mion's gaze trailed towards her own lap as her lips formed a line.

"I am fine. And please, do not call me by my name. You're not my family."

"Then can we be friends?"

"… Friends? What is that?"

"You know… Friends. People you have fun with." Takeru scratched his head as he tried to explain it to her with his clumsy words, to which Mion only furrowed her brows as she tilted her head.

"Mion, it won't do you any harm to spend some time with us, right?" She looks at me and, after her hands shuffle around themselves, she gave a nod.

"If you're not busy…"

"Then let's play something!" Takeru grabbed her hand and got her off the seat.

Mion's eyes widened yet she didn't release herself. Takeru said we should play something other than Shogi, however we do not have any toys or games to speak of here. On his suggestion, we instead played a guessing game with one of the books we had on the room where we were. I had grabbed a book about some of our traditional stories and he managed to guess many times before Mion when I asked them about our folktales.

"How can you not know what happens to Issun Boshi?"

"I haven't read the story in a long time." Mion answered in her polite voice, still as stiff as ice.

"I mean… What do you do to have fun, Mion?" Mion's gaze fell down at his question, my heart feeling a pressure tantamount to having a blade riveted on my throat. I delayed a breath as her eyelids descended and her shoulders tried to make themselves smaller.

"… Fun? I… I am busy studying for school and practicing my swordplay. I do not have time to slack off."

"Mion, relaxing for some moments isn't slacking off. I myself read some manga from time to time. I believe it would do you good to find a hobby you like."

"No… Sister, I am behind in my lessons. Father would be most upset at me."

"That is not true, Mion. Haven't you been doing your best efforts in school and in the dojo all this time?"

"I'm not good enough, Sister."

"Why? You're good in Shogi and you fight with Shion all the time, right? You must be really good then!" Takeru comments with a smile.

"Maybe to you, but I can't best Shion yet. I always lose in our practice at the dojo."

"But you're not giving up. Only one can win so it's not that bad to lose from time to time."

"Eh? Only one can win?" Mion pondered his words for a moment, seeing how her lips plucked at him… I could use this to get her out of her cage.

"Yes, only one can win. Losing doesn't make you bad." He said as he rose a fist again.

"Even so, I can never give her a good duel."

"Mion, think about what Takeru told you. If you were to best Shion once, would that mean she wasn't doing enough in her training?"

"Huh? I… Um…"

"Can you see it? Were she to lose, Shion would still have her good grades in school, like you do as well. Honing each other together does not mean only one has to win, doesn't it? If only one could triumph over the rest there would be no point in training all four of us to work together. We all are to cooperate so there isn't a single winner in the long term. Would you not agree?"

"I suppose…"

"I don't know why you're so down, you just gotta try again until you win!" Takeru told her, getting closer and grabbing her hands. "I mean, I lost super bad with I'm still going to try. You just gotta do your best until you win. But you can't overworry or get sad. That's why you should have fun once in a while."

"… Please release my hands. You don't know how hard it is, to fight with Shion." She looks away, her head hanging lower once more.

"I got hit in the head today. And I could barely do anything. You're better than me, right?" She nods slowly. "Can you actually hit her sometimes?"

"Yes, I can. But I always lose in the end."

"Then you just gotta hit her harder!" He released her and rose his tiny fists upwards.

"Huh? Harder?" Her eyes widened as she tilted her head at his simple advice.

"Yeah, if you can only hit her once then that hit has to count!" He furrowed his brows and puffed his cheeks. "If you can only hit her a few times, then you gotta win with those hits!"

"… If I can only hit a few times… then I have to win with those few hits…"

"Mion, his words do have some merit behind them." I pat her shoulder, caressing the back of her head as she looked at me. "You don't have to do the same that Shion does. You can fight how you find it most comfortable. Me and Maya don't use the same approach after all."

"Truly?"

"Yes, that is the case." I pat the top of her head like Maya did, Mion seems to be shaking a bit. "Why don't we practice together in my style, to see if you find it useful?"

"Would it be alright? I don't want to trouble you."

"You're no trouble, my sister. Would you like to train, just the two of us together?" Usually, she would have receded inside her shell. However, she now was tapping her fingers together, her lips twisting. She finally returned my gaze, the small flickering of a candle blistering behind the thick layer of ice that had covered her eyes as of late.

"Um… If you're not busy…"

"Of course I'm not. Do we have an agreement?"

"Yes… Yes, we do." She finally nodded. She agreed to do something new. Sigh…

"So, aside from your studies, how do you have fun?" Takeru asked again.

"Well, I read mangas." Seeing Mion was still unwilling to answer, I did so myself. "What do you do, Takeru?"

"I read folktales with a friend back home. There's also a book of poetry I got for my birthday that I haven't read in a long time. And that giant book of the monkeys and that weird island." He puffs his cheeks as he said the last one. Mion put a finger to her lips, narrowing her brows.

"Monkeys? Oh, do you speak of the Malediction of Monkey Isle?"

"Yeah, that one! It's so long… I'm not even near half of it and I've been reading it for a long time too." He folds his arms as he pouts.

"Mion, do you know of that book?"

"Yes, we were once asked to read a foreign book that was translated into Japanese and that series of books was in the list of options. It was a large book so I didn't choose it, but it did seem interesting. Shirogane, what do you think of the book?"

"Ta-ke-ru, call me Takeru. That's my name."

"Um… It would be rude for me to call you by your name."

"But aren't we friends?"

"Well… Sister? What do you think?"

"It won't harm you, at the least." He looks at him, Takeru smiles at her and she looks down, tapping her fingers together. She finally nods at him. Uuh… They look so cute… I take a deep breath to calm myself down before speaking up. "So Takeru, what do you say of talking about it with us? Maybe you could bring those books here when you come visit and read them with Mion?"

"Oh! Yeah, I'll do that if Maya-nee lets me bring it. Then we can eat cake as we read it."

"… Cake? Sister, what is that?" Mion tilted her head as she folded her arms.

"Mion, you… don't know what that is?"

"No, I do not. What kind of food is it?"

"Oh, it's really sweet!" Takeru said, again getting a tad bit too close to Mion. "It has all this cream, and it's really soft, and it also can have strawberries and chocolate!"

"I see… Is it really that good?" She asked, curiously leaning forward.

"Yeah! It's super tasty!"

"Well, you'll get to try it next weekend. Should we read some books until Maya finishes her duel?" Takeru nodded in an instant, whereas Mion hesitated as her hands fumbled together.

"Um… Sister, would it be alright to have fun?"

"Of course it is. Shion is also relaxing now, right?" We all look at the table were the turquoise ones were.

It looks like they just began another match. Shion no longer has that roughness in her movement, that tint in her eyes as if she was always ready to fight. Now it looked as if she finally was calm enough to properly practice her calligraphy or do some origami.

"See? Shion is also taking a break. So you should do so too, Mion." She nodded as she looked at her cousin. "You are reading the book Takeru will bring next week with him, right?"

"Um… If he doesn't mind…"

"I don't, so let's read it together." He again gave her a handshake with a bright smile. "Next time I come I'll bring that large book and we'll read it together as we eat some cake. So don't be so down, Mion."

"Why do you insist on calling me by my name?"

"I mean… Aren't we friends?"

"… We could be, but… Why?"

"What do you mean, why? I just wanna be your friend. If you wanna read with me then you're my friend, Mion. So, what do you want to read now?"

He and Mion debated for a moment on what to read next. She was still being polite to him but she had dropped her tension. I watched their exchange and then we all read the book they chose together.

How thankful I am to you, Takeru. I am blessed for you to have come aid me right in this moment. I surely hope you can be a good friend to both Mion and Shion.

I do wonder if Mion will like the cake Maya brings, but at the least she might be able to enjoy reading with you. If Shion can stop being so aggressive with you, maybe you'll finally be able to smile again. And who knows? Maybe she'll be interested in that book and I can use that to make them get along from now on.

Regardless, he's really funny to be around. I can see why Maya likes you so much, he is not very polite but he is very attentive, in his own way. And I am glad Maya thinks like I do regarding our sisters. I can only hope Shion's birthday goes well, for both of them.

The only thing that is left piking at my heart is… If only I could give Meiya-sama a good friend like you, Takeru… I only she could have one person she could treat as her equal…

November 27 th , 2001.

[Takeru]

---

Ugh… Chest hurts… Can't… breathe well… Where the hell am I?

Some sort of run down corridor, tilted to my left and with moonlight coming from the windows, except it's green for some reason is all I can distinguish amidst the fog.

Can't find an exit… What the hell is… happening here?

Struggling to keep walking, I realized something was looking at me at the distance.

In a flash, my feet froze up. Said something zoomed in, holding me by the wrists. Looking up at it, not recognizing what the hell it was, my feet sprung into action, kicking at the thing, pushing with all my might to release me.

The dark silhouette didn't budge, it stood still as if it were a statue. Some sort of dress was on it… and its eyes were… oddly round and big. Biting its lips, gazing into me with a look as hateful as Sumika's when she screamed bloody murder in her frenzy, its nails dug into my skin, peeling it off as if it were the foreskin of a roasted chicken.

"Gah! Let me go!"

No matter how hard I kick or struggle I can't break away. As if the thing were using charcoal instead of soap to clean my wrists, the pain doesn't end despite my efforts.

" No, you are the one who has to let go."

"… Huh?"

For some reason, I can't move again. As our eyes met, as the green moonlight grew stronger, as everything else around seemed to warp as if sucked into a twister, the… thing began to bite its lips far more strongly. It began to shake, fissures appearing on it, bits and pieces of the silhouette began to… fall off…

And the restrained but hostile expression… crumbled away to reveal a far, far more menacing glare, one that could kill in a mere glance. Those lightless eyes… that hawkish tint… where have I seen them before?

" Release me."

"What?… You are the one that's-"

" I told you to release me!"

One arm was raised, twisting into some eldritch, jagged shape, as the other kept me in place. Barely raising my free arm to protect me, the impact sent me flying away. Despite being hit on the face, what hurts the most is my chest. Feel as if I had taken a hundred slashes right at the heart, as if she had hurled the charcoal she was using to wash my hands right at my chest.

" Cough … Cough…"

Hurts… Everything hurts… Shivering and doing hiccups, trying to stand up and look around, my hands make contact with… something.

"What the hell is… going on…" Hunched over, as I blink I realize I'm on the… ground.

Dirt, grass… Standing up, looking around, I don't know where this is. Bare patches of dirt, humid and rugged, some grass here and there… and a bunch of stone slabs. In rows, some creaking, others crumbling. Some had vases near them, with dying, drying flowers in them. Some had sunflowers, other had lilies, others were too dry to tell.

As I glanced around, within this thick fog and the same green moonlight, walking around, hearing literally nothing but my steps, the rows just have no end to them.

The silhouette wasn't around anymore, yet I couldn't shake the feeling that something was close by despite the silence.

This place looks like a graveyard, and yet I hear no crows, no other steps, no… nothing.

Licking my lips, I pick up my pace. Glancing back, I don't see the silhouette from before.

And yet, no matter how much I walk, there is no end to this place. The temperature seemed to be cooling down, I could see my breath as I rubbed my arm. It feels as if someone had given me a hug after touching snow.

"Heey! Is anyone here?!"

Gasping as a dog after running in summer, I keep changing directions, yet I find no one here.

No matter how much I scream, no one answers me back.

There is no one… no one left… lost in a graveyard…

Wait…

Looking at the graves around me as I slowed down to catch my breath… I know these names, don't I?

Sumika, Meiya, Kei, Chizuru, Tama, Marimo-chan… with the dates of the accidents back in my world, and those in last loop as well.

Again, the charcoal hit my chest as their voices began to echo around me, as those moments returned to me.

The wings of fire cover those two graves, a thunderbolt falls on another, the smaller one is crushed down, other begins to slowly freeze over while the last one explodes. And all the while, their voices kept echoing about.

Inhaling sharply, rubbing my forehead, I managed to drown out those voices once I ran away from those graves' side… But as I did, my ears picked up a noise rising in intensity around the place as the fog became thicker and a cold shiver ran up my back.

Somebody else… A voice… A cold, ruthless, and enraged voice.

" Thereby, I declare you to be removed from the inner echelons of our fellowship."

The ground began to shake, yet not as violently as my knees. The clouds began to swirl, cover the sky. The grass on the ground began to dry up, the ground cracked up, resembling a wasteland, the vases broke down, the flowers within crumbled to ashes.

Gasping for air, feeling something else coming closer, I broke into a sprint.

" You shall be stripped of the honor of carrying my house's emblem on you henceforth."

As I kept running away, the voice followed me. Glancing around, nothing was nearby, no silhouettes or anything, but the voice was still there. As if breathing down my neck, as if aiming for my nape. Not paying attention, a rock found my feet as I sprinted, sending me to the ground.

" You shall forthwith regain your past station, along the obligations that with it come."

Looking up, a grave was right in front of me.

It was cracked, the round arc on top broken in places, and it also was almost wholly covered in moss, as if nobody had come to take care of it in years.

No flowers were nearby, it didn't even have a vase or anything. The area around it was mossy as well, grass sprouting to its sides.

Losing my breath, clawing at the ground, I couldn't even blink to release myself from what read on the stone slab.

Takeru Shirogane

December 16 th , 1982 - June 29 th , 1998

" Farewell, Ta… Shirogane."

Then, the ground teared itself open. Roots shoot out at me, trying to drag me into the hole.

"Guh… Damn it, what the fuck is this?! I'm not dead!"

Trying to take the vines off me, my feet sink into the ground. My joints getting bent into stiffness, my neck beginning to be pulled backwards towards the hole, I dug the fingers of my only free hand into the dirt, trying to rise back.

As I did, it seemed as if the green moonlight began to shine in between the dark clouds above. In sync with that, another voice… one that I think I recognize began to speak from somewhere .

" This is no time to be spawning rifts in our ranks. Come with me, and I shall aid you in your apology."

For some reason, I can't help but to grit my teeth, frown at the tone of the voice.. all-knowing… superior… Apologize for what? I did nothing wrong…

" You have fifteen minutes, I shall take my leave afterwards. Choose wisely, Takeru. This might be the only chance you have to correct your mistakes."

That… condescending… cold… and prideful tone… It pisses me off.

"I didn't do anything wrong! I'm only… trying to save as many as I can…"

That's why I push forward… That's why I keep moving on… Because there's no joy in martyrdom… There's no boon that could outweight all the lives that we've lost to this war…

I can see them again… the last transmission… the reactor room… The bloodstained face. I can hear their cries, of laughter when we met, of pain when we parted.

" I've nothing to apologize for. I'll keep struggling until I reach my peaceful world! You and your holier-than-thou act of superiority can go fuck themselves for all I care! Go and leave if you want, I'll cleave a path forward by myself if I have to!"

Not a second after I said that, the clouds covered the moon again. And as it was obscured in its entirety, the ground began to close up, the vines pulled with far more strength than I was ready to endure.

My fingers getting caught in the closing edges of the ground, as if they got stuck in a closing cockpit, made them gave up and I fell down into the dark, cold underground. Everything in utter silence, the walls began to close in, more and more, until my limbs began to turn in angles that shouldn't be possible.

Ugh… S-Stop… C-Can't breathe… The vines keep pushing me down, yet I feel like I can finally begin to resist their hold, pushing and kicking in what little space I have left.

Let me go… I haven't… fixed anything yet… This can't… won't end like this… I am not allowing these setbacks to get in the way anymore… this accursed war… all these sacrifices…

Something begins to push my back as the thrashing of the vines eases up, yet I still can't see anything, can't breathe well.

It hurts… It's so cold… Feels so… empty… so lonely…

"… ru-san."

Ugh… Gotta get out… Can't die… here… I haven't… accomplished anything yet… Like hell I'll surrender like they did… I won't forget, I won't forgive…

"Takeru-san!"

THUD!

"Guh… Huh?"

… What am I doing on the floor? Ugh… Head hurts… Chest too, can't breath well. My limbs feel numb, as if I were sleeping in an odd position. Ugh…

Taking some breaths, blinking a bit, it looks like I just fell from my bed. Why didn't I hear Kasumi waking me up?… What was I dreaming about?

Ugh… Shit, my head feels so heavy… Think there's a buzz in my ears zooming in too…

I feel a hand atop my hair, ruffling it slowly.

"Takeru-san, did you have another nightmare?"

"… Yeah." She softly pats my head for a while, I close my eyes as she does. "Thanks, Kasumi." Slowly getting up, feeling my ankles wobbling as if made of jelly, I sit on my bed. She looks super worried, eyes focused right into mine.

"Do you want me to suppress the memory?"

"No… It's… It's fine."

Inhaling deeply a few times in a row, rubbing my eyes and my nose, I finally manage to exhale a long, heavy sigh. A few tears running out as I did, I rose my arms to stretch and get rid of the stiffness in me.

"What was it this time? Are you truly alright?"

"Yeah, I'm… okay. Still, I… don't really recall what I'm dreaming about as of late. It's just… this suffocating feeling, this tension on my back." Though, it's the first time I fall off my bed because of a nightmare.

Yawning and then exhaling a sigh at the tail end of it, resting my arms on my legs, the more I try to remember the less I do. All that's left is… this empty feeling on my heart, like those days when I didn't had the willpower to get out of my bed back in my world after all the accidents.

Again, Kasumi pats my head. Giving me a smile, she takes a step closer and grabs one of my hands. As she does, very slowly, the tingly feeling comes back to the back of my head, and as it does, images of my life back in my world come back to me. The last games we played in the arcade, the times we met up after we got into college, the fun we had in school, and also… the other worlds where I could choose someone to be with.

Visiting art galleries with Chizuru, going to different restaurants with Kei, playing videogames with Meiya or having snowball fights against each other, helping to find homes for stray cats with Tama, and messing around with Sumika as we took our vacations from college, placing which sauce we would use for dinner as the prize of our usual squabbles.

… We really enjoyed ourselves back then… didn't we?

"… Thanks Kasumi, I'm alright for real now." This must be hard on her, to bring back these many images this early.

"I see. Your mind still feels tired. Should we postpone today's recovery session?"

"… Actually, there was something I wanted to see. So, if I'm still feeling fine by night, let's give it a go." She held my gaze for a sec, scanning me. Then, she gave a nod.

"Very well."

"Alright… Sigh, I'll get ready. You can go back now."

"Okay, have a nice day. Bye bye." Waving at me, I do the same as she goes her way.

And once she does, I let out a huge sigh out. Getting up and splashing my face with cold water, rinsing my mouth, and hesitating for a moment before getting on the shower, the heaviness on my shoulders refused to leave.

… Those days were truly blessed… Just spending time with my beloved, despite the arguments we had every now and then… Yeah, focus on what you can do… No idea what this nightmare was about, but hell if I let it bring me down. After all that happened, after how useless I was last loop to aid my squadmates, and after the accidents that befell my world…

"Yeah… I've got a mess to fix. I'll despair after I'm dead." Because I can work towards saving them, because the reset will fix my world.

Getting out, drying myself up, and putting on my uniform, that I should send to the laundry after this training, I leave my cell and go to pick up my breakfast. Better hurry or I'll miss the morning trainings.

Maybe I'll ask Sensei for permission bring some dumbbells with me to the office she gave me, I feel like I'm starting to lose muscle since I can't go to run or exercise at my leisure anymore.

---

(Same Day. A few minutes past Noon.)

(Sim Room.)

---

"Sei!" I dash forward and slash at the enemy. One less, two remaining.

"Shirogane-san, you're leaving my range!"

"Sorry, Tama. I'll pull back now, cover me." I back-boost towards her position. The next one should come right… Ah, there it is. Tama took down the stock Fubuki that was coming at me from behind a building in no time.

I hear Meiya charging to my left, shooting at the last one, then the message of BETA alert appears on my view and I quickly shoot at the silhouette of the Heavy Laser-Class. A message appears, informing us that we cleared the exercise.

"Good job, you three." The Instructor informs us, a smirk in her face as big as the horizon from atop the hill. "You've completed Level C-5, return to your starting point and we'll finish this session."

"Understood!"

And with that, the stock city vanishes from my view, the data link with the sim is ended, and I'm back at the cockpit. Unbolting myself out of the seat, I sigh for a sec as I comfortably lean back on it.

Thanks to my knowledge of the exercises, I could guide the girls towards victory without looking like I'm cruising through this thing, and I can leave the rough spots to them, forcing them to improve. So far, the plan is going well.

Today we did some drills for the Feedback Protector during early morning after the lecture on how to properly use it, the same question of what we would do if we were stranded on it in the middle of the class, and then NotMarimo-chan had the girls have a go at Level D's final courses while she had me take on the FP course by myself.

Once that was done, she put us in two teams of three and we've been going at it since. To be honest we're making decent progress, better than last loop even, despite Tama still being reluctant to go into CQC or long dashes and Meiya's propensity to do the opposite to cover us, hesitating a lot when she was left without choice but to engage in long range. Both of them need that awareness, the first about the closer space, and the other about the surrounding area, to grow into the pilots they need to be. But, well, one step at a time.

I get out of my pod just as the other three were also going out.

"I told you to cover Yoroi!" Chizuru chased after Ayamine, who let out a heavy sigh, slowly turning towards her while taking a hand to her chin.

"The attacks were coming from our right, I was in a better position to strike both of them, so you should have covered my advance." Despite having her usual calm face, it was obvious she wasn't in a good mood. This is just like when we had to work together during my first loop.

"No, you should have sticked to the plan. Enemies won't stay put in the middle of battle, charging alone just because you thought it was a good idea will only bring us down!" She berated her while making circles in the air, stomping the back of one of her feet on the floor.

"We wouldn't have lost if you had covered her, you failed." Kei shrugs as she looks away and tries to go her way, only for Chizuru to step in front of her.

"What was that?! You're the one that-"

"Chizuru-san, Kei-san, please stop fighting! I was the one that couldn't dodge both bombs, so I'm the one who caused us to lose."

"Yoroi, stay quiet. That wouldn't have happened if Ayamine hadn't gone rogue, placing herself and the mission in danger."

"Your addiction to rules and the 'proper way' to do things is gonna get us killed in real life."

"And your tendency to do whatever you want is gonna get many people killed. You're a soldier, you have to follow your leader's orders! How are we supposed to work together if you don't?"

"Not if those orders will get me killed pointlessly. I train to save lives, not to die to stroke your boner for defensive and coward tactics." Chizuru's eyes blaze up and she was almost about to strike Kei as the Instructor spoke up.

"Squad, line up!" We all quickly form a line by the side of the sim pods. She's staring at Chizuru and Kei smirking from ear to ear.

"We've all finished the drill, Instructor." Chizuru does the usual talk, but her hands are still shaking.

"Good job. Sakaki, Ayamine, Yoroi, while you barely passed it, it is amazing you completed Level C-5 in only your second day. Mitsurugi, Tamase, Shirogane, your teamwork was marvelous, you completely dominated the course." Her smirk eases up, nodding our way. "I said it yesterday but you're all breaking the records of all previous squads I trained, so keep it up." They all smile, even Kei and Chizuru. Finally seeing their training bear fruit is one very important step to forge them into the pilots we need them to be. "However… Shirogane, I have a few questions for you." Now what did I do?

"What is it?"

"What exactly were you doing?"

"Huh? What are you talking about?"

"I'm talking about your moves. I've never seen someone move in such patterns, it's reckless to be honest. Could you explain to me what were you trying to achieve?"

Right, not only I am still relearning how to move with the old OS, but I also have been trying some of his movements these days. The sidesteps are really useful since I can't cancel now that I got the timings figured out. Oh well, let's explain to her all the concepts of Valgern-On.

---

One long explanation later…

---

"… This sounds terribly complicated. Where did you learn of this?"

"Nowhere, I just thought it was a good idea." Can't say a thing about the consoles now.

"Hmm… It does seem like you're onto something here. Do keep these new moves to a minimum, understood?"

"Yes, Ma'am."

"Then, since we still have some time, let's proceed towards Level C-4. This time you'll fight against seven AI controlled TSFs, so be careful. Same teams and pods as before, move along!"

"Roger!"

We get back into the sim pods, I take a look at the other three before entering myself. Kei and Chizuru were, as usual, not looking at each other or even talking. Sigh… Considering our talk yesterday, Kei might just be on edge. Even more considering how this world is, but when I talked she was clearly shutting herself away. If things keep going like this, I'll have to rely on Tama and Meiya to clear the air between those two.

After properly bolting myself to the seat, I press the button and the visage comes to my sight. Another generic ruined city… Can't we get anything different? Like some giant dome, a battle on the shore, or a forest on the mountains? This isn't preparing us well to fight the BETA. Sigh…

"Shirogane, Tamase, report your status." Meiya's face appeared on my view, the data link to my team formed.

"05 Tamase, all green."

"06 Shirogane, all green."

"So, do any of you have a proposal for how we should operate for this mission?"

If I recall correctly, there's five of them in the middle of the city waiting to ambush us. When two of them came scouting near us, I remember that I started chasing after them and Tama had to save me from all the other ones during my first loop. Let's force Tama to take care of this one, to get her some more confidence in her belt.

"06, I'll go scouting near our position. 02, can you remain close by in case I spot the enemy?"

"Hmm… What about 05?"

"Tama can remain farther behind us since she's got the range to back us up, and if someone goes after her, you would still be close enough to cover her until I rejoin you." I believe it's a good excuse, today I want to make Tama get as much experience as I can.

"I have no objections. 05, what do you think?"

"I also agree with 06's plan."

"Alright. Then, 06, taking off."

After a long dash, I boost jump landing myself near a couple of tall buildings. Meiya was slowly coming towards my position. Taking some air in, trying to remember how this training went, shrugging off the heaviness that still lingered on my shoulders, after a look at the map my Fubuki slowly walks further into the city.

Checking my radar as I go, taking a turn to my left, I still see nothing. I do wonder if we're gonna fight against the AI that Sensei pitted against me in the Gekishin at some point. That was nuts, how they locked me down in a few minutes. It would be awesome if the rest could-

A beep in my radar snaps me out of dreamland, there they are. The signals of the enemy start moving towards me, spraying their ammo upon me as they appear on my sight. Since the delay is still on, my Fubuki could buckle and dodge easily, lazily returning a few volleys to make a convincing act to those watching the monitor.

"06, found two! Currently engaging them."

"02, roger that. I'll go cover you. Move towards these coordinates." A cross appears on my radar, an open park to the west of my position. I see, to allow Tama to snipe them. I knew I could count on you, Meiya.

I backboost while shooting at them, just so that they don't get too close. Doing some jumps and trying to do some cancel moves, I manage to avoid most shots while also doing some damage to their hands. As one got a bit too close, fire opened from my right. Meiya had joined and we retreated to the park while keeping the two of them from shooting at us.

The thing is, the park is near the center of the city, and if I'm not wrong the other five TSFs are probably somewhere near there, waiting for us. Dashing towards the park through the half-broken streets while I keep a close eye on the radar and our surroundings, the other five TSFs appear as soon as we enter the open space. Taking two seconds, they start shooting at us.

"Damn, we got ambushed! 06, fall back!" Meiya starts retreating, but I take a forward dash and slash at one of our first chasers that got too close, knocking it out.

"No, we can take them! 05, can you snipe them from your position?"

"Eh?! I… I think." Her brows arched down, lips moved slowly in hesitation.

"Then go for it, we can hold out for a while. The enemies will get exposed as they try to get a clear shot at us."

"06, I am the leader of- Ugh!" She had to crouch and retreat behind a building as she was targeted by the TSFs.

"Let Tama try to nullify them, if we can break through their ambush they're done for." I boost jump and take cover behind a building to Meiya's three. Then, one of the ambushers gets taken down. Atta girl, Tama.

"06, let's focus our fire on the ones to our three. 05, aim at the ones to our nine." Quick as always, my dear Meiya.

"Roger!"

I shoot a 120mm at the one that was chasing us while Meiya distracts him, taking it down. Tama took down another one to our left. Then, Meiya boost jumped towards the two on our right, guns blazing. Sending a few volleys towards the broken buildings near the stock Fubukis, the resulting collapse caused their firing to get delayed long enough to allow her to get close safely, I then get back behind the building to reload.

Once she landed, the radar showed me Meiya dashed at both of them. Looking her way once more to support the charge, Meiya was in the middle of drawing her sword. She took down one with a downwards slash, and followed it with a dash and a wide slash aimed at the waist of the second one. The second Fubuki, however, back-dashed out of her range behind a building. Meiya tried to follow, but ended up smacking herself onto the building, and the TSF quickly aimed and shot at her at point blank before I could lock onto it. I finish it off from afar, as Tama also snipes the other one to our left.

The usual green message appears on my view, mission complete.

"Good job, squad. Return to your initial positions." We acknowledge our orders, the ruined city vanishes from view.

"Tama, good job with those shots." She appears in my view with a small cat-like smile.

"Oh, it was nothing. You and Mitsurugi-san endured their fire despite being so close."

"Nah, if it weren't for your marksmanship we would have lost this round. Don't go all modest on us, you can be proud of this result." She giggles as she smiles, scratching one of her ears.

However, Meiya hasn't chimed in and she's not in view either.

"Hey, Meiya. Good job covering me."

… No answer. She must be very upset.

After removing the bolts, I exit the pod. Tama was already outside nervously playing with the end of her hair. Meiya was giving me her back, so I can't tell what kind of face she's making.

"Hey Meiya, what's up? Are you upset?"

"I am not." She faces me, folding her arms and pursing her lips. Yeah, no. You're super upset.

"Thanks for covering me, and sorry for not being able to do the same for you at the end." I did hold back, to let her take all the glory. But that seems to have backfired.

"Do not apologize, I was the one who overestimated my own dexterity. If this had been a real fight, I would have died."

"D-Don't be so hard on yourself, Mitsurugi-san. I was able to land all of my shots because you two did a wonderful work holding out against so many enemies." Tama beams at her, but Meiya looks away as she sighs looking downwards, tilting her head to a side.

"Hey, you can always improve. We're making superb progress, so don't get all down. We all are making great progress so far, right?" I give her a pat on the shoulder, causing her to look up, recovering a bit of her usual shine.

"I… Thanks, Shirogane. Forgive me for being down, I just expected more of myself."

"… Does this has anything to do with the buff man that came on Sunday?"

"Buff man?" Tama tilted her head, narrowing her brows.

"Oh… Yes, it is related to that matter." Sobering up, she sighs as she caresses her air intakes. "I merely wish to complete the basic training as best as I can. A most harsh test is lying in wait for me, so I might have been too reckless today due to my own anxiety. Forgive me." She bows to us, shame flooding her face.

"No, Mitsurugi-san, you still did very well! Let's keep improving together, yes?" We're lucky to have such a sweetheart in the group.

"Thank you, Tamase. Even so… You never cease to amaze me, Shirogane." She folds her arms again as she stares at me, sparkly eyed.

"Yeah, you immediately took charge of the situation, you kept your pursuers at bay, you even managed to hold out in the park, we wouldn't have been able to clear this level without you, Shirogane-san."

"Tama, don't be like that. You could have done a good enough run without me." Because you did in all previous loops and you're better in this one. Sigh… Sure, I am pushing you forward, but these victories are all you.

"Nonsense. You keep surpassing all the expectations I place on you, I cannot believe we actually managed to hold them off together. Only you would try such a reckless course of action."

"Says the one who jumped ready to sword her way through a building to destroy her enemies." I smile at her, causing Tama to laugh. Meiya blushes, her lips shaking as she struggles to find a retort.

"That was… I merely was trying to do my share."

"Mitsurugi-san, I think you were trying to copy Shirogane-san's style. You still did very well, considering how weird his moves are." Tama giggles again, making Meiya's face go crimson.

"Tamase, I am not being influenced by him! He's just…" She closes her eyes and breathes deeply. "Just look at his performance, he's still keeping up with us despite the setbacks he's facing. Truly, you're still as amazing as you were during basic."

"Hey, I'm just doing my best. Stop putting me atop an altar." I really do not like how she idolizes me this time around.

"If you're there, it's because you yourself keep going further beyond than what we can expect. Your movements during this last exercise were also marvelous, I couldn't keep up with you as we retreated. Compared to that, you surely found my maneuvers most lacking." She sighs as she drops her shoulders.

"Don't start with that again. I'm doing my best to support you guys." Not lying, I am making an effort to let you make the most out of our trainings while I get used to the old OS again.

"That's why Mitsurugi-san is praising you so much. You're always driving us forward, making us do things we didn't think we could do. We're flying through Level C thanks to you." Smiling widely, she then scratched her head, unable to hold my gaze anymore. Uh… You're so sweet, Tama. "When you told me to snipe those TSFs I was kinda nervous, but I believed you'd pull through and knew I had to respond with my best effort. Thankfully I didn't fail this time, they were just little dots on the horizon… Haaauuu… I still can't believe I hit the mark." She starts shaking left to right as her eyes became whirlwinds.

"Don't worry Tama, you did great. And I'm glad to be helping out, so let's just keep doing our best." She stops shaking and gives me a nod as her eyes return to normal. "By the way, you really should try to fire a tad bit faster. The automated systems will correct a slight error anyways."

"Yeah, I know. I guess I'm just kind of used to have to zoom in clearly before pulling the trigger."

"About that, Meiya, you also should try to manage your barrages a bit better. Don't just aim at the enemy, try to use the terrain to your advantage."

"Well, I did not think it wise to further damage the city. Our mission was to defend it, after all." Arms folded, she plucked her lips just a tiny bit.

"Still, you ended up crashing. With no one around to get caught in the fight, more broken buildings are better than failing the mission or losing a comrade."

"I suppose… Forgive me, I was so throughly comcentrated on mine own performance that I misjudged my options." Damn, don't get so down, dear. Goes to show she's more devoted to her duty and role in this world.

"Come on, now. It's just advice, don't get this bummed."

"Bummed?"

"You know, dejected." Again, she sighs as she shakes her head.

"By the by, your jumps were very good all day long, Shirogane-san. On which page of the manual are the details for that?"

"Oh… It's actually not in the books." I scratch my head, looking up. "I, uh, am just putting to practice what my old squadmates told me about their trainings."

"Huh?! Really?" Tama seemed surprised, not as much as Meiya though. "Even the sniping?"

"Yeah, for real. I actually learned all I know about sniping from one very good squadmate I had back then."

"Oh, I see. Did you learn about the automated aim from that person, too?"

"Well, no, that was just me being a nerd about framerates and junk. But she was a great help in learning how to handle a gun, and her words of advice still help me a ton today." I really don't know what I'd had done without your tutoring, Tama. And despite all my loops, I'm sure you can be so much better than I am now.

"She must have been a great person."

"Yeah, she was. I still think she was better than me, I never could beat her in a sniping run. So, if I could get this good, you can too, Tama. Once you get your gears in order, I bet you'll surpass my sniping."

"C-Come on… That's not true." Scratching her ear, she looks down.

"Nah, you'll totally get there. Just keep it up, and remember the bits of advice I gave you and you'll be golden." Winking at her with a smile, she mutters a thanks as she can't meet my gaze. Uh, you're such a sweetheart.

"Ahem!" Meiya coughed loudly, startling me a bit. "Just as you said, so long as we continue to hone ourselves we shall reach our commission." Arms still folded, her brows were down and a bit tense.

"Right. Just don't make any reckless moves, that's my job." Both of them chuckle, Meiya loosening up her tension.

"Well, it's thanks to you that I have the confidence to do things like that. I know you're behind me giving me cover, therefore I believe myself able to perform those dangerous moves because I know you'll be there."

"Exactly! Since you're here we can rely on your quick decisions and moves to aid us, Shirogane-san."

"Well, glad to see you're comfortable with my style."

"It is not your style, but you yourself what gives us reassurance." Meiya confidently said as she strokes her hair. "Since I know how fast you are, I simply know you'll react in time." Her eyes sparkle at me as she gives me that classic confident smile she always used to have.

Why was she so down before? During this morning, while I was still kinda down, she did seem bothered too. Yesterday, she was rather nervous after the drills until me and Mikoto began to fool around, and since I told her of what happened to the sword I've found her staring at me sometimes. Maybe she's still holding some suspicions towards me? I mean, me not having the blade confirms I'm not a fellow. I have such a hard time reading her face… Meiya usually is just frontal with her woes, so no idea why she isn't bringing up what she has on her mind.

But it's a good thing she doesn't seem to be affected by any more weird visions, since we can talk normally without her blushing or stuttering like after her first simulation. Same for the rest, they're all interacting normally with me now. Save for Kei, who is still eyeing me sideways from time to time.

"I mean, I'm not that good really. I still can improve a lot with enough time and training. There's a lot of pieces of advice from my old squadmates that I haven't put into practice, after all." Let's start building up the excuse for my soon to come jump in skill once I stop holding back, and for when I change back to the XM3.

"Of course, that's obvious." Arms folding again, a brow lowering, her eyes remained closed for a second. "But it is still a great relief to be able to fight by your side. It truly is a relief, especially after what happened." Meiya then looked down, sobering up again.

"Come on… I'm just glad to be here. Let's all just do our best together, yeah?" She stares at me for a sec, then nods along Tama.

"I only hope Sakaki-san and Ayamine-san don't keep fighting." You can say that again, Tama. Really, those two will be another problem.

"Regardless, I'll be relying on you for the remaining training courses, Shirogane. Let's clear all the records they have!" Meiya places her hands on her waist, looking upwards with a smirk. Tama does a little jump while raising a fist, smiling at us.

"Yeah, let's go for it." If they have a clear, hard goal to pursue they will become even better than before, maybe more than what I expected.

After a little while of waiting, the other pods open and Kei and Chizuru get out looking completely exhausted. Mikoto gets out sighing.

"Good job, squad. Let's review your results." The Instructor came towards us, bearing a severe expression. "First, Mitsurugi's team, you broke another record. You got the fastest clear time of this exercise. Well done, you're on the right track."

She smiles at us, I can see the girls' eyes light up proudly as a small smile appears on their faces. However, the Instructor's smile turns into a tight line as her eyes flare up, and a small shadow appears above them.

"On the other hand, Sakaki's team failed the exercise. Ayamine, I know you dislike taking a reactive approach, however, if you keep acting on your own without even telling your squadmates what you want to do, you'll keep bringing them down, even when your idea is the better one. Sakaki, you also should refrain from screaming at her all the time. Being the Squad Leader doesn't give you the right to always harass her, even when you're only keeping the order in the mission. Yoroi, you're the only one actually doing something for the team, but you also tend to get distracted and not follow Sakaki's orders as she asks you to. Start paying more attention to your surroundings and try to understand what Sakaki asks of you. We'll end today's morning session here. We'll follow up with more simulations in two hours. Be here at the ready by then, and don't forget to go do your laps before going for your lunch. Dismissed!"

"Salute!"

The Instructor nods and then leaves. Chizuru sighs audibly, rubbing her forehead.

"Sakaki, Ayamine, what gave you so much trouble?"

"Mitsurugi, the question here is how did you break the record." Chizuru crosses her arms as her expression gets mired by dark clouds.

"It was all thanks to Tama." I pat the little girl's shoulder causing her to twitch.

"Eh?" Her eyes start widening.

"Miki-san, you're amazing! So, you were the star player?"

"Eh? No, nothing like that. I did play a key role, but I wasn't-"

"Nonsense. Tamase performed admirably in the last simulation." Meiya also went and patted Tama's shoulder, making the little one blush and look down.

"I see… With Tamase supporting you it's obvious you could fight more efficiently. Sadly, I couldn't do the same for my team." She sighs again as she takes her glasses off and rubs her eyes.

"We just got scattered, that's all!" Mikoto tried to cheer her up but only caused those eyes to flare up again, those brows to tense down into a V.

"No, that's not it at all. Ayamine didn't do as I asked her and did her own thing again, she ended up being taken out, and as we tried to get to her we got surrounded. All that chasing around was pointless."

"Only because your plan of sticking together and advance slowly would have gotten all of us surrounded anyways." Kei, why do you always have to antagonize her so much?

"You don't know that. My plan was the safer for all of us to gather info and then proceed with an offensive approach." She started doing circles on the air again as the patience was leaving her tone.

"There was nothing to gain from sitting around waiting for the enemy to bombard us. Given the urban layout, using a hit and run approach would have given us the same intel of their placement while taking care of some of them. My plan was better." Kei seemed to have taken offense at Chizuru's tone. It's just been two days, for God's sake.

"And how did that turn out in the end? All you accomplished was to become cannon fodder." Chizuru shrugs as she looks slightly to her left.

"You just don't want to admit your plans are worse, that's why you don't support my ideas." Chizuru's eyes snap wide open, but before she opens her mouth I raise my voice as I take one step forward towards them.

"Alright, you two. That's enough. Unless you want the Instructor to be all over you with a lecture again, stop it." They click their tongues and look away "Discussing this without sending knives at each other isn't out of your reach. Both of you have the same goals, to save as many people as you can, right?" Chizuru nods, crossing her arms. Kei closes her eyes and remains in her poker face, unmoving. "I know your approaches don't mix, but no one can progress alone. There has to be a way in which you can find a superior alternative without either of you feeling screwed over."

"… Don't talk so high and mighty." Kei muttered under her breath, her brows coming down and melting the poker face.

"If I was wrong in anything, feel free to rebuke me, Ayamine."

Then, she shot me a glare, a hand on her chin as she took a single step forward.

"You have no business telling us what to do."

"I'm just trying to help you guys out. Things won't be fine if you keep butting heads like this. You didn't pass the CCSE for this, right?"

"Yeah, I didn't. I also didn't train to be lectured by an American that killed Japanese soldiers."

"K-Kei-san! They told us that-"

"Shut it." Frowning at Mikoto, she then returned her eyes towards mine. "You have no right to tell us what to do when you showed us how you clearly prefer to solve your missions. Why would I take advice from you?"

I know. She isn't my Kei.

The edge of my lips returned inwards. My gaze went downwards.

I know. This is another world, one vastly different to the one I've been to.

But it still hurts, to see her face like this.

I miss my cocky, teasing Kei, all the BS she threw at me, the one-liners I always walked right into. Sigh…

"Ayamine, we told you what had happened." Chizuru frowned at her, Kei looked away and left to the changing rooms.

"Sigh… I suppose Ayamine is still reluctant to see you as a squadmate." Meiya shook her head, sighing.

"… It's cool. She has the right reasons not to trust in me."

"T-That's not true, Shirogane-san!"

"Yeah, she's merely doing whatever she wants without a care for the team." Chizuru also shakes her head, sighing.

"I don't… think she's uncaring, but…" Mikoto looks down, a finger scratching her nose. "… I guess it'll take some time."

"It's alright, guys. Don't pressure Ayamine anymore. That'll only backfire as things stand." I know how she is, better to give her some space.

She might have gone along the joke yesterday, but every time I begin to fight well or answer the hard questions right her eyes again get sharp and distrustful. I don't know that to do anymore about her.

"We did tell her you weren't at fault, Shirogane-kun. And, well, you wouldn't attack anyone so aggressively again, right?" Holding my gaze, her tone slowed down and sobered up.

"Of course not. Sure, I might be willing to make sacrifices to achieve my mission, but… I don't want to have a repeat of what happened during the CCSE." I fight to save people, to bring back peace. There will be times when shit will hit the fan, times where nothing will be enough… However, in no way would I support such cutthroat approaches to be the norm.

"Sorry, I didn't mean to-"

"It' cool Sakaki, for real. We should get going, though." They nod and we begin to make our way to the changing rooms.

This is one setback I was not expecting. Why does Kei refuse the orders like this? She wasn't that much of a prick in our past loops, she was clearly challenging Chizuru's authority and methods. I know she has a problem with authority due to her Dad causing casualties to the UN or something like that, but maybe things are worse for her this time around too? I wonder if I'll be able to bridge the gap between them this time…

Also, I wonder if we'll ever get along again…

Same day. A few minutes past 8 PM.

(Sim Room.)

[Meiya]

"That will be all for today. Dismissed!" We salute 1st Lt. Takamura who returns the gesture before leaving.

Barely a soul remains of the sim room at this hour, since it is almost at the end of our usual curfew. The few that still remain here are waiting for their comrades to end their simulations, others are merely watching the runs as they drink something along their companions.

Having no more business here, we five march out towards the changing room to finish our day. Sakaki and Ayamine haven't directed a word to one another to mend their discussion, they even decided to be in different teams during this evening training.

Ayamine also did not apologize to Shirogane, no matter how we tried to approach the subject. While Tamase was sent with her and Sakaki during the afternoon, their cooperation did not improve in the slightest. While I normally would favor Ayamine in employing a more offensive plan, Shirogane's proposal for a reactive tactic during the afternoon proved itself as the superior alternative. His and Yoroi's marksmanship is truly a wonderment to observe, even if she tends to ignore our orders at times.

"Sigh… Today's session was intense." Yoroi cracked her knuckles as she moved her neck in circles.

"Hauuu… I really screwed up. Sorry." Tamase hanged her head low, eyes closed.

"Tamase, do not be so harsh on yourself. Takamura went too far today." I truly cannot believe she made us fight against thirteen enemies on our very first training, yet I suppose it was her way to ascertain our current skill level.

She especially pushed Tamase today, making half of them take sniping positions. If only Takeru were with us… No! I cannot allow myself to fall into that sinkhole, I myself have to step up when the need calls. Becoming overdependent on him is a mistake I must not make, even if Takeru is more skilled than me.

Ugh, I'm calling him Takeru again. What is wrong with me? I shouldn't be referring to him in such a way, but for some reason I keep doing so. Today I was careful to not say it out loud, but it doesn't help that he's been so nice to us since we came back, despite all that he's going through.

It truly is a shame he couldn't keep his Minaru Kamui, I was convinced Tsukuyomi was wishing to induct him into the Guard. Why did she react so badly when I tried to approach him then? Could it be that they have revised their opinion on him after the CCSE?

"I agree with Mitsurugi. You did very well today Tamase." Tapping her glasses, she gives her a nod. Ayamine pats the little one's shoulders as she smiles, causing Tamase to blush and look down. "Still, I can't believe someone more pushing than the Instructor exists. Though I do wonder why she offered to lend a hand in the evening drills. Why would she bother with us?"

Yes, it is odd. She does drag Takeru with her during lunch time and after our afternoon training is over due to the punishment. I can only hope she's treating him well, considering she's also a member of the Guard I wouldn't put it past her to be cruel to him given his current situation.

"B-But because I couldn't take out the snipers we failed the course. If I was better…" Tamase's slow, small wailing stopped as Ayamine petted her head.

"Don't worry. We'll clear it next time." She smiled at her small trembling frame, making Tamase finally give us a smile.

Unlike when she's paired with Sakaki, Ayamine didn't disobey her orders. I suppose it all comes down to their differing views of how to proceed with a mission. I wonder if there is anything I could do to stop these petty discussions of them…

"We'll keep improving the more we train, so we have to make sure to make the most out of this." Sakaki's finger traces circles again. When did she develop this habit? "We have to be grateful 1st Lt. Takamura is going out of her way to train us, despite her reasons to do so. I saved some documents in the library's computers before coming to train, they have some tactical reviews and movements I thought were interesting, so give them a read when you have the time. We cannot let Shirogane-kun get the number one spot again."

"Chizuru-san, do you still resent Takeru?" Yoroi asked her, without breaking eye contact.

"Of course not. I simply don't want to have him shoulder everything again. I think all of us have taken a look at his control logs, right?" She looks around, we all give a nod. "Not only his piloting style is extremely complicated to understand, but his pacing and footing is incredibly good."

"I wonder why that is…" Ayamine put both hands behind her head, rolling her eyes.

"We already told you that-"

"Sakaki, do not retort." She furrows her brows, sighing. "Ayamine, you as well. What were you trying to accomplish with that comment?"

"Just telling the truth. Special-kun always comes out with minimal damage despite all those reckless charges he does. Don't you find it odd?" She looks directly into my eyes, remaining as collected as habitual.

"… I do notice his skill. However, as I told you before, he isn't hiding anything odd from us."

"How can you be so sure?"

"I… believe he didn't lie during our talk, so I again must ask of you to refrain from displaying such hostility towards him."

"… Fine, I'll try."

Sigh… Why must you hoist such doubts? We have told you many times he has no ill intent towards us.

"Ahem…" Tapping her glasses, she then gave us all a look. "So, I'm sure all of us want to get as closer to his level before we get commissioned. We don't know where we'll end up after that, so I believe we have to make the most out of this trainings, especially once we begin to pilot our Fubukis."

We all nod in agreement, even Ayamine, to her words. Soon after, we reach the changing room and go inside. For a moment, no words were said as we got out of our suits.

Sakaki is right, we don't know for how longer we will have him by our side. There is still much I wish to learn about him, I also want to have a proper duel with him. Grasping the reasoning behind his movements is something I cannot seem to do, so just copying them is pointless. Should I ask him for a duel in the simulator? I do wish to see how I hold up against him.

"Say guys, did you see them already?" Tamase spoke up as she finished getting out of her suit.

"See what?" Ayamine was getting in her fatigues, but froze as she looked at Tamase.

"Today I went for a walk to the hangar, and there I saw them as they finished painting them. There were ten Takemikazuchis painted in UN colors, with the insignia and all!" She smiled slightly, moving both hands in the air.

"Eh?! I didn't knew we had… Mitsurugi, do you know anything about this?" Sakaki was undoing her tied up hair, her eyes were widening by the second.

"No, I have no idea why they are here. If you're implying I had a hand in this, allow me to clarify that in no way I have the power to do such a thing." My voice sounded drier and sharper than I expected. Sakaki looked away and gave me a small bow.

"F-Forgive me. I didn't mean to imply anything."

Sigh… In the end you're like the rest. It's not like I'm not used to being treated so formally, but I had believed we had formed some trust for you to not feel obligated to show this unnecessary respect.

"It is alright. I have not taken offense, it just baffles me is all. I am no less surprised by this than any of you."

Even more by the fact that Master, Mion and Shion were sent to deliver them. I know I still need to face Master, but there was no need to send this many Takemikazuchi to give them an excuse to come here, or for you to send your personal unit to me. Whatever would you do if danger goes your way?!

"So even you don't know? Wow, this must be some secret deal, right?!" Yoroi had finished changing and was staring upwards with stars in her eyes.

"How many times must I have to tell you that I am merely a civilian? I am no noble so-" However, Yoroi's ramblings covered my voice.

"The Type-00 is like our most powerful TSF, right? Do you think we're getting ready for some super mission?! Oooohh, I wanna see it fly!" She once more gets lost in her own world. She does enjoy talking about TSFs for some reason.

"Yes, it is our most powerful weapon. With its deployment during the Battle of Kyoto and Operation Lucifer it became clear it could stand toe to toe with America's and the European's 3rd Gen TSFs." Sakaki remarked as she tried to close her jacket.

"Exactly! Imagine if we could see a mock battle of them!" Yoroi started shivering, her eyes shining bright as a blistering shooting star.

"Yeah, it is a relief to have them here for sure." Tamase put on her boots, finishing changing.

"I do agree it's a relief. However, it is still concerning. If they are indeed painted in the UN's colors, that means they're recognized as UN's TSFs. I cannot fathom why the Empire would relinquish its most prized weapon to the UN in such manner."

"Same. It's weird." Ayamine nodded in agreement.

"Well, on one hand you're right." She rearranged her glasses after making her ponytails. "But so long as the pilots are Japanese I think it isn't so much of a problem. I don't think they just handed them out, the Empire must have received something in return."

"Yes, I suppose you're right." Sister wouldn't do something so naive. It is still worrying though. It is too soon to start deploying another domestic TSF, if the Takemikazuchi's weakness get exposed to the foreigners…

"Anyways! We can rest easy because we have Japan's best sword in the base to keep us safe!" Tamase brightly smiled at us, clearing the stagnant air that had started to form as me and Sakaki spoke.

"Yeah! I can't wait to see it fly! It's gonna be awesome!" I wonder how Yoroi can remain standing despite being shaking so much.

"Well, talking about flying… I think it's just a matter of time before we get to ride our TSFs for the first time now." All of us stand in attention at her words. "I know we have been progressing fine for now, but we must not get overconfident. I believe that in one or two days we will get our first real piloting test, so let's polish our skill as much as we can these last days. Let's aim at clearing Level C before we take our first ride!"

"Roger!"

"That's all I wanted to say. Let's enjoy what little free time we still have, today was a harsh day after all." She raises both arms upwards as I hear her shoulders crack.

We leave the changing room. Tamase and Ayamine went to the library to read up on something, Yoroi dashed towards the hangar to take a look at the Takemikazuchis, and Sakaki went back to her room. I suppose I'll go for a jog again. And so, I begin making my way to the track field.

… My first run, I can't wait until I finally get to actually pilot. If I defeat Master in our duel I'll finally be recognized as a member of the Tozama, this shall be the first real step to achieving my goal. Please be patient Sister, I won't disappoint you. However, I cannot believe you sent your own TSF to me. Am I so weak you felt the need to send a clear sign of my standing, to ward off possible enemies? Mion and Shion must have reported my failure during the CCSE, I shiver to think how upset you must have been at your sorry excuse of a sister. Does she even see me as her sister though? Sigh…

And yet, I cannot excel in my trainings, Takeru is still above me in everything. To think I barely am able to keep Sakaki and Ayamine from further bickering among themselves, to fail at conveying how much Takeru aided us during the CCSE. And… I'm also disgusted at myself, to have such a vision during my aptitude test. I did not think myself to be such a lascivious person, why did I think about Takeru doing… Ugh, no! Don't think about it anymore! I am a blade! These thoughts are in the way.

Except I can't stop my gaze to wander to his side. He's amazing, in more ways than one. Sister needs a stronger version of myself, I should be thankful to have Takeru by my side.

Sigh… I can't believe I refer to him as Takeru within myself. I do want us to be friends, but even so… Well, he does call me Meiya, so this is only fair for me.

Even so… I do not know how to feel now. I feared he could replace me, but after the CCSE I… started to see why he would make a good Royal Guard. Someone who isn't afraid of bloodying his hands for the right cause, someone so skilled and so resolute. He also remains most afflicted by the CCSE, and today again showed he doesn't take pride in the decision he had to make. Takeru didn't simply murder without thought, and yet, somehow, the fire within his eyes… that light that he chases after… hasn't left. I wonder what could it be, whatever motivates him to push forward.

Did Tsukuyomi took his blade because he killed those soldiers? She should know why, she should know it was my miss what caused that outcome now that the cousins are in the base.

He doesn't deserve this. Takeru should be getting praised instead, with how great he acted, how he's enduring the whispers behind his back, and how he's keeping up on the trainings despite how he has to live now. I'm so glad we can fight together. Having him by my side is truly a relief.

Takeru… by my side… No, don't think about it. Don't think about him in the suit, don't think about us in the sim pod. I want him as my fellow, the partner in my element. Nothing more.

"Sigh… Takeru, what did you do to me? Why do you spawn these feelings within me?" I hug my sides tightly. I refuse to lose myself to these feelings, I must not lose composure.

I do not wish to lose his aid, I doubt I could find a better sparring partner than him. I should be ashamed of myself, to look at him in such a salacious way. He's my comrade in arms, not someone I should desire. I'm the Shogun's blade first and foremost, I cannot let myself be led astray by such temptations. Even if I do admire him, it's a completely different thing to desire him in that way. I am not like that.

And furthermore…

I look at my arms, tight and rough. The clear shape of my muscles, the way I speak, how I fight and carry myself. A knot again makes its way to my stomach. I always knew I'm not that feminine. If I compare myself to Sister, or even to Tamase, I can tell I do not look like a lady. I doubt he finds me attractive.

Especially since it would seem his eyes are locked onto another. Now I'm convinced of it, the one who bested him soundly was that same woman he spoke of today. The cheer, the sheer elation in his voice, that same light on his eyes, they're the same of those in our first bout. And when he spoke of how she taught him, it was just as when he spoke of her during the CCSE.

Someone so dear to him, who taught him this much, only for Shirogane to have to mercy kill her. And then… that would imply the Minaru Kamui he had belonged to this woman, I am certain of it now.

Still, who was she? To hold his gaze captive in such way, to invigorate his voice with such passion… Adept with a sword, with a finesse in sniping, perhaps also a polished sense for tactics. And for her sword to have been given to him… He did mention the handguard tradition, now that I remember.

T-Then… Does he… know of the implications of such a-

"Meiya-sama? Are you alright?"

"Huh?! Oh, Tsukuyomi… 1st Lt., what did you need of me?" What foul timing. I can only hope she doesn't notice anything odd with me.

"Well, it seemed as if you were in pain. Is anything troubling you, perhaps?"

"Thanks for worrying, but I am fine. I'm on my way to do some jogging, so if you'd excuse me." I try to leave, but she steps in front of me.

"Ahem, we need to talk. Could you follow me to my room?"

"What is this about?"

"You'll know once we get there. Now, let us go." She turns to the hallway to my left, and I follow suit.

What does she want to talk with me to come out and face me so openly? Did I… Did I make a miss? Did Sister… No, Her Highness sent a punishment for me? Or am I being sent back to the mansion? Master did come here some days ago…

We reach her room on the far west of the barracks, where the usual trio salute me as they move aside. As we enter I see three figures dressed in red sitting around a small table, drinking some tea.

"Good evening, Meiya-sama." Master, Mion and Shion give me a bow, that I return before sitting along Tsukuyomi.

"Good evening to you all. What did you require of me?" Master lays his cup on the table and fixes his posture.

"Ahem… First, I wished to inform you that we will have our duel in two days. I just got confirmation from the XO of this base."

"Eh?! Two days? But I haven't piloted a TSF yet."

"That means you'll get your piloting debut before that. I believe you had plenty of simulator training already." Not changing his tone, he stares at me. If this is how it is, I'll cleave through you then. I can't lose any more time.

"Understood. If that is what's been decided, I shall face you with all I've got."

"Ahaha! Good answer, grasshopper!" Smiling as I know he does, then nodding a few times my way, he again drinks some tea. "Now then, into the less pleasant talks…"

His smile was as brief as steam, I've never seen Master's eyes lacking so much cheer. Looking at them, both Mion and Shion have remained oddly silent and look far too solemn for them. Even Tsukuyomi seems to be rather tense. Master coughs, then sighs as it would seem he is hesitating. Looking at me, his eyes squinting, he leans forward.

"Meiya-sama, could you tell us what you know of Cadet Takeru Shirogane?"

Chapter 38: Kriegspiel

November 27th . 08:37 PM.

(Near Yuuko's Office.)

[Takeru]

---

I wonder what Sensei wants now, to call me at this hour. I wanted to go talk with Kasumi about seeing who my parents were in this world, but I guess it'll have to wait for a lil' while.

On one hand, I can tell her of the designs I sketched today. The HM ammo, the revamped M61 for the Type-00C I was supposed to get, the Blade Armor of the F-15, and the chainsaw sword. I'm still not sure if they are actually practical or if we have the resources for them, but I think at least it's worth considering these ideas. Especially the HM ammo, since we are going to get blindsided by the Laser-Class a lot in our future missions. I also haven't finished theory-crafting the clone of the Flash from Valgern-On, using some data about a prototype Chaff missile that was abandoned by America.

Honestly, mixing jamming and the chaff's cloud to give even more protection is a genius move. Whoever came up with the JAFF concept should have gotten a raise, since it's also really cheap to use. Sadly, since fighting the BETA became a priority, they pretty much abandoned the patent and sold it to the UN, who did nothing with it. Then, America developed the Raptor and had no more use for this type of chaff, so they literally forgot it existed. Better for me, now I found another tool to improve our stealth capabilities. I just need Sensei to help me with the calculations of the jammer that reflects a signal off the chaff.

On the other, however… She might have noticed my movements and now wants an explanation. After all, she'll protect me 'so long as I help her'.

I reach the end of the hallway, and before I can knock on it, the door opens automatically. Weird, I always had to knock before Sensei unlocked it in this world.

"Good evening, Sen… Huh?"

"Oh, good evening Shirogane. Take a seat." Sensei gestures towards a sofa.

I sit, facing the other person in the room, a woman that looks just like Sensei but with long hair and a wide smile.

"Good evening. So you're the famous Shirogane…"

"Famous? Um, excuse me, who would you be?" She gives off the same aura as Sensei despite being smiling all the while. She was wearing a loosened UN formal uniform with a yellow bracelet on her left hand.

"Oh, where are my manners? I'm Mitsuko Kouzuki, Yuu-chan's older sister."

Yuu-chan? Older sister? Great, now there's two of them. Though, she seems awfully relaxed, like my world's Sensei.

"Mitsuko-nee, I told you to not refer to me in that way."

"Oh, don't be so cold with me! Anyways, I was expecting something more…" She looks back at me, a small smile on her face. "… mature, I guess? You're telling me this pipsqueak is that important guy for your project?" She waves at me, making a comical smile now. Did she just insult me?

"Yes, he is. Shirogane, this is one of my older sisters." Plural, so there's more of them somewhere. May God have mercy on my soul. "She's a member of the UN's High Command Council and the responsible for you not getting executed. Be sure to thank her." For Sensei to be so stiff and serious, her sister must be even worse than her.

"Ahem, thank very much for your support, Mitsuko-san. I suppose you wanted to have a talk with me, right?"

"Yes, indeed. Though, it's surprising you have the guts to call me by my name. Well, Yuu-chan must have influenced you in that regard." She grabs a cup that was on a table nearby, smiling at Sensei.

"Just so you know, he was like that from the beginning. I had nothing to do with his attitude. Anyways, let's start the talk." Sensei sits on her usual seat near the board, one of her brows lowering as she glanced at her sister. "Shirogane, let's start by telling you that HC no longer has anything against you. Mitsuko-nee coerced all members to drop the claims and suspicions off you. I also pulled some strings to make sure they didn't want you off the base."

"What did you do this time? Blackmail?" She gives me a devilish smile as she starts drinking coffee.

"Shirogane-kun, Yuu-chan has many people indebted to her. She used some of that support to convince some of the most hardheaded members to stop trying to get you out of the Empire." She entwines her fingers and leans back on her sofa.

I doubt people in the Shogunate would want to help her with this kind of thing. Especially considering that I killed people and had a Minaru Kamui.

"I know what you're thinking, but the Shogunate didn't raise any complains." Gazing at me, with a subdued smile, she rested a coiled hand on her chin. "I have a few allies in America, many people still support Alt. IV there. I merely asked them to make the UN's American Branch ask about your situation, since you were trained there. Given the fact that you are being very useful to Takamura and that I am asking you to do some 'important paperwork' for me, HC went into panic when they asked for your standing in the base."

"Why? I mean, if America asked to get me back, I think they would immediately get me in a plane with a ribbon on my head." Mitsuko-san starts coughing, it seems she was in the middle of drinking and I caused her to laugh.

"My, what a peculiar description. Shirogane-kun, do you have a thing for cross-dressing?"

"What?! No!" Are they trying to make me lower my guard?

"Then, why do you think you'll be sent with a ribbon on your head?" Ugh, she's worse than Sensei. Her smile seems kinder, but in her eyes lurks a snake with a venom stronger than anything I've seen before.

"It's just how presents are given, right? You know, you cover them with that bright paper and then tie them with a ribbon?"

"Mitsuko-nee, stop teasing him. Shirogane, they didn't want you to go away once they realized you're making yourself a valuable asset to me. You invented the training terminals, and are making yourself useful to at least two important research projects in this base as far as they're concerned. Do you really think they would want to lose such a promising source of income?" Well, she's right. If the UN's Japanese Branch can get the profits of my inventions, then they wouldn't want me gone. So, our plan is going good?

"What Yuu-chan said is the summarized version of it." Twirling some of hair on a finger, she smiled my way."HC has received some interesting reports about your performance in these days. Not only you've been forced to endure a severe punishment, but were put in two important projects. Yet, not only your performance in your trainings hasn't dropped, but you're actually delivering decent results in your work. Who would want to get rid of such a hardworking pawn?"

So the plan is working, glad to hear that. The UN saw how useful I can be and now they don't want me gone. One thing less to worry about.

"I see. That is a relief to hear. But I guess that's not all there is to this. I doubt a member of the Council would come meet me for such a simple matter. I assume you want a report on my 'important paperwork', right?" Both of them smile at the same time.

"See Mitsuko-nee? Told you he can be sharp when he wants to." What do you mean 'when I want to'? I'm always doing my best!

"Well, he's not wrong. Shirogane-kun, as you must have realized, I know of your involvement in the many developments that have been going on in this base since your arrival. And I also know you're on the Shogunate's sights." Sobering up, leaning forward, she sent a look my way along a devilish smile of her own brand. "I've been looking for something that might help to mend the relations with the Empire and having you developing tech that gets recognized as Imperial by the UN can be called nothing short of a godsend. However, that doesn't change the fact that I know nothing about you, and Yuu-chan refuses to speak of anything regarding who you are." Sensei tensed up as she heard that, as Mitsuko-san gave her a serious glance. Briefly looking at me, Sensei brought one hand to her chin as she fixed her eyes on her sister. "So, while I also have other things to talk about with both of you, I'll cut to the chase." Crossing her arms, she shot a direct look at Sensei. Dropping her smile and lowering her brows, Mitsuko-san then pointed a finger at me. "Yuuko… Is this boy the 00 Unit?"

Wait, what?

"Sensei, she for real?" I look at Sensei, rising one brow. She places one hand on her head and sighs audibly. So she's not sending me to the sharks.

"Of all the things I thought you would ask…"

"What is it with this reaction? Yuuko, I want an answer. The timing of his appearance and of you stopping to give reports coincides perfectly. It only stands to reason that a quantum computer is the one that is coming up with all of these inventions, including that OS you mentioned."

"Oh, so that's why you think that. Sorry to disappoint you, but I'm a normal person." Her eyes widen as a brow twitches, then looks at Sensei, who just shrugs, and then Mitsuko-san sharpens her gaze upon me.

"So you're a normal person? Not a cyborg? And you're also not with the CIA?" She drills her eyes onto mine as if they were spears, but since I'm already used to Sensei it's not being very effective. I mean, I'm not a spy and I have nothing to hide regarding America.

"Nope. I'm a Japanese dude with no ties to America whatsoever."

"… Then, who are you? Yuuko, while I am more than glad about all these developments you've given us in the last month, I want to know the truth."

"Mitsuko-nee, that's what you're misunderstanding. He is Takeru Shirogane, there is nothing false about that." She smiles at Mitsuko-san, making her relax into her seat again. It seems she's playing on my team, for now.

"So, you're telling me a mere boy like him is being useful to you?" I don't like how you're pointing that finger at me, nor the tone of your voice. Well… All they'll see in me is a mere boy, I guess.

"Yes, that's right. And if you don't believe me, we can show you some interesting things. Shirogane, did you finish any of the schematics you were doing?" So she's gonna use the weapons I was coming up with as bait?

"Yeah. I am having trouble with one in particular, and I was hoping you could help me with the math." That seems to have picked her curiosity, her smile relaxing into the honest one I know her for.

"Oh, don't worry. I'll have a look at it later, is everything in the same directory as where you saved the docs?" She goes to her desk and starts typing something in her computer.

"Yeah, on a different folder. It's named weapons, so it shouldn't be hard to find." Let's see what she does, if she won't sell me away.

"Alright, let's see… Mitsuko-nee, come and see for yourself. The result of Shirogane's paperwork." I don't think this is a good idea, but if Sensei thinks it is I'll have to trust in her, and deal with the worst if it comes down to that.

Mitsuko-san goes to the computer and I suppose she starts reading the reports and schemes I made today and yesterday. Her playfulness vanished from her complexion, that turned focused and alerted as a cat in front of a dog while she kept reading through the docs. Her eyes look like those of a hawk right now, making not a single noise or moving at all as she reads.

"Shirogane, by the by, what did you come up with? You haven't told me a thing about your research yet." Sensei plays with her bangs as she comes to my side. She's relaxed, but since she may be hiding something let's play it safe.

"A new ammo, another sword, a revamped machinegun for the Type-00C, some Blade Armor for the F-15 and I also found an interesting tool that will increase our stealth capabilities."

"Really? Well, color me surprised. So, what do think Mitsuko-nee?"

"Yuuko… What on earth is this?" Mitsuko-san looked at us with sharpened eyes and blades in her tone.

"Hmm? What is it? I thought you would be happy to have these nice new toys." Sensei smiles at her, but she returns a scowl with those hawkish eyes.

"That's not the issue here. Why was I not notified he had this kind of knowledge?! There's no way a mere recruit could come up with these diagrams! According to these schematics, he possess knowledge like that of an engineer. You're telling me this boy is both a soldier and a researcher?"

Oh, just that. I do have experience in college, and my interactions with the engineers have only made me grow more in that regard. But even if I thought the reports were kinda rough, she seems truly impressed by them.

"He does have a lot of knowledge and doesn't really let 'common sense' to bind his ideas. As for why I said nothing, nobody asked me about his aptitudes outside of the battlefield so I didn't mention it. Right, Shirogane?" Sigh… She's just being her usual self in the end.

"Yeah. I mean, I'm just coming up with random ideas and drawing them, using the experience I got from the training terminals' development here." Me and Sensei nod at each other's words. Seems like she didn't notice a thing yet.

"Sigh… I can see why you two get along so well. Even so, this is very surprising. It stands to reason we can't let you off this base, despite your dubious origins. Yuuko, I expect you to start reporting these developments to HC in the short term. Now, let's start addressing the important matter here." She goes back to her sofa. "Shirogane-kun, am I right to assume you do not wish to go against the Empire?"

"Yes, I want no trouble with them." Not lying here. I want no more setbacks.

"Then, what would you do if you were confronted by the Royal Guard?"

"I'll try to run away. I don't want to die, but I also don't want to put the UN in a rough spot because of whatever reason the Guard has to come after me." She smiles faintly as she grabs her cup again. After finishing her drink, she again speaks up.

"I suppose you're alright with all of your inventions becoming a patent of the UN, right?"

"Yes, of course."

"Hmm… Well, I'll do my part to highlight your involvement in these things. That should be enough to placate the most nationalistic people within the UN. It should also please quite a few in the IJA and the Guard, to have Japanese citizens working for the 'glory and honor of the Empire' in the UN. Now, let's touch the most important part. Yuu-chan told me the Guards that were sent here have been trying to approach you. If General Guren has come personally after you, it means the Shogun wants you gone." So they tried to 'approach me'? I look at Sensei, who sighs and faces me.

"They tried to go to your cell today after dinner hours was over. I don't know what they're planning to do, however you should remain composed if they approach you. I don't think the Shogun would be so foolish to act against us now that we have accepted the railgun and are preparing all of these new toys for them, but you never know."

"Roger. I'll stay on my guard, just in case."

"I also wouldn't like to lose such a promising pilot, so I'll pull some strings to keep the Guard off your back. I hope you keep supporting Yuu-chan from now on, Shirogane-kun." Mitsuko-san smiles at me as her eyes finally relax and show true kindness in them.

"Of course. But are you both sure this will be enough?"

"Shirogane, they don't want to get into a fight with us now of all times. I did some moves and signed some papers that must have pleased the Shogun a lot, so I'm sure the Guard will have to fold its hand or be open about their motives to approach you." Sensei can't speak comfortably while Mitsuko-san is here, so let's try to end this talk.

"Alright. Thank you both for your help, I'll keep doing my best to get you the results you expect of me." I bow to them. Sensei seems surprised while Mitsuko-san smiles warmly at me as she moves her hair out of her face.

"That is much appreciated. Though, now I have even more questions for both of you. Yuu-chan, who came up with the idea to add machineguns to the Takemikazuchi?"

"That was me, actually." she edges closer on her sofa, licking her lips.

"Oh? Why did you want to do that?"

"Well…"

Me and Sensei spent almost two hours informing Mitsuko-san about our developments in the base. About how 'an interesting idea' lead into the XM3, how my help in the consoles' development made Sensei think I had a knack for coming up with unorthodox but useful ideas, how she let me do some research to see if I could come up with more interesting concepts for our weapons, how I'm helping with the railgun and how the project is coming along. She also asked me about my training and my relations with my squad. After that Sensei dismissed me, and told me that since it was already late I should go to sleep.

But I wanted to have a recovery session today… Dammit… I returned to my cell, since the door to Sumika's room was locked.

Well, I'm glad I don't have to worry about the UN anymore. Seems like my efforts these days are starting to bear fruit. That being said, I should be a bit more careful, just in case. I wonder if he'll finally contact me tomorrow?

[Yuuko]

"Seems like you found yourself a nice pawn, Yuu-chan." She speaks as I went to refill my mug, just as Shirogane left the office.

"Mitsuko-nee, he's too important to be just a pawn. You also know of his piloting skills, do you not? Why didn't you ask him about that?"

"Oh, he seemed really tired. And I already got the data, that's the most important thing. So you weren't kidding when you said you'll give him the last Type-00C." She crosses her arms as she looks at me.

"Of course I wasn't. I told you he's very skilled, in and out of the battlefield. That's why I asked you to hold them back. The UN can make a lot of money if these inventions of his become a reality." I was expecting something crazy, but you again surpassed my expectations.

A portable HM bomb, in case the Laser-Class ambush us, to allow a small squad to perform a Laser Hunt. Several add-ons to make Blade Armor for the F-15, which will come in handy for the new F-15 we're developing. A redesigned M61 to fit in the Type-00C's hip block. A barbed sword that looks similar to the Blade Motor's designs. And these chaff missiles, which will improve our already great stealth capabilities. If all of this gets patented and mass produced, we'll get a nice amount of money and support from the UN and America. And that's without even starting to touch his Type-00C, who knows what kind of things he will do to his machine.

"Frankly, I'm a bit jealous you have such a dependable man in your team. So, how's the Yellow Dust coming along?"

"Sigh… No news. We still can't find the balance we want."

"Despite all the new test subjects you got after Niigata?"

"Yes. If we wanted to use it on people it would be a great success. But we still can't get it to harm the BETA, at all." I slump into my seat, sighing.

Not even with Motoko-nee's help we can figure out a way to harm them. And it's not like we can rely on them being hurt for it to work. If the BETA are harmed, as soon as the Dust makes contact with their blood, they'll start to melt too. But without harming them first, it's pointless to use it.

"Then let's leave it at that. I suppose you still don't know who was the one behind the pulling of the execution order." I shake my head, grabbing my cup to drink some more coffee. "Sigh… I also haven't found anything. Do you know why the Royal Guard is so interested in the boy?"

"That's what we want to know. You do know his records were erased. I did try to ask them about it, but they dodge the issue every time. It is a bother, to be honest." She nods as she strokes her chin.

"Then, can you tell me why are you making him pass as a dead person?" She twirls her hair as she looks to the ceiling. I have to make her believe he is the real one, until he gets enough memories to fool everyone.

"I'm not. He is Takeru Shirogane."

"Are you being serious, Yuuko?" She crosses her arms, staring at me, her chin lowering inwards.

"Yes. While I know you helped me with his cover, I can guarantee you that he is truly Takeru Shirogane."

"Sigh… Yet, you refuse to tell me where he came from. I suppose that bit of him slowly recovering his memories isn't a lie?"

"No, that is true. However, since we don't know why his data was erased we must keep him safe from the Guard. At least, until they're willing to talk this out with us."

"So, do you think they might believe he isn't who he claims to be?" I nod at her words as I take a sip of my coffee, leaning back on my chair. "Then, why not send him to the Capital to fix the misunderstandings?"

"… Because I doubt the Guard would accept a mistake. You know how our security forces do things, they'll never release someone who they brand. It would only bring them shame to their eyes."

"So you think they'll try to blame him, to hide the fact that the databases suffered an error? Well, I can see our stubborn Royal Guard acting in such a way, sadly." She leans back, smiling as she shakes her head.

"That's if they don't make it seem as if we are the bad ones. Don't worry, I have all the intentions of actually taking the XFJ Project under my care, so deliver those papers as soon as you can."

"You think you can actually restart the Second's development?" I smile at her, showing her some graphics I had prepared in advance.

"Oh please. We will get the money from this parts, and once the Empire stops being so paranoid towards the UN and I reveal the XM3, I can ask America for some help. We also have a nice test pilot in our ranks now, so that base is also covered. And if we also adopt the Type-00C as our High Performance TSF and get it to be exported, the Royal Guard will also be in our debt. I think Sweden would like to have the Type-00C to work along its JAS-39. I believe we do have nice relations with them, and they would welcome the Takemikazuchi to be the High to the Gripen's Low."

"Then, should I start speaking with the Chilean and Argentinian branches to prepare a test run?"

"Please do. I know our relations with the EU are also strained, but if we manage to get them to cooperate the Type-00C will definitely get the seal of approval faster." While we could do some testings along the Guard in Hokkaido, now that the Soviets isolated themselves we can't sell them anything and can't rely on them to do any testing. And there's also little space to work with in the Empire as is. "While it isn't Siberia, see if you can get approval to do some testings in either Ushuaia or Punta Arenas Base."

"I'll see what I can do." She nods, straightening up her posture. "So, in exchange for this, keep me updated on Shirogane-kun's control logs. You did say that you'll have him fight Takamura in that F-15, right? Be sure to make him pilot his Type-00C if you get the chance." She stands up, buttoning up her suit.

"I don't need you to tell me that. Do look forward to it." Smiling at her, she chuckles back.

"I promise I'll try to get you some more support. I really would hate to lose such a useful pawn. Oh right, I almost forgot!" She began to groan a bit as she started rummaging through her purse.

"What is it? I swear, if this is another of your jokes-"

"Here. The UN's Undersecretary will be coming to visit the base on the 30th, it was decided on a rush so I couldn't tell you in advance." She hands me a folder with some papers. Is this one of the 'accidents' he mentioned? I'll have to ready the OTH Cannon just in case.

"I see. Nothing we can do now. Well, I'll call Pyatkh to escort you. Take care, Mitsuko-nee."

"Oh, how sweet of you to worry, Yuu-chan!" She jumps and hugs me tightly. Ugh, she knows I hate this kind of thing!

"I told you to not call me like that!"

[Takeru]

---

"And that's all. After getting into your suits, go towards the hangar. I have to prepare something beforehand. Dismissed!"

"Salute!"

The Instructor goes her way and we then start going towards the changing rooms.

"Honestly, I can't believe she just dropped this on us." Chizuru sighed heavily as we walked.

"We're taking our first, actual, serious piloting test. I-I'm not ready for this! Hauuu…"

"Chill, Tama. No point in overworrying. Let's just do our best like we have been doing in the simulator so far, right Meiya?"

"… Oh, yes. We just have to face this hurdle."

… She's been weird today. She hasn't looked at me in the eye and avoided making conversation after our runs in the sims. Is she not feeling well? Perhaps some bad memories leaked into her?

"Gotta step up. We're not failing this." Kei frowned as we reached the changing rooms. She looked ready to hop in her cockpit and tear anything in her way.

A small time it took us to get prepped up, and then we marched on towards the hangar.

"We're flying! Takeru, what do you think we'll do?" Mikoto was all smiles as usual, ignoring the tension in the other girls' complexion.

"I dunno, target practice?" That's what we did all the time for our first piloting session.

"I agree with Shirogane-kun, they must want to see if we can actually handle the shaking of a real TSF while attacking and moving at the same time. Squad, no matter what they throw at us, let's clear this test!"

Mikoto and Tama give a 'Yay', Kei just nods, I smile at them. But Meiya seemed out of it. Still walking along, but way too solemn and silent. Chizuru notices this too and approaches her.

"Mitsurugi? What is it?"

"Hm? Nothing, I am merely bracing for what is to come."

"Is that so?" Tapping her glasses, she also doesn't seem to buy into the excuse.

Making our way into the hangar, the Fubukis came into view. Tama began to take breaths, Mikoto got up to the rails to stare at them, while us remained a bit behind as we waited.

"Hey, you guys…" Mikoto looks back at us, tapping her cheek with a finger. "Why are there only five Fubukis lined up here?" Now that she mentions it… I didn't ask Sensei why there are only five of 'em here.

"Oh, I hadn't noticed." Chizuru looked over the hangar that was filled with TSFs. "Maybe there was no more space?"

"Shirogane, what do you think?" Meiya's eyes still seem normal and she sounds kinda worried. But still, something is wrong with her today.

"They either couldn't fit the last Fubuki here, or someone won't do the test in a Fubuki."

"Someone? You…" Meiya's eyes became sharp. She gazed at the purple Takemikazuchi and bit her lips. I got closer to her and spoke in a low tone.

"… Think they'll force you to use it?"

"I hope that's not the case." She is more bothered by it, but there's not much I can do.

"Squad! Line up!"

"Instructor, there seems to be one less Fubuki for us." Chizuru spoke as we formed the line.

"One less? What are you talking about? All five of them are here."

"Instructor… Then, who will ride a different machine?" Meiya asked, clearly tense as her hands were coiled into fists.

"Isn't it obvious? Shirogane won't get to do his training in a Fubuki, due to his punishment."

Huh, so that's how it is. Can't say I didn't expect it.

"Huh? Shirogane-san will? B-But isn't that unfair?" Tama stepped forward. I didn't think she'll defend me like this over something so small.

"It is what it is. Shirogane, you'll pilot that Gekishin that's on the far right side of the hangar. Now, all of you, get inside your units. You'll do your test all together as a squad. Move along!" Barking her order, NotMarimo-chan then went her way to the mobile command center, probably.

Well… Time to rumble, I guess.

"Takeru, will you be fine?"

"Don't worry, Mikoto. I'll pull through somehow."

"Squad, let's hurry. Shirogane-kun, you don't worry. We will do our part to aid you during the test in case something goes wrong."

"Thanks Sakaki. Well, let's go." We all nod at each other and go towards our TSFs.

As I get to the far right I see that this Gekishin is the one I used during the trial against that AI back in October, but it looks more spiky than before. It also has an antenna on its head and its Jump Units are the same as the ones that the Kagerou I used before had, with the pair of Variable Wings. I get into the cockpit and, after bolting myself, I start the Data Link. Let's see this… doesn't have the XM3 installed. Sigh…

After checking all is in working order and that the training weapons are all set, I send the signal.

"06, all green."

"Roger that. 01, all green as well. Everyone, how are you?" The rest replies, seems like there are no problems whatsoever. "Alright. Squad 207 is ready to go. Command Post, what are we to do?"

"Command Post to Squad 207. Get ready to deploy and wait for our signal."

The Instructor so ordered, and thus, I felt as my unit was being turned around. The small shaking as the system started to brace once the cables loosened off, my sight changing towards the opening gates of the hangar.

"Everyone, align on the rails and get ready to boost as soon as we give you the signal." NotMarimo-chan said. The five Fubukis and my Gekishin line up near the gate, that was open already.

A brief moment of wait extended itself, until the connection with the Instructor appeared again.

"Squad 207, take off! I repeat, take off!"

First Chizuru and Meiya, then Mikoto and Kei, and Tama along me last. All six of us are now flying towards the ruins, following the path that appears on our radar.

"Squad 207. Some marks will appear on your radar, get ready to perform the movements necessary to pass through the designated altitudes. Now, exercise start!"

This is like what we did in the sim, but without circles in the air and just a certain height to be at a certain point. We boost upwards at first, moving forward for some meters. Then we slowly move downwards, and continue to descend until we eventually reach the training grounds. Nothing wrong with this, for being their first take off.

"Well done. Now, spread in a line. Many targets will appear along the city, aim at them and shoot. However you'll have to do it as you boost through the city, so you cannot stop. There should be some mark to indicate the available placements, report back once you're all in position." After her orders were clear, we all got in position at the ready.

We all got one street assigned to cover. Once the signal was given, we boosted into the ruins, guns at the ready. This next part went by easily again. I had no trouble hitting my targets, even with the stiffness of the old OS.

"Squad 207, we've all finished this course." Chizuru notifies our progress, her face then appears in my view. Looks fine and dandy, no stiffness nor fear.

"Roger that. Now, for the last part of this training. You'll have to return to your original position without boosting. You have to remain grounded for this part. Many turrets are being activated all over the city, they will shoot at you once they spot you. Return with as little damage as you can. That is all."

"01, copy that. Alright squad, let's go!"

"Roger!"

We dash into the city. I disable my comms and everything except the infrared. I check the radars and sensors, the Noisemaker is not activated. That's good. Now, let's do this in the same way I did it last time. By dashing like mad.

Again blazing through the city as the turrets shoot at where I was instead of where I currently am, the ruins come and go in my vision. Thanks to the sidesteps I learned from his memories this is a piece of cake. There are less turrets compared to when I did the test run against that AI so many nights ago, so I have plenty of time to spot and dodge their fire, or to change my direction to avoid them.

I reach the end of the ruins with some paint, but I'm not soaked in it. It took three minutes for Mikoto to reach the end, another two for Meiya, then Tama arrived shortly after that and behind her Kei and Chizuru were the last ones to arrive. All of them were covered badly in paint.

"Squad 207, you've completed your first run. Return to the hangar. Over and Out." NotMarimo-chan delivered the orders and we returned to the hangar. No words were said in the trip back.

As I descended from my TSF and went towards the group, the Instructor approached us alongside Takamura from a hallway.

"Salute!"

"At ease. Squad, you did very well for your first run, to clear it without anyone being knocked out. In the future we will start doing mock battles in your TSFs and the sims, so get ready for that. You can have the early afternoon free, we will return to train at 1800 hours in the simulators. I have to compile the data from this run, and prepare some new training drills on the sims based on it. So look forward to that. Dismissed!" We salute her again, and both of them leave. Takamura didn't call for me, does that mean I also get my afternoon free?

"Takeru, those moves you did were awesome!"

"Huh?"

"You know, those zigzags you were doing. You dodged almost all of the paintballs!" Mikoto beams at me with sparks in her eyes.

"Well, it's what I usually do."

"Really? I've never seen you do those moves in the simulator. You're usually fast but…" Meiya commented with a slow, tense tone. She looks dejected, like when I started cruising through the daily runs.

"Yeah, I knew you were good but those moves were quite fast." Tama commented, but on a soft friendly tone. "Your dot in the radar kept blinking as you moved farther and farther away, it was something else for sure."

"You will have to tell me where you learned to do that." Chizuru readjusted her glasses as she looked at me as if I were some weird thing in a test tube.

"C'mon Sakaki, I told you all already, that's how it feels natural to me."

"Hmmmmmm…" Why must you look at me like that, Kei? Sigh…

"In any case, it's good that all of us made it out in one piece. From now on, we'll have to redouble our efforts in the mock battles. This is where the real training starts!" Chizuru says to motivate us, raising a fist to the ceiling.

The others give a 'Yes' and we start making our way towards the changing rooms. The other three started to talk about how it felt to pilot, how they aimed at the targets and other stuff.

However, Meiya and Kei didn't join in. And remained staring at me as we walked.

"Is there anything else you wanna ask?" I approach them, they don't change their aura at all.

"Special-kun, how good are you?"

"How good? I mean, I dunno. I still haven't finished my training."

"Please, Shirogane. That maneuvering… Why haven't you done that in our trainings so far?" Meiya again was looking at me clearly bothered. Like… the day she punched me.

"It's not like I can test everything I wanna do in our exercises, I am under a punishment. Oh, I have an idea. What if we ask the Instructor to let us spar against each other in today's session? That way you could learn to move like I do." And I could prevent you from getting all negative.

"Eh?! You want to… Wait, are you serious?!"

"You don't want to?" I thought Meiya would immediately agree to it.

"I'm in, so long as you're serious." Thanks Kei.

"I will, don't worry." So please drop the side glance. It hurts.

"Well, since you offered your help. So, you won't hold back?" What got into her today? Why are her eyes full of clouds again?

"Hey, you've been weird today. Did I upset you?"

"No, I am not upset."

"But you've been really cold with me today, during the training and before the test too." She caresses her hair as she looks away.

"I've been my normal self today. I'm just surprised at how good you are, is all."

"… Are you doubting me again?" She flinches back. Her eyes open wide, her irises are flooded by conflicting waves.

"Shirogane… I am not doubting you. I shan't deny that I became… a bit envious at your result. But I am not holding a grudge or anything. You have been helping us in our trainings, and I know you're always doing your best effort."

"Then, why can't you look at me in the eye?"

"I… I mean, I'm just minding my words. I do not wish to say anything unnecessary." She looks away, digging her gaze on the floor.

Kei remains staring, unblinking.

"Do you wanna say something too, Ayamine?" She nods.

"Special-kun, you're too good. You sure you weren't conscripted before?" Oh shit, here we go again.

I feel as if I had swallowed that first pizza I made so long ago, rough, dry and hard as shit. Why… Why do you look at me like that again? What did I do this time? Is this how it is in this world, then?

… No, get it together. I have to do whatever I can to stop them from becoming paranoid again.

"Well, I just did what I usually do. I could teach you how to do those moves if you want."

"Really now?"

"Yeah, it might take a while for me to properly explain them, but I'm sure I can tell you how to do it."

"You speak as if we could match you." Meiya said, this time with spears in every word.

I honestly can't believe it. I mean, Kei was never on good terms with me, but for Meiya to turn around overnight. Little by little, step by step, I thought I was beginning to fit in the team. Alas, my fragile dream of camaraderie was crushed again by some unseen threat.

Did the General speak with Meiya? Or are they just jealous of my piloting skills? Regardless, I can't allow them to get all negative on me. If talking to them won't work, I'll just keep my distance. The last thing I want is to go back to how things were before. I'll help them out if they want, that's all I can do.

I look away and continue to walk in silence, while the other three still debate over something.

Sigh… In the end, seems like that's all I can do. Force a draw, reach a compromise. There's no… way for us to be on good terms here?

"Um… Shirogane, forgive me. I am just baffled at your performance. I didn't mean to imply-"

"It's alright, for real. I can tell you're bothered, I don't know what I did to make you angry at me again, but I'm not so dense to not notice it." Without looking back at them, I rub my eyes. "I'll be serious against you during this afternoon's session, so don't worry about me looking down on you. I'll do what I can to not make you feel uncomfortable guys, so I'll be on my way. Later Ayamine, Mitsurugi." I wave at them as I pick up the pace.

"Shirogane, wait up!"

"Hey, what's going on?" Chizuru and the rest were glancing at us, we had reached the changing rooms.

"Nothing, we were just talking about the course." I wave her off, I don't need Chizuru to get involved in this too.

"Oh, I see. Let's get changed then, we can all talk at large after that."

The other three go into their changing room. Kei and Meiya didn't, they remained staring at me.

"Special-kun, you angry?" Kei looks at me with her usual poker face, but her eyes were wavering a bit.

"A tad bit. I thought we had left the doubts behind, that I was beginning to fit in, but it looks like I was mistaken. Don't worry, I won't hold back anymore. Let's keep the peace in the squad until we get commissioned, just ignore me from now on." Kei's lips shook for the briefest moment. "Well, I've gotta hurry up, I need to go to the XO for my orders since I can't have free time due to my punishment. Later."

"Wait, Shirogane." I glance at Meiya as I was ready to go into my changing room.

She looks to the ground, unable to meet my gaze. Her hands are tightened into fists. It's clear she's regretting what she said but, what got into her?

Did Tsukuyomi-san told her something? Or did the General order her to keep tabs on me? That's the most plausible reason for her change. And I don't want to be harsh to her, so I better mind my words.

"Forgive me. I didn't mean to… well, make you uncomfortable. I let my jealousy get the better of me again. I'll be looking forward to today's training, I hope you can show me how to do those zigzags you usually do." She recovers a faint smile and stares at me with her usual confident eyes.

But… if they approached her… it means you're on their side now. I know you'd take Yuuhi's side over me. So, if she ordered it, you would become my enemy. I can't let you get negative… But I can't trust in you either. I am a stranger here after all, I know full well that anyone who takes Yuuhi's side won't show me any sympathy.

"I'll try to meet your expectations of me. Later, Mitsurugi."

She twitched at my words. Her eyes froze and a layer of shadow appeared over them. I went inside before she could reply.

(Same Day. 07:09 PM.)

---

"Finally done." Moving my neck in circles, I walk towards Sensei's office. How did Sensei sort out the JAFF calcs so quickly is beyond me, but almost all the prep is done.

Luckily, I ended up delivering folders for Takamura until I had to go training, so I'm not that tired either.

Today's training was fruitful too, I guess. I kinda went serious against them from time to time, and I managed to not let them off easily. I pushed Kei and Meiya to a standstill, and defeated the rest. I gave them some pointers about their jump timings just like I always did. That's all I can do for now. I can only hope Tama is ready for what's to come. According to Takamura, they should have finished another training session right about now, so hopefully that went well.

"If only I could think of how to approach Meiya…"

When we fought her moves were unfocused, her swings were less precise than usual. Against me it was obvious, but all of her matches were odd. She was kinda out of it and looked depressed to no end, kept staring at me when we both were out of the pods, but didn't try to talk and I didn't feel like forcing a conversation, last thing I want is to make her uncomfortable or more paranoid.

I want no more problems, and I don't drive a Mercedes Dense anymore so I know better than to poke my nose where I shouldn't. If she was approached by the Guard she'll end up getting all negative all over again, I better keep my distance and do my best to not upset her. I do not want to fight her, she and all the squad is too precious to me.

I'd still like to find a way to get along with her, but if she was told something it's gonna be hard. And if Yuuhi ever asks for my head… If that General brands me as a traitor… It'll be over.

Sensei did say that the UN will give me cover so long as I can keep making useful stuff, so I'll have to believe her. At least I'll be safe here for the moment, until we see how this memory business plays out.

Since she again called me to her office, maybe she's got an update or something. That, or she noticed my moved.

Reaching the office, I knock on her door and enter after she beckons me in.

"Good evening, Sensei."

"Hey Shirogane. Let's go." She gets up from her desk and comes towards the door.

"… Where are we going?"

"You just follow me." She smiles at me, chuckling a bit.

We go back to the elevator and ride it, and while at first I was a bit nervous, we ended up down on Hangar 90. Getting out, no one else was in the place at the time. Only our footsteps echoed about in the gigantic empty space.

"So, what are you going to show me today?" I follow her, looking around. Without the XG this place feels so hollow.

"We've been making a Kagerou variant that is similar to the one you used. Our best team has been making some adjustments to the frame of the F-15J to further enhance it. Here, take a look at it." She made a grand gesture with her hand towards our left.

In front of me was a Kagerou that looked very different than the usual. Now its shoulder pads were triangles, its chest also was definitely more sharp than the one I used in Niigata, and the antenna on its head was a bit bigger. The inverted triangle shape of its waist was the same though. Its hands were not mounted in yet, and the leg armor and knee tanks were also not present.

"So, what's new with this one?"

"You can consider this one a fusion of the Strike Eagle and the Active Eagle. Unlike the one you used, this one has the final and fool-proofed versions of the Jump Units, engine, radars, antenna and sensors we made. Like the Strike Eagle, it will be able to get rid of its knee blocks once they're depleted, we also changed its internal components to make it lighter and completely functional with OBL. Its hands and legs are being worked on now, to put in them the Blade Edge armor you came up with once its built. Its forearms will also have sensor pods similar to the ones on the Active in them, we'll mount the blades on them to allow you to use them as a striking close range weapon. That will free the knees since you won't need to hold daggers in them, giving you double the ammo from last time."

"That's awesome. So, does this thing have a name yet?" I'm honestly surprised we can do this kind of things so fast.

"No, I haven't come up with anything conclusive yet. Since we want it to be known as a Japanese design I was going to codename it F-15JS, the S stands for 'Shin'. Calling it Shin Kagerou would give a nice ring to it, don't you think? This will have the lightness of the Strike, the mobility of the Active, and our best stealth tech on it. With your data as the base for its configuration, it'll turn out to be a great machine." She declares proudly, puffing her chest as she makes varied gestures with her hand towards the yet incomplete TSF.

"Heh, glad to see we're making progress here. This is a surprise for sure, didn't expect we could make new models here."

"Good to see you're pleased." A hand on her chin, she smiled. "By the by, the Gekishin you piloted is something similar to this. While we finished the new parts, the unit you're training with is the proof-of-concept that we used to test the full power of the new parts. You can consider it the one and only Shin Gekishin, since we won't bother to try to make a new model at this point. While I disabled them for today's test, it also has stealth capabilities. If you want we can paint it in ARP, in case you ever need it." I give her a nod. So that's why it was so fast. It wasn't the same I used, it was its ultimate form. No wonder I could still dash like that despite lacking the XM3.

"If we can paint it, go for it. We don't know when we might need it. It did move very fast for a Gekishin." She smiles again as she turns around.

"Glad you're happy with it. With that said, let's go over there." She moves to the open space to our right, where… No, you gotta be kidding me.

"Sensei, are those the chaff missiles?"

"Yeah. We had some of them lying around, I honestly didn't knew they were here. Tomorrow we'll start to develop these babies. I checked the reports you made, and let me tell you that you came up with some nice ideas. The HM ammo is the easiest one to make, we are currently working on it on the upper floors, but we will need some time to double check the sword design you came up with before making a prototype. Honestly, I have no idea how you came up with the barbed sword concept, but it is interesting."

"What about the M61?"

"Well, for that we will have to go to the other side of the hangar." She picks up her pace humming a tone to herself. Someone sure is happy today, Sensei very rarely hums to herself like that.

On a corner of the hangar, a Type-00C was standing proud in its new UN colors with some cable connected to its head.

"So I suppose this is my unit, right?" So she did reserve it for me. Glad she followed through on this.

"Yes. I already opened it up and checked its specs and functions, and while I don't think we can match its internal engine or Jump Units, I believe I can improve its radar and sensors to give it stealth. Since its head is a simplified one, I can make an antenna for it to give it a horn like the other Type-00 have. I was thinking on mounting the M61 on that triangle on its waist, by the sensor's side and in front of the Jump Units. You could lock them with the barrel looking downwards when inactive and it would lock forward when activated, or you could try to manually control it when you're on the air. Since the M61 itself is rather small its weight shouldn't offset your agility too much and since it uses 20mm ammo we can fit a great number of it in a small space."

"Great. Since it also has its daggers in the hands, that would be like having four weapons on board, along the rest of its weaponized armor. I suppose you already installed the XM3 on it?"

"Yes, of course. It's ready for you to take a ride in it if you want." She smiles devilishly at me.

"Heh, I might go for it in due time. So, that's all?"

"No, I wanted to let you know I'm putting you in charge of the hangar."

"Sensei, when you say in charge, what do you mean?"

"That you'll be the one overseeing the development of both the F-15JS and of your Type-00C. You're in charge of these two, they're your babies after all." She chuckles at me as she plays with her bangs.

"So, I'll be the one who'll be monitoring these two? Does that mean you're getting closer to finishing the 00 Unit?" She smiles widely at me. I mean, this does play nicely with my plans, but… I'm kinda tired, not gonna lie.

"Exactly. I finally met the equations I wanted to fix. So, now that we tested that the hardware and the software do what we want it to do we will go and re-spec the 00 Unit."

"What about the leaks? Did you manage to get anything out of the tests?"

"… No, not for now. However, thanks to the second theory, I found a way to halt the sharing of data. While nothing happened between the reactor and the parts we're testing, Yashiro failed to scan the parts despite the lack of hyper ceramic. So that's a success in my eyes."

"… What is hyper ceramic?"

"Oh, a material that makes it impossible for the ESPers to scan someone's mind in any way or form. So, if the Reactors also establish a psychic link with the unconscious 00 Unit during the times the ODL must be purified, all I had to do was find a way to block anyone from accessing her mind at a time like that. I believe you're familiar with the ribbon I was preparing?"

"Oh, yeah. So, you did something like what those… particles on the ribbon did to her conscious mind?"

"Precisely. It was really hard, though, and frankly, it may be a pain to deal with."

"… Why?"

"Because it'll cause her ODL to deplete even faster, since I'm putting even more burdens onto her brain. Think of it as a subconscious shield, how our brains block certain memories from surfacing at times, or even forge fake ones to avoid a certain trauma. I aimed to replicate that, and while it went well enough during the tests, I assume it'll make her performance drop until you can stabilize her into proper human behavior."

"Roger. Don't worry, I'll handle it well."

"As I expect. So, I assume the 00 Unit will be running in three to five days." Wow, that's earlier than I thought.

"So I'll take care of all these projects to free your schedule until you're back?"

"Yeah, as an overseer. Thanks to your data from Niigata we finished the new parts for the Kagerou, so they're ready to be mass produced. So we will focus now on making the Shin Kagerou a reality along the revamping of this Type-00C. Also, you're in charge of the weapons too. I'll be expecting good results, Chief Shirogane." She laughs devilishly again.

Sometimes I don't know how you can pull these reckless things. Is she onto me? Or she's merely trying to regain my trust? Regardless, this is quite the shock. To be the chief of this hangar…

"… You've gotta be fucking kidding me."

"No, I'm neither kidding nor fucking you." Then, she smiles as her tone descends into a whisper. "Though, if you're in the mood for the latter, you can swing by my room later."

"Sensei!" I can feel my face blaze up and my heart begin to lag and glitch. Why does she have to be like this?!

"Ahaha! Sorry, couldn't resist. You're too much fun to tease. In any case, you're the Chief of the hangar until further notice. Show the UN that you can lead this projects to fruition." Locking her eyes onto mine, the sobered up gaze told me everything I needed to know. For now, our deal is on the rails.

"Understood. I will deliver, Sensei."

"Good. Now, let's get you changed."

"For what?"

"Hm? Didn't I tell you? You're going to have a battle with Takamura in your modified Kagerou." Don't stroke your head like that, you know you didn't tell me a thing about this.

"I heard nothing of this. I mean, do I have to play as the Viking again?"

"Yeah. I want to see how our inventions measure up. Don't worry, we repaired your TSF and replaced the parts with the final ones. It should be even better than last time. This will just be a mock battle, so don't be so tense." Easy for you to laugh like that, I'm up against a Type-00F with a Kagerou. After such a long day, too.

"I'll do what I can. Also, I can meet with Kasumi today right?"

"Yeah, of course. What? Are you in a hurry to get some memories of Her Purpleness?" Folding her arms, she gives me a side glance. What's up with her?

"No, it's not just that. You see, today I had a rather weird dream. I saw this world's Sumika with him in it." Sensei's brows arch up, looking intently at me.

"What did you see?"

"Just some kids fooling around. There was me, Sumika, one guy named Jouji, another named Masahiko and another girl named Chie. We were all just playing in a park with a ball or running around in the slums. It was like… I dunno, dreaming about people you haven't seen in a long while." Like the few times I used to dream about my grandparents outta nowhere, or about some old friends that moved away when I was little.

"… Is that so? These memories might help to stabilize Kagami, so you should show them to her as soon as possible. Alright, let's take care of Takamura swiftly so that we can get on that." She waves her hand at me and starts walking towards the elevator.

"You say it as if it were an easy task…"

"Oh, come on! You can take on thousands of BETA but you're scared of a single woman? You didn't fall for her, didn't you?"

"Of course not! It's just that this is too much of a gap, facing a Takemikazuchi with a Kagerou. I feel like I'm going to be destroyed." The technological gap is too big. I'm not sure if I'll be able to win. And… She might be sending me to my death, now that I think about it.

"That might be true if we only look at the specs, but don't forget that you have the stealth protocol on your side, and you have much more experience than her. Your sheer agility will definitely play in your favor too, even if it can't match up with the Type-00F, your patters will definitely throw her off." She doesn't seem to be hiding anything, but I don't think I can read her that well. The door opens and we ride the elevator.

"About that… What if she realizes I'm the one who fought with her down the line?" That is a serious concern. I do have habits and tells that I can't hide, someone is bound to notice them and make the connection.

"Don't worry, I don't think she'll notice anything. As you proved to me, most pilots rely on their radar, sonar, and automated systems to get a feel of their opponent during Anti-TSF combat. They don't pat as much attention to their immediate surroundings. You, on the other hand, tend to rely more on your vision to move. They will be constantly looking at their radar, altimeter, and data logs to read your position until they're close enough, while you'll be looking straight at them alongside the data in the projection. With the stealth the radar will display nothing, so they won't be able to recognize all of your patters precisely because they will have to rely on their sight for that, and at the speed you move even seeing you for more than a second will be hard in the cramped space of the training grounds. If they can't see you in their projections, their data longs come up empty, and they can't even track you, all you need to do is strike from behind and any opponent will fall."

"I know what you mean. But it still makes me nervous. Since she's a samurai she might be more used to not relying on the radars and focus more on her sights and hearing during close combat. But I guess we'll just have to see what happens."

Facing against a Takemikazuchi is crazy, but even if this is dangerous it will be a good test to see how I hold up. I may have to fight them in the future, so I'll take this chance to spar with a Royal Guard in preparation for any upcoming battles.

"That's better. Now let's go, I suspect Takamura is waiting already." The door opens and we step into the hallway. "Oh right. On the 30th, the UN's Undersecretary will come to visit the base. Is that one of the incidents we have to be careful about?"

"Yeah. An HSST filled with explosives will fall on the base, and we will have to use the OTH to strike it down. I did what I could to make Tama as good as I could, now it's all on her." Sensei smiles at me.

"You trust a lot in them. I certainly did not expect you to send Takamura to train them. Who would have said you could make her do your bidding like that?"

"I just asked her if she could do it." Really, can you stop with the teasing? It's not like I can boss Takamura around, she's just being considerate.

"Well, I already tuned the OTH today, so we did all we could to prepare. Don't worry, everything is under control."

"If you say so."

We reach the changing room and I go inside. I suppose it's time for another fight.

True or False?

Chapter 39: True or False?

---

November 28th. Near 10 PM.

(Shogun's Private Chamber. Imperial Palace.)

[Yuuhi]

---

The heavens have bequeathed good fortune to me, for today was light on meetings, and that I could delegate them to my trusted fellows. After all, they would have found me on a most ill mood. The mantle of the Shogun requires me to be a beacon of light and amicability, yet a forceful lightning wouldn't have bestowed me any favors in my duties. Such atmospheres most remain cordial, therefore I could not allow this toxic mire to permeate what words were required of me.

Sighing once we enter my chamber, yet there is still a tint of disquiet in my breathing. The opulence of my room, with such regal decorations and furniture, that are but a grim reminder of the shackles I wear when taking upon the mantle of the Shogun, at least have served me as a haven where I know I am at peace, where no one could intrude on my thoughts, or dare to eavesdrop on my words.

… However, albeit nothing has changed, my fingers cannot stop tracing my neck. As if crows were pecking upon me, as if some manner of rusted iron were oh so very slowly tracing from my nape and down, hewn into my very flesh, nothing I've done today has managed to assuage this foreboding feeling, and the resulting ire it has brought to my heart.

"Your Highness, if I may." Maya tells, returning me to the room, away from the sensation that drowns all else.

Extending my arms upwards while slowly closing my hands, eyes wandering the ceiling, Maya carefully removes the pieces of my formal attire, cradling them onto her arms as she does. My Chamberlain places her fingers on the edges of the golden crown atop my head, taking it off my hair with small, precise movements as habitually. Once she safeguards the ornament, she then rests my night attire on her palm, which descends upon a small table to deposit on it my clothing as a leaf would fall upon a pond.

However, while the habitual routine is something that gives me a respite from my incessant duties, a breath of calmness where I can detach myself from worries, the lethargic pace of it all only manages to distress me further, for I would be wishing to receive news on what is transpiring on Yokohama.

Once Maya has finished her duty, my hand reaches for her arm to stop her from proceeding as usual.

"I can get changed on my own. Maya, please do go request a report from Daizaburou-san and Mana henceforth."

Briefly closing her eyes while tapping her glasses, she swiftly bows down and leaves my formal attire on the Chamberlain's hands, who also proceeds to quickly place it in its place before leaving behind Maya, more do to my own mood than her desire to remain by my side.

Looking to the door to make sure I was left alone, alone in these magenta walls full of opulence, with a glistening wooden floor, I drag my feet through the small changing room and into my private bedroom, but do not stop, instead I keep walking past this unnecessarily large bed of mine and all of its cerulean sheets.

Moving my neck in circles, undoing my ponytail slowly as I move towards the window, gazing at what few stars I can see from beyond the curtains, with every breath one small fraction of this disquiet leaves me. Without any haste, without removing my gaze from the window, I change into my night clothes, then sit on my bed as one hand swims through my hair, some strands caught in between my fingers.

And then, my hand begins to halt its advance as it approaches my neck. Massaging it, parrying the vexing raking with my the tip of fingers, once I sigh what was restrained within I manage to quell the feeling.

I know it is futile to repine about the matter, to continue to ruminate in such way, however, whatever has compelled such silence from both Mana and Daizaburou-san? It has been many days already since their arrival at Yokohama, and besides the preliminary words from Kouzuki, which have not been as pleasing as I once desired, they have yet to report anything. To think their mission would have been stymied, what manner of protection has that faker been bequeathed with?

Resting an ankle just beyond one of my knees as I crossed one leg over the other, feeling my brows beginning to wish to interject, I close my eyes and take in a deep breath as a hand moves to the base of my neck.

"Peace… All shall be dealt with in time. They cannot hide that faker for long."

However… How in the Heavens did that man gain possession of a Minaru Kamui? Mana was much preoccupied when she reported the matter… even going as far as asking me if I was certain of his death. That he knew of the nickname he had given the cousins, that he knew of his favorite food, his birthday, and that the man's expressions were the same as…

Releasing the sheets I was unaware to be clenching, that same foreboding sensation once more ascends yet again to my neck.

"Sigh… I cannot fault her for harboring doubts, however the reality of the matter is that… he's dead. No matter how much knowledge that faker may possess… Takeru died as the G-Bombs fell. In no way could he have survived from that event without me knowing of it. Such a flagrant trickster having deceived Mana…"

It is certainly impossible that anyone has acquired such knowledge. And yet, regardless of knowing of his birthday, of the possibility that the man guessed his favorite dish… How in the Heavens did he learn of the cousins' nickname? Moreover, how could the man ever have taken possession of the blade? I doubt Mana's eyes could be deceived with ease… It is dubious she and Daizaburou-san both had fallen to this deception. What if… if somehow…

No, it is impossible. I was in the vessel that was overseeing the operation, the UN officers that were in it alongside me confirmed there were no signals coming from the location of the blast or its surroundings. I saw the… horror of that black orb that took his life. Taking a moment to exhale, with long steps I return to the window, with a gentle swipe of a few fingers I move aside the curtains, and once more I begin to gaze at the stars.

Could it be that they are being manipulated somehow? Perhaps their thoughts could be being read by the young ESPer that resides in that base, and she then tells such intel to the spy who is passing as Takeru. However, what reasons could compel such manner of plotting? After all, I highly doubt they know who he was. Unless, however, the man's mission is to hinder my relations with the UN. However, I do not see Kouzuki allowing such a person to be on her base.

"Sigh… The more I ponder, the less I understand. However… that does not change the actions that have to be taken from this point forward."

While I cannot merely have the man executed after learning he knows of the importance the Minaru Kamui has and that he somehow gained possession of one beyond my knowledge, and I do not desire to become the recipient of Kouzuki's animosity by forcing an execution of someone from her base, much less with the regretful turn of events that transpired during the cadets' test in the island, there should be a way in which we can apprehend the man while not compromising our relation to the UN.

Yoroi did say the Vice Commander is still an ally of ours, on his opinion, and that the chasers were not acting on her orders. However, he also harbors doubts regarding the unyielding refusal of the woman regarding sending the faker to the Capital, on the excuse of mending the missing data in the databases.

Yet again I am unable to dispel the growing frown that refuses to remain hidden, the mere thought of someone passing as him is bountiful enough to set my ire unfettered. As he would have said, I could almost see the blue fire in the reflection of my eyes shining stronger than the light coming from the lamps that illuminate my privacy.

I look back, he isn't there. And I know that, no matter how much I call his name, he will never come back. Feeling my lower lip folding inwards, placing a hand over my neck, the longing that this emptiness leaves in me, equal to that of a lonely seed in wait for spring as it endures the cold night gale of winter's gate, instead is almost engulfed by the anger of he who dares to trample over his name with this deception.

"Sigh… And yet, if I begin ruminating on this overlong, I shall wind up with a most severe headache."

Rubbing my head in a slow circular motion, my chin lowering in as I remember how he used to pat my head, how carefully and tenderly his hand would descend upon my hair whenever I was troubled and failed to halt my overinsistent trails of thought.

… I miss you, Takeru.

Sitting on my bed again, opening the drawer that was close by so slowly it made no sound at all, I take out the item it had within. Resting its lower tip on top of the drawer, placing some small amount of tension on the tip of my fingers, I spin the toy and lose myself in the colored patterns its surface makes, my mind wandering towards those so distant days that have been lost to me so many moons, so long ago.

When he gave me this toy, my very first present from a friend, when he would come visit with new souvenirs every weekend, when we would get to play together, when he didn't hesitate to hug me… The toy stops spinning, yet I continue swimming in those memories, a cheek slumping onto one of my palms.

When he would complain of me besting him in Shogi… When he still was clumsily learning to wield a blade… When you were still here…

"Yuuhi-sama?"

"Eh?! O-Oh, Tsuhi? Sigh… Why must you never announce your presence when you arrive?" My tone slightly adusted as she broke my reminiscence, I join my hands as I give her a good look.

She then proceeds to bow down almost lethargically, her short dark hair swaying as she does, yet her calm, almost frozen expression remains unchanged, those topaz-colored eyes of her meeting mine with the habitual poise a calm lake would possess. Her gray uniform almost standing out against the walls, her slim figure, almost as tall as I am, remains staring for a moment.

"My apologies. I did not meant to infringe on your privacy, I merely am used to walking silently as the shinobi I am." Speaking as slowly as always, in that usual composed and almost lethargic pace her words take, as if she had just been woken up from a long dream, as if she were still shaking off the husk of a dried cocoon from her wings, she then stood in attention.

"Tsuhi, you are no longer a shinobi. I believe I have made my wishes on the matter clear enough by this point."

"And, as I am sure you are well aware, I am merely following my family's code, and my leader's orders." Narrowing her eyes as she said those last words, I sigh while bracing for what I assume is to come next. "Which begs the question, why have you not notified me of Takeru's situation until today?"

"… Because there is nothing to notify you of, is all. The man is a faker, through and through." Her eyes not relenting, I stand up and take a few steps towards the window. "Now then, I do not recall giving you permission to enter my chamber unannounced." Remaining as composed as she was, she merely nodded to my words.

"Indeed. Maya-sama was called to attend a few matters regarding the patrols, and thus, she tasked me with the delivery of the report to your person, considering the gravity of it."

"Sigh… Fair enough." Tsuhi is one of the last I would have wished to learn of this ploy, however if Maya has decided to rely on her, I too so shall do.

"Well then, should I begin?" Giving me a small bow, a hand on a shoulder, she looked my way.

"By all means."

Turning to face her, she coughed before opening the small folder she had on her, and thus she begins to speak.

"Well, first and foremost, it would seem that the man in question has truly been placed under a most severe punishment." She then details the supposed routine of the man, and how they were unable to pay a visit his cell past dinner time or even approach him at all.

"So they were… impeded to approach the faker?"

"So it would seem. Due to his situation, the man cannot receive visits on his cell without first requesting the permission of the Vice Commander, along the motives for the visit."

So that is what has stymied their progress. If the man has been made to work during most of his time outside of the training course, then there will be few openings in which they could approach him.

"Has Daizaburou-san mentioned anything regarding their plans to unmask this faker?"

"As it were, Daizaburou-sama seems to be holding doubts regarding the identity of this person. During their meeting, it seems-"

"Pardon?"

"Ahem, I said, Daizaburou-sama is not convinced at the moment of-"

"Yes, I heard that well enough. How… How could it be that he is also casting doubts on my words? Whatever does this mean?" First Mana, now him… Just what is causing this?

"Well, according to his report, it would seem his first impression of the man was not what he expected." And yet, she remains composed, twirling a strand of hair as her eyes focus on the report she had. "He thus says, and I quote, 'the man possesses an expression truly reminiscent of our Takeru, with clear traces of the wrath that once took hold of him restrained under a layer of the relaxed nature we knew him to always display before the war'." She takes a moment to catch a breath, curling a strand of hair behind her ear. "And, with all due respect, I am of the opinion that, in light of what the report says, this person might in fact not be a faker at all, Yuuhi-sama."

"… Surely you are not proposing what I believe you are?"

"Well, what would you order if the man was, in fact, Takeru?"

"He's dead, Tsuhi. You were on that battlefield as well."

"True that might be, however, I was not allowed to inspect the nearby area of the G-Bomb's explosions. If you recall, we were hard pressed while cooperating with the squadrons from the A-01 STF to halt the American's advance into the Yokohama Hive. Therefore, I cannot deny the possibility that my leader could have survived somehow."

"And I am saying that is impossible."

"… Would you wish for me to continue with the report?" She gives a small, curt bow.

"By all means, please do." Closing my eyes and brushing my hair, I face the window.

"Then, it would appear the man has been made into the recipient of many ill rumors, while also receiving low grade synth food as his sole source of nutrition on these passing days. All points to the UN using him as a scapegoat for the… Ahem… misconduct of the chaser squadron."

"Is that so?"

"Indeed. Mana's subordinates have also reported that the man in question has been seen around 1st Lt. Takamura due to some arrangement of said punishment."

"What? Has he… been placed on the railgun project?"

"So I said, Yuuhi-sama." Unable to restrain a small groan, I fold my arms and look away from her furrowing brows. "However, the details of his involvement remain a mystery to our fellows. According to Daizaburou-sama, it would seem the man has been placed as an aide, perhaps. However, since questioning 1st Lt. Takamura might arise suspicions, they have not approached her for the moment."

"… I see." Why would Kouzuki do such a thing? In any case, we also now possess Takamura's eyes to our disposal, if her account ever becomes necessary. "What else is of note? Has the man… showed any hostile signs towards his squadron?"

All matters considered, I shudder to think of what the true goal of the faker could be. Not only for Meiya, but for all the other members of her squad. I will not be able to face my fellows were harm to fall upon their daughters due to my tardy action.

"No, nothing of the sort. The man seems to be fitting in well, better than before the CCSE as far as the report from Mana's team says." Huh? How in the Heavens could that be? "Also, it would seem he has remained in top form during his training sessions, and it appears as if he were employing odd maneuvering at times."

"… Odd in which sense?"

"In Mana-sama's words, those same eccentric sidesteps my leader always preferred to do."

One of my hands began to shake ever so slightly, closing my eyes and taking a deep breath, sending that hand to again swim within my hair, the vile is subdued once more. So the faker happens to also share a piloting trait with Takeru, perhaps? In no way could this man know of his training, for Takeru was trained under my House's doctrine and for the spy to possess such knowledge would mean someone has betrayed me, yet no one who knew him would do such a thing. All of his fellows have remained loyal, even if our views differ from time to time. However, why are Mana and Daizaburou-san being deceived by this flagrant deception? I did not think Mana to be this emotional, to fall prey to this sinkhole of lies.

"Anything else of note?"

"There are still a few points of interest." She says, unfazed and completely calm at the situation, which yet again makes my lips pluck. "Mainly, it would seem the man is fond of Meiya-sama, and according to her is also prone to make odd jokes every now and then."

"Oh? So the faker is trying to get close to Meiya? Sigh… How did I not see it?" It is obvious, some American is plotting to gain intel on her background. Perhaps, another Regent is also doing the same for some reason. "Have they decided how to proceed from now on?"

"… No, as it is they are once again asking you if you are certain that-
"

"Yes, he's dead. Do tell them to device a plan to ensure the faker is exposed, detained, and brought to my presence, and soon."

"Yuuhi-sama, may I tell you of what Meiya-sama herself said about the man?"

"Hm? Meiya spoke of him?… I suppose, do tell me."

"Ahem… First, the man was insistent on referring to her by name since they met on the night of October 22nd." Huh? Oh, a foreigner it is then. Quite foolhardy, to reveal their trails this easily. "Second, she is certain the man employs the Mugen Kidou as we do."

"… Excuse me?"

"I said the man empl-"

"Yes, I heard well enough. Whatever does this mean?! The Mugen Kidou… to fool Meiya's eyes… What of Mana's observations?"

"In her opinion, the man does indeed fight in our style. Mion reported that, during their bout on the island, his stance and patters do resemble those of Takeru, albeit far less aggressive than she recalls." She then looks my way, awaiting further questions. Yet, those I have couldn't be answered by her.

Did… one of our fellows betray us? I suppose, since Mana confirmed the Minaru Kamui was indeed a real one despite having a dulled edge, one of us has turned traitor. However, all of my trusted confidants still have their blades with them… And his fellows would never denounce their oath to their leader. In which case, from where did this damned faker get hold of the blade, and learn our style as well? Furthermore, how could both Mana and Mion be beguiled with such ease?

"Sigh… Just what trickery is this faker employing, I wonder?" It is so vexing… Inhaling slowly, easing the vice grip my hands were placing on my chest, the toxic trail of thought is stopped before its fueling force surfaced in me.

"Yuuhi-sama, what if they weren't fooled?"

"… I believe I was clear enough. Takeru is dead. Stop reiterating the matter." Why do you all doubt me so? Is this their ploy? To make my fellows reticent towards me? Why are they falling so easily to this deception?

"However, the man is also aware of the handguard tradition, it would seem."

"Huh? He… Wait, how do you mean?"

"That the man once mentioned to Meiya-sama that he knew of the meaning behind giving someone the handguard of a blade." She retorts, as composed as always.

"T-That's… No, the spy is knowledgeable on our customs, that's all there is to it."

"She also mentioned how his reactions to the talks of his missing memories seemed honest as well." She retorts, a gentle stroke of a finger on her chin.

"… I said he is dead. Meiya never met Takeru, so she can in no way ascertain whether she met a faker or not." Pushing the curtains aside with a hand, the scorching azure fires that the reflection of mine eyes returned brought me stillness, I had not noticed such an intense scowl had made nest on my face. "… If this is all, do prepare a notice to inform them I wish to hear clear progress on the next report. What has Kouzuki done so far?"

"Remained as stoic as she was. When inquiries were forwarded, she asked our reasons for delving in her special protegee's affairs. Without knowing if you'd favor a confrontation, Daizaburou-sama has remained in wait for now."

"Have them approach the man at some point, to ascertain for who he works. If Kouzuki continues in her refusal to send him to the Capital, I myself shall lead the talks." Little power might I have, yet I won't allow her to tarnish his name, even if she is the leader of the project. She must be aware of who the man truly is. "You may leave, Tsuhi. Thank you kindly for your devotion, as always."

"No, it is nothing. However, there is something I must ask."

"… I am not sending you to Yokohama." Looking back at her, she finally reacted. Lowering her brows and chin, what once could eternally lie found motive to stir back to life, to incite a most searing frown on her face.

"Why would you not? Were you still harboring doubts, I could easily tell if the man is or isn't-"

"Tsuhi, Takeru is dead. What is it with all of you?"

"That is my question, Yuuhi-sama." Still frowning, still adusted and inquisitive.

"Whatever are you talking about?"

"Why do you so vehemently refuse to consider he might be alive?"

"… Because he died. There is no way in which he-"

"Because it would mean you, again, abandoned Takeru, wouldn't it?"

… Clutching the curtains, feeling something within me tearing, something pounding into the back of my head, a myriad of insults and aggravations wished to be released. That same poisoning sensation spawned on my neck, and I did not fight it this time. Yet, licking over my lips, exhaling through my nose, such hampering thoughts were kept in check, for the moment.

"Take those words back this instant."

"Why should I? You did abandon him when Yokohama fell. And, if he had survived, you would have-"

"Takeru has been dead for two years. That is the truth."

"He could have survived, however. In which case, we must take action to bring him back home instead of leaving him in the clutches of the UN."

"He did not. And furthermore, I never abandoned him."

"Then, why were we together under the Chain squadron when we began investigating the affairs that lead to the fall of Mo-"

"Enough!" Rubbing my forehead, gulping as I tried to calm down my breathing, yet failing to restrain those days from returning. It made my ankles shiver as if tickled by feathers, made me again massage my neck to regain some measure of poise. "Sigh… I understand your worry as one of his fellows, however, if he indeed survived Lucifer then, how do you explain his disappearance?"

"I have been trying to tell you what the report says, yet you seem fixated on rejecting the news." Narrowing her eyes, giving me a side glance. "Meiya-sama said the man was sent to Alaska, that he woke up alone and without knowledge of his past. And that, because no one could find anyone related to him, he had to stay abroad."

"That is… nothing but a forged story. In no way could he have left the Empire behind our knowledge."

I was looking at all times, and they explicitly said no signals were left on the area. I was there… when the radar went blank… when that dark orb appeared… I am certain he is dead. Could it be you are also under some drug's hold, Tsuhi? Or, perhaps, are you part of whatever this plot is aiming to do?

"And on the off chance that such a thing happened?" However, she rarely shows such open signs of anger… No lies reflect off her eyes or tone, then, whatever compels this insistence?

"… It is impossible. That is all. Take your leave, now."

"Why do you refuse to consider the chance that he might have survived?" She takes a few steps closer, such a defiant tone bringing an odd sensation to my throat, as if some foul bug was climbing on it. Two fingers choke a strand of my hair as I look away, no longer able to restrain a frown.

"I already explained my reasoning. There is nothing else I require of you. As your Shogun, I order you to leave my chamber, 2nd Lt. Yasomaga."

"… Very well, so I shall do. There is one matter I would wish to remind you of, however."

"And that would be?" And yet again, she frowns my way.

"You may be the current Shogun, however that is not why I serve you, Yuuhi-sama. Please do remember why many of us remain on your side."

Taking a step towards her, our eyes met. She remains composed, yet frowning.

"… Are you insinuating that you are not loyal to me, perchance?"

"I am loyal, because my leader so commanded. Because I still believe in his words, in his fiery fury to protect our people. That belief in your House's teachings is why many are still devoted to you. And if he happened to be alive, I expect you take the necessary steps to ensuring his return to our home, regardless of your own opinions. That is all." She then turns around, as if thinking she could merely leave after such words.

"Halt where you stand. Whatever do you mean? You expect me to… Are you… in league with this faker?"

"… So you truly refuse to admit the possibility that he is still alive."

"Why must you all-" Looking back at me, yet again with a calm expression, she sent a hand to her chin as she stared.

"No, the question here is, why do you refuse to consider that possibility, after both Mana-sama and Daizaburou-sama have both expressed their concerns?"

"… Sigh. Because he has died." Why… Why are all of you so fixated on this matter? What good will it do to us to hold onto such an obviously false hope?

"Isn't it because it would mean you abandoned him, when he was at the verge of death?" A brow twitching as I looked at her, she rose both hands in peace as I took a few steps towards her, as my teeth gritted, as the restrains of my ire were coming unbound.

"… I did no such thing, and he has perished."

"Then, why would you be hesitating, Yuuhi-sama?"

"Huh? I am not-" She takes a step forward, but remains silent. Staring at me, her face relaxing into her usual expression.

"Why did you retreat your petition for the execution, then?"

"… Because the man had a Minaru Kamui, and it had to be investigated how-"

"Order the man to be handed to the Royal Guard for the execution, inquire into the matter with the UN to see how much they know."

"That would still not answer-"

"Yuuhi-sama, when Mana-sama took possession of the blade, all that was left was to capture the man. Had you asked him to be sent to the Guard for the trial, using the deleted databases as a motive for the procedure, the man would already be in our custody. And yet… You hesitated."

"I… am merely minding my power. I do not wish to bring chaos to the scales of this nation. It… would set a most dire precedent. And furthermore, it would raise questions regarding why we were acting in such way. Do remember that his identity must remain concealed, despite his passing."

"… Is that so? However, isn't leaving the man near Meiya-sama far more dangerous?"

"Then, pray tell, whatever would you have done?"

"I already said so. Request his transfer to the Guard for his punishment, interrogate the man here. The UN was in no position to refuse your petition, considering that they wished to hide what transpired during the CCSE. And furthermore, if anyone had dared to look into the matter…" Her brows lower, a small smile forms on her. "We could have easily crushed their fangs."

"… I cannot allow the matter from drawing too much attention, that is all."

"Yet, you sent Daizaburou-sama, Mion, and Shion, while Mana-sama is also present in Yokohama. Could it be that you are struggling to accept the man might truly be Takeru?"

"Well, Yuuhi-sama?"

… If he were still alive… if he truly was agonizing back then… and I didn't send a search party… I gag on air, clenching my hands once more as my feet grew unsteady, thinking on what could have been of him. H-However…

I return to the window, to the skies. Betraying my own words, considering the possibility… Hugging my sides, it is not enough to assuage this shiver on me as his hands would have.

"… If, for some odd miracle, Takeru had survived, then I myself will handle this matter. We cannot allow attention be directed to his name. Furthermore, Mana, Mion, and Shion are in Yokohama as of now. If he truly is alive… t-then he is in good hands. However, as I have been saying, in no way that faker could be Takeru."

It is nothing but a faint wish, a pointless expectation. In no way Takeru could still live… but… but if… he was… if such a miracle had occurred…

"… Hehehehe."

Hm? Whatever has caused her to giggle so? How odd, Tsuhi rarely laughs, much less in my presence.

"Why would you be laughing in such a way, Tsuhi?"

"Ah, no, my apologies. I merely found it amusing, how you seem to believe them to be able to quell his anger."

"… I believe that there are few people better suited to pacify him other than-"

"Yuuhi-sama, you have certainly not forgotten those days, have you?" Noticing the slight increase in speed of her tone, the tinge of joy in it, my lips could do little but pluck as I frowned. "If you truly wish to have Takeru back home, then having the man meet with either you or Raiko-sama would be the most effective way to do it." And then, I bit my lips. And knowing what she is implying, every fiber in me came unbound in a synchronized shift towards anger.

"… I am the only one who could assuage his ire. In no way that woman could ever-

"Please, I was one of those who remained with him after Yokohama's fall. I very well know how Raiko-sama tended to his heart after you left it in tatters."

"How dare you… have the gall to utter such lies… I did no such-"

"Please, I am not looking to upset you." She again bowed down to me, now a small smile on her face. "However, please do not feign ignorance towards what you did. And given their relation, I believe remembering their closeness would ail his heart were he to remember those harsh days that followed the fall of Yokohama."

"First, the chances of him being alive are astronomically low. Second, if he were, the Tsukuyomis are fit for the task of looking after Takeru. And third, were he to suffer a shock from recovering lost memories, only I would-"

"Please, Your Highness." She turns around, without even listening to me. "You should know that I was Takeru's right hand on his flight, since I was the one who kept giving you reports on his condition. Which is why I am saying that she is a good choice to handle this situation, since it would be difficult to arrange a meeting between you and the man without drawing unwanted eyes onto us now that you withdrew the execution order. And I am certain of this because she surely knew how our leader fared on those days better than you and me both… I dare say that she know every inch of him, in fact."

"Silence! How dare you-" Without even waiting, she bows down and goes to the door.

"I suppose this shall be all. Good night, Yuuhi-sama."

"Do you not be thinking yourself capable of merely taking your leave after uttering such-"

"Then, why was he drowning in tears after you left Hakuryo Base?" Back to the frown, she stared at me. Saying nothing, awaiting my reply.

I am not proud of what I did. I was… prey of stress and fear. Amidst the pressure of becoming the next Shogun, as if the white darkness of fog had covered me whole, no words he said could dissuade me, no explanations could make me accept a scenario where he wouldn't be by my side. His reiterated refusals, his insistence on remaining in Hiiragi…

Takeru's company was reassuring to me, one last link to who I was beyond my duties as a Head of the Koubuin House and as a Shogun. Whenever I looked back, he was always there. I knew it, even when we were little, that he would come during the weekends to share his fun and joy with me and the cousins. And then, there was a time where he always near, when his presence became a constant in my daily life.

A small treasure only I knew where to find, a hand I could always reach out to whenever I needed it. Someone who I could relax around, without any need of forceful formality framing my conduct into a mold. Someone who never once tried to take advantage of me, who never looked at me with neither false amicability to gain my favor nor forced manners hiding disdain at my position.

And yet, he wished to stay in Yokohama despite the risk, despite the fact that it was equal to signing a death sentence. And in my suffering upon his refusal, feeling betrayed by his very first harsh words towards me… I tried to impose my will upon him, only to be met with his very first reaction of anger. And in turn… I retaliated, uttering words I never should have spoken.

"… I admit I was foolish, nothing but regret do I harbor for my words on that day. However, it does not change the fact that only when being by me did Takeru restrain the wrathful id that had been sowed into his heart of hearts by the war. You, as one of his fellows, should know that well, Tsuhi."

"Please do not be upset, I am not intending to insult you. Simply put, I am certain that you are well aware that both of you cater to different sides of him, is all." And again, that small smile.

"Cease your prattling! Takeru never held her, no, anyone else in the same regard as me, even after our… dissidence on that day. Even if he no longer lives, do not forget you are speaking of a member of the Koubuin House. I shan't allow you to tarnish his memory with your vile lies."

"And do not forget you are speaking of my leader, the man who continued to protect your wishes for all of the '99. The man you are refusing to confirm if he yet lives. Furthermore, I seem to recall you had removed him from your house. Which is why he instead had a burgundy lotus on his-"

"Utter one more word and I'll have your head on a pike by morning." Short of receding, she yet again smiled.

"Hehehe… Do you still claim to be in the right mindset to face this conundrum, Yuuhi-sama?"

"… Whatever are you referring to?" Then, while never dulling her smile, placing a hand on her chest, she gave a short bow.

"Well, if the words of this humble servant are enough to bring forth such ire, whatever will you do in front of Kouzuki if and when you are required to have a talk with the woman? Whatever would you do should he require your embrace to regain his composure?"

"I… Uh, I would… Nothing the XO could say would compare to-"

"Takeru Shirogane is my special protegee, therefore he shall remain by my side." A frown ignited on me, only to cause her to giggle once more. "You two truly are so similar. It would seem he did whisper that same wrath into you, Yuuhi-sama."

"Utter no further balderdash. You have merely put me in a foul mood."

"You still should meditate on all possible outcomes, however. He is no longer here to express your ire for you, so I do understand the pressure you must feel by being forced to play the role of a docile and warm Shogun every single day of your life. And, as per his command, it is my duty to ensure you do not ever follow his footsteps." Taking a step back and bowing deeply to me, she remains in position. "Thus, please do take into account that Takeru might yet live, and what you will need to do to ensure his return."

"… Take your leave, and do not dare to mention those days ever again." Turning back to the window, I hear her first steps as she leaves my presence. Looking back after a moment, I heard the door and then the ensuing solitude of my chamber.

The gall… How dare she say such words… How dare she still insist on such… lies, on such provocations. Takeru only confided in that woman because he… he insisted on remaining behind. It is true I was undeservedly harsh towards him at the time, yet… yet she could never, in no way or form, replace what I was for him. She was nothing more than a confidant, nothing else.

I can only bring a hand to my forehead as I shake my head, all of my anger, or at least most of it, leaving me as if rows of candles all drowned into ashes, sending my heart into a placid, dark, and regretful pondering.

"Sigh… How foolish of me, to become this adusted at her words. She is merely trying to spur me to act, to reignite my feelings for him so that I would try to confirm the man's identity." Ugh… Tsuhi always tends to act like this, and I always fall in her trap.

This time she went too far yet again. Maya should admonish her tomorrow, and well enough. As much as I appreciate Tsuhi's services, it would be the same as asking a bird to be pleased by living in a cage to have her act in any other way. After how the relation between our families crumbled, I should be grateful she still supports me despite the losses we suffered, even if I simply cannot stand the way in which she carries herself when she becomes upset.

"Still… Her words do carry some truth in them. I must not allow wrath to make nest within… And indeed, if I react towards her in this way, how will I face my daily endeavors or Kouzuki in due time?"

I sink into my bed, looking at the ceiling yet seeing something else entirely. Recalling all those distant days, when you visited, when we played together… What if… What if you're truly… alive…

However, how did he survive? That should be impossible, and it would make the man unable to truly be Takeru. And yet… And yet…

I curl to a side, hugging my forearms. Suddenly feeling cold, remembering his company yet no longer having it, I begin to rub my arms over and over.

"… I saw the readings… I saw the radar… He perished on that day. And that's… the truth."

Then, the tip of my nails begin to press themselves on my arms.

I have known this since many moons ago. They are all… merely being overwhelmed by emotion while facing someone who resembles him much. That is all. It is only logical, I also would have been truly shocked to see a copycat of Takeru. And yet there is no way that such obvious blight would fool my eyes.

Descending to my elbows, small marking are left on my arms. Then my hands begin moving up, this time with more impulse on their pressure.

There's no way he survived… There's no way I abandoned him… I didn't… I didn't do such a thing… Takeru is dead… The sword… must be a well forged replica, he must have received footage of the Mugen Kidou…

By this point, my teeth were gritted as my arms reddened, as my hands raked them over and over as if they were a lush farm field. However, what spawns these tears comes from within.

To know his tastes… his gestures… and his piloting quirks… To… possess his face and display those same emotions…

"Sniff… What if… you truly were… still alive? But then… How were you taken from… Uh-Ugh… Hic… Who… took you away?"

… And, if it truly is you… I should send word to them posthaste so that they monitor him more closely from now on, to dispel this fog. Both to quell the hesitation they're displaying and my own disquiet. However, if he had survived… If it is truly you…

"… Then, I shall have you back home, regardless of the UN's consent."

"Why didn't you follow the plan?!" Tapping her glasses, she fumes at Kei.

"Sure did, targets got shot down."

"Because you broke the formation. All of us were supposed to nullify one target each during this scenario." Making circles in the air again, she sighs.

"No point in following a flaky tactic." Her brows are twitching, she's trying hard to not snap.

"Oh, are you saying my plan was flawed somehow? Why didn't you say so when we debated how to approach the exercise then?"

"C-Come on, you two." Mikoto barely manages to wring out. "In the end, we passed the exercise, so let's keep-"

"Yoroi, you did not manage to perform at your best." Tapping her glasses, the frown does not fade away. "If this continues to happen, Ayamine's teammates will end up with far less points than they should. If you're seen as dead weight, your score will suffer the consequences."

"I wonder who is at fault…" And of course she'd retort like that.

"What? Are you implying I'm the one who made Yoroi under-perform just now? How selfish can you be…" Crossing her arms, her brows tense into a tight V.

Looking back, Tama was shivering a bit as she looked at them, then at the ground, then at me and Meiya, then at the Instructor, then at the ground again. Meiya sighed yet again, leaning on the rails, the onset of a frown also appearing in her face. And NotMarimo-chan doesn't have any intention to stop the fight, just as she did nothing when they dog piled on me.

Sigh… And the core issue behind this argument won't be solved with a few words, much less in this world.

"Maybe you should look in the mirror more often." Looking away, hand on her hip, her usual deadpan tone could set off a Jump Unit without much help now.

"Huh? Some of us aren't making the most out of the trainings because of your selfish maneuvers!"

"C-Chizuru-san, it's alright. I can make it up in the next run."

"Shouldn't have to. You did try to do the right thing." Kei says, giving her a nod.

"What are you even going on about? Ayamine, it was you who broke the formation and caused this to begin with. It's always the same in every single run we do." Shaking her head, she then rolls her eyes.

"If you had followed my lead, all of us could have scored well enough. You didn't, and forced Yoroi to do the same when she was about to follow up." She says, which makes Chizuru shoot a look at Mikoto.

"Um… You know, I did think that, maybe, it would be for the better to scatter at the clearing…" Holding her elbow, she looks to the ground, unable to hold Chizuru's gaze.

"Then, why didn't you say that before the exercise? We could have devised another plan." Tapping her glasses, fuming an eruption out of her lungs, she looks away too.

"Uh, well, it was because I thought the plan was fine."

"Huh? You just said you thought scattering would have been better."

"Yeah, but… well…"

"Well, which is it? What was your assessment of the exercise, then?" On normal circumstances, Chizuru's question would have been received as the curious, honest inquiry of a leader trying to learn. However…

"Ah, um, you know… I saw the enemy had a vantage point and, uh, thought that we should scatter…" Mikoto is terribad when it comes to putting her thoughts into words like that. She usually has problems doing that, so in such a tense situation it's obvious she'd just clamp up.

"And after that? How would you have proceeded?" Chizuru presses, Mikoto looks down.

"Uh, I… well…"

It's not just about her usual absentminded way of being. She, just like Kei and me when I had just begun, moves purely on instinct. For her, who is also dealing with the same issues of not finding her moment to talk, and so keeps avoiding getting involved in the thick of the debates while instead just popping in every now and then, finding the right words is going to be almost impossible under this mood.

If I had to guess, going by how she isn't even lifting her gaze from the ground, she'll choose to either shut up or ask for someone else's opinion. She still doesn't have the confidence to voice her own thoughts and to follow through on her own ideas.

"Can't win if you stick to the books, is what she's saying." Kei says, shrugging. Probably trying to shield Mikoto in her own way.

"Hmph." Chizuru crosses her arms, shooting Kei another glare. "Don't be ridiculous, we can't go into battle without a plan, and not communicating our opinions is only going to make things worse."

"I did. I told you to follow me, and that you were one breath too slow." Again, one of her brows twitch.

"And what part of that tells either me or her about how you wanted to proceed?" Kei just looks away, again remaining silent. Chizuru sighs yet again. "So Yoroi, in the end, what were your thoughts on how to move on after scattering?"

"… Well, uh, I didn't really… think it that far. Kei-san, what did you have in mind when you asked us to follow you?"

"Yoroi, I'm asking your opinion. Why did you think it was a good idea to break formation?"

"I… I've been telling you, I just thought it was… the right call in the moment."

Chizuru shakes her head, looking away as she closes her eyes. Mikoto's gaze sinks further in down to Kashgar as she scratches her neck, Kei remains as she was, brows down and posture stiff as hell.

And the ones keep rollin', and they don't stop comin'. Wish taking ten was an option right now, seems better than rolling this rigged dice.

Kei again says a one liner, Chizuru fumes about how they're both not making sense, Mikoto doesn't even try to talk anymore.

"Um…" Tama speaks up, looking back at us. "S-Shouldn't we do something?"

"Leave them be, Tamase." Tracing the rim of her fringe with a finger, Meiya's eyes narrow. "Halting the argument won't solve anything. It is they who must find a way to healthily communicate their issues with one another. We must have faith that they shan't allow this setback to hamper our collective efforts."

"Uh… Shirogane-san, what do you think?"

"Well, on one hand, Mitsurugi is right. They're not little kids anymore, and us stepping in and telling them what to do won't solve anything." Tama looks down, deflating like a blimp that sees that it's in the range of the Lasers. "But, no way in hell we should just stand and watch."

"Huh? Then, what should we do?" Tama takes a step forward, regaining some color in her eyes.

"Shirogane, you should desist." Meiya says, arms folding. "Surely you know how they always have been like this. The probability of them reacting badly to your words is decidedly high."

"… And?" Looking away from her eyes, I scratch the back of my head.

"It would be most foolish to interject now of all times. We should give them some respite before we try to speak of the matter. As they are now, no words we could employ shall reach them."

"Cool, that's your opinion, Mitsurugi." One of her brows twitches. "But we're losing time, and since their problem is my problem too, I'm gonna take cards on the matter." Turning around, facing the Instructor, I can't take two steps before Meiya places herself in front of me.

"And what are you trying to accomplish by having the Instructor halt their discussion?"

"… Who said I'm going to stop their argument?"

"Huh? However, then, what are you planning to do? You should tell us what-"

"No, I don't think I will." Her lips pluck a bit, a finger begins to tap her forearm. "Because I know you're not gonna agree with me, Mitsurugi." One of her brows sinks down.

"Then, why follow through with this idea of yours?"

"Because they need a splash of cold water, and believe me when I tell you I know what I'm talking about."

"… Oh, is the water in your cell truly so cold, Shirogane-san?" Tama's tone got all creaky.

First, that's not what I was referring to. Second, don't give me those sad eyes, it's cheating. Third, thanks for worrying, sweetheart.

"It's just a manner of speech, Tama. Anyways, we can't just fold our hands and hope everything will just fix itself on its own. So, please move, Mitsurugi." Giving her a direct gaze, holding it for a second, she finally nods.

"If you're so determined, then do as you wish. However… What about our acco…" She looks down, then simply walks away.

"… What was Mitsurugi-san talking about?"

"It's nothing, Tama. Don't worry 'bout it." Smiling at her, I then turn to see that they're still going at it.

Mikoto trying to pacify them, Kei refusing to speak, and Chizuru still trying to get them to explain their thoughts in a way she can understand them.

If Kei hadn't given up on talking things through with her, all it would take is a 'You gotta be more flexible on the battlefield, because the targets will fight back in real life' from her to solve this mess. Though, if I go in and say it, Kei herself will get pissed off. She hates it when people either force her to do something or are telling her the same thing over and over again.

What makes this worse is that Chizuru is telling her she's making a miss when, in all fairness, the one making the biggest mistake is Chizuru herself. She's trying too hard to prove herself worthy, to make good plans, to make sure her outlined scenario fulfills an ideal outcome that she's missing the point of the training as she did in all past loops before the mock battles started. And since she's so dedicated to her tactics, people telling her 'do this or that' without an explanation sets her off like nothing else. More so in this world, where she's more dedicated to the role of leader.

Just like when I bought stuff on impulse back in my world and she scolded me for not being responsible with my money. Luckily, she isn't admonishing Kei as badly as in my other loops, mainly not insisting on her being mistaken, but still, it will get to that point if nothing is done.

Kei needs to trust in Chizuru again, to drop whatever is making her retort in remarks and tell her, no layer of sarcasm involved, what she wants to do and why. Not being forced by anyone, Kei herself needs to be honest and speak her mind openly or this won't have any meaning. I think Chizuru is trying to be more patient, despite how pissed off she is, since she is still trying to talk things out with both of them, so maybe I could talk things out with her later… But Kei remains as the main issue, not only in her isolating stance but on her 'No Retreat' ideal.

… One needs to learn to let go of the script and trust in her gut, the other needs to begin to rely on her team and drop that almost suicidal way of fighting. So… They gotta face a situation… in which their original plan is busted and their wincon becomes survival. However, no way in hell the Instructor will let us advance in the exercises to the missions that would place them in such a scenario, so we gotta make do with what we have on hand… which are stock Fubukis that don't move unless it's to give chase if we retreat and also barely retaliate, if at all, or the slow moving targets that are barely an inconvenience.

So, there's only one thing that could get them out of this hole as of now… and I know this will come back to bite me in the ass later today, considering how long last night's fight took, but… I guess I don't lose anything by asking.

Looking away from the argument, I walk up to the Instructor, who rose a brow as I approached.

"… I'm not going to stop them, if that's what you're going to ask." Crossing her arms, she returns a narrowed gaze.

… Yes, I knew you wouldn't, NotMarimo-chan. No need to remind me.

"I have a suggestion to make if you'd allow me, Instructor."

"Hm? What is it?"

"Would you allow me to face off against both Sakaki and Ayamine in the simulator?"

"… And that would be beneficial to the squad because…"

I then tell her my idea, and what I needed her to help me with in the sim. Never letting go of my eyes, she groans a bit once I finish.

"… And, assuming I agree, do you truly think yourself able to fill the part?"

"Yes, Ma'am. For the squad to be commissioned, and for their own futures as well, they need to stop this bickering. But, as you can see…" I look back, they're still going at it. "… words alone won't do the trick. Could you allow this exception, Instructor?" Giving her a bow and remaining like that, she soon begins to chuckle. "Uh, Ma'am?"

"It would seem you're finally ready to take the training seriously, Shirogane." I don't like that smirk, but whatever hellish training she comes up with after this will be future me's problem. And those two… gotta step up, now. "Fine, I'll allow it." Then, she begins to walk towards the rest, taking her usual pose. "Squad! Line up!"

Meiya gave me a stare as I got to her side, seeming to want to say something but choosing not to at the last second. The rest also line up quickly, the shorter ones looking antsy as hell, the other two pissed off but making an effort to restrain their mood, and failing miserably at it.

"Well, another exercise finished. No comment on this one." One of Chizuru's brow twitched, Mikoto's mouth barely opened to let out a small groan. "The next group will be Sakaki, Ayamine, Shirogane, in that order on the pods."

"Um, Instructor, what about-" Meiya's question was slashed in half by a silent stare from NotMarimo-chan.

"Come on, in the pods!"

Meiya still stared at me, arms folded and brows low. Both Tama and Mikoto gave us the antsy, worried gaze as we walked to the pods. Man, they look like I did whenever Yuuko-sensei dropped one of her crazy questions in her exams. Making a small smile, I give 'em a thumbs up. Mikoto seems taken aback, then Tama seems to tell her I had a plan or something which eases her tension, just a tiny bit.

… Meiya, however, remained with her arms tightly folded, tapping one of them with a finger, never letting me out of her sight. Sigh… I really tried to stay in good spirits around her today, but I know I should just mind my words. Though… for now, I have something else to focus on.

Looking away from the other three, I saw Chizuru and Kei sharing a sigh as they walked to the sims, getting in the pods.

Entering my sim and bolting myself to the seat as usual, the connection was started. However, unlike all the other times, a different message, colored in crimson, appeared in my view as the colors of the HUD shifted to a darker hue, as more and more windows and options appeared for a second as the sim changed its mode.

[LINK CONFIRMED - AGGRESSOR UNIT]

I think this is the very first time I play as an aggressor during my cadet course. I wonder if I can override their BGMs now? Sadly, I have no badass horse to use as a name for my unit… Oh, but one could say that I am a time diver, kinda. I'm even using an old model on the course to boot, despite the sim having me train with the config of a Fubuki. Thinking about it, my Shin Geki could be like what the Specter Type-R was for Gyriam Jaeger in the game.

Pfft! Hahaha, would be real cool if I actually was some sort of badass, S-Tier unit. Though, from the eyes of my squad, I might as well be one.

"Shirogane, can you hear me?" NotMarimo-chan's face zooms into the center of my view.

"… Loud and clear, Ma'am. All green on my end." I almost ended up lost in thought again there.

"Good. So, just to be clear, are you sure you want me to remove the automatic functions of the simulator?"

"Yes, I've been meaning to ask for permission, but didn't find the right moment."

"Sigh… Do remember that your final score will be reflected by all of your exercises. A poor performance will hurt your records. Also, manual controls can and will give you the full feedback of the unit, and that also applies to the shaking and vertigo. The images that will be projected when you perform high velocity maneuvers may either give you motion sickness or dizziness. And, of course, the aggressor configuration will also require your suit to enter the full load of the heightened feedback. Are you certain you wish also remove the auto-adjustments?"

"I am well aware of the conditions I'll be facing, Ma'am. And I have weighed my options, I believe I can handle it, more so if you allow me to use manual controls."

"Hm?" Arching a brow, she simply stares back in silence for a sec. "And, how exactly are you certain that you can handle this mission?"

"Well… There is some delay between the commands I input and the feedback, there's also the slight lag on the display. If my eyes didn't fail me, I have some frames of leeway to make some mistakes. And, not to boast or anything, but I am confident in my skill to face off against them by myself." Cue in Blaze Wars fading in aggressively.

… Not to joke again but, if I were a unit in a game, what would my BGM sound like? Oh, I know. I'll ask Kasumi to pick one for me from the songs in Oratory Tango next time we get to play.

The Instructor blinks a few times as she furrows her brows, leaving her mouth barely open.

"… Can you explain what do you mean regarding the frames?"

"Uh… Think of this as if it were a race where I can gain some seconds of advantage on the curves." She nods, making a short groan and placing a hand on her chin. "So long as I keep myself in check, so long as I listen to the car, I can exploit those seconds of advantage I get off the curves to extend my lead or break even."

"And this translates to TSF combat, in which way?"

"Sigh… There is some delay in the feedback we see, right? The inputs don't occur as fast as we press them, doesn't feel like it at least."

"Well, yes, that's true."

"So, since I more or less know which commands worsen or lessen the lag, and which are unaffected by it, I have an advantage over them, besides my own piloting skills. And so, by having no limits on the movements I can make, I have a wider set of options to choose from which will allow me to set the pace of my fighting as I go depending on how well I can take the unlocked feedback of the sim."

"I can see what you mean, however, what does this has to do with the manual controls? It isn't as if you were lacking options with the automatic support systems activated." She crosses her arms, raising a brow.

"Well, to be honest, the forced auto systems bother me a bit. My volleys are not arching as I want them to, they continue firing in a straight line, my auto-aim doesn't allow a target switch as fast as I'd like, and I can't move as I want to if the system prevents me from doing something it deems problematic." Really, I know easing people up in the learning curve is important, to grind the basics into our skulls and polish any unnecessary moves we might make otherwise, but this could use an overhaul.

Sure, I didn't get all hyper over Valgern-On in a single day, but the learning process was so much more smooth than our cadet course. Beginner mode alone covered what I'm asking of her with just a simple flick of an option. The XM3 can't get unveiled any faster. If only they had agreed to train with the consoles… Considering they're now in the open, I doubt we'd get to formally use them before we join the Valkyries.

"Hmm…" She smirks again, I don't like the gleam on her eyes. "One last question, do you think you'll be able to finish the day's trainings after this exercise?"

"Huh? Yeah, I mean, we don't have anything on the afternoon after all." What with Tama's dad coming over and…

… I just fucked up, didn't I?

"Shirogane, what do you mean by that?" Narrowed brows and eyes, the edge of a blade being released lingered on her words.

"Uh, you see… Sensei told me something serious was coming up and I wouldn't have to train on the afternoon… due to my punishment, that is."

"Sigh… Fair enough." Bullet: Dodged. "Fine, you can have your match on your rules. Show me if your ideas hold water, and if your ego translates to reality. However, if you fail to complete the exercise, I will not hesitate to give you a matching score. Are we clear? Good. So, you were wishing for their data link to be delayed?"

"Yes, if you could allow it. They need to see the importance of communicating on the go in a clear way, and halting the data link is the only way to force them to talk, for now."

"Alright, I'll play along this time. I am expecting a good show, Shirogane."

"Yes, Ma'am!" She cuts the connection, and I'm left waiting for the start of the run.

Sure, showing off will make Kei and Meiya more paranoid… but they need to get better, they can't waste their time with these arguments anymore. Also, if I'm being watched by the Guard, this might prove to them I don't fight like this world's me did at all, even if I try to use his sidesteps. But… their future is far more important than the risk of increasing my wanted level on the Royal Guard's black list yet again. And anyways, chances are they are still coming after my head, going by how Meiya again got all suspicious of me.

So… even if it's a bad call… Inhaling through my nose, filling my stomach with air as I lean back on the seat, I recite the poem Maya-sensei taught me within me as the rumbling of the sim begins to make itself known.

"… Time to flow into my enemies, with the might of an unending waterfall."

A Mistake Worth Making

Chapter 40: A Mistake Worth Making

---

November 29th. Around 10:30 AM.

(In a sim pod.)

[Kei]

---

Sigh… What have I done to deserve this shit? This is the third time in a row the Instructor puts me along the princess, and now with Special-kun too. Why isn't she saying anything? Why isn't she stepping in?

I'm not making a miss… If we followed her orders we would die in the field, and she just won't shut up about how we're mistaken. Easy to throw your comrades' lives away when you can just run away to Daddy's mansion.

The initial rumbling slows down as the scenery comes into view, yet another urban layout.

"01, all green. 04, 06, report your status."

"… 04, all green."

Still, I can't fail this training, and I don't wish to become a burden. But then, how on Earth do I make her understand? If I say anything, she gets all irritated. If the others do, she pressures them until they shut up. Some squad leader you are… We all are scoring good enough numbers, perhaps not when compared to the irregularity that is Special-kun but we're still doing remarkably well. Actually, she should be the one revising her stance. The military has to do all it can for its people, that also includes one's squadmates and underlings. Yet, she still acts all high and mighty despite being the one with the worst numbers across the board. She's just like the idiots that blamed me after what Dad did, skull as thick as her eyebrows.

"06, report your status." She asks again.

And then… there's no answer.

"06, do you copy?" Some seconds pass, but he doesn't answer her calls.

"Should we call the Instructor?"

"Yes, just a second… Instructor, do you copy?"

…

Okay, now the Instructor is also missing? Maybe something came up? But then, her face zooms into view as usual.

"Were you calling, Sakaki?"

"Yes, Ma'am. We can't seem to reach 06's unit… And he is nowhere in sight."

"Don't worry, this is all part of the exercise." Smirking as always, she begins the briefing. "Now then, let's begin exercise C-2. You currently have a base behind you, guarded by some artillery and infantry units, that's in the middle of an evacuation." A blink in our radar shows us the location of the target we have to protect, located at the tail end of the map to our seven. We were somewhere close to the middle, near a highway. "A hostile TSF unit is closing in on your location, and you cannot allow them to reach the perimeter of the base. You are to stand your ground and subdue the aggressors. However, your data link's functionality shall be reduced, and your mapping won't be as fast as it should. Make sure you communicate well between yourselves to clear this mission. As always, the goal is total annihilation of the hostiles."

"Roger." Still, this is weird. We didn't clear C-3, yet she's sending us to the next one… Well, this might be one last show of patience to force us to work together before punishments come out pouring.

"Understood. Instructor, what will 06's role be?"

"06 has been placed on a different location, and has to remain alone during his part of the mission. Said reason is why your data link is limited, so that neither he nor yourselves know where the others are. You have a few seconds before the mission starts to discuss strategies, that is all." And with a nod, she cuts the connection.

So she's sending him all on his own, to test his real abilities. This will be a nice way to see his true colors. While our sparring yesterday wasn't bad at all, and he did better than before, I still can't find a single weak point in his piloting. But… he didn't give us any advice as usual, and even kept some distance from Mitsurugi and me. Even asked us to ignore him… as I did when I got fed up with the princess.

No, I'm not wrong on this. He's too suspicious, too skilled to be a cadet. Closing my eyes for a moment, releasing some air as I hunch forward, I refocus on what's ahead. Can't involve myself with him, can't let my guard down.

"04, I think we should each take one side of the crossroad up ahead." The princess cuts into a corner of my vision, a small marking appears on my radar. "Most of the landscape to our twelve seems to be collapsed so any hostiles won't be able to get past it without jumping, and then we could snipe them. So, blocking the open highway seems like the most appropriate choice."

… For starters, it is. Until we see through the missing dots where Special-kun is on the mission, blocking that street is our best bet. However…

"I suggest that we stand behind the collapsed buildings further into the ruins, there is very little cover near the highway."

There's a clearing near our position, and big enough buildings and large lots full of rubble to each side of the highway both in front and behind us. Getting too close to that small clearing equals exposing ourselves unnecessarily, our rifles have plenty of range to deal with any hostiles rushing through it, and the extra space would give us ample time to react to any that jump through the toppled ruins.

"However, our data link will be hampered." She retorts, hand on her chin. "We might not be notified on some of them approaching through the ruins, and if we're focusing on the highway there's a possibility that we might miss some. I believe we should be closer, so that our radars locates their signals sooner."

"We can slowly approach the highway as we deal with the hostiles." Even in the case of a sudden rush with multiple enemies, we should have enough room to chase some if they happen to evade us somehow. Having more cover would be beneficial so that those enemies can't strike at us from a blank point.

"Acquiring intel on the enemy's position would be a priority in this situation, in my opinion. Also, neither of us can snipe as well as Tamase, so we should shorten the distance in case some sneak by us."

"We can chase them then." In this narrow space full of debris they won't be able to get near top speed, and if they jump they'll be sitting ducks in the air. No AI could match up Special-kun's deranged style, after all.

"What if the Instructor deems any hostile getting too close to the end of the map as an instant failure?"

"… Damn, didn't think of that."

She's got a point, all be damned. If the Instructor wants to, she can say we didn't cooperate well enough. She did say we couldn't let anyone reach 'the perimeter' of the base, so if we take too long during the chase we might fail this. And yes, neither of us got Tamase's sniping, and we don't know where Special-kun is, nor if he'll get close enough to lend a hand. And, if the hostiles go in the princess' direction, she ain't got the ability to hunt them down. She can't fly as precisely as I do, but also lacks the marksmanship of either Yoroi or Tamase to make up for that. And if there's a sudden rush of hostiles after she's forced to chase a stray enemy…

Sigh… For the sake of the training… For my own commission… At least we can't retreat on this exercise.

"Roger. I've no complains, let me take front point then."

"Huh?" Arching a brow, she taps her glasses. "Why would you take front point? Your long range is worse than mine."

"My CQC is better, I can rush the enemy while you cover me in case many come at us all at once."

"Don't be stupid, we have to operate close to each other. Especially in this mission, without our data link working well."

"What do we do if some slip by through the ruins?"

"We'll have enough time and space to give chase if we're near each other, since they'll have to jump through all those toppled buildings to do that."

… Not even considering the chance that they might strike at us from a blank point, huh. And no way in hell she'd be able to chase them down. I'll just listen to the radar and take out any enemies that try to break past us. No need to keep bashing my head against the wall.

"… Roger."

"Well, here's the positions I thought of." The radar shows two spots near the start of the clearing, quite some meters in between each of them, behind two of the few buildings that we could use as cover. "This gives us a good vantage point to attack the enemy while also letting us see far enough into the highway with our combined footage."

"Okay. Which side is mine?"

"You prefer the right one, so take it. Remember to use the comms to notify me of any changes you see."

Yes, I know you like being on top, princess. No need to remind me. Worst of this is, if she misses an enemy I'm too far away to try to snipe it from here. There's a goddamn building in the way and if I'm not careful I might end up taking the princess down if I try to get it on the small opening I'll have from there. And we also don't have a frontal view of the highway, so we might not see an incoming rush quickly enough.

Sigh… Don't have time to argue, just focus on doing what you can. As much as I dislike it, at least Special-kun is somewhere out there. For all I know, he might have been placed as a last line sweeper.

Before neither of us could say anything else, the green message appears on our view. The mission started, and wasting not a second I move forward, running through the rubble. Gotta conserve my fuel, in case a chase is required later.

The princess decided to jump instead, making it to our decided spot a few seconds before me. As I did, though, I saw the first few enemy signals pop up on my radar. Five enemies, two right behind each other on the right, the others lagging behind on the left.

Alright, I'll begin with a dash to gain momentum and suppress them with the 36mm, from there I can-

"Ayamine, take your position! The enemy is closing in already!"

"… I know." God damn it all.

Rifle out, fire angle locked. The enemy appears, heels on the pedals then I tap the trigger to send a short volley, and then do the same when the second one appears as I move back. Both of them neutralized, less than fifty 36mm used. Taking cover as they shot at me, the princess begins to attack then.

Shooting together at the rushing enemies while taking cover when necessary, we subdue the first wave. More than I thought would come, but we did have to go toe to toe against eight enemies at the end of Level D. Luckily, their response time is rather slow and we even have the aid of auto-aim for when we have to move back. Locking onto another target does take half a second, so just shooting is actually the better choice since the machine remembers the last angle I used to shoot at, added to the absolute lack of evasive maneuvers of the AI. Guess Special-kun was right about that, too. Maybe because he actually piloted a TSF before.

Bringing me back to the fight, more beeping comes in through the radar.

"What the…" Nine signals, all at once. Closer than the others were before when we noticed them. A rush so early in the mission? "01, hostiles located. Nine coming, first four coming on the left to your two through the ruins."

"Nine?! Dammit. Can you handle the highway?"

"Yeah."

Moving under cover, going to the left side of the building to get a good sight of the enemy, seeing the first two hostiles get shot down by the princess, I prep up a boost. As the hostiles rushed from the highway into my range, I again opened fire upon them, moving behind cover when necessary. As the radar updates, I see one is near me and getting closer. Readying a dagger on my free arm, crouching as I move out, a rush aimed at its cockpit drives the dagger home. Lost the weapon but the enemy Fubuki was neutralized without me taking any damage. Sigh… All done here.

But once I saw the radar, there were five more signals coming our way.

"04, five more hostiles sighted. Prepare to engage again."

"Way ahead of you."

"Why, you… Here they come!" Don't need you to tell me.

Reverting to the 36mm, going back a few steps, more and more bullets are sent at the hostiles, that get shot down on the spot. Before the radar could tell us, another four come through the highway, trying to scatter as they dash away from us. Rushing out of cover, veering to the right, I try to spread my angle to not miss, but one of them had sent missiles my way, forcing me to move behind cover. And as I was re-aiming, the shock warning appears on my sight as my inputs cease to work. Damn… As soon as I got out of cover, one of them landed a hit on my feet, and I began to fall down onto a building, pretty much headbutting it face first. Just a scratch, no damage to the visor thankfully. Then, her face pops up in the left corner of my vision.

"I got hit. 04, can you still move?"

"No, they got me too. Let's chase them, no signals over the radar."

"Roger, let's hurry with this!" And for once, she isn't being a bother. It's gonna snow, dammit.

Diving my heels onto the pedals once the response comes back, the shaking increases as I suddenly shift to full march towards my fleeing target. Her dot on my radar was unmoving despite how she took off immediately once the shock time stopped, as I did. Looking at it, there's a three second lag in what's displayed.

Choosing to boost jump when I realized I wasn't gaining time on it, the distance between us finally begins to shorten.

Don't have time to waste, if too many come out now we won't be able to get them if they scatter. If this were a real mission, and she ends up surrounded… she would die, I would die, the base might get overrun. And I'm sure… this is nothing compared to what our armies had to do when that attack happened a few weeks ago.

"I won't let something like this bring me down…"

Boosting again while leaving my feet firmly planted on the pedals, the Fubuki finally enters my sight again. It's running instead of boosting… probably because it should conserve fuel to escape after attacking the base. Shaving the distance, the hostile stops in its track as it turns around, readying its rifle. Not giving it enough time to properly aim, switching to 120mm, then flickering the trigger once more with a vengeance, another volley comes out and the hostile is shot down.

Sigh… Thank the Emperor it didn't get near the cramped part of the ruins, or that it didn't have time to shoot. Worse, if it had boost jumped, I would have made us lose. Alright, let's return. Radar shows nothing, but I shouldn't count on it.

"04, stray neutralized. How's the situation?"

"01, I just shot down my target as well. Let's return to the highway."

I nod to the projection, shutting it off later.

Again activating a boost, jumping above the nearby buildings and rubble lots, I quickly return to our prior position. However, I don't return to the spot she chose. Circling to the place I had thought of before, crouching in between some broken down buildings in front of a small amount of rubble, I take aim at the highway.

The enemy's goal is clear, split us up. Wouldn't surprise me if another rush was coming our way, so we need space to not end up shooting at point-blank, we might get taken out otherwise. If another rush comes right after this, and I have to give chase again, I might not make it in time to suppress the enemy. Hell, the princess might not make it back before the next ones come here, her target ended up farther away than mine after all. Worse, they might stop using the highway altogether and force us to separate to then gang up on us. Better take these next ones from a safe distance and then get some breathing room to see where the next ones come from.

Prepping the 120mm, the radar beeps, just two signals.

"04, two hostiles sighted."

"01, roger that. I'm getting close and… Wait, why aren't you by the highway?"

"Risk of taking a hit at point-blank, can't take that if you're not here."

"That's… No, good call. I'm almost there."

Wow, she didn't begin to scream? Shit, a blizzard is on the horizon. Heh… Well, a Fubuki is coming towards me, actually.

Looking back forward as I grin, said hostile Fubuki comes through the highway, running with its guns blazing. Too bad you can't hit me from that far away by simply spraying your shots around. Not fast enough for me to miss, nothing like Special-kun or Yoroi, trigger pulled and down it goes. The other again tried to break through the ruins, to make a run for it, but I had enough time to lock onto it, move out to intercept and take it down in between the streets. Didn't even have to give chase, I knew this spot was the best pick.

"04, both targets down." Her face again appears in a corner of my vision, this time her brows were down and arched very, very hard.

"Good work. I'm right around the corner, how's the situation?"

"Both targets shot down. And… nothing on the radar." She is almost here, so I guess I'll just return on foot to my cover. Turning around, stepping on the pedals with just a bit of impulse, I jog my way to the buildings.

"Stay on your guard, we don't know when the enemy will appear." Sigh… I know.

"By the way, I noticed the radar takes three seconds to update when you left."

"Oh, really? Good work, 04." It's gonna rain icebergs, I tell you. "I can see the highway already, any updates?"

I look over the radar, that was blank three seconds ago, as I bring my unit to a halt.

But then, the image displayed a singular dot in the highway, almost to our end of it actually.

But… But the enemies so far didn't move that-

Beep!

For just a second, as I turned around, I saw the figure of the Fubuki as it flew right through the open space of the clearing. Locking my barrel onto it, my shot missed. Once its feet touched the ground it again jumped, wasting no time and in a fluid movement as if it were dancing a ballet, taking cover behind the buildings we were behind before while dodging all of my shots. Then, it sent a volley my way, tumbling my Fubuki down. Light damage to the outer armor of my left foot, dammit!

"01, a single enemy sighted! It's- Tch, damn." Forced to crouch and hide behind a cover to avoid its heat, the radar shows me the hostile again began to advance as I did.

Looking out from my position, I saw it flying about for a second before it landed behind some buildings, out of my sight.

"04, where's the enemy?!"

"Got past me, landed on a street to your Five. Giving chase now."

"Wait, leave it to- Woah!" Her face tightened, gritting her teeth.

So the runaway ran into her, huh. Good enough, we'll regroup after taking it down, so unless there's another rush we should be able to manage. No other signals on the radar… I could leave it to the princess… But if more of those come out, I can't hold five or so by myself if all of them boost jump in different directions.

"01, currently engaging. Can't seem to pin it down."

Sigh… If it wasn't because it caught me by surprise, I wouldn't have let it slip. One alone is not a threat to me. Shows how good she truly is. The radar changes, showing me their positions. She's… actually getting driven back? What the hell, squad leader. Much lip, little skill.

"04, I've located you. Coming in to your Three."

"Got it, I'll distract it to let you strike from behind then. Just hurry it up!"

Thank the Heavens she's cooperating, even if we're gonna swim in snow the next few weeks. As my Fubuki runs through the broken streets in between the buildings, I caught sight of the radar as it updated. The hostile is in a clearing, not letting the princess move out from her cover.

… But wait, why would a hostile AI do this? If their mission is to reach the base, it should have tried to run away as soon as she couldn't retaliate, like the others did until now. After all, all the enemies we've faced before don't stay to fight when the mission entails defending a perimeter.

Then… Why is this one acting differently?

Three seconds passed, the radar was updated as I was almost to the clearing in the ruins, taking a corner to reach their position and seeing the back of the enemy Fubuki. And wasting not a second, the hostile turned around. Pointing its rifle right at me, making me bite my lips as I yank the controls.

"Damn it!" Moving sharply to my left, the increased shaking tells me that shot just grazed me. "01, this is no ordinary hostile. It noticed me and attacked in less than a second."

"What? I thought it was just my imagination when he engaged me…"

So you saw it and said nothing? No, now's not the time. Where is that-

"The target is fleeing!" And again, doesn't seem like it's running either. Triggering the boosters, pushing the controls a tad bit too strongly, I begin to make consecutive jumps to get closer to it. "I'll take care of this one, you return to the highway."

"Don't be foolish, you can't take that one out by yourself."

Heh, tell your pride to get down from the pony. My reflexes aren't as bad as-

Looking forward once I landed, the warm end of a rifle was pointed at me on the corner of my sight.

"Guh!" Feeling my elbow hit my ribs, the edge of the seat sinking into the back of my knees, instinct takes over as I jolt the controllers to move back.

Dammit, again just barely managed to dodge it. And by jumping away from it, again. Doesn't matter, I'll take it out with the next shot. Like I always did with the other hostiles up until now. Getting out of cover, my trigger finger ready to shoot, the first thing I see… is a sword coming down onto my head.

Barely pulling away to avoid it, the follow up forces me to backboost for the first time since I started my piloting training, all to barely escape the edge that creates a blizzard of concrete and a deafening sound burst as a building is shredded down, prey to the onslaught of the hostile.

And through the rubble, through the dust… the green light of the enemy Fubuki's visor was there, staring right back at me and getting closer.

"Damn… But I've got you at point-blank. Now you're gonna bite it." I shoot, confident that it will be enough to take it down at this distance.

But, somehow, it brought its blade to its body, covering my shoots with it. Moving forward once more, bringing its blade above its shoulder, again all I can do is backboost away as it eviscerates another building.

Damn… That trick won't work twice on me, though. I'll just shower you with a few 120mm, let's see you block this with a sword.

"04, pull back! Let's pincer it toge-"

"Shut it, I can take it down."

I won't retreat. If this were a real mission, if real lives were at stake… we should subdue such a threat immediately!

I open fire again, this time not lifting my finger. Don't care how many bullets it takes, this one's going down. We're wasting too much time as it is.

With this it should… should be… enough… Huh?

It didn't move left. It didn't move right. It didn't backboost or use its sword to block my shots.

It jumped forward, looking more like a short hop, avoiding my firing line altogether. And raising its blade, I saw it would also tear me down as it did to those buildings as soon as it landed. Biting my lips as my tongue sinks down, clawing at the controls, and not because of the intense shaking, backboosting is all I can do. Again.

Landing with a feet forward, using the momentum of the jump to do an upwards slash, my pressure on the pedals is not going to let me avoid this. As I gritted my teeth, the hostile suddenly froze over in its stride, letting me get around a corner to catch my breath.

"04, I told you to pull back! I barely managed to cover you!"

"… My bad."

I ran away. Again. But… But that reckless attack pattern…

"Damn, I'm getting pinned down again. Did you sustain any damage?"

"No…" The radar gets updated, the hostile is in the middle of a street. The princess is on a corner diagonally from my position.

"Let's coordinate an assault on this one, we can't leave the highway undefended for so long."

"… Wait, let me try something first."

"Huh? This isn't time for any selfish maneuvers!"

"I'm not going to move, just give me a second."

"Ayamine, now's not the time to-"

Tapping the button, I open the common channel. Which should be useless during sim training… unless you're fighting against someone else.

Those sharp moves, the way in which he always jumps forward to close the distance with his enemies… If this isn't him, then it's an AI loaded with this moves. And while he might have been placed on the other end of the map with the same mission as us, I don't see the Instructor sending someone on a solitary mission like that. If she wanted us alone to do another run as a punishment or a test, she wouldn't have called him.

"So, seems like you got a nice role to play in the mission, Special-kun."

"Huh? What are you saying?" She sighs, shaking her head. "Come on, 04. There's no way that's-"

"Ah, goddammit. You had to go and spoil the fun." That same complaining tone as when he had just gotten here, couldn't help but to purse my lips.

"Huh?! Shirogane-kun?!" Eyes wide, mouth as well, she seemed to not believe it.

"Oh, well. No point in hiding it. I was given the role of your enemy for this mission. Nice eyes, Ayamine."

"… So, what was up with those moves?" They were better than usual. He never… cornered me in such a way. I never… shivered by seeing the green glint of an opposing Fubuki as it chased me. To think I ran away instead of retaliating… "Seems like you've been hiding your best cards from us. Bad Special-kun."

"Ayamine, this isn't the time! We're in the middle of-"

"Nah, it's cool. She's right, though. Sigh… I am doing my best right now." He groans a bit, his voice sounds… exhausted, drained.

"Really? Because you're fighting two on one?" The princess asks.

"Or because he thought we wouldn't notice." She groans as I say it, but he speaks up before she can.

"Well, can't exactly take it easy against you two. But hey, most of my work here is done already, so might as well enjoy this early mock battle we have going on here." His voice again full of cheer, of the fake variety since he's clearly tired, Special-kun chuckles a bit afterwards.

As I wondered what the hell he meant by that, the radar let out a beep as it updated.

Revealing over ten signals coming from the highway, rushing towards the base.

Some odd minutes afterwards.

[Mana]

Mumbling and whispers filled the simulation room, yet all eyes were unmistakably gazing at the same monitor. While the performance of both young women was acceptable, it paled in comparison to the dexterity and finesse in which the male of the group commanded its virtual machine. A few pilots were gambling on whose side would emerge victorious, eliciting a small cheering from certain sectors towards either the females or the lone male as they continued to spar.

… And yet, in no way could I possibly believe what my eyes see now. It would be no jape to say I am petrified on the spot, as if my arms had been molded into my stomach, aware of my inhaling through my nose despite how tightly my throat is closing up at what I am seeing.

It isn't the same, not in its intent at the least, yet the similarities… are too large to ignore. More conscious footing, sharper cornering and jumps, barely no wasted movement in any of its attacks, and… a most polished control of the jump units that would leave anyone thinking the man is truly deserving of the darker suit he endows for his training.

However… It is less rash, impulsive, and far more aware of its surroundings. Takeru-sama tended to abuse its machines much, gaining the animosity of all of our mechanics in doing so, as he preferred to remain as close to top speed as possible while somehow managing to not crash as he did so. He truly was addicted to the element-based line-piercing doctrine Amato devised. And yet, despite being alone in this fight, he only ever uses a complete boost at the last moment, or sometimes even at random just to throw off his squadmates' offensive. Halting the advance of both of them at the same time, in spite of some… remarkably odd movements on his end, there is no mistake left in my eyes.

This is person… is none other than our Takeru. Even if its adusted impulse has been diminished, that most eccentric movement pattern is his no doubt. Then… Then, he truly was… alive? How on the Heavens could anyone replicate to this level of detail his piloting, if this isn't him? It is hard to imagine, when his fellows in training or even his Instructors were left lacking of all words when in front of his ways.

Sigh… You always were such a reckless boy… Even now, fighting on your own while relying on sharp dodges as opposed to taking cover… You never enjoyed using the shield, after all. Biting softly the inner side of my lips, I repress a smile. Finally exhaling heavily, my back allows itself to lean onto the frame of the wall.

"… It truly is a wonder."

"Indeed it is." Kamiyo says, yet with hostility permeating her tone. "What a parade. The man is flaunting his position as a commissioned pilot openly, and the fools are cheering on him."

Looking back at her, one of her hands was coiled hard enough to crush a rock, if one had been within its grasp.

"It is nothing but a cavalcade of clowns, what did you expect?" Tomoe says, shrugging. "However, at the least we now know our suspicions were spot on."

"That is true." Ebisu nods, taking a step closer. "Mana-sama, should we report this to the Great General? It is obvious the man should be detained, all things considered."

"And since when you are the one who decides what we do? Remember that we cannot act at our leisure in this base, even less after being appointed by her as the eyes of these testings we've been taking part in." Narrowing my eyes, she makes a sudden bow.

"Apologies, Mana-sama. However, in light of what we're seeing, I believe a report would be welcomed. There is no need to leave such a dangerous element near Meiya-sama overlong."

"I do agree with her." Kamiyo nods, then also bowing down. Tomoe follows suit. "While it is true we have no choice but to bow down and allow the UN to treat us as their mooks, we should not let this matter rest in my opinion. The damn American was in possession of a katana, and now we know of his true skills. We, as the servants of the House of the Shogun, should act to apprehend this-"

"Any further repining shall be reported to Her Highness." Freezing up, the trio simply bows down again. "You should know we cannot act by force. We're not some barbaric buffoons, we are the Royal Guard. And as my underlings, I am expecting you to measure up to the honor befitting the title you possess."

"Apologies, Mana-sama!"

"Sigh… Not so loud." And again, they bow down. While I am pleased with them as my fellows, and that they always listen to my words, from time to time I can't help but to wish they were slightly less noisy in their loyalty. "In any case, you do have a point. Enough woolgathering, a report is in order. Ebisu, remain here watching over Meiya-sama and do not, unless it is an emergency, approach the man. Have your communicator at the ready if anything that requiered my attention were to ocurr." Again narrowing my eyes, she stands upright and salutes me. "Then, let us go."

Taking one last look at the monitor, at Meiya-sama as her stare was transfixed onto it as well, I briskly walk away from the simulation room.

… So you're alive? Is it truly you? If so, then…

How were you taken from us? Who plotted such a thing? And… Does that vixen fox know of your true identity?

Otherwise, despite the discussions regarding the blade, despite Chief Yoroi's warnings, despite how detrimental to her relation with the Guard it is to not hand over the man and instead have to negotiate herself…

Why would she so stoutly deny us the chance to speak with you? Why erect such a wall over your person? For that woman to do such a thing…

Biting my lips, feeling my boots repine as their grip on the floor loosened once I picked up my pace, a frown expanded on my face despite my efforts.

… For this equals that she sees you as an important piece, which would mean…

She knows something about your identity, however small that knowledge may be. And if not, then she plans to make you into her pawn, to truly make you into her bodyguard.

… And I'd rather face damnation as we did during the '99 than see that come to pass.

"Mana-sama, please wait for us!" Kamiyo repines, her voice sounding out of breath.

"I believe you were the one who was wishing to make a report? Then, make haste. Time is of essence, after all." Descending the stairs without slowing down, the sounds of their hastened steps soon follow.

At the same time.

(Sim Pod.)

[Kei]

---

Volley to the left, he dances away from it. Retaliating with his own, an ember scratches my left arm. Orange numbers, two more hits and its dead. Pressing the tip of my tongue against the base of the inner side of my teeth, my heels sink into the pedals. Veering left, I spray him with more bullets. Special-kun dodges them, but I manage to hit one of the AI hostiles that was behind.

"04, move back!" She shouts, the radar updating as she moved forward.

That I do, and she sends a few 120mm and manages to neutralize another AI Fubuki. And not a second later, she has to run away as Special-kun almost introduced her to the sharp end of his sword.

I move forward and firing immediately, but he jumps away, into a building as if it were a trampoline, and if it weren't for the princess' covering fire I would have been the one introduced to his sword just now.

"Damn it all… Can't chase the hostiles…. Can't take him down…"

I thought he was commissioned, that he had experience, but this is just asinine. He isn't even using a shield! And he's just dodging our shots as if it were effortless…

He said… He once said that, since the auto-correction in the aim systems would remember the last angle the TSF fires at, taking a second to truly look at the target would make a difference in our results. Taking a single second to truly look at where you have to aim, that's the advice he gave us before things went south between us.

But… while that applies to stationary defense, if you're constantly on the move then not only you need to readjust your target, you practically have to align both the maneuver and the shots you fire. Such coordination while using a manual configuration… to make such precise and fine movements, to dodge our heat, and almost always hit the mark despite the constant shift in his position at the speed he moves…

"Forget being a commissioned soldier, you're a monster." Can't help but to complain as he again forces us to move away after another failed attempt at doing even some little damage to his unit.

Piloting a TSF is already complex as it is, but to instead take manual control of the machine to this extent? Was this… what you always were aiming at? My lips tremble as he again takes a sidestep to my left, the arms of his Fubuki moving slightly up as its torso shifts its weight back. My bullets, that were aimed at his upper body, move under its elbows as the arms raise, the edge of the blade now facing out and moving to the left. His Fubuki making the battle pose he always makes when sparring with Mitsurugi, the coming slash losing no momentum.

You're telling me… you're seeing through my moves with such ease? To dodge point-blank fire… and prep up a counter in the same move? Hands shaking, mouth wide open, stare is all I can do. I… He knew I would spray my shots, instead of aiming at his feet. He was jumping like mad all this time… banking on this chance to take me out?

At the last second, it had to do a backboost.

"04, you have to pull back! I'm almost out of 120mm!" Her face appears in a corner of my vision, those thick brows arched.

Barely putting force on my pedals, I again… I again run away. As he gave us a breather, I looked at my radar and he wasn't moving.

A few hostiles broke through, but we can't move carelessly because he'll take us out if we try to rush. Once those AI get to the base, we will fail the exercise. He'll win this time, again.

Suddenly gritting my teeth, shifting my hold on the controls, I inhale sharply to fill my lungs. I'm going to take you out. Don't think you can ridicule us like this…

"04, how are you holding up?" Her face zooms in, tone also exhausted.

"… Arms in orange, fuel at half. No more 120mm, around 500 36mm left."

"… I'm not much better, to be honest." Closing her eyes, she sighs really heavily. Seeming to be biting the edge of her lips, she then shakes her head. "I… I propose that we should… retreat to a safer position while we deal with the rest of the hostiles."

"… You're planning to run away?"

"It's a… strategic retreat." Grimacing as she said it, she then sighed. "We need to neutralize those other Fubukis or we will fail this mission. And we can't stay near 06 or we risk being taken out. If either of us falls, this mission ends in failure."

"… Then, you go back."

"04, now's not the time. We both should-"

"You should go take care of the AI, don't think they'd give you trouble. I'll self-destruct my unit to off Special-kun from this mission."

"That's too risky. We should both take a vantage point to neutralize him after we regroup closer to the base." Furrowing her brows, her tone rose in complain.

"… We're wasting time. Go and run away already." Hitting the pedals, I boost towards Special-kun.

"Ayamine! Stop it, we should-" Ignoring her, the radar guides me to his position.

But, why isn't he moving? Heh, thinking to give us some advantage, hmm? Damn it, Special-kun.

Rushing through the broken streets, I make visual contact with him. Quickly sending a volley his way, the Fubuki crouches down as my bullets tickle its head.

Huh? He didn't… move or jump? Maybe his radar didn't update fast enough to notice me.

Boosting forward as I shoot short volleys, he again sends a few well timed shots my way. But he's slowing down, I can actually dodge his attacks now all by myself. I can do this!

We trade paint with the buildings' rooftops as we move while shooting at each other, painting the simulated streets with Fubuki footsteps, evading the other's heat.

"Haa… I'll be damned." He speaks over the common channel, still sounding tired. All those maneuvers had a cost, after all. "You're getting good."

"Look down on me and you'll pay."

"No one's looking down on you. Just… Sigh… Surprised to see you holding up so well on your own."… Why does he sound happy? Making fun of me? "So, what's the plan? Pincer me as you play decoy?"

"… I'm plenty enough to take care of you." Crouching and moving forward, I shoot at his feet, forcing him to glide away.

Entering a sudden boost to not miss the window where his rifle can't aim at me in the ground, I rush at him as I leave the boosters activated. Once the boosters go off, we'll both explode. With this, you'll be removed from the board!

Tackling him in full force as my arms grapple his arm joints to halt his attacks, the jump units begin to overheat. Holding my breath tight as the shaking intensifies, buckling my knees and hips down to not let go of the pedals, I let out a groan as my arm extends even more to push the controllers all the way forward, keeping my arms locked onto his arms with all I have.

However… Suddenly, for some reason, my machine ends up on top of his.

… He let a single foot slip as he bent backwards, and then activated a single jump unit. Spinning around, Special-kun took measures to bury me into a building as we both crashed. The increased shaking was too much, making me dizzy for a second, and my feet slipped from the pedals.

"Damn it all…" I couldn't self-destruct… My fuel… is getting low. I can do it one more time… but now I don't have the surprise factor anymore… Ugh… My head hurts a lot.

Yanking the controls and stomping on the pedals, I bring my Fubuki on its feet once more. He did too, and we stood close by, sizing up the other.

"You're one nimble bastard, Special-kun." I've got a newfound respect for you now. Quick thinking, sublime piloting, I wonder if there is something you don't have. If it weren't for his age and lame jokes… I'd say he's a vet.

"… What was the deal with that?" He asks, his voice making me shiver for a second. Dry, rough, somewhat upset. Heh, he's mad I almost took him out.

"Thought to self-destruct, since you're one tough obstacle."

"And why? Sakaki is still nearby, and the rest of the hostiles aren't down yet."

"I just said why. As things stand, you're the biggest hurdle to overcome. If this was a real mission, I doubt we could take you down without suffering casualties."

"… You still have your partner here, why would you choose self-destructing as the first option?"

"Because that's all a dead soldier can do."

If this was a real fight, I'd have a foot in the grave. All I can do is take you down with me to cut the losses of my forces. That's all I can do, I refuse to retreat and allow such a dangerous pilot close to my base.

"… Don't give me that bullshit."

"Huh? Did you…" Did he just call me plans bullshit? How dare he… Wait he's angry? I… I think this is a first.

"All a dead soldier can do my ass… Don't you give me that excuse."

"It's not an excuse." I ready my rifle again. "It's the most cost effective way to-"

In the blink of an eye, his Fubuki lunged at me. Looks like he was warming up his jump units. Barely able to dodge the slash, I can't reposition as it quickly turns after me, shaving the pavement with the tip of his blade, as if sharpening it against the concrete and making sparks fly off, sending a rising slash at me.

That was… faster than before. And… he aimed at my cockpit this time. All the times before he was aiming at my arms or shoulders… What the hell is wrong with him?

"Don't give me that bullshit, Ayamine." Again coming after me, now with his rifle out as well, his voice sounds hoarse as if he were restraining a shout. "Your goal is to protect the base. Dying doesn't accomplish that."

"It takes you out of the equation, so it does plenty enough." Crouching to avoid a 120mm, he's forced to jump to avoid a hit to his feet.

"You're just giving up on the mission by choosing to die now!"

"No, because I'm doing all I can for my comrades and my base."

"And what about their lives?! Nothing guarantees they are safe."

"You'd be down, and that's enough to-"

"No, it isn't!" This time shouting in true anger, he jumped over the buildings separating us, starting a boost at the height of his jump.

Looking as if he were about to do air jousting, if I hadn't been on the move already I wouldn't have been able to avoid his attack. Couldn't even react to it, it was… simply too fast. Piercing through another building as I dodged, and quickly scattering the dust and crumbling concrete by swinging his blade around, it's as if I had been frozen in place after seeing the sheer speed and aggressiveness of his move. If that had connected… Finally, hands, shoulders, lips, even my knees shake for a moment.

How the hell did he do that? How did he came up with that move? He's a monster… To move with such precision even at top speed… To manage to not crash at that speed despite missing his target…

"Hear me well, Ayamine." I twitched at his tone, unlike anything I've ever heard from him. Sounding as if he were talking over clenched teeth, almost managing not to snap. His Fubuki turned around and pointed its blade at me. "Suicide is the last option. You choose that when abso-fucking-lutely you don't have another path available."

"… Not like I have much cards against a monster like you."

"Then, tell me. If the military has to do all it can for the people it protects, why are you abandoning them?"

"What did you say?! I'm… I'm not abandoning anyone! I'm removing the most dangerous target on the field." I fire another volley, he crouches and shaves the distance between us.

When I thought I was done for, he punched my cockpit instead of going for a slash. Damn, lost the grip on my rifle! Why didn't he knock me out?

"No, you're giving up. That's why you're choosing death instead of fighting until you've no other choice!"

"Shut up! This is all I can do now, I can't beat you in a one-on-one fight so this is the best course of action I have!" And I won't retreat. I'm not a traitor… I'm not like them… This is all I can do, don't talk so high and mighty as if you knew what it is to be in my shoes.

"… One person once told me that staying alive was the best thing a soldier could do."

"Huh?" His tone eased up all of a sudden, giving me time to stand up and locate the rifle I had lost.

"Once you're dead, you can't save anyone. It doesn't matter if others call you a coward or whatever, staying alive and fighting on is something that someone has to do. If you enter a fight thinking that you can only make yourself useful by self-destructing, you're about as good as a loose frag grenade."

"… Don't talk down to me. This is all I can do. I tried everything and nothing worked!"

"Then, why not try working with Sakaki instead of acting on your own?" Finally moving forward once I dashed towards my rifle, he kicks it away. Tackling his Fubuki, I sprint forward and recover my gun.

"I won't retreat, never. This is how I fight."

"… Don't fuck with me, you gotta know that stance is the same as asking to be killed."

"It's how I do things, deal with it."

"… So when things don't go your way, you place your pride above the rest and choose to just blow everything up?" Again talking through clenched teeth, his words froze me in place. "What about the people that placed their trust in you? What about your comrades? How do you think they'd feel when they see you exploding your everything away?!"

"I… I… What? I… I'm not doing that."

"Yes, you are! You always do! You just shut up and let your relation with the squad implode instead of taking the steps to talk your issues out with them! Shutting up and doing your thing without a care… You have to know you can't go on like this, dammit!"

… Huh? I… do what I want without a care? No, that's not it… But… When I can't take the loss, I shut in and do what I want? I… let everything explode?

His face flashed before my eyes, both when he was with me back home and the last time I saw him, during the execution. Traitor, American supporter, military scum, the names he was given were many. But all despised him for the same reason.

Dad killed the people that didn't agree with his ways at the last mission. That's why… we lost so many of our men, why the UN took so much damage. It is true many civilians managed to be evacuated due to how he refused to buckle from his position from what I heard… But… But… I'm doing the same? I'm the same as him?

My hands begin to shake, I hunch over.

No… I've been making an effort… to not be a traitor, to follow the rules as best as I'm able… But if I had retreated, we could have offed the other AI hostiles, and then it would have been a matter of keeping Special-kun quiet. But then…

My eyes and mouth open wide as the realization hits me.

I screwed up? I… If the mission fails, I… I got the princess and the base killed. Because I… placed my pride above them? Because I acted like he did? I… acted like Father did, all those years ago. But I… I always….

"Ah… No… You're wrong, I didn't…"

His Fubuki takes one step towards me.

"You did." He said, a bit calmer now. "And you shouldn't assume that's the only way forward."

"… What do you know? What the hell do you know?!"

"That to keep struggling isn't pointless. And believe it or not, I'm sure that at the very least me, Tama and Mikoto would welcome you being more honest with open arms. You're not fighting alone here."

"… The end goal of a surface pilot… is to enter a Hive. There's no retreat… in the battlefield against the BETA, there's no retreat."

"You know that's not true, the war would have been over if that was the only choice left for us."

"I… I'm not a traitor. I won't retreat." If I do… it's back to those days… What do you know? You can fly back to America any time you want, don't you?

"… So what if people call you names?" Again angry, his Fubuki took another step closer. "So what if the odds are against you? So what if you're not good enough? Who the hell decided that you have no choice but to lay your life down like that?!"

"T-That's the way it is with the war, there's no option left for- D-Dammit!" Yanking the controls, I barely dodge his slash.

"Wrong!" He sends another wide slash, leaving me with no choice to backboost away from his flurry. "When you give up, that's when you're truly out of options. Keep struggling on, until you find a better solution!" Wasting a second, I take out my sword and we begin to trade blows.

"And what about the ones that can't find a solution?! What about all the fallen to the war?!" Come on, mister American! I'm sure you know all about it!

"You honor their sacrifice by making the most out of your life, so that when death comes knocking you don't leave a mess behind."

"And what if you don't get the choice? Pretty sure the high-ups won't hesitate to use us as meat shields." The mission was to stand our ground, no matter what. While the Instructor hasn't chimed in so far… that wouldn't happen in the field, we would have been forced to remain in place.

"Don't shield yourself behind excuses! Plenty of people die without having a say in the matter every day, but we are different. We, as soldiers, are given the choice of how to die once we enter the battlefield. Be it prey to fear, to an accident, or to protect someone. But what you're doing is none of them, since you assume from the get go that dying is all you can do, all you're doing is looking for a place to die. Will you just choose to explode at the very first sign of danger, then?!"

"Don't mock me! Then, what can I do? What if I don't have a choice?!"

"So what if you don't?!" This time his shriek was… guttural, pained. The slash that came with it forced my hands to push the controls as hard as I could to not bend under the recoil and shaking. "There's a difference between a sacrifice and a suicide. And if you keep thinking that your only last resort is the red self-destruct button, then you'll only become the latter. If you don't struggle to find a way to victory, a way to bring you and your comrades alive from the battle, you're just a loose cannon." Sending a kick my way, my legs brought to red numbers, I barely manage to not fall back.

"… What's the point? If we die anyways… Might as well take some of 'em down with me. Why struggle if the result is the same?" It's just like when I tried to reach out to the squad. Those same eyes… the silence as people spoke behind my back… Why even bother?

"… Struggling in itself is meaningless, yeah." Calming down and sighing, he gives me a breather in his assault. "When faced with the situation you described, when you're just a meat shield," For a second, his voice sounded as disgusted as I've never heard someone be, "whether you die as a pig or bravely fighting to the end doesn't matter. But you know what? Even if the act is meaningless, we can give it a meaning of our own."

"… Huh?"

"Leaving the big picture out, fighting to live your life is a valid goal to have. And even when you think you've no choice but to die, maybe you should take a look around first. Maybe your presence inspired people to fight harder, maybe your comrades were closer to lend a hand than you thought if you had looked around instead of at the red button. And for all you know…" Then, his voice creaked as his swings became less fierce, allowing me to parry them without crippling my wrists. "… maybe someone could have needed your company when shit hit the fan at a latter point."

"T-That's… I don't really… think that's true, I don't really fit in anywhere." Tamase has her family and old friends… It's not like I'm that important…

"And guess what? If you keep shutting yourself in, you'll always be just a misfit lone wolf. You know that already, and I'm sure as hell that you're better than this!"

"S-Shut up! You don't know shit about me. Don't get all preachy on me… This is all I can do…"

"No, it isn't!" Sending another of those vindictive slashes, eviscerating another building to my right, his voice was filled to the brim with anger again as I backboosted away from him. "You don't have to do this because we're right besides you, you stupid idiot."

And then, instead of chasing after me, he jumped sky high while readying his sword for another of those air jousting maneuvers. And going by his usual speed… I won't be able to dodge this one, and I doubt I could take out my rifle quickly enough either… His visor looks down right at me, diving as a hawk.

"Open your fucking eyes already, Kei!"

SWISH!

BOOM!

I blink, still frozen in place. Everything is still working… And there's a huge cloud of dust to my right.

"Ayamine, why didn't you try to dodge?!" Sakaki's face enters in sight right in the middle of my vision, brows narrowed and tone way too high.

"Ah… I… What did you do?"

Finally looking around, I spot Special-kun some meters behind me, lying on the ground. His Fubuki seems to fumble around as it tries to regain footing.

"Why aren't you shooting at him?!" She complains, making me focus back again. Seeing that he was on and about again, I backboosted behind cover since I hadn't even taken my rifle out.

"I… Just shocked. What happened? What about the AIs?"

"Only managed to cripple them. I took down two and damaged the legs of the ones left to make it here."

"… Why did you come back?" Just to mock me? To hold the line as the plan said?

"I'm not abandoning you. I'm not turning tail and leaving you behind just because the plan is crumbling." Frowning, her Fubuki lands behind a building to my five.

"… I see. So, uh, how did you stop him?" Pretty sure he was going to skewer me right there.

"Using what you told me of the refresh time of the radar, I managed to catch 06 by surprise by going into a full boost after the refresh, but… What on Earth was that move?"

"That's what I want to know."

"Well… I shot and managed to hit his shoulder, which caused him to miss you and crash land further in." Then, she taps her glasses as she plucks her lips. "Anyways, Shirogane-kun! I'm going to have to ask you to stop lecturing Ayamine while we're in the middle of a fight."

"Shut up, Chizuru!" He retorts, still pissed. "This is your fault for not being more open with her! Kei wouldn't feel so left out if you had tried to be more civil."

Is he… defending me? Why? Why would he? I… I only give him shit, never talked much with him to begin with, even tried to harm him during our bouts at times before the CCSE.

She frowns in the small window that's in my sight, tapping her glasses.

"I have been trying. Not once did I shout at her as I used to do during this mission, and I made a conscious effort to be supportive despite her refusal to follow the plan."

"That's not enough! You have to be open and clear with her, you know Kei's skull is as thick as your eyebrows."

"Wha… I'm not that unreasonable, that's pure slander."

"My eyebrows aren't that thick! And I have been clear today."

"You're both wrong! Kei, you never listen to anything anyone ever says. And Chizuru, you never openly praise her nor directly ask her what she thinks first. You're both at fault!" His voice raising, he then sighs.

"Not my fault she never takes our words in consideration." After all, she only came back to deal with you. She used me as bait, all to take you out. The princess only wants the praise.

"I have been trying, Ayamine!" And of course she snaps. "You were the one who moved on your own, allowing Shirogane-kun to exit the highway and leaving me alone before."

"You're both right and wrong." He says, right before I could retort. "Yes Chizuru, Kei rarely listens but that's because you never tried to ask her opinion before without snapping at her. And Kei, Chizuru doesn't try to hear you out because you always get angry before her and begin to make sarcastic remarks which then makes her snap at you. Sigh… You two really are so thick-headed."

"Pure slander." She always snaps before I do, and always insist on me being mistaken… She's got it coming to her, to be honest.

"My head isn't that thick… And neither are my eyebrows. I always try to be honest, yet she dismisses my words and answers in insults."

"Because a certain someone doesn't know how to get down from the pony."

"What?! You're the one who never talks and continues to act on her own." Frowning again, she once more begins to shout. "And I do recognize your talent, but you never return the trust I place in you."

"Heh, you never did that. You just delegate what doesn't get you praise."

"What was that? Why don't you say that again?!"

BOOM!

A shell hits a nearby building, silencing our argument.

"See?! You're both at fault. You two can't keep throwing your biases and expectations on the other, because you know what's gonna happen? You're gonna die in the field if you keep this up." Another shell hits the building, it begins to crumble away. "And I assure you, the Instructor won't let this petty issue between you go unchecked for long."

"… I am following her plans, yet she never listens."

"I do listen! You are the one who never talks to me!"

"So, are you two gonna let this go on?" Again sounding hoarse, more bullets hit another nearby structure. "If you gotta talk things out, do it on your free time. Beat each other out if you must, say to the other all the shit you've been holding in, but for now, you've got a problem on your hands. Can you defeat me by working together for once, you thick-headed dragons?! Or will you let the base be destroyed by the hostiles?!"

The radar didn't refresh in time, but both of us had begin to move away as he shouted. Barely avoiding his shots, we flee in the direction of the base by moving out towards the section filled with tall buildings. Wasting not a second, he begins to chase after us.

"… Let's do peace for now." She says, sighing as her Fubuki runs in front of mine.

"… Fine. So, what's the plan?"

"The hostiles shouldn't be near the base, but we don't have much time. I may have crippled their legs, but they should still be able to jump. We should try to perform a flat-scissor maneuver to pincer 06 when he comes closer again, even if only to cripple him to give us some time."

"How many hostiles are left?"

"Five, and they're not exactly close by. And my fuel is getting low, so if I'm grounded I can't reach all of them with all the rubble."

Sigh… So that's what it comes to. Neither can hold Special-kun down alone, and if we don't spread out to finish off the hostiles before they leave the cramped part of the ruins, we lose this. The Instructor is hearing our talks, so… chances are she's gonna punish us regardless of how this mission turns out. But if we screw it up… So then, if halting him is what we gotta do first…

"… About that, I noticed something about his style." Doubt she'd want to go along the idea but… If I just shut up and do what I want… I'd be the same as him.

"Hm? What is it?"

"He can't stand up fast enough after the inputs cease. When you shot at him, his Fubuki didn't get up as fast as it should have."

It was as… Well, to be honest, it's as if he wasn't used to regaining his footing after falling. Not just today either, he always does that little fumble after he falls. For how good he is in everything else, it feels as if he didn't pay mind to the cease of inputs when he moves. That's the only amateurish point in his skillset.

"Really? Hmm… Then, I've got an idea." I nod, seeing in the refreshed radar that he was closer, far closer than I thought. Just a few buildings behind us to our seven… He could do that air jousting thing any minute now. "When we pincer him, I'll try to rush in after him at full speed first, so that when the freeze happens you can finish him off."

"… I'm faster, I could do it better."

"Yes, I know." Her brows narrow. "But you're probably almost out of ammo, aren't you?"

"… Sigh. Yes. But you can't get shot down, I'm also low on fuel."

"I am aware. But on the off chance that this fails and we can't freeze him, your CQC is our best bet to bring 06 down."

… So she's still leaving the kill to me, huh. I guess… she was a bit nicer this time around, just a little bit. Sigh… No, focus. I can't be an asshole right now.

"Got it. Just be one breath faster than usual if you wanna do it right."

"Sigh… What do you even-"

"Take a short breath and see." I take a second to do that, to inhale through my nose and then exhale it as if I were running. "Move that little bit faster when you dash."

"Okay, got it. Ah! He's nearby, stay alert!"

Looking at the radar, he's in the second innermost circle already. We don't know if his radar is updated with ours or not but if he didn't see her assault, then it is safe to assume it is rigged too.

"Let's scatter fast, to make him come after us and put some distance." She says, I nod.

We both separate and go into a moderate boost, taking different roads. The dot in the radar shows he's coming straight through a road to her five.

"One street front, one right." She says, informing me.

"One front, one left." I reply.

For a few seconds, we tell the other the streets we cross as we reposition to begin the pincer maneuver. The updated radar shows he's to my eight and her five, right before a crossroad without rubble. If he gets any closer, he might go into a jump and off one of us after we lose the cover of the buildings.

"One front, one right. Scissors?" I ask.

"One front, one right. Scissors in next two streets."

"Roger." Gritting my teeth, I double check my weapons. Less than a hundred 36mm, one knife, and a damaged blade. Still… better than nothing.

Letting out a some air, tightening and loosening my hold on the controls for a while as I leaned back, nothing I think of can quell the quiver of my knees.

What if he does that mad maneuver again? What if I fuck this up? Should I just trust in her and follow her lead? To begin the pincer on foot makes sense since we gotta conserve fuel and keep as much distance before we engage, but still.

The second streets comes up, I turn right and put my rifle in position on my right, and ready my pylon finger to take out the sword once I exhaust the bullets. You never know, I should do a boost dash just in case. And as I did, planting my feet slowly onto the pedals to dash through the street as we had planned in a moderate speed…

The radar updated, and he wasn't on the street as we thought.

His dot was in the middle of the lot the leader had to her right as she traversed the street we decided to use.

And I looked up in a flash, only to see the Fubuki in the same pose I saw twice some minutes ago.

But… she has nowhere to run to in the street surrounded by tall skyscrapers, even if she somehow dodges him.

"01, above you!" Heels trying to pierce the pedals, I force a sudden boost jump once I'm almost to the crossroad, locking my rifle onto him.

"Huh?!" Her Fubuki looks up as it runs in the middle of the street, but he's already descending.

Pressing the trigger and leaving it hard on while in the air, I shot where I thought he would descend to, since he should be aiming at the leader.

But he didn't dive down to the street, and my shots missed. Instead, he decelerated before crashing onto the roof of a skyscraper and then used it to change direction towards me.

"I knew you were gonna jump the gun!" He screams over the common channel as his Fubuki approaches, in the same posture of the last two times.

Again… I screwed up. I'm falling on air, I just used the boosters so I can't trigger them again without risking a failure or an overload, and I'm out of ammo. If I had sticked to plan… I… failed…

"04, stay quiet!"

Huh? Then, on the corner of my vision, I saw her taking aim at me, the signal of being locked on by a friendly beeping in. As Special-kun was almost to me, a rain of bullets showered on him, making one of his arms explode and sending him recoiling to crash onto a building to my left.

Landing hard, still a bit shaken by what happened in the last few seconds, my arms move on their own as I run to take a turn on the street. If this window of time expires, we're done for! Taking out my blade, stomping my way to him, his Fubuki was barely standing up amidst the rubble. No… It looks like it's swaying?

"Ugh… Damn it…" His groans come through the common channel, sounding hurt. Coughing a bit, his Fubuki isn't even trying to stand up as I approach him.

No! He's faking it! As soon as I let my guard down, he'll shoot me without hesitation! And so, raising my blade, I dash towards him, since I'm sure he'll retaliate.

"Take this!" Triggering the boosters, I rush at him.

And so, I slice his Fubuki in half, the sudden burst of speed enough to send the upper torso flying through the street as the legs explode.

"Argh! Cough! Cough! Goddammit… There was no need… to rough me up like that…" Coughing and hacking drowning his complains, I'm left staring at the one-handed torso of the Fubuki, its signal marked as down.

Huh… He was this exhausted? No, this isn't exhaustion, this sounds downright hurt. Maybe those air jousting moves give him motion sickness? I mean, with how fast they are…

"Good work, 04! Are you in one piece?… Huh?" Her smile on my sight turns into a wide gesture as her brows rise. "What did you even do to his Fubuki?"

"… I rushed him thinking he was going to… Wait, I really did it?" I look back, the signal is still marked as down.

Did I just… beat Special-kun? Huh… He really is down, is he. No… It would fit better to say 'we' beat him. Despite me fucking it up and playing into his bait… I only delivered the last hit. No, that's not right either. He was dizzy and down after her shot, she could have dealt with him even if he had shot me down. Maybe he would have surrendered on his own. All I did… was bring her down in this fight…

"While you did went a bit overboard, you truly saved us back there." She smiles, nodding at me as her Fubuki begins to walk away.

"What are you talking about? If I hadn't jumped out, his bait would have failed, and in the end he was dizzy enough for you to take him out without issues. Sorry."

"Uh, you do realize he might have actually attacked me if you hadn't moved out as you did?"

"… Huh?"

"Yeah, if he saw you weren't nearby, then he would have proceeded to dice at me. And your radar refreshed before mine, for some reason. I didn't see his dot until you shot at him." So our radars receive intel at different intervals? So that's why the Instructor told us to communicate at all times. I… didn't even think of the possibility. "And furthermore, if you hadn't moved out, 06 wouldn't have given me an opening to aim at him with such precision. Because I knew where he was going to be, and because he was in midair with no buildings to bounce off, I could land a hit, and by depleting half of my remaining 36mm. So, uh, if it weren't for you, he'd have taken me out. Which means, you made the right call back then." Again raising a finger and doing circles, she nods again. "Good work, 04. We won this fight thanks to you."

"… No, um, if you hadn't landed a hit… I wouldn't have been able to take him down… Let's just say both of us won this one."

"Alright, I can agree to that." She chuckles, I do too after a while. "So, let's go finish those remaining hostiles. We've no time to lose! You take the right side of the highway, I cover the left one. You do have enough fuel to jump, right?"

"Got enough to fly, let's not take chances." I smirk, stepping on the pedals softly to heat up the boosters.

"Heh, fine by me." She smirks back at me, I can see her own boosters ready to go. "Alright, let's take-"

Beep!

A green message appears on my view as the response fades from my controls.

"Exercise failed. Cadets, you may disembark." The Instructor's voice reached me, but I blinked a few times before what she said sank.

"Huh?! I-Instructor, Ma'am, did we run out of time?" The leader asks, her brows tensing much in my vision. Then, the Instructors' face zooms into the center of my view, eyes narrowed as she was in the middle of sighing while rubbing her forehead with a single finger.

"No, that was not the case. A hostile breached the base after the other four were destroyed by the little units stationed nearby, leaving them without ammo to stop it. Thus, you failed the exercise. Come out, the morning runs are finished."

"Ma'am, does this mean 06 won?" I ask, unable to not pluck my lips.

"No, both teams lost. He didn't stay alive, and you didn't protect the base. That is all. Disembark at once." And with that, she cut her connection.

"… Goddammit. This sucks." It's so anticlimactic, too. Just as I was getting ready to blast those suckers, just when the leader finally admitted how I helped out…

"Well, at least we defeated Shirogane-kun." She says with a small smile, her face now coming to the center of my vision.

"True that. So, uh…"

"Yeah?"

"… Sorry, for, well, everything. Can we… have a talk later?"

"… Sure, I guess we do need one. And me too, sorry for everything."

"It's cool… Guess you weren't as thick as I thought, huh."

"Listen here, I'm not thick-headed. And by the way, my eyebrows aren't that thick either."

"… They are, though."

"Wh- No, they're… D-Do you think they really are?"

"Well, just a little bit."

"Uh…" Plucking her lips, those brows furrow more and more. "Shirogane-kun, don't think I'll let your comment slide, either. I still want an explanation from you."

But then, he doesn't answer.

"Shirogane-kun? Are you there?"

"Ugh… Yeah."

"Hey, you alright?" He does sound hurt… Maybe I really went overboard?

"… I think I'm gonna puke yesterday's breakfast any second now."

"Sorry, shouldn't have attacked so hard."

"Yeah, a lil' late for regrets now, ain't it. Funny, how you two sync up only to beat me up." He groans, coughing again.

"Well, it serves you right for calling us thick-headed." She folds her arms, brows still tense.

"Cadets! Why are you not disembarking? Get out from the sims, this instant!" Frowning much, she barks at us.

"Roger." Me and the leader say, Special-kun groans.

"And Shirogane, if you puke now you'll have to clean it yourself, you hear me?!"

"… Yes, Ma'am. Loud and clear." Sounds like he just barely whispered that out.

"Well, come on. Get out, now." She then once more cuts the connection, Special-kun also closing off his channel.

"… Just what did you do to him, Ayamine? To send his torso flying like that…" Narrowing her eyes, she raises one brow at me.

"Look, if you had been the target of those air jousting moves, you would have done the same." I still can't wrap my head around how the hell does he manage to move so precisely while maintaining top speed. You're truly a monster, Special-kun.

"Sigh… Well, let's get down before the Instructor comes in again." I nod to that, cutting the connection.

And after a sigh, I begin to slowly unbolt myself from the seat. Still… We did just take him out. I think that's a first, to win against him when he's on his best. I should be happy about it. But I'm not.

Not only he sounded super beat down, but all he said… He was just trying to make deliver a point across, and if he didn't give a damn about me… He wouldn't have snapped as he did, if he was just angry he would have shot me down when he had a chance. And he had plenty of those. Defending me when the leader appeared, trying to make us see the other's point of view, just the fact that he cared enough to reach out despite how awful I have been with him is surprising. And plenty of proof to show me he's… not a bad guy at all.

"Sigh… I guess I really was being an asshole, huh."

Just saying sorry won't cut it… But I won't forget this. Regardless of whether I manage to make peace with the leader, someday I'll pay this favor back. Even if you compared me to her eyebrows, when I am in no way that thick-headed.

"But from now on, I'll try to answer to the trust you placed in me, Shirogane. And to show you… how grateful I am, for how you made me realize I was acting like him."

Inhaling sharply and opening the sim, regaining my usual composure, I step outside and walk over to the rest.

Chapter 41: Key Words of the Masquerade

November 29 th . Near 1 PM.

(Sim Room.)

[Takeru]

---

Slowly getting out of the sim pod while holding my head, I can barely walk in a straight line without wobbling. God damn it all, they messed me up. At this rate, I'm puking for real. Pulling off three Gliding Charges was too much for me… And after yesterday's fight to make matters worse… Though, I'm surprised they survived all three of them, since it's practically my ace move in Anti-TSF combat. In all fairness, I didn't use it from a blank point, so they had time to dodge.

Still… I'm drained… And the day just started… Haaauuu…

"Shirogane-kun, are you alright?" Tapping her glasses, she comes closer.

"… Do I look alright?"

"Well… No. Did those maneuvers give you motion sickness?"

"It's more like… I'm just plain exhausted."

Sigh… The Aggressor config really lifted the limiter on the sims, it now truly worked as if it were a real TSF cockpit. And while the shaking wasn't equal to one, the detail in the projection was near frame perfect. And my suit probably fed the system the data to give me the most accurate feedback possible, and with that the thing felt almost like the real deal. Never thought I'd say this, but I need a break from piloting… Thank God Tama's dad is coming tomorrow.

"Hey, you really fine?" Kei comes over, hand on her chin as she stares.

"Yeah, I'll manage somehow… Phew… Though, didn't think you both would elude me in the end." I wearily smile while chuckling.

"You didn't made it easy." Kei narrows her eyes, bringing her head closer. "Those air jousting moves were on another level. What the hell was up with that?" To have her openly curse, it means she's really upset and curious. But… it also means she's at least willing to do peace, for now.

"It's just… my ace in the hole, if I can call it that. Think of it as the best move I can think of."

"Huh… Did you, uh, learn it abroad as well?" Eyes almost running away, her voice didn't have that same toxic tint it always used to have here. I'm glad… the bet worked, even if just a bit.

"Nah, that's an original from yours truly." Can't tell 'em I learned it from a videogame, after all. "So, is everything cool between you two?"

They share a look, Chizuru nods as she shrugs, Kei then does too while looking away. Thank God it worked out.

"While I don't agree with all the points of your lecturing… I admit I should have been more open." Tapping her glasses, she sighs.

"I, well, didn't see I was, uh… acting that bad. Sorry." She then gives both of us a small, but firm, bow. Wow… To have her apologize and all…

True, I did kinda snap at Kei when she said the same as… back then, but I didn't think she'd take it to heart. Kei rarely, if ever, listened to a thing I said.

"Don't worry 'bout it, it's cool. Just… try to take one step at a time to get better at communicating. Just that, solve your stuff between each other however you like." Both of them nod, no shadows in their eyes nor delay in the gesture.

"Thanks, Special-kun. I, uh… appreciate it. You know, despite me being an asshole to you all this time." Still unable to lift her gaze from the ground, falling pencil would drown her voice right now.

"Sigh… It's cool, I also didn't try to solve things before the CCSE. Let's just leave that behind and focus on what's ahead, okay?" She nods again, now recovering her smile.

"Yeah, though… Why did you use our names back then?"

"Huh? Oh… You know, bad habit. Got pissed off and… Sorry, it just came out like that." I still tend to get emotional during my preachy speeches from time to time… Looks like both of them didn't take it as badly as the first times I called them like that here, so maybe… we can begin to mend the bridge from now on.

"Hmm… Is that so." She looks away, seeming bored despite the small ember in her tone. I dunno if she's mad or what, getting mixed signals right now. "Well, whatever. Just… Thanks again, really."

"It's cool, just… Sorry if I said something hurtful, I tend to get carried away when I do speeches like that."

"No, it… it was spot on. You were harsh but… you spoke the truth." Closing her eyes and sighing, she then folds her arms as she returns my gaze. "So, uh… Everything's cool?"

"Yeah." Nodding at her, the tension finally leaves and her shoulders ease up.

"By the way, Shirogane-kun…" Chizuru takes a step closer, narrowing her eyes. "… Do you mean what you said before?"

"Huh? About what?"

"… About my eyebrows being… too thick."

"He's right, though." Not a second after she said it, Chizuru shot her a glare. Kei hid behind me, probably returning the evil eye.

"Just so we're clear, my eyebrows are not that thick!" Again making circles in the air, she directed her verbal gun at me now. "So, I expect you to be more tactful from now on. You should choose your words more carefully."

"… I mean, I don't see what's the problem, honestly. I think they look cute on you." Sure, the Chop-kun doll you gave me had way too thick eyebrows, but they do look good on you. Frankly, it's nothing to be ashamed of. It's how you are, what's the problem?

"Wh-Wh-What… W-Wha…" Her stammering brought me back to Earth, one could say she was in the middle of an overheat worse than Sumika's ones.

Wait, why is she… Oh, goddammit… Did I actually tell her she looked cute? I am a walking danger when I'm tired.

"Special-kun, you silver tongued bastard, you broke the leader."

"Okay, that was not my intention. I was just being honest." She smirks at me, chuckling at Chizuru's embarrassment.

"Now this is a rare sight…"

"S-Shut up! I won't forget this teasing!" Again raising a finger at us, she turned around and walked away.

"Nice one, Special-kun." Then, she gives me a thumbs up.

"Sigh… Whatever, let's just go to the rest."

Walking over the sims, I soon find a crowd cheering on us as we walk over to the Instructor, who looks rather pissed. She looks back, silencing the people, before coming towards us.

"Squad! Line up!" We do just that, the other three giving us a good stare. Chizuru refuses to look at us. "Despite the failure of this last exercise, you did manage to cooperate to a greater degree than ever before. Sakaki, Ayamine, I expect you two to begin to work together as well as you did just now from now. As someone said, beat each other up if that's what it takes to keep getting this performance off. You may have lost a great deal of time, but your final strike was well coordinated for an on-the-fly attempt. I am looking forward to the next sessions."

"Thank you, Ma'am." They both answer in unison.

"Now then, Shirogane…" Crossing her arms, narrowing her eyes, NotMarimo-chan stares in silence for a sec. "You didn't puke in the sim, did you?"

"No, Ma'am. Yesterday's breakfast is still within me."

"What is this about, Instructor?" Tama asks, receiving a smirk with a chuckle from NotMarimo-chan.

"Oh, the hotshot here seemed to fly too recklessly as you saw, and said to be feeling dizzy and nauseous." The other three give me a worried gaze, the Instructor just smiles. "In any case, you did put on a good show. Perhaps a bit better than I was expecting."

Someone from the crowd of pilots and MPs whistles, others begins to laugh. NotMarimo-chan's brows twitch as do her lips, crossing her arms real tight.

"… But I believe I told you to keep those reckless moves to a minimum, didn't I?"

"Yes, you did Ma'am. Is there something wrong with how I piloted just now?"

"Besides the fact that you probably broke the joints of the figurative machine you operated? What on Earth were you thinking when you made those charges? You could get killed by doing those maneuvers in real life, crashing isn't something to take lightly, Cadet Shirogane. Not only the loss of a pilot, but losing a machine that, let me remind you, costs upwards of a million dollars would be a great detriment to the war effort, especially if you attempt such a move on a crucial mission. For all the talk about how you thought someone was acting in a suicidal way, you yourself seem to have a death wish of your own, Cadet Shirogane."

Ouch, using the rank and all. Though, I do understand her concerns. A miss in timing equals certain death when using the Gliding Charge, and if I'm hit during it, well… I just saw what happens then. And this is still rather tame compared to how she interrogated me when I used it during my first loops to tumble down the rock to save the old lady from the lava.

"I do comprehend your words, Instructor. However, I believe the move you have an issue with is as valid as any other. While it is true that it comes with great risks, it also yields great results when used properly. Furthermore, such line-piercing maneuvers might save someone's life down the line once we get commissioned, if I'm given time to perfect the move."

"… Perfect it? You say it could get better?" Raising a brow, her tone filled with doubt, she and the other five, and probably some of the others from the crowd too, stared in shock and whatever comes after that too.

"Yes, what I did was a simple charge. While the timing at the height of the jump is hard to pull off, with enough practice and accumulated data it could be feasible to say I could perform it without risk of crashing." Because I did that during my first loops, and without the XM3. "However, there is a way in which the base maneuver could be improved, but it's something even more reckless and difficult to achieve. And frankly, I don't have the confidence to attempt the full maneuver at this point." Her eyes simply squint as her mouth remains half-open.

"Huh?!" Chizuru looks at me, completely tilted. "You say it… gets even worse than that?!"

"Better, actually. It wouldn't be an improvement otherwise."

"… Special-kun, you're a monster."

"No, I'm just Takeru." And I doubt I could pull off the Skull Kaizer's Sky Rend without the XM3.

"… Shirogane, does this have anything to do with… your special missions?" The Instructor asks, a hand on her chin, her tone calming down and edging up.

"Eh… Well… I choose to remain silent." She nods, taking that as I thought she would. "In any case, while I will keep it to a minimum due to how taxing it is on me, I ask you to give me permission to attempt my aerial charges when I deem them necessary." Giving her a bow, I can hear her groan. Some more people from the crowd whistle, her groans intensify.

"Sigh… Fine, I grant you permission to do it, but keep it to an absolute minimum." I return myself upright, standing in attention as I salute and thank her. She shakes her head, sighing again. "… In any case, you did play your role as good as you were able. Perhaps you should have seized the chance to dispose of Ayamine when you had it, but otherwise you fought admirably on your own despite your defeat at their teamwork. While I'd like you to hold back on those moves, you're free to attempt them in moderation. You fought better than I expected, and for that I'll let you off the hook today."

"Thank you, Ma'am." Sigh… Bullet: Dodged.

"Now then, there's a small announcement to make." The other five stand tense in attention, seeming to be bolted in place. "Tomorrow, an important retinue will be visiting the base. Therefore, all trainings from now on, as well as mock battles, shall be postponed until the start of December. This means that this marks the end of today's training sessions, since you're also free of lectures on the late afternoon."

"Huh?! However, Instructor, how could this be?" Meiya's voice rose up in complain, a bit more bothered than I thought she would be. "We didn't hear anything about this until today!"

"Sigh… And that's because even I didn't heard anything until today as well." Folding her arms real tight, her brows tense downwards. "Sadly, there's nothing to be done. Since it's the Undersecretary himself the one coming tomorrow, all trainings from noon onwards are cancelled. Not just for you, but for the commissioned officers as well" Which explains why there's so many of them lurking around here, instead of patrolling or doing stuff. "I will be busy helping with the preparations on B3F, so you also won't be able to use the pods at a later hour. Use this time to relax, as soon as December starts we're advancing into the mock battles."

"Roger!"

"Shirogane, I received word from Takamura that her mission will not require your assistance during these two days, so you are allowed to enjoy your free time according to the Professor's orders. That's all. Dismissed!"

"Salute!"

She returns the gesture, and as she turns around she reminds the people nearby to not bother us. A few still send me and the girls thumbs up and smirks, others just whisper as they look at us, and there's the obvious disdainful gazes of those who still hate my guts. However, after NotMarimo-chan's warning they all begin to scatter, seeming pleased with the show we put some moments ago.

"Cadets, do not dally in getting changed." She says, giving us six one hard stare. We nod, the girls tensing up as they do. "And Shirogane, if you truly are feeling unwell, don't hesitate to go to the infirmary."

"Don't worry, Instructor. I'm merely a bit tired."

"If you say so… Well then, until tomorrow." She then goes her way out of the sim room along the stream of bored officers.

Sigh… Thankfully she allowed me to keep practicing my Gliding Charges. And really, it's just a really fast dive, I'm amazed no one thought about it before. The people of this world lack imagination. It's not like I'm doing a Rocker Sunshine or a Bright Finger.

"… I cannot believe they cancelled our training without a single warning." Meiya was clearly angry at this turn of events, going by her sharpened eyes and dry tone. She was groaning to herself as she folded her arms, looking at the pods with tightly closed lips.

"We can't do anything about it. Squad, let's use this time to review our lessons and get as ready as we can for the mock battles. We advanced much for only a morning practice, so let's keep up the good work." Chizuru smiled at us confidently.

"Roger!" The girls all gave an energetic reply, even Kei for once.

"… Roger." Energy depleting… Need food… I think I did save some of my breakfast for after the simulations. Drowning a yawn, I blink as I move my brows up and down, running a hand over my face

"Shirogane-kun, are you really okay? Maybe you really should go to the infirmary?" Tapping her glasses, she looked at me in the eye.

"… Don't worry, I'll be fine."

"Takeru, are you sure you're fine? Maybe you should go rest?"

"Thanks Mikoto, but I can't just go to sleep, as much as I want to. It'll mess up my internal clock. Luckily, I can just laze about today."

I'm sure Sensei did this out of consideration, after yesterday's battle I was completely spent. And what little stamina I regained has been spent already. It's hilarious, actually. In the game, the Gliding Charge does deplete the energy gauge entirely, and right now my gauge is completely busted after doing them. Siiigh… A nap is tempting right about now, though.

"But man, that fight was super!" Changing her mood in a flash, she smiles widely at us. "Chizuru-san and Kei-san worked so well together at the end there, and your moves were superb!"

"Yes, just looking made me dizzy, to be honest." Tama scratches her head, giggling. "But it was amazing, how nimbly you moved at such high speeds."

"It's all in the practice, really." You have no idea how many times I crashed myself by attempting the Gliding Charge during my first loop. And the Instructor is right, it damages the joints real bad. Even if Chizuru hadn't hit me, my joints would have ended up on red.

"You truly looked like a monster." Kei gives me a side glance, still smiling.

"But Kei-san, you ended up tearing his TSF in half!" Mikoto giggles at her while she plucks her lips.

"By the way, were you talking about something back there?" Tama asks, tilting her head. I look down, since it's not my place to speak if they don't want to. "Since you stood quiet for a long while, and you even shot at a building a few times… Is everything okay?" Her tone growing a bit worried as she switches glances between Kei and Chizuru, her hands play with her hair.

"Well… It's nothing, really." Chizuru says, holding one of her elbows.

"… Cute eyebrows." Oh God, she just had to-

"S-Shut up!" An immediate, abrasive retort. Didn't expect any less.

Tama and Mikoto tilt their heads as they stare at them, Kei smirking as she chuckles and Chizuru pretty much spewing steam from her ears.

"Anyways, it is a relief to get a breather for sure." Again making circles in the air, she takes a step away from Kei. "Shirogane-kun, could you come with me later? I have something to give you." What could Chizuru have for me? Another Chop-kun doll?

"Sakaki-san, what are you going to give him?" Tama was eyeing Chizuru with stinky eyes. Mikoto followed suit. It's always funny to see them like that.

"W-Why are you looking at me like that? I just prepared some notes for him, since he can't go to the library like we do."

"Thanks, Sakaki. I'll read them throughly when I get the chance."

"Yes, you do that. It would be a problem if we couldn't coordinate our movements during the mock battles, especially if you start doing those charges." She started making circles in the air again. I can only wonder what memories she saw. I mean, do they see the things clearly, or do they just inherit the feelings?

"Chizuru-san, why are you even giving him that? He's the best one of the squad." Mikoto smiled at me as she smacked my back. And surprisingly, Kei nodded with a small smile in her face to the words.

"Yoroi, I did this for him because he can't access the library. It's for the good of the squad. Right, Mitsurugi?"

"… I suppose." Meiya just looked away, going towards the changing room. Her voice barely audible, shoulders down and with a slow pace she exited the sim room.

She hasn't looked at me since I exited the pod, so I guess… she's getting paranoid again. To remain so silent despite how we fought just now… Sigh…

"Well, anyways, we can't really stand around so let's get going." Chizuru takes the lead as she stretches her arms forward.

We all go towards the changing rooms, Tama and Mikoto asking about the fight and us answering what we could, or wanted to, tell them. Things seemed pretty tense in the hallways, everybody was hurriedly running somewhere. Considering what is coming up, it doesn't surprise me.

"Hey, is the Undersecretary someone really important? What does an Undersecretary do anyways?" Mikoto asked the group, receiving puzzled looks as an answer.

"Of course he's important, it's the man that connects many of the UN's High Command Council and our Parliament with the UN's International HQ. Basically, it's the right hand of the HC in many affairs." Chizuru obviously knows her political stuff, I never found out what exactly Tama's Dad actually does though.

"Oh! Then he's a super important person. I wonder what he's like." Smiling gleefully, Mikoto has not an ounce of care in her. As usual, basically.

"Yeah, it makes you wonder. What kind of person the… the Undersecretary… H-Hauuu…" Tama froze in place, eyes became two big white dots.

"Miki-san? Are you alright?" Mikoto waved her hand in front of her, but she remained still.

"Tamase? What's wrong?" Chizuru looked back worriedly at the frozen shape of Tama.

"In Shirogane's words, she's tilted." Apparently Meiya had noticed we were coming and waited for us. She looked at Tama, circled around her for a bit, poking her. "It seems she's out of commission."

"Hey Tama. Do you know who the Undersecretary is?" Color returns to her eyes, and very slowly she starts shaking.

"She knows. Spill the beans." Kei grabs her from behind and starts to give her head pats very aggressively. Death by forced pampering, a new form of torture has been born.

"Awawawa…"

"Could it be… Tamase, is the Undersecretary your father?" Chizuru, you hit the jackpot so hard it's now a crackpot.

"Haaauuu…" She somewhat nods under the pressure of Kei's menacing head pats. Kei seemed to be enjoying herself though.

"Ayamine, stop it. Tamase, you don't have to be nervous. You've been doing a fine job in your training, I'm sure he'll be proud of you." Chizuru, my dear, that is not the problem here. It's…

Wait one second, last time I got beaten up, right? I can't believe I'm happy the HSST is gonna fall, if only because I'll avoid that horrible fate.

"That's not the problem. You see…"

…

"Your father believes you're the Squad Leader?!" Chizuru's eyes turned white as the shock left her mouth hanging wide open.

"I just told him of how I was improving after the CCSE in the last letter, and he somehow turned that into me being the Leader. I'm sorry." Tama starts bowing repeatedly at all of us.

"Don't worry Tama. This isn't your fault. Did he misunderstood anything else from your letters?" She got tilted again. Oh God…

"Miki-san, what else did he got wrong?" Tama starts violently shaking in place as her eyes spin in a counter clockwise way.

"I can't tell you! It's too embarrassing! I'm sorry! I'm sorry!"

"Please stop apologizing, you did nothing wrong." Meiya told her in a slow, tender tone while placing a hand on Tama's shoulder. "Whatever shall we do about this? Sakaki, should we just be honest with the man?" I don't think that will work. I mean, considering how he usually acted in the past loops…

"Hmm… We don't really have a choice, do we? It's not like we can fake our ranks, that's a violation to the UN's code." She raises both arms in defeat.

Should I suggest the same plan as I always did? It would be sad to see the man dejected, and in the end he always saw through our little stand-up act… But will people let us do it in this harsher world?

"Special-kun, any ideas?" Kei stared at me with half closed eyes.

"No, not really."

"Hmm… Seem like you were wanting to say something, though." Her stare intensifies upon me, making the others stare at me too. Uuuh… I think this isn't a good idea this time around.

"Shirogane, do you have an idea to help Tamase?"

"Well Mitsurugi, you see…"

---

One explanation later…

---

"… and that's the gist of it."

"Shirogane-kun, do you really think you can convince the Instructor to allow Tamase to be the Squad Leader tomorrow?" I can't blame you for being skeptical, considering NotMarimo-chan's usual mood here.

"Sakaki, if there is one person who can convince her it's him. I shall accompany him to request this of her. It truly would be a shame if their reunion took a sour note for this misunderstanding." I didn't think Meiya would volunteer to help me.

"Sniff… Thank you. Really, I'm sorry for the trouble." Tama starts bowing at us again.

"Tamase, do not apologize. Sakaki, I assume you have no qualms with this if the Instructor gives her approval?"

"Of course. Honestly, I don't want to break his illusion, and it isn't unheard of for squads to change their leaders after they start piloting. Now is the most believable time to do something like this, since Tamase is more fit to be in the backrow we can just say that the position was given to someone who could be in the middle more naturally if we ever get asked about it." I'm so glad this Chizuru is more understanding. She is taking into account Tama's feelings and their effect in her performance, even if it means doing something 'wrong'. She also did seem to try to be more civil with Kei, despite their usual bickering.

"Don't worry. You'll do a better job than her." Kei smiled at Tama as she patted her head again. Why did I have to jinx it? I can already-

"Ayamine, what do you mean by that?" Here thar be dragons yet again.

"By what?"

"You just insulted me again."

"Nope, you're wrong."

"Why do you always talk through your teeth? Was all you said about trying to talk more openly with the squad just empty air?"

"No, that was for real." Chizuru's brows twitch, I can't help but to snicker at them now.

"Then, what did you mean?"

"Damn, you really are as thick-headed your eyebrows." And then, Kei dashes behind me as Chizuru was diving at her.

She again grabs my shoulders and uses me as a human shield. I may be able to pilot the XG, kill thousands of BETA, and travel through space-time, but releasing myself from Kei's grabs will forever remain as an impossible feat for me. And I'm also too hungry and tired to even try.

"Don't hide behind Shirogane-kun! Come out and speak up!"

"You said you'd stop shouting and being abrasive, squad leader."

"Wha… You have some nerve… And my eyebrows aren't that thick."

"… Hey Ayamine, what about the part where you said you'd rely more on your squadmates and stuff?" I sigh, feeling her grip on my shoulder tighten.

"… I'm relying on you to keep me safe from the her." Goddammit, Kei.

"Shirogane-kun is right, you shouldn't keep acting like this, Ayamine. After all, he made very fair points about your conduct back there." Moving the finger in circles again, she smirked.

"More like he did the leading for you."

"What was that!?"

"Sakaki, please calm down!" Thanks Meiya, keep the chill coming. "We should go change, we still have to talk with the Instructor."

"… You're right. I shouldn't let my temper-"

"Cute eyebrows." Goddammit Kei! Oh great, Chizuru's eyes resemble those of the Legendary Super Shayan now.

"Girls, let's calm down. We can't go bothering the Instructor now of all times, right? A lecture wouldn't be enough to placate her wrath this time. Wouldn't you agree, Mitsurugi?" I wink at her, asking for support. She looks away but nods at my words.

"Just like Shirogane said, we can't go making more trouble. Please do keep your poise, do not forget our shared goal."

"Yeah, come on." Mikoto says, but looking to the ground. "Pointing fingers won't do us any good, right?"

"Sigh… I know. I did promise to try harder from my position. So don't go hurling one-liners like that, we still need to have a talk after all." Chizuru looks away and starts walking, Kei releases me and joins the rest as we go our way.

Tama and Mikoto sigh as we keep walking towards the changing room, Meiya shakes her head as well. Wait a sec, did Kei do that to change the atmosphere? I mean, Tama looks way more calm now. She can be surprisingly kind when she wants to.

Once we got to the changing rooms, I change in a flash while also grabbing my little paper bag with what I saved of my breakfast. Thank God there's bathrooms right by the side of these rooms. Going to splash some water on my face, drink some to parch up my throat, and then part ways with yesterday's breakfast, I leave the heaviness behind as I get out, rubbing my forehead. And as I did, I kinda saw someone moving away fast into a hallway. Did I imagine that?

"Oh, you're already out." Meiya and the rest then came out in their fatigues. "Do you wish to go speak with the Instructor now or after eating lunch?"

"I rather have a short rest, if you don't mind."

"Very well, so shall we do." Nodding and folding her arms, she again looks away. Sigh… "So Sakaki, shall we be off to the PX?"

"Hmm… We still need to go run our laps, but considering that the trainings are cancelled we can just go to eat lunch today." Tama and Mikoto breath a sigh at her words.

"I'll be in the track field, go there when you're done." I wave at them and go towards the hallway to my right.

"Wait Shirogane-kun. Can't you come to the PX with us? Your punishment was lifted for the day, after all."

"No, just one punishment was lifted. I still can't go to the barracks or the PX. And… considering what people say about me, it's better I don't join you guys." Looking back, all of them were looking down, even Kei now. "So I'll rest there until Mitsurugi is ready to go talk with the Instructor. Later." Mikoto seemed like she wanted to say something, but didn't. Kei furrowed her brows, her hands diving into her pockets as she looked down.

And so, I went my way to the track field.

Some people giving me smiles, others commenting on the fight as I passed them, and still quite a few narrow and hateful gazes coming along dirty whispers, my feet dragged themselves to my destination. Breathing slowly, enjoying the coming sunshine as if I were a sunflower, as well as the chilly breeze that came in from the few windows that were open, at least I could ease up my tension as I made my way there.

Luckily, due to the prep needed for the incoming visit, there's no one around here. Finally, I can relax without hearing any whispers or being alert in case any bastard tries to trip me again.

"Sigh… Man, it's been such a long time since I could come out for a breather."

The sun feels so nice… I stand in the sunlight, enjoying the wind as it blows through the track field. Opening the food pack, I lean on a wall as I eat the little I left for this time.

Damn, I truly didn't think they'd push me to such lengths. Though, I really should try to relearn how to stand up quickly again. It's such a bother, but it's for the best if I gotta keep using the old OS for a while longer.

Though, to be completely honest, if I hadn't been exhausted after yesterday's fight I wouldn't have missed my charges. Takamura was a monster to deal with. Well, I can't really say anything since I sworded my way through three buildings trying to get you off guard. While I ended up losing, when she used her hands to damage my arms, it was because I had forgotten the Takemikazuchi's hands are also weaponized. We did duke it out for half an hour, so I'm happy with the result even if I lost.

My maneuvering did catch her off her groove at times and I actually knocked her sword away, but the difference in our mechs was too big, and since she isn't exactly a pushover I couldn't overpower her with my speed. Not even with an Albright I could take her down. I thought that coming at her from behind at top speed would do the trick, but nope. She sidestepped at the last second and started chasing me, firing at the buildings to my sides to close my escape roads.

But the fact that I could stand up to a Type-00 in a Kagerou, even if it had the XM3 and its upgrades, is proof enough that we are on the right track. That said, that battle tired me out more than I thought and I couldn't do anything else yesterday.

Still, at least I saw a funny dream of this world's me playing around with Sumika today. Who would have said she also was afraid of Binocchio's book in this world? And of course, she punched him into the stratosphere when he joked about it. It's good to see they were still that close here, too.

Sigh… Still, real tired right now. Looking up, I close my eyes as the wind blows.

In less than a day, we get the first real test here. Will we make it? Or will I fail once more? I can only believe in Tama, she has done many incredible things through all of my loops.

Anyways… Thankfully, I can enjoy some alone time in pea-

"Excuse me, Cadet."

And my rest is ruined. I just can't catch a break, can I?

"… What is it?" Mion and Shion were coming towards me, with the same lightless hawkish eyes they had during the CCSE. Great, dying today it seems.

Both of them were wearing the red dress of the Guard, taking slow but firm steps, enough to lift a small cloud of dust, never taking their eyes off me. Are they coming to harm me? Or are they here to test the waters? Faster than I expected, but I did show off quite a bit just now. The emerald and turquoise eyes meet my gaze as they lock onto me. Mion took one final step forward and spoke up.

"Good day, Cadet Shirogane. Do you happen to be free right now?"

"Yes, pretty much." I wonder if Sensei noticed this. Maybe she 'liberated' this zone, so that they could approach me? "Nice weather, right?" They both nod.

"I was under the impression that you were under a strict routine." Twirling her hair, never taking her eyes off.

"Something came up and I'm free for the afternoon, is all. So, do you need something?"

"Well, it seems like you're progressing in your training just fine." Shion smiled at me widely, showing me her teeth.

"One could say that, yes."

"From what we heard, you performed… quite well in your last session." She smirks evilly, as she did in the memory I saw.

"Well, I did my best just now, to be honest. Though, I ended up going overboard, to be honest."

"Did you happen to crash, perchance?"

"Oh, no. It's just that my head hurt a bit after moving too fast too frequently. I almost puked yesterday's breakfast all over the sim pod."

"… Huh." Both of them narrow their eyes, confusion and disgust mixed together.

"Sorry for the vulgar expression, but I got really dizzy after today's training due to doing some of my best moves."

"… Well, it would have been a shame if you were to be unable to pilot, considering you bested me during the CCSE." Mion also smiled, with a small hint of darkness in her eyes.

"I suppose. So, what did you need of me?" Giving them a side glance, their brows seem to lower just a tiny bit.

"Is something the matter?" Mion asks, forcing a small smile.

"Well, I just don't know why you Guards would approach me. Doubt you'd come just to make idle chitchat." Looking around for a bit, I don't see anyone else from their group, but I do now they're stealthy.

They… might just be trying to make me trip, or to attack me if no one is around.

"Well, that is true." Shion took a step forward, pointing one finger to the sky. I think her little self did the same in that memory I saw. "Are you truly free as of now?"

"Yeah? I just said so."

"Hmm… So, you came here to relax, then?"

"… It's kinda obvious, to be honest. So, uh, did you need something or what?"

"Could we ask you some questions? I am reaaally curious about you, actually." Shion says, again raising a finger.

"… Fine, I guess."

"Who're you working for?" Her eyes changed again to those lightless, oppressing, hawkish eyes she had during the CCSE.

"The UN?"

"Playing dumb? Well, do you like natto rolls?" She changed to a shining smile for some reason.

"Yeah, I do." I'm one of those weird people who don't mind eating natto rolls, and that made Mom and Dad always give me those when we went to eat sushi while they ate all the other ones. Damn pricks, just remembering that is making me mad. "But why are you asking me this?"

"You do, huh? Then, do you know what steamed doubin is?" She ignored my question…

"Yeah, my favorite dish actually. But could you stop talking about food?" She sharpens her eyes at me again, Mion does the same as she speaks up.

"Why? Are these questions bothering you, by any chance?"

"I've lost my lunch due to my punishment. You know, for what I did to those soldiers? So talking about food right know is like torture for me." I show them the small pack of rations I have on me.

"So you were indeed punished for saving Meiya-sama, huh." She twirls the low end of her ponytail as her eyes narrow a bit.

"For harming the soldiers. Nobody believed me when I said I did it to help my squadmates." I can't really tell why, but I'm feeling really calm now. Maybe because I saw their child versions? I mean, I'm not here to harm Yuuhi so there's no reason for us to fight actually. But, still, being cautious is never bad.

"Is that so?" Making a small smile, Mion tilted her head. "Well, you seem to be truly skilled with a blade. Can you tell us where you learned that?" She kept faintly smiling as she played with her hair, Shion on the other hand was silently staring at me with a poker face.

I can only drag the conversation and hope either Sensei or Kasumi notice this. As for the rest of the base… Yeah, they would leave me to my misery. Maybe waiting for Meiya is… But what if she's cooperating with them? Hauu…

"… I learned from someone that was on Yukon Base."

"Hmm… Say, considering your words at me when we fought, I suppose you don't know who we are, right?" Her eyes slowly were turning into those same eyes she had during our fight. Time to fish up some answers.

"Aren't you relatives of the 1st Lieutenants? I think you said that your sister was the one here, so you're 1st Lt. Mana Tsukuyomi's sister, while Shion would be 1st Lt. Maya Tsukuyomi's, right?"

"Ooh! He got it right!" Shion bursted suddenly, smiling again at me. "So Shirogane, the question here is, did you know about us beforehand?" She said wiggling a finger at me. So that wasn't wrong.

"No? Aside from your relation with 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi, I've no idea who you are. I'm the one who wants to know why you called me by my name when we fought." Gotta play my part here, to make the 'I have amnesia' thing to be credible. And I'm not even lying, I've no idea who they are.

"Huh… So that's how is it…" Shion brought one hand to her chin as her eyes started to lose light again.

"I mean, we never met before right? Why would I know you? Do you happen to know who I was before I left the Empire?" C'mon, gimme a hint or something.

"… What do you mean by that?" More and more, their eyes lost friendliness and regressed into those hostile pair of gazes that met me in the CCSE under the rain.

"I mean… I don't really remember much from my life in Japan. I woke up in a hospital in Alaska without many memories, and since no one could find any relatives I have no idea who I used to be. Hell, I don't even know if my parents are alive." That is not a lie, we do not have any idea who the hell he was. Wait a sec…

Dad and Mom… Who were they here?

… Why do I… feel heavy again all of a sudden?

"… So you lost your memories? Is that true?" Mion asked, sounding as convinced as my Mom when I told her I actually passed my history tests once in a blue moon.

"Yes, I honestly don't know. Though, I've been dreaming about my childhood for a while. I think I used to live around here, when there was still a town."

"… Eh?" Both of them opened their eyes wide, taken aback for some reason.

"Yeah, I think I lived around this place when I was little. Kinda remember what my house looked like, sort of."

Suddenly, Shion sprung forward and grabbed my shoulders.

"What else do you know? Who did you live with?!"

"I-I dunno, I can't really remember. H-Hey, it hurts! Let me go!" I try to shrug her off, to no avail. Her fingers dig into my shoulders, determined to not let go.

I don't know if I was actually living with Maya-san or if she was just looking after me, so I better shut up about that. But seeing her reaction… They're scouting me, and with ill intentions at it. Of course, they're on Yuuhi's side after all.

"Shion, let him go!"

"Shut up! Takeru, do you remember visiting the capital?"

"No, I don't. And why are you calling me by my name?" Shion's eyes were fierce, but the glow in them had changed. Wait… the Capital? Is that where we were during that memory I saw?

"Shion, we can't arise suspicions. Let him go." Mion pulled gently on her shoulder and, very slowly at that, Shion released me.

"So… Can I get an explanation for what you just did and why you're asking me these questions? Did you knew me before I left the Empire?" Shion looked to the ground while Mion returned my gaze.

"… Shirogane, do you remember anyone from your childhood?" Did they take the bait? Mion seems serious, so let's assume it did work.

But… Considering Sumika's existence was erased as a collateral effect of the G-Bombs' explosions, they shouldn't remember her at all even if they met her at some point. I better shut up about her, I can't involve Sumika in my troubles with the Guard.

"Hmm… Two boys named Jouji and Masahiko and a girl named Chie." Let's keep quiet about that memory I saw of their little selves, since it would imply that I do remember them.

"… Could you describe them?" I suppose she's testing me, to see whether I really know or if I'm just a spy repeating a speech.

"Well, I only saw them in a dream but…" I describe the children's attitudes, appearance and usual clothing. Their eyes started wavering as I talked, so the bait is working.

"So that's what you recall… Well, we might have been suspicious of you due to you coming from America and your profile lacking data, however, if you're a Japanese citizen, then we have no more reasons to question you. Forgive the inconvenience we've caused you." Mion gave me a small bow and prepared to leave, but then Shion took a step forward.

"Mion, I still have some questions for him. Don't decide by yourself when we end this."

"Shion, I believe we have already spent enough time here."

"I mean, when did this become an interrogation?" Shion shot a glare at me, slightly bothered.

"Shut up, Takeru." She's not giving me an inch, and she's calling me by my name again. "Mion, you're not in charge here, so I'll ask him some more questions. That's alright with you, Takeru?" She smiles at me wickedly. I do not like that smile.

"Uuuh… Why do always have to be like this?" Mion pursed her lips at her cousin, who just chuckled back at her.

"I guess I can answer some more questions if you want. I don't want trouble with the Guard, so if I can clear whatever suspicions you have I'll gladly answer your questions. But you still haven't told me what you know, did you know me or not?" If I can get some answers right now things will go more smoothly. Win-Win.

"I dunno. We may or may not have met." She giggles as she sees my expression to her answer. "Now then, do you remember having any siblings?"

"No, I think I was an only child." That part is true for me, but I don't know if it's the same in this world. Shion looks down, a small shadow covering her eyes. Right, he might have been like family for them.

"… I see. Then, do you remember having any military experience before joining the UN?"

"Not that I can tell. I did catch on quickly in my trainings, but I don't think I had any experience before." And since I don't know what kind of training he had I can't make up bullshit this time.

"Hmm… Can you show me your stance?" She stroked her chin slowly as she got closer.

"My stance?"

"Yes, when you get ready to attack with your sword. Show me your pose." She moved her hair out of her face and returned a fierce glare. I slowly take my Mugen stance, I see their lips tremble a bit.

"Is this good enough?"

"Yes, thanks. Do you happen to know the name of the style you employ?"

"No, not really." Can't tell them that, since it's something I learned in my world. "So, you don't have other suspicions about me?"

"If I may, why have you not gone to the Capital to rectify the matter of your missing data?" Mion asked, again making a small smile.

"Because I already presented the data I had, and if there is an error, is on the Empire's side. They're the ones who should upload the new data or fix their own mistake." Plus, that's on Sensei's shoulders as my legal tutor. You go and try to convince her to let me go near the Capital, I'll go take down Kashgar and every other hive in the meantime.

"However, you could try to delve into the archives, to see if any ties to you could be found. Perhaps, some members of your family may yet live."

Feeling my back completely cold all of a sudden, as if I had gone out to take out the trash in shorts and a shirt while it was snowing, as if I were curling under a simple blanket to drive out the cold air, as the shower in the cell feels on top of my head and on my back every morning, I sighed while looking down. For some reason… it feels just like when I wake up as of late… so empty and far away from everything …

"… Family, huh."

"Ahem… Is there anything wrong?" Shion asked, again raising a finger.

"… No, nothing." Looking up, scratching my head, can't help but to frown a bit. "It's just that… thinking about my family or my parents just… brings my mood real down." I pop into my mouth the last piece of the dough, looking at the clouds.

"… Huh, is that so."

"So, anything else?" Meeting their gaze again, for some reason, I didn't find that hawkish tint in them anymore, nor the readiness in their posture.

"Well, I have one last question for you." Shion smiles again as she brings one finger up. Mion tenses up, slightly moving her brows in confusion.

"What is it?" She smiles wickedly at me, curving her brows a bit as she takes a single step closer.

"… Have you ever been kissed?"

… What kind of question is that? That's a personal-

"S-S-SHION!" Mion's outburst caught me by surprise, I'm sure her shout could be heard from within the base. Her face was reddening badly.

"Oh, what is it, cousin of mine? I did not aim the question at you." She smiles as she plays with her hair. One could practically hear the screeching gears on Mion's head as she opens and closes her mouth.

"You can't go asking that kind of personal questions! It is unproper for a Royal Guard to-"

"So Takeru, have you ever been kissed?" She ignored Mion's rambling and gazed at me again, joyfully smiling from ear to ear.

"… I don't know?" I mean, I have been kissed in my other lives, but in this one I… well, I've been alone so no action whatsoever yet.

"Was that a question or an answer?"

"I haven't kissed as far as I know, but there is much I don't remember, so… I dunno."

Shion then smiles at Mion, who returns a small frown her way. What is it with these two? Did this world's me kiss one of them? But wasn't he… I mean, Yuuhi seemed really attached to him. Does this mean I fooled them? I can only wonder what they'll do next. There is the General to worry about too.

"What are you two doing?!" Oh, seems like I forgot about someone. Death flag, here you come.

Both Pickles twitch, their expressions clouding over as the roaring stomps of Tsukuyomi-san approach us. To say she's royally pissed would be an understatement.

"Ah, uh, Sister, you see…" Mion slowly, as a snail, turned around and bowed down. "We saw the cadet was free for the moment, and thought that perhaps we could have a talk with-"

"You both should know better." Dry ice would be a supernova compared to her tone right about now. "The situation of the cadet is a delicate one, and you may only bring him further setbacks, for others to see him being questioned by the Guard. Furthermore, the UN has requested us to not involve ourselves in their affairs unless necessary."

"We weren't questioning him in the slightest, Mana-sama." Shion, losing all energy and turning meek, said while also bowing down.

"Then, Cadet Shirogane, do you believe these two to have been interrogating you?"

"… To be honest, yeah." Both Pickles flinched, giving me a frown. Tsukuyomi-san's eyes narrowed upon their figures.

"Is that so. You two, take your leave right this instant."

"However, Sister, we-"

"Did I happen to mumble, perchance?" She then placed a hand on her chin, staring right at them.

Who would worry about global warming when you have Tsukuyomi-san here? Though… Seems like she also wants to have a talk with me. The Pickles look back and give me a small bow before going their way, real slow at that. Tsukuyomi-san keeps staring at them, to make sure they do return inside the base. Once they're out of sight, she runs a hand over her hairs she lets a sigh as huge as a Fort out of her lips.

Taking a few steps back, never losing sight of her, I wait for a moment, yet she doesn't speak up.

"Uh… Do you need something from me, 1st Lieutenant?"

"Why, are you inconvenienced by my presence?" And there it is, the coup's glare. And again, for some reason, my stomach feels upset and heavy all of a sudden.

"Well… You just said people may misunderstand having a Guard asking me questions."

"Worry not, it seems no one can see us from behind this wall." She then walks past me, leaning on the wall to my right. As she remained staring at me, I sighed the acid on the back of my mouth and also got back on the wall. "Well then, it would seem you have been placed under a most unjust punishment, cadet."

"It is what it is. I do deserve it. Killing should never go unpunished."

"… I see. Now, may I ask if you were told anything regarding the situation of your blade?"

"That the Empire dropped the claims to have my head since I didn't knew its meaning and had no bad intentions. So… Is it back where it belongs?" She looks at me, eyes ever so slightly narrowed, then she nods. "That is a relief…"

"Huh, so you are relieved it is back to its rightful owner?"

"How could I not? The blade was too important to leave it in the wrong hands."

"… True enough. By the by… Why did it have a ribbon on its handle?"

"Huh? Oh… That was just… something to remember someone I liked much, someone dear to me."

Holding her gaze is harder than I thought. Yes, she is as imposing as I remember her but… It is saddening to see such a rift between us, compared to how close we used to be. Sure, that might only apply to when I married Meiya, but she did live with me and teach me many important things back home. And even in the other worlds, she was someone I knew would cover my back, even if we didn't see eye to eye during the coup. Her loyalty might have been somewhere else than mine, but she was someone I could say I looked up to. And despite how I harmed her, she still called me back during the incident on the school… Back when I was leaning on this same wall, unable to do jack shit, she still found it in her to lend me her ear.

Sigh… Different world, I know. The one I remember her as is no more, this ruthless Royal Guard is all that remains. I should know better by now, but damn, it still hurts to think about… all those I lost, all those good times we'll never share again.

"… Is that so?" Brushing her hair, she looks at up at nowhere. "Then, allow me to cut to the chase. Who was the one who bestowed the sword onto you?"

"… Someone in Yukon."

"I would be liking to receive a name, cadet."

"It was someone dear to me, so I won't say it." Not like I can tell her Maya-san was the one, or that the blade belongs to Meiya. "I was the one who brought it here, and so, I will face the consequences myself."

"… Even if that places you on a court?" Taking a step closer, her gaze cut into mine. Holding it, I nodded. "Are you… certain of this?

By merely giving us the name of who was the supposed owner of the blade, you could clear all guilt from your person."

"I am the last owner of that sword, and I brought it here. If you want to place blames on someone, the culprit is right in front of you."

"… While I praise your resolve, there is no need to shoulder this burden. You should be well aware of the blade's importance."

"So what you're saying is, I'm still on your black list?" Again feeling acid coming up my throat, a small twinge of pain appearing right below my ears as our gazes met, can't help but to cross my arms real tight.

"Ahem… It is a sensitive matter. It would be foolish to not warn you, seeing that you are willing to talk. I must insist that you give me the name of-"

"I refuse." Her brows twitch. "I thank you for your consideration 1st Lt., but this is my own problem. I should have listened to Cadet Mitsurugi's advice and go to speak with you earlier, to avoid this from being mixed with my current dilemmas. However, it is my own responsibility, and as such, I won't blame someone for my own miss. I brought the blade, unaware of its meaning, and did not consult with the authorities about it. That is all there is to this."

And if they press, I don't have an answer. I can't read her expression, so I don't know what they thought of the blade. Going by her earlier answer, she already sent the blade to Yuuhi probably, so… Going by how she mentioned a court, chances are I am still on their sights. Yuuhi is still… coming after my -san remains gazing at me, for a long while, saying nothing.

"… So, did you tell of the blade to anyone in the UN?"

"No, I kept it with me on the closet and never took it out of my room. No one, save Mitsurugi and the XO, know about it."

"I see…"

"So, uh, anything else?"

"Yes, I wanted to confirm something. When did you arrive to this base?"

"Huh? Why do you want to know that?"

"… Answer the question." Taking a step forward, she locks her gaze with mine again.

"Can't you just check the databases?"

"… So, you arrived on the 23rd then?"

"The day before, if it makes any difference." No point in hiding that, Sensei should have the cover prepped up already.

"I see…" Again running a hand over her hair, she stares at me.

"Anything else?"

"No, that was all. Do forgive my relatives' behavior."

"It's cool, for real. So… See you later, I guess." She remains staring, a poker expression in her face. Very slowly, her brows lower and lips pluck.

"Wouldn't you think that, perhaps, goodbye would be a better way to end a conversation?"

"I mean, we are going to see each other later at some point, what with you being around the base, so it isn't a goodbye. So, see you later. Here's hoping this mess can end well, somehow." Sighing the acids out, I give her a small smile.

I know, it's stupid to hope for it.… But I really would like this all to end on a good note, if only to not bring more problems to Alt. IV or be forced to restart the loop.

And, again, she stared at me silently. Still saying nothing, she gives a nod and then leaves the wall as she runs a hand over her hair.

"I suppose. Well then…" And thus, she leaves with hurried steps.

So, which one was it? I thought she would have been more fierce towards me, what with they having the blade and all, but she did mention a court. The Pickles' also were rather hostile at times, but ended up chilling down a ton by the end. Doesn't change the fact I've no way to explain from where I got the blade… Sigh… What could I do if they keep pressing? Sensei did say they wanted to approach me, and my answers were not pleasant ones for sure… I wouldn't trust much in someone like me if I were in their shoes…

As I was lost in thought, I saw Meiya coming closer.

"Oh, hey Mitsurugi. Should we go see the Instructor?"

"Yes, but before that…" She crosses her arms and stares at me with narrowed eyes. "I believe I saw 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi coming from the track field just a moment ago. Did she happen to come talk with you?" Sigh… Again with that doubtful gaze, huh.

"Yeah, you know, about the sword."

"Oh." Eyes sparked up, arms loosened quite a bit. "And, what came of it?"

"Eh, nothing much." I leave the wall, going to her side. "She still seems to hold some doubts towards me, as do her relatives."

"Huh? Did Mion and Shion also came to question you?" Widening eyes, curved brows, shocked for real.

I wonder if… you're on their side. The reason why I was here was because I had to wait for you, maybe I would have gone to my office to be in peace instead if nothing had happened with Tama. No… Tsukuyomi-san was royally pissed at the Pickles, so I guess they just seized their chance just now. I mean, I did fly like crazy. They sure got super suspicious after seeing that.

"… Yeah, a while ago. They asked me some stuff about the CCSE and junk. Shion kept asking about my childhood, for some reason."

"Your childhood? Do you remember anything from it?" Meiya's eyes gained a peculiar tint, as if concerned, when she got a bit closer.

"I've been having dreams about it, but they're just small little things really."

"That's not true! If you're remembering your past that would mean… Well, you would not be treated as a foreigner any longer. And aren't you glad to recover some of your memories?"

For some reason, you look happy about it. It does look like she knows something. So, she's… working for the General now. Huh… So that's how it is now, then.

"… Yeah, but they're just small tidbits. Well, let's waste no more time. I'm sorry for dragging you into this." I give her a small bow, I don't want her getting more negative with me after all. But she seems to be bothered by it as she fidgets in place.

"Do not mention it. I volunteered myself for this, now let's be on our way." I nod and we begin to walk.

Going back into the base, we make our way towards B3F, where the Instructor said she'll be. The hallways were still bustling with activity. I can only hope things go well tomorrow. There's also the matter of what the Guard will do now. Don't have an excuse for the blade and now they're asking for me to go to the Capital to 'fix the databases'. We still don't even know why his data was wiped clean… What if Yuuhi wasn't on good terms with him anymore? Then… What could I do…

"Shirogane?"

I could fight with my voice distorted. But if they ask Sensei to hand me over… We're gonna have to pull some nice heist to deceive them and keep me hidden to ensure they never find out, assuming she wants to keep me here once I tune Sumika. All it takes is Meiya or someone else on the Valkyries to see my face or hear my voice once, and that's it. I trust that the Captain would keep it a secret, but if something goes wrong in the battlefield…

"Shirogane!"

"Eh?! Oh…" Arms folded real tight, lips pursed, and brows narrowed. And, as always, that purple fire coming out pouring in her eyes. "Sorry, I was lost in thought. What is it?" Meiya avoids my gaze for a while as her hands play with her tags.

"You see… I was wishing to apologize for my behavior yesterday and earlier today. I… well, shouldn't have treated you in such manner after all you did for me. Could you please forgive me, Shirogane?"

Her voice seemed clear, her eyes had no clouds over them. She is being honest, but is this some ploy to make me lower my guard? Regardless, I can't go making things worse.

"It's cool, Mitsurugi. But why did you get upset? Did I said something that I shouldn't have?"

"No, it's just… Do not worry about it, twas nothing but a show of weakness on my part. Also, could you stop calling me Mitsurugi? I thought we had agreed that you could call me Meiya." She purses her lips as she stares at me.

I know that when she looks squarely at me while moving her lips like that she's being honest, and a lil' bit bothered too, so this isn't part of a ploy or anything. But… I can't understand her. Yesterday she got all suspicious, now she wants me to call her Meiya again. Is this some sort of 'Cold-Warm' play she's doing on her own to make me lower my guard? Sigh… Whatever.

"Well, since you got upset at me again, I thought it would be best to put some space between us. I don't want to make the squad uncomfortable again, there's enough with Ayamine. Is it really alright for me to call you Meiya?" She looks away as a blush appears on her face for the briefest instant, then she faces me again while brandishing a serious expression.

"Yes, you can keep calling me Meiya, but on one condition."

"… What condition?" Is she going to ask me to tell her all I remembered from my past? Or to go talk with Tsukuyomi and the General or something like that?

"You may continue to call me by my name…" She looks away, her voice fading into a whisper. "… if you allow me to also call you by yours."

"You want to call me Takeru?" She twitches slightly in surprise, then starts fumbling one of her hands in the air.

"No, I don't. I am merely stating that it would be fair for me to call you Takeru since you call me Meiya. So, if you wish to keep calling me-"

"Fine, sure."

"Huh? Fine? You mean… I can call you Takeru?"

"Why are you so surprised? You know I don't really care a lot about etiquette, so if you're comfortable calling me Takeru you can do it, I don't mind." And it seems like you're just being you this time. I missed this cute side of her, and I know she can't lie when she gets all bashful.

"Really? Then… T-Takeru?" The blush on her face grows larger as she comes closer, looking at me with bated breath as if she were waiting for my approval.

Meiya, stop being so cute. When she gets like this my heart melts, since she reminds me of my world's Meiya a lot. Uh… Don't use that sweet gaze… Must suppress… the urge to hug…

"Yes, that's me. Now stop getting all embarrassed." I smile at her to hide my own embarrassment, causing her to slightly pout at me.

"I am not embarrassed, not in the slightest." Folding her arms, another bothered gaze came my way. It's so nice… to have this back. "So… Takeru, let's hurry to the Instructor's room."

"Yeah, I know."

We resume our walk, but now Meiya was bearing a small smile. I don't get it, did the Guard talk with her or not? Or did she just got envious of my skill and that was it?

Well, anyways, it is good to see we finally made up. Maybe with this she'll finally stop giving me cold looks and stuff. Though… I wonder how long it'll last, what with the Guard coming after me. Looking at her, at that small, honest smile, the same one my Meiya had during our last talk…

"… It would be nice if it lasted."

"Huh? Did you say something?"

"Nah, don't mind me. Just lost in thought again."

"Huh… Is that so? Then, might I ask your opinion on our morning practice as we walk? As well as about that maneuver you employed during your sparring."

"Sure, don't see why not." Smiling at her, she returns the gesture.

Not as sweet as the one in my world, but still, charming as only she could be. You truly look most beautiful when you smile. As beautiful as you also are fearsome, whenever that fire spawns on your eyes. Here's hoping we can… regain at least a sliver of the bond we used to share before, however little it may last .

Evoking Bonds

A/N: I've been forgetting to add a memo about the changes of this rewrite. Sorry for the delay.

There's only some very minor changes before Ch. 24, like Takeru speaking of Majora's Mask with Kasumi. The first "big" change is in Ch.18 in Takeru's reaction to his fight against the chasers, and his talk with Meiya on Ch.20 being a bit different.

From Ch. 24 onwards, there are tiny scenes added to this middle arc. At the end of Ch. 25 there's a scene from D&R I never got to post, then a small addition of Mana taking Takeru's Minaru Kamui, the earlier chaps of D&R are added to clear things up, and there's some more PoVs from Kei and the squad detailing their first days after the CCSE. Small new things, don't change the plot.

What does change it a little is the opening segments of Ch. 24, 37, and 39, since they show things I didn't get to tackle in D&R. Those are all the 'sparky important things' added that are new and warrant attention for the plot going forward.

I know asking the readers to yet again go through these large old sections is hard, to not say impossible, so you can simply wait until we're back to the Shirogane chapters, if the wait is worth it to you.

As always, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

[Takeru]

"And then the Instructor basically said that she will order Tama to be the leader for the day, on the grounds that I have to be part of all evening trainings from now on." Chizuru nods to my words, tapping her glasses.

We got lucky NotMarimo-chan was willing to hear us out, honestly. Using myself as bait was kind of a risky gamble, but I'm really glad she agreed in the end despite her usual sharp tongue. Even if this means more training and less resting for me.

"I'm sorry Shirogane-san, because of me…"

"Don't worry Tama, this was my idea to begin with." Smiling her way, what stiffness was in her evaporated away.

"So, I suppose Tamase will have to guide the Undersecretary during his visit to our side of the base, right?" Chizuru seemed relieved things went our way.

"Exactly." Meiya said while nodding. "Tamase is only required to play the role for a brief moment, it shouldn't pose too much of a problem. Also, Takeru suggested that we make an armband to… Hm? What's the matter? Why are you looking at me like that?" The rest stared at her, obviously shocked.

"… Meiya-san, how did you call Takeru just now?" Mikoto, ain't those evil eyes a tad bit too much?

"How? I called him Takeru, did I happen to stutter?" She looks at me for confirmation. So you can't even tell they're surprised?

"Mitsurugi-san, why are you calling Shirogane-san by his name?"

"Why, you ask? Well, he's always calling me Meiya so we agreed that I could call him by his name as well." She had to go and say it so happily, folding her arms and rising her chin upwards.

"Huh, so that's how it is. So Shirogane-kun, you allowed Mitsurugi to call you like that." Raising a brow, tapping her glasses, and narrowing her eyes at me, she kept staring. We're only missing the snake hair for bingo.

"Keep it in your pants, leader." Kei, please don't taunt her.

"Ayamine, now's not the time for your quips." Thank God she ignored her.

"Neither it is for you to try to establish dominance." Tilted into stillness, save Meiya who cocked her head, the others couldn't simply form words for a sec, frozen in place.

"W-What do you mean by that? Can you stop with your double meaning phrases for today?!" Chizuru berated her as she hasn't done in a long while.

"Come on, you two. Don't start-" However, here thar be dragons.

"Are you really that thirsty?" Kei gives her a side glance.

"What are you implying?"

"Here, have some water." Eyes closed, she hands Chizuru a bottle. Where did she even get that from?

"I don't need it!" Stepping in between them, looking at each one once, I fold my arms.

"Please, you two. We've gotta talk about how to deal with Tama's dad. Remember, let's all try a bit harder to communicate better. And, by the by, why do each of you have a swollen cheek?" They both look away, pursing their lips. Please tell me you didn't just blow everything up between each other.

"One for one." Kei said, tapping her cheek with a finger.

"We said what we had to, and tried to get past some… troubling views we had." Tapping her glasses, she looks at the rest of us. "So, to leave everything truly behind us, we just gave the other one last slap for all the baggage we had between us so far."

"That's… a bit more extreme than I thought you'd be willing to do."

"Yeah, Chizuru-san that's a bit too much, in my opinion." Tama nods as Mikoto scratches her head.

"… It wasn't my idea."

"But sure you did retaliate." Kei shrugs, smirking her way. The comment makes Chizuru frown, choosing to say nothing as she fumes in groans.

"In any case, we've dealt with our prior issues as good as we could." Tapping her glasses, she tries to chill down. "But I doubt we'd be able to simply get along perfectly from now, so… well, let's just do what we can. So please stop with the one liners, Ayamine."

"… I'll try." Looking away while plucking her lips, this only makes Chizuru groan more.

"Sigh… You do you, but don't go overboard. We've got something important coming up right now, okay?" They both nod, Chizuru sighing and Kei shrugging.

"Yes, Takeru is right." Meiya nods, arms folded as well. "We should discuss what are we to do tomorrow if the Undersecretary inquires about our trainings. Please keep your arguing to a minimum for today."

"… Takeru, huh?" Kei smiles at her, making Meiya purses her lips at the teasing.

"Well, anyways! Takeru, in what do you think Tama's dad is going to come? Maybe we could get to see a destroyer?!" I've never been more grateful for Mikoto's random outbursts than I am now.

"Yeah, that's probably what they'll use, right?" Let's try to get back on topic.

"Yeah, Papa did mention the re-entry destroyer sometimes." Tama followed up on the conversation, a smile back where it belongs.

"Then, it stands to reason why we are unable to proceed to the mock battles. In any case, let's discuss what we'll do tomorrow." Chizuru got in charge of the conversation, and we started to discuss our ideas as we walked to nowhere in particular.

Hopefully, this will turn out okay. We may have a better OS and the warning to make sure the OTH is ready, and now I know the Valkyries are at the ready if Tama can't do it, but still… I hope she can step up to the challenge.

After we agreed to simply be honest about her sniping results and how she's always on the lookout so that we don't fight as the motives for her being the leader, we then helped Tama practice giving us some orders, but she got super tense and started shivering midway through it.

Since we needed some privacy, Chizuru suggested that we went to the library to debate on what to do, and study while we were at it. The punishment only forbids me from going to the PX or the barracks, so I'm all clear on that front. Despite the whispers and nasty looks, that is. Sitting in a far away table, to not be in sight of any sudden visitors in case they had a bone to pick with me, we also picked up some books and stuff to have Tama know the procedures and junk just in case.

After debating on how to act around Tama's dad, despite her refusal to tell us what she put in the letters, our leader decided to have us do a reread of the lessons as well as the plans for the coming mock battles. Which are the same plans and formations we always used, but with me as a Gun Interceptor. Now they wanna use Meiya and Kei as our vanguard, me, Mikoto and Chizuru as our midfield, and Tama alone in the backrow. Seems like they value my vision and pacing more this time around.

"With you covering their backs, Ayamine's random charges won't diminish our chances to clear the battles, and you also could team up with Mitsurugi should she find herself alone at some point." Again making circles in the air, she explains while looking at all three of us in the eye.

"Come on, now. Don't be so harsh with Ayamine, all of us got things to polish."

"Indeed, Sakaki. We triumph and fail as a unit, singling her out shan't yield positive results." Meiya nods, arms folded.

"Sigh… I'm not." Tapping her glasses, she leans back on her chair. "I'm just telling you my priorities. I can barely keep up with Ayamine's stride, but you two can do it effortlessly. All I ask is that you remember to not stray too far if you decide to advance beyond the plan's goals." We two nod, Kei was looking at the ceiling. "Ayamine, what is your opinion?"

"I agree with the plans. Also, as long as you remember to move one breath faster I think you'll be fine." She gives her a thumbs up, finally willing to talk without sarcasm anywhere.

"I will try to put your advice to work, but I don't know how fast I'll manage to get used to that pace, so for now let's play it safe. By the way, Shirogane-kun, could you tell us how you did that aerial move?"

"Hm? Sure. The key point is in freeing the boosters for when you reach the peak height of a double jump, so that you can reposition them to perform a full boost dive. Then-"

The lesson then turned into me lecturing them on my crazy acrobatics, and how they are effectively pulled off, and how a quick random acceleration is what allows me to not crash every time I do my stunts.

It's not that I'm always at top speed, I just increase my speed to get the most impulse before hitting my target. But since I then let go of the pedals, the coming deceleration and unlocking of the jump units' positions lets me change their orientation to soften the eventual landing. Sure, the timings are really tight, but it isn't impossible to do. I mean, I can do it. That's proof enough.

"… So by knowing your craft's capabilities to such minute detail, you effectively change the psychology of the battle from your point of view." Meiya remarked, nodding with a hand on her chin. "Which is why you prefer manual controls, since they allow you to coordinate your maneuvers to the smallest detail. So it was all in minimizing the time you're in the air, while simultaneously reducing the windows where you're vulnerable to be tumbled."

"Uh… Yeah, that."

And again, she overthinks this. To be honest, while the move does have its merits, I merely use it because I'm used to it as my finisher after playing with the Kaizer too much. It's much more effective as a surprise attack or as a counter to the waves of Tanks we face, if I get enough space to prepare the jump without any of them getting onto me.

"… But the damage to the TSF is too grand." Mikoto says, reading the control logs she, somehow, had printed already. "I'm not saying it's a bad idea, but… well, doing so many of them is risky."

"It's okay, I know it's more of a gamble. It's an ace in the hole for a reason, it's not the consistent attack that I rely on most of the time, after all." Smiling at her, she also returns one at me.

"But it sure is amazing…" Tama says as she looks over the logs. "You three made some very precise moves at the end there."

"Yeah, the leader sniped Monster-kun really well."

"… Oi, who're you calling Monster-kun?"

"You, of course. I still can't understand how did you came up with the move." Eyes still narrowed, she reminds me of my world's Mikoto after he faced the Elef.

"Sigh… It really was a lucky shot, though." Tapping her glasses, she leans back on her seat. "But I believe all of us should at least try to perform those… double boost jumps he does."

"Just that? What about the cancels or triple jumps?"

"I… don't think I can take those." Scratching a cheek, she looks down.

"I wanna know how you spun your Fubuki when I grappled you." Kei asks, leaning closer.

"As for me, I would welcome a lesson regarding the 'cancels' you spoke of before." This time Meiya said, eyes a bit narrowed for some reason.

"What about you, Tama, Mikoto?"

"Huh? Ah, well… I think I also want to learn the cancels and the double jumps at least, if you have the time of course." Again playing with her tags, Tama gave me the lonely kitty eyes. Uuh… That's cheating. I nod at her and she beams back.

"Hmm… For starters, I also want the same as Miki-san. Once we pilot more, I'll see what I want to polish." Smiling as she kept reading the control logs, Mikoto nodded my way.

"Roger… So, well, do we have the manual around here?"

"I'll go pick it up." Kei stands up, going to the shelves.

"Bring the one about repairs, too." She nods, giving a thumbs up. Sigh… How good it is to have mended this bridge…

"Ahem…" Looking back at the table, a certain pair of eyes were spewing purple fire. "Then, should we begin with a preliminary opening, Takeru?"

"Fine, fine. Let's talk with a timer in mind, to explain the random accel to reach a double boost jump quickly. Mikoto, you have the pages of when I exited the highway ready?"

"Uh… Going by the time mark… Oh! Yeah, here they are." First giving them a look herself, gaining Chizuru's and Meiya's groaning, she then laid the pages in the center of the table.

"Alright, let's compare them to both my other moves, Sakaki's and Ayamine's jumps, and the other page with the state of our virtual machines to show the impact it has on the joints." Kei comes back, leaving the books on the table, and after clearing my throat, I then begin the explanation.

---

Around an hour and half later…

---

"… I don't get it." Kei says, slumped face first on the table.

"I'm telling you, you just gotta use one booster to begin the spin after gyrating with a single feet to ensure you remain in position. Just lightly start the jump unit and then let go, you gotta do it in one breath."

"Impossible. My wrists are gonna die."

"… I'd have to agree." Mikoto nods, sounding deflated. "I can understand the jumps, but how can you be so sure to do a cancel? If you miss the prediction, you're getting shot down."

"You just gotta move faster."

"That doesn't make any sense." She groans a bit, plucking her lips.

"Yeah, and remember that time you didn't beat me?"

"Wh- T-That's because your movements are too erratic to follow most of the time!"

"And why do you think that is?"

"Eh? Well… Because you'd get shot down otherwise?"

"Exactly. Both you and Tama give me less than a second to avoid a hit. At least I can see where you are, which makes maneuvering easier, but Tama? Yeah, I can't dodge what I can't see. Got no choice but to do random turns and accel if I want a shot at dodging her."

"C-Come on… I'm not that good…" Again playing with her tags, her gaze sinks in embarrassment.

"That's not true, you're really better than you think." Mikoto nods alongside me.

"Monster-kun speaks the truth." She says, still resting a cheek on the table.

Seeing mine and Kei's smile, Tama blushes a bit as she looks down, muttering a thanks. As sweet and humble as always.

"Sigh… It's complicated enough to just get hold of the jump timings, but to also try to predict the firing lines of the enemy?" Chizuru sighs, a hand on her forehead.

"Well, it is proof that Takeru's results are not only fruit of innate talent." Meiya says as she keeps reading the control logs alongside the maneuver manual. "He has clearly polished his knowledge much to deliver these results. And if we also pour in a similar workload, our own efforts shall certainly improve even if we cannot replicate his own quirks."

"I agree." Tapping her glasses, she leans an elbow onto the table and a hand on her chin. "Still, this merits more reading. I still can't fully grasp the image of the movements in my head."

"Yeah… Um, maybe we could leave this practice to the sims?" Mikoto taps the books and the notes they had taken, looking at the rest furtively.

"I'm on board that idea." Kei lifts a thumbs up, as well as her face off the table.

"Yes, it would be most dangerous for us to try these concepts without mastering them first." Meiya nods, as does Tama. "Takeru, could we perhaps continue these lessons during the evening trainings from now on?"

"I mean, I don't see why not. Whether it is with Takamura or the Instructor, I agree that it's better to leave this practice for the extra trainings." Wouldn't want them scoring lower numbers due to failing to do the cancels or jumps with the old OS, after all.

"Well, now that that's settled… Should we end this for today?" Chizuru looks at us, we all give a nod, except Kei who yawns. "Alright, let's put everything in place then."

Grabbing the books and papers, we began to tidy things up, the others debating what they understood of my words as I went to the shelves.

"… Hey." Kei elbowed me, a book in her hand, as the others kept talking.

"What's up?"

"Nice of you to help Tamase with her dad."

"Just doing my share, is all. Tama was always nice to me, it's only normal I'd return the favor."

"Yeah, that's right.… Sorry."

"Huh?" Placing a book in its place, I look to her. Looking down, playing with her tags, her lips moving as if unsure of what to say.

"Sorry, for being an asshole all this time."

"Hey, we already went over this. It's cool, really."

"Still… I should have known better after the CCSE… So, uh-"

"Don't say it, it's okay. I did something horrible, and it was obvious you'd be reluctant to trust in me. Let's just… try to get along from now on, okay?" Smiling at her, she nods.

"So… You really… aren't that violent, right?"

"… Do I… look like that in your eyes?"

"Well, when you charged at me, I was frozen. You sounded like a monster for a second as you screamed at me then, charging so fast I couldn't even react." Finally looking at me, a minuscule shaking of her lips, she gulped as she stared. "You truly… aren't a conscripted soldier?"

"Sigh… No, I'm not."

"Then, about… what you said back then… about someone needing me after I was dead…" Holding my gaze, making me feel acid down my throat again, she takes a step closer. "Who was that about?"

"… About someone I lost… to an unfortunate accident before I had to come here. Someone that, just like you, didn't want to retreat, no matter what." Exhaling as I look up, softly biting my lips, a hand goes to the back of my head as I think of those fights. "I'm no one to tell you what to do with your life, and you are right in a way. Sometimes, the red button is the only option left. Just… I'd like to believe we can work towards a better result in our fights. I know that it's impossible to have zero casualties in a mission, but… that doesn't mean I don't want to try to get them as close to zero as I can." And even if it's for the best, I don't want to use others as meat shields. Just as Sumika planned during Ouka, to have us be the sole strike force to protect all the UN vets that were going to be sent alongside us, I want to be the spearhead, the spiked pavise that'll protect the rest from those unending, unyielding hordes of BETA.

"I… see…" Her gaze dropping, a hand going to the back of her head, she stole gazes at me now, oddly hesitating in her words. "Um, then… The CCSE… was just an accident, right?"

"No, it was a mistake I chose to make. But… if you're asking if I'd do that in the future, then… No, I'm not that violent, and I don't want to be. If left with no other choice… I'll probably do something like that, but only if it is to save a life, either mine or someone else's. I know it's hard to believe me with how I pilot… but I'm not willingly doing something like that again unless I'm absolutely out of options."

Looking straight into my eyes, she then grimaces as she lowers her gaze.

"Sorry, didn't mean to accuse you or anything."

"It's okay. I… get why you'd want to confirm if you can trust someone like me."

"So…" Scratching her head, still looking down, she, very slowly, raises a hand. "Could we… start over?"

Sighing as I smile, I give her a firm handshake. She stalls a reaction, opening her eyes wide. Seems like she didn't expect me to agree so quickly.

"Really? Everything's cool?"

"Yeah, for real. I'm not telling you to let what I did go, but we can begin to work together if you think I'm worth your trust. And yeah, that means I do trust in you, Ayamine."

"… So you think I can fit in the team?"

"We're already part of it, if I fit in of course you would too. Let's do our best to get commissioned, and then we'll kick the BETA's ass back to the other end of the galaxy. Good enough for you?" Smirking at her, she finally tightens her hand around mine as she returns the smile.

"Yeah, good enough."

It's so good to see we could finally reach a truce, Kei. Here's hoping we can keep getting along from now on. Finishing our business in the library, the girls decided to go to the PX for dinner. So I said my goodbyes for the day, going to get my own dinner. At this point, even the paper bag looks tasty to me.

Going down to Hangar 90 as I ate, there I checked up on the orders I had left during morning. The design of the sword seemed to be defined already, now it was time to do the math to see if it worked. The actual production would take a lot of time, so I might not see it in action this year. The M61 was ready to be mounted, but we need some more time to double check the internals of the Takemikazuchi, we do not want to break it just to do things fast.

The rest of the weapons are coming along nicely. I also gave an explanation to the mechanics and engineers about how I saw the Blade Armor for the Shin Kagerou, with fins similar to the ones on the Super Tomcat. It would have them on its forearms, feet, legs and shoulders. That will protect it from all the Tanks and it's not that hard to do, unlike mounting a machinegun on its waist like we're trying to do for my Type-00C.

Also, I'm glad I finally got an answer on the mail. Though it'll have to wait until after tomorrow, it's good to know he was willing to hear me out. Well, let's time my steps. I do need to make sure I'm not being played here.

And since that's over and done with, I ride the elevator towards Sensei's office. Exiting and going up to the door, the usual knocking is followed by the usual ding of the thing being unlocked, and so in I go.

"Good evening, Sensei." Facing me, eyebags marked hard, she stopped typing on her PC as I approached.

"Good evening, Shirogane. Is anything wrong?" Her tone slower than usual, colder too, her eyelids lowered a tiny bit while looking at me.

"Not wrong per se, just thought I'd drop by to see how was everything."

"Under control. The Valkyries and the MPs have been briefed on the patrols required, the OTH Cannon is ready to be used at a moment's notice, and anyone who was looking the least bit suspicious has been observed by Yashiro."

"I see… Good to know. So, by the way, the Guard approached me today."

Then, she looked into my eyes, saying nothing. A hand on her chin, a stone-cold mask.

"… What did you tell them?"

"Nothing much. Just answered with bits I remembered during the sessions. I'm not sure if they bought it, but they pressed for three things. To see who gave me the blade, to know when I arrived here, and if I was planning to go to the Capital to fix the databases. They left me alone after that, without any real hostile signs."

"… Is that so."

"… You did know they approached me this time?"

"Yes, I was informed. Don't worry, your cover is air tight. And I am sure you've no plans to go to the Capital, so if you think they at least believed some of your words, there's nothing else to do. Now it's time to see how they react to what you told them."

"Well, you're right. So, I know you're busy but, can I see Kasumi today?"

"Hm? Yes, why would you not?" Narrowing her eyes a bit, she leans forward.

"I mean, you may need her for something or the other, it's not like I can waltz in to see her whenever I want."

"… Fair enough. She should be free for the moment, if she's done with what I asked of her. If she's in the cylinder room, then you're free to go there. Remember to wear the headband if you perform a memory recovery." Sighing a bit, she then looked back at the screen of her laptop.

"… Is everything really okay, Sensei?"

"Hm? Yes, why do you ask?"

"Besides the fact that you're being awfully cold? Is it something I can't help with?"

After again holding my gaze in silence for a sec, she begins to spin slowly. Leaning back onto her seat, looking up, she folds her arms.

"… I'm merely taking care of many issues all at once. The 00 Unit, the papers to present for the coming operation in Sadogashima, the formal request to host a trial for the XM3 and ask for the XG line, as well making sure the ones responsible for the drop of the HSST are nowhere near this base."

"The ones… Do you think it's those terrorists you told me about before?"

"You don't need to know that, for now." Wow, back to the dry ice tone, huh. "So, I'm not in the mood for long talks today. If you dealt with the Guards well enough, then that's that. Tomorrow is a very important day, so do try to rest well. I'm busy now, so if that's all be on your way."

"… Roger. Later."

Didn't even get to sit down, huh. Whatever… This is on me for coming here in high spirits after how good things went today. I forgot… who I came to talk with, of course she'd just leave me in the dark again. If it's something serious enough to make her look like that…

Sigh… No point in delving too much on this, it's on her if she doesn't want to talk it out. After all… She's neither the Yuuko I worked side by side last loop nor the one I supported after everything was over in my first loops. This time… our goals differ, in a way. But this is just further proof, now that she's tired she dropped the mask.

Exiting her office, I try to enter the creepy hallway and the door slides open as usual. Making it to the cylinder room, I see Kasumi near it as usual. She turns around, moving her bunny ears when she seems me.

"Hey, Kasumi. How's it going?"

"Good evening, Takeru-san. Everything is fine."

"I see… So, check this out! I finally managed to make Kei and Chizuru try to get along."

"Really? But they seemed too stubborn…"

"Haha, yeah, they are. Luckily I could get my point across, even if I got a bit emotional back there. How about you? Is work going well?" I get closer, petting her head. She moves her bunny ears as I do, nodding.

"Yes, today I started since early morning, but we made good progress. But I can't tell you about it."

"I know, I know. It's top secret, after all. Just knowing you're holding up fine is enough." Seeing her faint like when we did the transfers is not something I'd like to repeat, after all.

"So, did you want to do another recovery session?"

"Only if you're feeling fine. We can play games if you're too tired." Narrowing her brows a bit, she looks right into my eyes.

"I can do it." Clear like a summer sky, her gaze seems honest, and her voice sounds as usual so she isn't lying.

"Alright. Thanks as always, Kasumi." Again patting her head, this time ruffling her hair a bit, I smile back at her.

"… It's nothing, I'm always ready to help you. So, um, what did you want to see? Something of the Guard?"

"No, today… I wanna see something of his family. Something of when we lived here. I dunno, how did he and Sumika met, where or who are my parents in this world… Just that it has to be short since tomorrow's schedule is packed already."

"I know… Then, let's start." Grabbing my sleeve real tight, she dragged me closer to the cylinder. "Could you try to think about Sumika-san this time? We can try the rest tomorrow, if you'd like." Hesitating like a cat seeing water, her grasps on my arm eased up as I sat down besides her.

"Of course. After all, it's thanks to you I can even see these memories. Just don't exhaust yourself, okay?"

"Yes, I won't. Leave it to me." Then, she went to pick up the weird-looking headband, and once I put it on she hugged my back, resting her head on it.

I closed my eyes, feeling the tingly sensation once more. Again thinking about boats and floating on water, I let the feeling cover me whole as a distant light slowly made its way into the center of my view.

November 28th, 1988. 0 7:34 AM.

(Hiiragi District. Sumika's House.)

---

Light poured through the window, a cool breeze accompanying it. The soft sounds of early morning on the street, the chirping of a frying pan as an egg dove into the oil, and the humming of a woman decorated the kitchen of the Kagami household.

Haruna Kagami was preparing breakfast while listening to the news, stealing glances at the house next door. She couldn't help to wonder what kind of people were her new neighbors. It was truly odd that someone would buy a house in this precise moment, with all prices on the rise. " Hopefully, they're nice people and we can get along," she thought to herself.

"Sumika, breakfast is ready!"

Her call went unanswered, to which the woman let out a sigh. Climbing the stairs she went to her daughter's room, where she found Sumika reading a book by her bed.

"Sumika, come on. Breakfast is ready. You have to go to school." Haruna said as she ruffled her daughter's hair.

The little girl gave a nod and left the book atop her bed.

Haruna couldn't help to keep gazing at the small frame of Sumika as they went back to the dining room and as they ate.

It has been four months already since they were notified of her husband's death during an accident during maintenance, as a leak in a jump unit caused an explosion when he and his team were servicing said TSF.

Ever since then, Sumika's smile grew duller and duller until one day she stopped smiling. According to the people she talked with at school, it started when one of her teachers openly badmouthed Sumika's father. Since some of the kids have been treating her harshly, calling her names and being mean to her, Sumika stopped talking with the kids in her class, choosing to remain silent most of the time.

Some people in the neighborhood called her father a failure, a disappointment to the Empire. Kids can be really cruel when they want to, and after hearing some adults insult the Kagami family, they did what kids usually do: imitate the adults, since that's what they want to be. Some teachers scolded them, others encouraged them.

The schism that had been planted in Japan was to blame. You're either loyal to the Empire or you're with the foreigners. Those who cannot meet the expectations of the Empire, those who are not useful to society, become disappointments, failures, mistakes, and are scorned by a growing part of society, that thinks that failing to meet the expectations of the Shogun equals treason, since you're wasting the trust His Highness placed on you.

While small at first, due to the increased tension between the Shogun loyalists and the American supporters, this radicalized nationalist ideas have been popping up more and more on the media and in the general population's attitude as of late.

Obviously, all of that was above little Sumika's understanding. All she saw was people being mean to her and her Dad's memory. And the more sad she got, the more the other kids wanted to bully her. Only a few stood up for her, but she was alone in her classes. So, she simply stopped talking. She didn't react when the others were mean, she didn't talk with the teachers. She was too scared to do so, because the bullying would worsen whenever she spoke up.

Once Sumika finished eating she went to get her bag, and after her Mom fixed herself they were ready to leave towards school. However, as they got out to the street, they saw a slender woman coming out of the house next door. With chestnut hair done on a single hairbun and dressed in a modest orange and white dress, the woman had a child dressed in the same uniform of Sumika's school with a rather small bag on his back. They were also going to school, and when they looked at Sumika and her mom as they approached them, the woman gave them court bow.

"Good afternoon. I believe you're my neighbor? I am Miho Shirogane. I just moved to the house next door. It's a pleasure." The woman introduced herself very politely. Haruna, however, was surprised by how pale she looked.

"Likewise. I'm Haruna Kagami, the pleasure is mine." She smiled at her new neighbor, returning the bow. "This is my daughter, Sumika. Come on, dear, introduce yourself." Sumika looks at them, not coming out from behind her, and tells them her name softly.

"My, how cute. Hello, Sumika-chan. I'm Miho Shirogane, and this is my son. Takeru, why don't you-"

The boy stepped towards the new people and with a big smile greeted them before his mother even finished speaking.

"I'm Takeru, who are you?"

Miho heaved a sigh, no longer surprised at her son's lack of manners. Haruna, however, thought it might be a stroke of luck to have another kid nearby. She held the hope that maybe the Shiroganes weren't going to judge them because of her husband's fate, and that the little boy could maybe be a friend to her daughter.

"I'm Haruna Kagami, Takeru-chan. Say, can you be friends with Sumika and play together from time to time?" The boy gave her a nod with a wide smile, and then circled towards Sumika.

"I'm Takeru, let's be friends Sumika!" He then promptly grabbed her hand and shakes it vigorously. Sumika seemed to be at a loss towards the boy, who clearly didn't care at all about her personal space.

"S-Sorry about Takeru, he really doesn't understand manners." Miho said, giving Haruna a small bow with an apologetic expression. "Takeru, come here. You're being rude."

"Why? She told me to be friendly." The boy pouted at his mother, causing her to sigh again.

"It's fine, really. It would be nice if they could get along." Haruna answered, pleased with Takeru's open friendliness. Sumika was still looking at him as he returned to his mother's side, as one hair of hers stood in attention.

"Forgive him if he ever bothers you. He just doesn't know to give others space." Miho said as she petted the little boy's head.

On the way to the school the mothers chatted along. Haruna told Miho of the layout of the district, as well as the people she should watch out for. She was surprised by her new neighbor's politeness and the general warmness of her speech. Since Haruna had gotten used to not speak much with her neighbors, she thought it was really nice to have someone like that to talk to.

However, to Haruna's surprise, Takeru kept making talk with Sumika about the smallest things. The sweets she likes, the manga she reads. She found the way he talked to be really funny, and had to cover her mouth on many occasions when he argued with his mother about how he was treating Sumika. Her daughter wasn't bothered by him, though, unlike how was around most people she met back then. The boy's earnest friendliness seemed to have piqued her curiosity, even if she feared he would be mean to her once they were in school.

"So, how old is Takeru-chan?" Haruna then asked.

"Hmm? He's turning six in a few days." Miho said with a small smile as she gazed at the boy that kept talking to Sumika with a bright expression on his face.

"So he's the same age as Sumika. So they may be going to the same grade."

" This is such a stroke of luck!" she thought. If he ended up on Sumika's class maybe they really could be friends, that's what Haruna was hoping for.

"I see. It would be nice if they could become friends." Miho said what she had just was thought of, wishing for her son to find good company in Hiiragi.

"Yes, I hope they do." So Haruna agreed to her words.

They reached the school and the little ones went their way. Miho had to remind Takeru to not be rude, to which the boy puffed his cheeks and protested again. Haruna simply petted Sumika, telling her to try to enjoy her day.

"Sigh… I hope he behaves as he should." Miho clasped her hands as she looked at them as they entered the building.

"Is he usually so relaxed?" Haruna asked, causing the chestnut haired woman to sigh.

"All the time! I can't get him to be polite no matter how much I try. He's so stubborn."

Both mothers turned around and started going back their way, and Miho chose to speak up.

"Um… Thanks for accompanying me, Kagami-san."

"No, it was a pleasure. It's been a while since I got to talk at large with a neighbor. Lately everybody has been really tense." Miho groaned in agreement.

"The news have been filled with bad omens lately. With how the IJA is falling behind in some tech program to how bad the situation looks on Asia. It's really worrying."

" Going by her face, she must have a close relative on duty. Maybe her husband?", thought Haruna. She chose to change the subject, to avoid being asked about her opinion on the whole militar situation.

"Anyways, it's really nice, this neighborhood. It might not have as many stores as the northern part of the city, but it's still really nice. And since there's the base close we're safe from any kind of thugs. By the way, did you want to ask anything in particular?" Haruna tilted her head, and Miho gave her a small nod as she scratched the back of her head.

"Yes, actually I was hoping you could point me towards a grocery store nearby. F-Forgive me for troubling you, I'm sure you must be busy." However, Haruna smiled brightly and replied amicably.

"Shirogane-san, what do you say of going together? I also have to buy some things, so if you don't mind waiting for a bit, I could tag along with you."

"I would really appreciate that, Kagami-san. But please don't go out of your way, it's alright. Just tell me where the store is, I don't wish to trouble you."

"No, no, it's fine really! Since we're neighbors, let's try to get along. You know, trust in your fellows and all that."

Haruna hoped she wouldn't be like the rest, but she chose her last words as a test, to see how she reacted. However, Miho smiled warmly, happy to have already found someone friendly in the neighborhood, and thus made a mental note to repay the favor.

"Thank you. I really appreciate your kindness."

Both mothers didn't knew it, but with this seemingly innocent exchange they had set their children's doom in motion.

Same Day. Some time after that.

(School.)

---

The bell rang and the kids joyfully relaxed on their seats. Lunch break had just started, which meant food and games, and running away from math while they were at it.

Some girls glared at Sumika, so she chose to remain sitting instead of going out of the classroom. As always. She didn't look up from her seat as she took out her lunch. Everybody would just go and play without her, and if she tried to be friendly she would only be the receiver of more pranks anyways. No matter what she did, though, they would just be mean again when it was time to go back home.

"Hey, are you okay?" A boy was standing in front of Sumika's desk. The boy she met just a few hours ago, Takeru Shirogane looked at her rather worriedly.

"… Yes." Startled by the boy's stare, she couldn't really think of an answer.

Was he already coming to be mean with her? She did saw him talk with most of the other boys, she feared he already thought like the rest.

"Can I eat lunch with you?" The boy asked. Sumika gave a timid nod and he returned a smile.

Bringing a desk closer, he sat in front of her as he took out his lunch. Takeru started talking to her, asking about the last class. He was apparently bad at math, and so was Sumika. However, she felt no malice from him, he wasn't trying to mock her. It reminded her of the school life of just a few months ago, when everyone was friendly to her. However, a question appeared on her heart as the boy smiled at her.

"… Why?" She managed to squeeze out her worry.

"Eh? Why what?" Takeru replied, brows furrowing.

"Why are you being nice?"

It wasn't the first time it happened. Someone would talk to her and be nice, only to later pull a prank on her and laugh along the rest. Why was this new boy being nice to her, when the rest of the class had wanted to talk to him too? It perplexed her, it didn't made sense to her eyes.

"Aren't we friends?" Takeru's honest answer startled Sumika again. It had been quite some time since someone called her 'friend'.

"Really? You're not lying?" She looked at him unblinking, but he smiled widely at her as he nodded.

"Yes, let's be friends. Or… you don't want to?"

Takeru was now uneasy. He was told many times he was 'rude' and some adults didn't like him for some reason. He didn't understand why people got mad at him when he was only trying to be nice. The other kids on his last school were also really mean to him, they said the samurais were bad and since his Dad worked for them, they treated him badly. Which meant he ended up being scolded for punching them, since they were insulting his Dad and the samurais.

"… No, um… Then, we're friends?" Sumika asked with bated breath.

Takeru nodded again, and began to ask her questions about her hobbies again, happy to have found a friend already. For the first time in a long time, she was enjoying her lunch break and he had another kid his age to talk to.

The rest of the classes went by quickly for Sumika and slowly for Takeru. History was something neither of them was good at, but Sumika was so really happy to have been called friend again that she didn't mind paying attention even if she didn't understand the meaning behind the names on her book, while Takeru was again complaining to himself about how useless it was to remember so many dates, making the class seem longer to him.

Some kids tried to make fun of Sumika when school was over, but Takeru scared them away to their and Sumika's surprise. He got scolded for punching two of them, but, very firmly and loudly, he retorted saying he was right to defend a friend.

This caused the teachers to again start arguing, some saying that it was wrong to allow bullying on the school, others defending the act, saying they were just drawing a line between them and 'the failure'. Both mothers took their children quickly and with a fast apology they made their way to their homes, not wanting to be part of the political debate between the teachers.

"You shouldn't punch others, but thanks for defending Sumika, Takeru-chan." Haruna petted the boy's head in thankfulness.

"Takeru, I've told you many times you don't have to get angry so quickly." Miho admonished him, causing him to yet again pout at her.

"But they were bad. Dad told me I have to stop people that are being bad." He rebuked, puffing his cheeks.

"Even so, no punching. Or I won't let you watch TV at night." The color drained from the boy's face, making Haruna laugh at his reaction.

"Um…" Sumika spoke up faintly, drawing the other's attention. "Thanks. Can we… Can we be friends?"

"But I already told you we're friends?" Takeru again tilted his head in confusion, not understanding why Sumika kept asking the same thing over and over.

Yet his honest answer startled the girl once more, who could do nothing more than stare at him as one of her hairs tensed up in surprise. She didn't understand as well. Why was he so nice with her? Why did he defend her? Sumika kept wondering about that as she gazed at him.

"Aren't you glad, Sumika?" Haruna stroked her daughter's hair softly as she smiled.

Sumika still hadn't smiled and remained with her poker face, but she was happy nonetheless. She hoped Takeru wasn't lying, she hoped that he was really her friend. He kept asking her questions about what shows she watched or what books she reads on their way home.

She diligently did her homework as usual before dinner, unlike Takeru who was slumped on the table refusing to open his history book again for the remainder of the day, much to his mother's displeasure.

Much to Sumika's surprise, his room was right by her window, so he also reached out to her before going to sleep, asking her about what she ate on dinner and telling her of the TV manga he watched before going to bed. Sumika again summoned some valor to open her lips and ask him another question that was bugging her, despite how her tiny hands were shaking, and not because of the cold of the night.

"… Aren't you scared?" She asked timidly in the middle of one of his explanations.

"Scared? Of what?" He replied dumbfounded.

"Of the others in school. If you're my friend, they'll be mean to you too." Sumika was happy to be called a friend again, but she didn't want Takeru to be treated like she was.

It made her sad to think he would also be made fun of like she was, that he would also end up alone, that he might hate her for it. In the end, all the kids on her class that were once her 'friends' stopped talking to her when the others started to being mean with her. However, Takeru tensed his brows, raised one fist and spoke loudly with little flares on his eyes.

"They're the bad ones! I'm not scared of bad people. The blue samurais don't fear them, so I don't too." The boy puffed his chest proudly. Sumika didn't understand what he meant, but was surprised to see him be so brave. "So you don't be scared, we just tell the teachers when they're being bad with us. Or we punch them."

"But your mom told you to not do that." She countered as her eyes drew a downwards arc, worried about him being scolded for helping her.

"Guh… Fine, no punching." 'I'll just kick them then!', he thought to himself as he smiled. "But anyways! I'll lend you some of my mangas later." He said, hoping to have someone to talk about his favorite books.

"R-Really?"

"Yes! I'll share them with you if you want. Or we can read them together on Sunday."

The two little ones kept talking for a while, until Miho came to check up on Takeru. The boy then said his good nights and closed his curtains after waving at her one last time with yet another of those wide smiles. Sumika remained by the window, her nose barely above the lower frame, thinking about him. Before going to sleep, she looked up at the night sky, wishing this day wasn't a dream, hoping Takeru wouldn't end up being mean to her.

Since then, the two became nigh inseparable. Takeru would drive away the girls that bullied Sumika, and she would help him with his homework. He would always have a joke to make her laugh, and she would always cover him when he played a prank on the boys that bothered them. Both would read books together and share sweets and toys, to the point that sometimes the mothers and the two little ones ate dinner together in one of the houses. And they'll always spend some time talking by their windows before going to sleep.

Since then, Sumika slowly began to smile again everyday. Since then, both kids made more friends from the other classes, and so were no longer bullied anymore. Since then, Takeru always had someone to talk to when he felt alone or scared. Even if he had the tendency to show her scary things and she would end up sometimes punching his tummy too hard, they still were each other's best friend.

… Until one day, Takeru left Sumika's everyday life.

He would only come home during the weekends, full of bruises and scars. Despite his exhaustion, souvenirs for her were always on his bag, a wide smile always rose up when they met again, and he still spent his little free time with her during those days.

But he was no longer there in school or by the window. The rest of the gang were still friendly with him, they all gathered at a park to play during Sunday. But it wasn't the same. And because of that…

… Sumika couldn't help to slowly start resenting the girl Takeru always talked about when he came back. Unaware of when this started, the desire that 'Yuuhi' somehow disappeared had been sowed into her heart. She didn't realize it at the time, but she had fallen in love with him and was terribly jealous of this 'Yuuhi' who, in her eyes, had taken Takeru from her side.

So, despite the shaking of her hands, of how empty her stomach was at the time, she confronted Takeru about it once. He then told her he couldn't come back, he had to train much to follow his dream. Sumika's left speechless, she didn't want him to give up on his dream of being a samurai, but she also wished to have him by her side everyday again. However, unexpectedly to her, Takeru hugged her and made a promise. That he would always come back. That this was his home. That he wouldn't forget about her.

She was elated to hear that, all the awful feelings washed away as he tightened the hug and smiled at her as he always had done. Because it meant that his home was by her side. That he was studying away, but that he would come back. Even if it reminded her of her father's promise when he left to the army, she believed they would be able to be together one day. Even if it hurt seeing him leave every Sunday night.

She really thought her feelings would someday be reciprocated by him, and that then he would once more remain close to her, never to leave again.

… Sumika could never have thought that her affection towards him would end up fueling the blazes of what would eventually be Takeru's downfall after Yokohama fell.

She could never, not in any possible way, have thought that her pure affection would become one of the reasons, if not the core one, why the man once known as Takeru Shirogane became what many people in the Empire would refer to as a heretic samurai, why he ended up becoming something even Yuuhi was at one point terrified of.

Sumika could never have guessed that his happy memories of her would turn intowhat pushed Takeru to become the leader of the Special Investigations Brigade of the Intelligence Division of the Royal Guard, codename Swordbreakers, as he then embarked in a quest for revenge… and redemption.

[Takeru]

"So you're sure I won't get yelled at or anything?" I ask NotMarimo-chan, who narrows her eyes at me.

"Shirogane, this is not a regular situation. You can remain in the PX with your squad until the Undersecretary arrives. Sakaki, come with me."

Then, both of them leave the PX. Chizuru seemed really upset about this, going by how her brows were arched and how heavy her steps were.

"Hopefully Sakaki can deal with this task without losing her composure." Meiya watched as the two disappeared into the hallway.

"I know Chizuru-san is the leader, but why are they making her guide the politicians if Miki-san is the squad leader for today?"

"I think it's because of her standing, right?" Meiya nods at my words as she comes back into the PX.

"That it is exactly. Well, nothing we can do about that. Tamase, you're the leader now, what should we do?"

"Huh?!" Tama twitched, a sweat bead appeared on her forehead. The armband Meiya made moved slightly as she started shivering.

"Supreme Leader Tamase-sama, your orders if you may." Kei, you're just making her more uncomfortable.

"Huh? I… err… E-Everyone, remain in standby and… a-and… Haauuuwhawha…"

"Miki-san, you can do it! It's not so hard." Mikoto beamed at Tama, who sighed deeply and calmed down a bit.

"This is harder than I thought." Maybe if we had trained them with the Game Guy and the Stallion using CryRing Saga she would have gotten more used to the idea of leading.

"Fret not, it will be over before you know it. Have faith in yourself." Meiya smiled at her warmly, easing Tama's nervousness.

"Yeah… Just don't sweat it." Nodding at her, she smiles a bit.

"Hey guys… Think that's the ride?" Kei called us as she looked outside, where a figure on the sky was closing into the base.

"Oh! So that's a re-entry destroyer! I never got to see one up close." Mikoto was staring at it starry eyed. Was she so into this kind of thing last time around?

"Papa is… Papa is… Awhawhawha."

"Tamase, do not lose your composure. It is unproper to act in such a way, surely you've been taught how important poise is, right?" Meiya looked like an older sister now. Tama straightened her posture and stopped shivering.

"Yes, but I'm not… I mean…"

"So guys, shouldn't we go to the barracks?" They nod and we all look at Tama.

"Right. Tamase, your orders."

"Errr… Everyone, let's go back to the barracks."

---

A few minutes later…

---

"Let me tell you, they didn't stop talking about all of these stupid regulations that are literally useless in this day and age!" Fuming as she drew circles in the air, she then shook her head.

"It is most troubling to have such politicians on the UN, if they are the chosen ones to represent our nation in front of the international community." A hand on her air-vents, she nodded hard.

Meiya and Chizuru were talking about the guys she had to guide just a while ago, with Kei surprisingly nodding in agreement to them.

"I wonder if Miki-san will be alright."

"We gotta believe in her Mikoto. And Kasumi is with her, so she'll be fine."

"Hmm… You trust in Yashiro a lot, don't you?" Putting her hands on her waist she leans forward, staring suspiciously at me.

"Hey, cut it out. Kasumi's a friend, you know."

"Really now?" Mikoto stop being a jerk. "So, feeling fine today?"

"Yeah… Still a bit tired, though."

"What's up? Didn't get much sleep?"

"Well… Kinda."

Seeing how little me and Sumika met up was really nice, Kasumi was overjoyed at the memory. We were lucky to be underground, because the stars would have gotten so jelly of the bunny's shining smile. That went well enough, even if I didn't stay to see how Sumika reacted to the memory since I was busted.

Of course, seeing Mom that pale wasn't nice but… Since I couldn't get that out of my head, as well as why Dad was nowhere in the house… What I saw today in my dreams… wasn't pleasant at all… Why was Mom in a hospital? I don't remember her ever having health problems back in my world, or at least they never mentioned anything. Sigh…

"Hey, you sure you're okay, Takeru?"

"Yeah, I'm alright. Thanks for asking Mikoto, but I'm just a little tired, is all." She doesn't buy my excuse, looking at me top to bottom.

"Well, you should rest more, in my opinion. You have eyebags growing under your eyes, and even your tone is showing signs of tiredness. I think it would be for the best that you slept in earlier today."

"Yeah… I'd be good if I could do that. Thanks for the advice." She scratches her ear, a small grin on her.

"Hey, they're coming! Squad, line up!" Chizuru spotted them at the end of the hallway and we all formed up, awaiting them.

The Instructor, Tama's Dad, Kasumi and Tama, who was clearly tense and moving like a puppet with one string, arrived at the barracks.

"T-These are the barracks, sir. To the left are the women's rooms and to the r-right are the men's rooms." Tama looked like a robot during a short circuit.

"Oh! These barracks do look nicer than the ones on the rest of the bases I've visited. Papa is so happy for you, Tama!" He's still the same doting father here, huh? It's nice to see that hasn't changed, for her to still have that good relation with him.

Wait a sec, is he gonna do that same joke about me and Tama being together?… This will not end well. I mean, in this world they shouldn't have feelings for me, so maybe everything will be alright. Considering how this world is, if everything goes the same as before things could end up bad for us, what with the Instructor almost turning into a Super Shayan on a daily basis and the stronger views people have here.

"S-Squad, salute!" Wow, Tama did it on her own this time. We all salute, the Instructor smiling at us.

"We've been waiting for your arrival, sir!"

"These are the members of Squad 207. Allow me to tell you that they've been excelling in their training, even if they are almost more trouble than they're worth." Ouch. Marimo-chan, forgive all the cruel things I did to you. You have no idea how much I miss you right now.

"Oho… So this is Tama's squad? Oh, you're the one from before… Chizuru Sakaki-kun, right?" She then takes one step forward and bows.

"Yes, sir."

"You must be exhausted after having to endure my fellows' ramblings, they can be very obnoxious, I know." He sighs in sympathy, nodding once.

"No, sir. It was an enriching experience." You were badmouthing them just a second ago though. I see Kei holding her pockets. So she wanted to comment on that.

"I heard you are Tama's second in command, am I right?" Oh, who told him that? The Instructor is grinning, so that's how it is.

"Yes. I have relied on her sound advice many times. I cannot count the amount of favors I owe her." I would like her good will to be repaid, but alas…

"Yes, I've heard about your attitude from Tama. You're just like your Father. Stubborn, inflexible, prone to screaming, and worst of all prideful and rude. Do try to not give Tama any more problems, will you?" Wow, she's holding it pretty good. Despite her trembling eyes, she's maintaining her posture.

"Y-Yes, sir. I'll do my best." She takes a step back and rejoins the line. As she does she shoots a glare at Tama, who starts quivering. Kasumi pets her head a bit, trying to calm her down.

"Now, you would be…"

"I'm Mikoto Yoroi, sir." Please try not to cry…

"Oh, yes. You're the happy one. The one who's always smiling and making everybody laugh with her eccentric quips." Phew, so this time she wrote nice things about- "And the one who's surprisingly flatter than Tama." Dammit Tama!

"Y-You know how much… Waaahhh!" Off she goes, leaving a trail of tears in her wake.

Tama keeps shivering while Kasumi keeps petting her. The Instructor is holding her mouth, so even she's finding this hilarious. How odd, she rarely ever shows us anything other than anger.

"Hm? What a strange fellow." One of his brows raises, his tone a bit confused. "Now, you would be…"

"Kei Ayamine."

"Oh, yes. You're the strong one of Tama's squad, right?"

"You're Tama too." Kei, no! "Nice mustache, by the way." Dammit! Why must this always go so poorly?

"Hey! Do not talk back to the Undersecretary!" Tama suddenly snapped and yelled at Kei. Oh God, she's twitching.

"Forgive me, Squad Leader." She's narrowing her eyes at Tama, who flinches back.

Tama, you're so dead. Kasumi nods at me, that means Kei is gonna have her revenge on her, huh.

"Well, I've heard you're quite a mystery and that you usually do your own thing. Do try to not get in Tama's way. You don't want to be like Sakaki-kun, right?" Double kill! I don't know who was more offended by that.

"… Yes, sir." Brows furrowed real tight, she stomps back into the line.

"Then, who's next? Oh, you must be…"

"I am Meiya Mitsurugi, sir." She steps up, saluting him.

"Hmm… Yes, I can see it. Hmm…"

"Do you not have anything to say about me, sir?"

"No, you see, I'd like my head to remain above my shoulders."

"I see?" She tilted her head, clearly not understanding his words.

Like, what did Tama even write about Meiya? I understand the guy not wanting to make jokes about a potential relative of the Shogun… But still, what the hell did she write?

"But well, seeing you here is a relief. Now I know why Tama could keep her hair like this." He nodded as a grin appeared on his face.

"Pa… I mean, Undersecretary that has nothing to do with her."

"Hey, Sakaki… What are they talking about?"

"Hm? You know, of why Mitsurugi and Tamase get to keep those ridicu…" Stopping short, she taps her glasses. "I mean, long haircuts without nobody saying anything." Am I missing something here?

"Sir, in this base we are allowed to maintain our personal appearance as we please, so long as it doesn't go against the dress code of the UN." The Instructor explains to him. I didn't knew we had a dress code here, since we get handed our uniforms after all.

"Oh, I see. Shame it's not the same in my office… Sniff… I do miss my old mustache from time to time." A single tear runs down his cheek. Wait… His old… You're telling me he had that same flamboyant mustache in this world?!

"Papa, don't be sad. Someday you'll be able to have it like that again." Tama beamed at her father, he smiled widely.

"Oh! Tama, my dear! You've no idea how happy I am that you can keep your do! Forgive Papa for making you go through so many hardships."

"No, Papa it's not your fault!" I feel like I'm missing something important here.

"Why is he so sad about that? What happened to him?" I look at the rest, who just make complex expressions at me.

"Don't ask me, we try to not pry into each other's business, remember?" Chizuru shrugged me off.

"He took an arrow to the mustache." Kei, are you being serious?

"Hm? What was that?" Crap, he heard us… "So you've told them about your bow skills, Tama? You must trust in them a lot." He smiles warmly at her, who starts fidgeting.

"Wait… Bow?"

"Oh right, you didn't know." Chizuru smiles, again tracing circles in the air. "Tamase is really good with a bow. We always used to poke fun at her, about how she should use a bow instead of a gun when we had just started basic." So this world's Tama was also good with a bow?

"Tamase is really good. But maybe Tama Elder hit himself in the face and lost his mustache like that." Kei smiles as she strokes her chin.

"Hey! Ayamine-san, no disrespect to the Undersecretary!" The kitty hisses, Kei narrows a gaze back at her and she recoils down to normal. Oh Tama, you cute little thing…

"Oh! You look so graceful when you give orders, my Tama. Papa wants to see you give some more orders, go ahead!" And he immediately invigorates the flame back up, huh.

"Hey you! If you've nothing better to do, go scrub the latrines!"

Why do you always point at Kasumi?! And why do you always obey without protesting?! Kasumi looks at me and smiles, then leaves towards the baths. Sigh… What the actual fuck? I was kinda worried things would spiral out of control in this world, but this is still as chaotic as always and everybody is cool with it. What the hell, seriously.

"You look so mature. Papa is kinda sad, my cute little daughter is becoming a woman…"

"Papa, don't say that. It's embarrassing!" The Instructor smiles at her, same for Kei and Chizuru. However, Meiya was looking away.

"And you're the last one… Takeru Shirogane, am I right?" Let's do this! The HSST is coming at us right now probably, so I just gotta endure it.

"Yes, sir!" I step forward. His gaze observes me all over, this is actually a bit embarrassing.

"I've heard many great things from you. You're strong, smart, driven, and kind above all else. Tama has mentioned how many good deeds you've done for the squad, and how you've helped them to improve in the short time you've spent with them."

"No, sir. I've just been doing my best efforts to not fall behind."

"And modest, to boot! You wouldn't happen to also know how to shoot a bow, would you?"

"Huh? I mean… No, I do not." I almost said yes. I do know how, but I don't know if this world's me also knew how to. So shut up, myself.

"Well, you can't be perfect after all. However, I heard you gave Old Man Mooroka a run for his money during an interrogation, not many people can do that. Your grit is most remarkable!"

"Thank you, sir."

"Hmm… Yes, you'll do just fine. Please Shirogane-kun, keep supporting Tama and standing by her side from now on, as you have been doing so far." Ah, yes. Here we go. "Let's practice for awhile, try calling me Papa!" A wide smile, welcoming and without any hidden spike or anything.

Now that I think about it, his attitude towards me is the complete opposite to that of my world's version of him. What the hell, yet again.

TUG

"Shirogane-kun, could you explain what he means?" Chizuru, please do not get so upset.

"I mean, shouldn't we ask Tama about-"

AGGRESSIVE TUG!

"Takeru, I have something to ask of you. Worry not, it shan't take long."

Meiya and Chizuru look even more pissed off than how they usually were in my past loops. Meiya's eyes were blazing purple again while Chizuru's glistened red as her hair rose up, snakes coming out of her twintails. Why?! I could maybe understand Chizuru, but you were getting all paranoid a few days ago! Why is the fire pouring out like when you sent me to that damned mountain?!

"Awhawhawha…" And now she's completely tilted, too.

"C'mon, guys. Don't go overreacting. I'm sure Tama has an explanation for this." My shoulders try to, very subtly, edge away, the crushing claws keep me firmly in place.

"Hm? I got the impression there was something between you two from Tama's letters, am I wrong?" Yes! Yes, you are!

"Undersecretary." Oh? What is Kei planning to do? "You misunderstood. There is nothing between them." Meiya's and Chizuru's grasp on my shoulders eased a bit. "And it's because they're so close, that there is literally nothing between them." God-fucking-dammit Kei! Don't smile at me like that! What about getting along and all that jazz?!

"Oho… So they have already gone that far…" He closes his eyes and caresses his mustache.

"Takeru, could you please explain what this means?" Meiya, dear, my bones don't bend that way. Her eyes, full of purple flames, resembled those of a dragon.

I really do not like it when she gets jealous. I still wonder why she's being so obvious about it, what data leaked into her?

"Tamase, why didn't you give us the happy news?" Chizuru went and addressed Tama in a small and slow whisper. Tama then seemed to suddenly become interested on the floor, doing a pendulum arc back and forth as she remained groaning.

"Sakaki-kun, don't make trouble for the Squad Leader." Kei poked the wolf, gaining a glare and a bark from Chizuru.

"Ayamine, I am just asking for confirmation on what the Undersecretary is saying."

"… Really now?"

"What are you implying now?"

"You're just jelly because you can't get Special-kun's special milk." Kei said in a mocking tone as she moved her closed hand up and down, closer and closer to her lips with each swing, which made Tama and Chizuru turn into tomatoes. The Instructor couldn't hold it in and I heard a noise escape her lips.

But… But… Dammit, that's embarrassing. On one hand, I'm happy she's willing to joke around like this. On the other, I really wouldn't like her to start making this kind of jokes often. It's hard enough to remain cool after they started being nice, being reminded of our intimacy is only gonna make me miss 'em more. And who knows how they'll react to that in the first place. Imagine Kei suddenly having dreams of us together after all we did to finally start over.

"Takeru, what is Ayamine talking about?" Meiya was the only one who didn't get it. You sweet cinnamon roll…

"Don't ask. It's better for you to not know." Especially considering the memory business, and how dear your duty is to you here. But then, she pouted as she heard my answer, her hands deeply rooted into her forearms.

"Why is that? If you have access to a special type of milk, I would very much like to try it. I've heard that milk is usually processed to have many different nutrients, so if it isn't much trouble, could you spare a cup of your milk for me?"

She can't… I heard that wrong, right? There is no way that she asked me that with a straight face.

"Pfft… Ahahahahah!" The Instructor couldn't hold it in anymore and started laughing.

"Hmm? Why is she laughing in such manner?" Meiya tilted her head, looking at the Instructor.

"Mitsurugi, you… Do you know what you just said?" Chizuru's face was completely red. Even Kei was blushing a bit.

"Ayamine, this is your fault." I send a scowl at her, and she ignores me as she closes her eyes and stretches a hand forward.

"Unexpected collateral damage. It was fun to hear, though."

"You can't just say things like that! Look what Mitsurugi said because of your joke!" Chizuru was stomping the tip of her foot in the ground. Kei shrugs, which makes her even more angry.

"Um… Can any of you tell me what is the problem? Takeru, is there any reason why you cannot give me some of this milk of yours?" Shut up, dammit! I should be worried about the HSST, not you! Ugh, I can tell my face is completely red by now.

What am I gonna do if Tsukuyomi-san is keeping tabs on you and heard this?! I'm dead! Screw the memory business, I'm dead! They'll assume I want to corrupt Meiya, and if she sees any other of our intimate moments, that might as well be true. If that happens, then Yuuhi is so gonna come for my head and cream me like a… No! Not like that, brain! God-fucking-dammit, myself! In no feasible way would Yuuhi and I ever do anything of the sort! What the hell am I thinking, defiling her like this?! Where the hell did that come from, anyways? Damned teenage hormones, making me imagine Her Highness in that way.

Meiya groans at my silence, a finger tapping her arm. Placing a hand over my eyes, I sigh and shake my head, unable to hold her gaze anymore, feeling a shiver on the back and down, as the Instructor keeps laughing.

"Awhawha, someone stop Mitsurugi-san!" Already on it, Tama.

"M-Meiya, I forbid you from ever bringing this up ever again."

"Eh? But… But why can't you-"

"Wahahahaha! Tama, your squad can really put up a nice act, can't they? Ahahaha!" His loud laughter, along the Instructor's, left us baffled. Is he doing this to spare us the embarrassment?

"Oh… Yes, sir. It was merely an act to show you how good we get along." Nice reaction Tama. Oh, Mikoto's back.

"Hey guys… Hm? What happened?" She stared with a finger on her lips at the blushing faces of the rest and the laughing adults on the side.

"Don't ask Mikoto. Just don't."

"Thank God Yoroi didn't heard that." Me and Chizuru share a sigh.

"Hm? Hey, what happened? Meiya-san, why is everybody acting so strange?"

"I do not know. Takeru refuses to tell me why he can't share with me some-"

"Mitsurugi, when quiet you're prettier." Kei put one finger over Meiya's mouth, saving the day.

"Well, let us continue with the tour then!" And as Tama's Dad prepared to move…

---

Thank you HSST, for saving me from this awkward moment. May Tsukuyomi-san have missed this little argument. Otherwise, they'll come for my he… life without a doubt.

"This alarm…" The girls look in shock at the red sirens.

"Undersecretary, DEFCON 2 has just been declared. It seems a destroyer lost control and is going to fall near us. Please accompany me to the underground command room." The Instructor apparently received her orders from a communicator.

"I see. What will be of the Cadets?"

"I do not know. For the time being, they should-"

"Surface Pilot Cadet Squad 207th. Assemble immediately in Briefing Room N°2. I repeat-"

"They're calling us to the briefing room?!" Chizuru's yell was mired by fear. The rest also looked petrified on the spot, as if they also had forgetten how to breathe.

"What is the meaning of this?! Ugh, Yuuko!" The Instructor sighed as she strokex the top of her head, drawing hard circles. "Squad! Head to the briefing room on the double!"

"Roger!"

"Take care, Tama." Tama's Dad took one last look at her before leaving.

"Y-Yeah… I'm off."

---

Some moments later.

---

Sensei's explanation went by just as I remember it, with the Undersecretary chiming in midway, until she revealed the OTH

Cannon.

"This is one of this base's greatest weapons, the OTH Cannon. It's already assembled, ready to fire. We'll take it down with this."

"Professor, the OTH Cannon isn't an anti-air weapon! It doesn't-" As before, the Instructor's complains are drowned by Sensei's chuckling.

"Oh yes, it can do it. This is our best bet, after all. And we did improve our base's equipment not so long ago." She sent a brief glance at me, a smirk in her face.

Right, the new radars and sensors will help Tama with more accurate data on her Fubuki, even when the Fubuki itself cannot be upgraded. We now could also indirectly help Tama's aim by upgrading her TSF's auto-aiming data with that of the training units we have been developing here.

I mean, I did say that the auto-lock wasn't good enough, and Sensei did want me to prove her how good going manual was, but I didn't expect her to try to improve the response time of the automatic aim systems too. Is that why I didn't miss most of my attacks during Niigata? Just how good are those new sensors? I'll have to read the docs throughly when I get the chance.

Sensei explains to the rest how the OTH works, it sounds exactly the same as what I remember. Except something about how she improved the shell's CPU to make it more accurate. Did she use something from Alt. IV, just like she did for the XM3? Maybe she was running against the clock to get that done, and it's why she's so tired.

"Professor! What are you saying?! Tamase is still a mere Cadet!" Glad to see the Instructor doesn't just go along with this mad plan, even if it is our best bet.

They start going back and forth again. Tama is clearly shaking now, holding her shoulders tightly. Eventually, the Instructor submits to Sensei's plan and faces us. With an expression far more grim and pale than I ever thought I'd see in her.

"The fate of this base… is in your hands now, Tamase." The rest hold their breaths, Tama seems to have stopped breathing as she stood frozen in place.

"No… I can't… I'm not… I'm…"

"If the Professor has chosen you above all the pilots in this base, it means you're our best bet to avoid this crisis." She tried to pat Tama's shoulder, but then she moved backwards. Still quivering, she retreated away from us and the Instructor.

"I can't… I can't protect you. I'll fail…"

"Tama, please calm down. Listen to Papa, you can do it. You've been training for this, haven't you?" He tried to get near her, but she kept moving away towards the door.

"Tamase, keep wasting your time and the whole base is going to disappear. Your father right there will die too. Do you want that to happen?" Sensei, as usual, had no intention to sugar coat the situation we're in.

"I can't do it!" Tama sprints away, not even stopping at her Father's hand.

He looks at the door, grimacing at Tama's reaction. The rest are all clearly staring hatefully at Sensei. Sighing, I rub my eyes. It might be for the best to not have Sensei halt this accident, but… it's not pleasant to go through this either.

"… Professor, I do think you're going too far." The Instructor sent a scornful gaze at Sensei, who returned one full of stalagmites.

"Marimo, that only matters if we survive."

"Professor… Why can't we evacuate? Or have someone else shoot it down?" Mikoto stepped up, despite her shaking hands.

"Even if we evacuated, the secondary wave would scorch us to death, and it's not like we have the time to get many people under B10F in less than fifteen minutes. As for why it has to be Tamase, it's because she has the best numbers. She is the number one sniper not only from this base but from the whole Far East Defense Line, I am not exaggerating. But I will only wait five minutes for her, I do have other pilots. However, do let me tell you that this will reflect negatively in your resumes, to run away from duty like this. Now, go and see if you can find her and bring her to Hangar 16. I'll be waiting."

"Everyone, let's go!" I scream as I leave the briefing room.

Before I left, Sensei gave me a faint smile. Everything is under control, huh? Regardless, it has to be Tama. Otherwise, her self-esteem will plummet if she runs away now. Not only for the Kashgar mission but for her own growth as well, she has to surpass that fear.

All of us take a different area, I rush towards Tama's room in the barracks.

"Tama, are you there?" With the sirens booming around, I enter the dark room.

"… What should I do?" I turn the lights on and she her shivering on her chair.

And on the desk, there were the sauntpaulias. Our flowers, the ones that brought us together. Memories of our times, both in my world and in the other loops come back to me. As well as her ends. When she was devoured by the Tanks, when the Superior turned her into a Soldier-Class, when a light post squashed her beyond recognition. Tama…

"Hey. How're you feeling?" I slowly approach her, she's still crying.

"… I'm scared. I can't do this."

"Nice flowers, by the way. It's a wonder they grew so much in a place like this." She looked up with her reddened and teary eyes.

"… Papa gave me the seeds when I enlisted here. They're called sauntpaulias, it took a lot of time for them to bloom. Actually, they got sick not so long ago. They almost withered."

"That's a relief."

"I don't know about that." Huh? Her voice sounded broken, is she not happy that they didn't die?

"Why do you say that? Didn't you take care of them a lot?"

"… They remind me of my Mom. And that makes me sad sometimes."

Her mother? Now that I think about it… I never met her Mom, and they never talked about her when I got into a relationship with her. I don't really remember that much from our relationship back in my world, so I have no idea what kind of woman she was.

"But… You didn't like your Mom?" She rises her head, frowning as I never saw her do, and I unconsciously take a step back.

"Of course I did! She was… I adored her. She was always tending to the flowers in the gardens, back when all of this war was so far away." She again hugs her sides as her gaze sinks lower and lower.

"Then, don't you want to protect that memory?"

"… I can't do it." She slumps into her seat again.

"Tama, I think you can do it. I've seen your progress, I think you have what it takes to rise up to the occasion." I try to speak softly and crouch near her seat. Our eyes meet and the distorted light within her gaze makes my heart tear up inside.

"… Why? Why do you believe that? You could do it instead of me, you're so much better."

"I'm not as good as you. The TSFs have proved that, I'm decent but you're a natural. Have some faith in yourself, Tama."

"I can't do it! I just took my first piloting run, I get… really anxious all the time. If it weren't for the auto-lock, I'm sure I would miss all of my shots. I can't even think, I just shoot! My hands get all sweaty, I can feel this pounding in my head… If you all weren't by my side… Someone like me can't protect anyone."

"Nobody can protect its own life alone, though."

"Huh?" She looks at me again, I wipe the tears of her eyes before continuing.

"Someone once told me that, in my old squad. I don't think it's a bad thing to feel fear, we all get really scared from time to time. Hell, when I started I was such a failure, if my whole squad hadn't got together to get me in form I wouldn't be here today. It's not a sin to rely on others, Tama. Because I'm sure the rest feel the same, they're also anxious and nervous. And because you're behind them, they can rush forward without fear." She shakes her head as she hugs her sides tighter.

"That's wrong. No one could feel safe with me…"

"The flowers do, though. And anyways, we can't run or hide. We gotta face this head on, and I believe you're our best bet, so at the very least I feel safe with you." I smile at her as I get closer, she looks at me, tears falling from her cheeks.

"That's not… I can't…"

"Tama, even if you don't, the Professor can get someone else to do it. But there is a reason she chose you above everyone on the base, think about it. If whoever takes the shot fails, wouldn't you regret it?

It's a great responsibility, to defend the whole base. But isn't that what you've been training for? Even if it's fighting the BETA, shooting down an HSST, or defending a base, didn't you train because you wanted to protect something?" I reach out for her head, to try to calm her down. However, she knocks my hand away quite strongly, making me fall backwards.

"SHUT UP!"

"Eh? T-Tama?" Her shout caught me off guard, her eyes were sharp, she was angry as I haven't seen her ever be. I remained still on the ground as a monster spawned itself within Tama's eyes.

"What do you know about me?! What do you know about war?! You were living in America, what do you know of this war?! Don't talk to me like that when you haven't lost anyone close to… Ah…" She stops shouting and starts to cry again as she turns away from me. What did… happen to her?

"Tama, you mentioned your mother a while ago. Does that have anything to do with this?" I slowly get up, minding my distance.

"… Please leave."

"Is that what you truly want?" She nods slowly. "Well… Take it easy then. I'll go shoot that thing down. Or fail miserably at it."

"… Eh?"

I turn back and try to leave but I feel a tug on my back.

"… Why? Why would you do it? It's impossible… W-We're just Cadets, we can't…"

"Tama, there is always a way to make things happen, just that sometimes we can't see it right away."

"But why? Why would you… still try to do something so… so…" She chokes on her sobs, unable to finish.

"You know… I lost everything I had before coming here."

"Huh? You lost… everything?"

How many loops? How many times? How many lives? I don't even know anymore.

"… My base was attacked by the BETA, everyone on my squad died. I was the sole survivor, so I decided that I would fight to bring some peace to the world they left behind." Though it's actually worse than that, since I have my world's blood on my hands now too along all the fuck ups during my loops in the Betaverse. Both from the time I ran away and from this time.

"Your base… Your squad… But then, why did you come here? Why didn't you stay in America?"

"Because this is the place where I can help the most. Someone I respect a lot told me that those who wish to bring forth a change in this world must not look away from their responsibilities and must not waver when they have to bloody their own hands. I don't want to lose everything again, I wouldn't be able to live with myself if that happened. I don't know what you went through, and I won't lie to you. I don't understand you, everything won't be alright, and all of us will be dead in around ten minutes if we do nothing. So, if you think about it, doing something and failing equals the same as doing nothing, right?" I turn around and smile at her, her eyes oscillate around the room.

"What are you trying to say?"

"Is is really the same, though? Even if you failed, do you think we would hate you? We wouldn't have the time, I assure you. But, even if we will disappear, even if this is where we die, I want to live. So, even if I fail, at the least I'll know that I tried and I won't die with the weight of the 'what if' in my heart. I'll take it all in and break through my fears, because I have something worth protecting here."

"… You're strong. I'm not. I couldn't possibly…" She shivers as she wipes the tears off her face.

"Nah, I'd say I'm an idiot who doesn't understand the situation. And even then, I still believe you would be better for this." Looking up at me, shivering a bit, her lips tremble. "Tama, I believe in you. If these are our last minutes alive, would you rather be here, alone in the darkness? Or do you want to protect this base, or at least your father?"

"I… I can't. I'll just…" Her breathing gets rugged.

There's no point in pushing her more. I don't know what's different this time, but she can't do it.

"Alright. Forgive me for being so pushy. I gotta get to the hangar. Bye Tama." I move towards the door and get back to the hallway.

"… Wait."

Tama had her eyes closed with both hands grabbing the ribbon of her uniform, slowly walking out of her room.

"Shirogane-san, do you truly think… I can save Papa? Do you really believe in me?"

"Yeah, I do. And even if it isn't you who takes the shot, if we fail it's all the same. But do you want to be the one to protect him? Do you want to stop that HSST?"

"… Yes. S-So… even if I fail… You all won't hate me?" Tears again fall from her face, what the hell happened to her in this world?

"At the very least, I won't." She takes a deep breath, she's still doubting.

… The Nucleus did seem to be causing some weird stuff in them lately, right? Making Meiya be jealous, even making Chizuru get so bothered by my comment about her eyebrows. Let's see if I can make that work on my favor. I get close to her and crouch in front, diving my gaze into her eyes.

"Say Miki. Why do you want to fight?" She twitches at my question.

"… Eh? Why? I… I wanted to…"

"You don't have to tell me if you don't want to. But let me tell you why I fight. I want to someday recover my peace."

"Peace?" She makes a conflicted expression as she tries to drive back the tears that just don't stop coming out of her eyes.

"Yeah. I'd like to live long enough to see a world with some semblance of peace back. That's why I would go and try to shoot that thing down, that's why I came here instead of staying in America. Now, I don't know why you fight, but let me ask you something. Would you like to see those flowers blossoming somewhere under the sun?" I try to recall those two years we spent together on that other world. Where we planted the sauntpaulias on the base and got them to bloom.

"I… I don't know… I'm just…"

"Take the HSST out of the picture. Even if just for a little while. Would you like to have your own garden?"

"… Yes. I… do want to. But now…" She's no longer shaking. Please Miki… I grab one of her hands, running a finger on her palm.

"So you do want to have a garden. You can't have that if the HSST falls now." She shakes her head, now looking down but not pulling away. "And we've just begun to get along in the squad. It would be a damn shame if it ended now."

"Yeah… But… I'm scared…"

"All of us are. If that thing hits, then… all we've done will be for nothing. And we're putting the safety of this place on your shoulders.

But I'm sure you can go out there and take that son of a bitch down if you put your mind to it." She stares at me, distorted by the tears those eyes of her are having a storm inside of them right now.

"… Do you really think I can do it?"

"Yes, I believe in you. And if you're too scared, you can just shout your fear away!"

"Shout?"

"I normally joke around when I'm nervous, but shouting works too. I frankly just keep pushing on, to someday live peacefully again. I'll despair after I'm dead."

"Despair after you're dead?"

"Yeah. Today's too nice to let my gloom freeze me, even if I can't help but to be scared from time to time." I stand up, not breaking eye contact nor letting her hand go, this time entwining my fingers with hers. "Miki, would you like to have a garden again?"

"… Yes."

"And you want to protect your Dad?" She nods. "Then, you know what you should do if that's the case. Go up there, and strike that damn thing into the sea. For the base, yeah, but for your own dreams too." Letting her hand go, I then pat her head for a second. "We're all going to be there with you, no matter what. That's what comrades are for, after all."

She closes her eyes and takes a deep breath. Then opening her eyes, she takes a single, but hard, step forward.

"L-Let's go. I… I'll do it. I will… I will protect Papa! And all of you! I won't… I won't let anyone die! And someday… I'll show him a new garden, like the one we had before." She wipes her tears and shouts loudly.

Despite her shaking frame, her eyes burned with a passion that I've rarely seen in her. Did my little bet work? Regardless, it's good to see her out of that swamp.

"Alright then, we better hurry up. We gotta get to the hangar before the Professor picks someone else."

"Ah! Yes, let's hurry!"

"Well, come here." Getting closer, I then lift her off the ground, carrying her on my arms.

"Huh? A-Ah, wait! Shirogane-san!"

"We're short on time, so I'm gonna rush to the hangar. Hold on tight, Miki." I smirk at her as she trembles, wrapping her arms around my neck as I start to sprint.

"Awawa! Y-You're going too fast!"

"Don't worry, you just hold on. And… Thanks Miki, for being so brave for us." Looking into her eyes and smiling, the hold on my neck tightens as she nods, lips quivering as if it were snowing.

"No… Thank you, for believing in me."

---

A few minutes after that…

---

After taking her to the hangar, the Instructor took me to the rooftop where we all gathered again, just like during the first loop. The sun almost halfway under the horizon, the afterglow already setting in, the cold breeze rustling over and moving the reddening clouds, not a word was being spoken. When they saw me and the Instructor come in, the four of them quickly got closer.

"So you made it just in time, Takeru." Meiya smiles at me as she passes me my transceiver. "Is Tamase alright?"

"Yeah, I think she'll be fine. She was really shaken, I tell you, but she agreed on her own. Don't worry, Tama's got this." Smirking at them, all of them also do the same.

"Good boy." Kei, I'm happy that you're happy, but don't pet me like that.

"Sigh… I really hope she's not forcing herself…" Tapping her glasses, she looks at the Fubuki that just appeared on the railway.

"Yeah, it is really unfair to place this on Miki-san's shoulders… To give her that experimental cannon and all…"

All of us then stood by the fence, looking at the weapon and its wielder as we waited. Of course, the rest are tense as hell and super surprised to see the OTH. All I can do is hope… she can push through whatever the hell this world did to her.

"Cadet Tamase, are you ready?" Sensei's voice rings on my ears, the others stiffen up as well.

"Ready anytime!" Tama's firm voice replied.

Sensei gave her the explanation and finishes it with an 'Impress your father, Squad Leader Tamase.", nothing goes unnoticed in this base, huh? So far so good, we still have enough time to fire three shots.

"Loading first shell. Aligning shot. Checking target's trajectory… All green." Tama's voice showed no hint of hesitation. No trace of what had made enough tears to fill up a hive leave her eyes.

"Firing in ten, nine…" Pyatkh announced the countdown, and as if in sync everybody seemed to have forgotten how to breathe. "… Three, two, one…"

BOOM!

And there goes the first shot. Tama loads the second shell.

"Impact in ten, nine… two, one… Target Intact!" She notifies us, clearly tense. No changes to that, huh?

"Two more shots…" Mikoto holds both hands together in a prayer-like pose tightly.

"She can do it." Kei was also tense as she gazed at the sky.

"Actualizing data… Aligning shot…" C'mon Tama, you can do it! After the countdown the second shot is fired, roaring into the reddening skies.

"Impact in ten, nine, eight… two, one… Target Intact! 115 seconds before impact!"

And it also missed. Just like during the first loop.

"Tamase…" The Instructor took off her transceiver and bit her lips. Even if she is super harsh with us, she still seems to at least care.

"You look extremely calm, Takeru."

"Hm? Of course I am, Meiya. Because Tama's gonna take that thing down." She smirks as she heard my answer.

"You have complete faith in her, huh?"

"Don't we all?" The rest finally sigh and recover a small smile.

"Everyone… I will not miss, I was just getting used to this cannon. Next shot… will hit."

"Go for it, Tama!"

"Yes!"

We all look at the sky as Pyatkh announces the countdown for the last shot. Tama takes one last breath and shoots, the rumbling shaking the air one last time.

BOOM!

And as the deafening sound left our ears, as the rest held their hands hard enough to make mountains out of their knuckles… The good news arrived.

"The target has been hit! I repeat, the target has been hit!" Pyatkh said, eliciting a shout from Mikoto and sighs from the rest.

"Great job, Tamase." The Instructor says, back to her usual tone.

"N-No, I could do this because everybody was here…

"Nah, this was all you, Tama. You saved our backs, girl!" She begins to stutter a reply, a sweetheart through and through.

"Yeah, that! You were awesome, Miki-san!" A few tears came out of her eyes, the others finally chuckled at her reaction.

"We're back to DEFCON 4. All units, stand by until further orders are given." Sensei ordered, finally releasing us from this event.

The cockpit of the Fubuki down below opened once it knelt, Tama waved at us from there. We returned it, Mikoto shouting again, until the Instructor took us, and dragged Mikoto, back into the base.

Sigh… We avoided this incident, and Tama managed to do it on her own. Finally… A good roll on the dice.

"This inspection was much more lively than I expected thanks to all of you. As a father, I have not enough words to thank you. Tama, you must cherish these friends you've made no matter what may come."

"Yes, I will."

"And I hope you don't give Squad Leader Sakaki more trouble from now on."

"Eh?!" The rest look surprised. Of course he knew.

"And also… I hope you can find here a path you can walk confidently. Cadet Mitsurugi, please look after her. I'm sorry to impose on you like this, despite my standing." Huh? What's this about? The rest look surprised too, except Meiya.

"It is no trouble. She is a valuable friend, of course I'll look after her." Tama's Dad smiles from ear to ear.

"I see. Tama, take care. And all of you too, good luck in your training."

"Salute!" We all salute him as he boards his ride and it takes off. Tama's hand was shaking a bit, her eyes never leaving his back as he moved to board the HSST.

It must be hard, to just say goodbye like this. But in a way, that is also a blessing. Because someday there will be no more goodbyes to say. Just like how my Tama is gone forever, someday even this fragile gaze of understanding between them will crumble. Someday… her only family will be gone, forever.

To stall that moment for as long as I can, and to do the same for the rest of the squad… That is why I'm here. To lead them to a better life after the war… and try to give them something to work forward afterwards. Sigh…

At least this went well enough. And if I again prevent Alt. V, he won't die either. Even if she's not with me… she'd still have her family and her own dreams.

"Shirogane-kun, what's wrong?"

"Huh?"

"You look so serious, are you alright?" Chizuru looked at me worriedly. I suppose that I was being too quiet.

"I mean… I was just thinking about how nice it is that they can still say their goodbyes, even if they can just salute each other."

"… I see." Chizuru, who lost her mother, must know what I'm talking about here.

"Miki-san, you were amazing! What you took down was even smaller than that!" Mikoto hugged Tama tightly. A lil' bit too… Hey stop! You're choking her!

"Mikoto, for the love of God, control yourself!"

"Well, sorry! I can't be as calm as you! She literally saved the base from being hit by something even smaller than that shuttle!" She waves her arms around as I pull her away from Tama.

"Great, now she's nervous again."

"Tamase, you performed admirably. You truly are the Far East's best sniper!" Meiya smiles at her, rubbing her back trying to calm Tama down.

"Mitsurugi, that's wrong." For Kei to contradict Meiya…

"Hm? How is it wrong?"

"She's our sniper. That's what counts. Good job, Tamase." She again starts petting Tama's head.

"Haaauuu… You're gonna make me cry again."

"Tamase, you saved all of us. Be more proud of yourself!" Chizuru patted her shoulders making her finally smile again.

"Thank you. I was actually… really nervous. I could do it… because you were all there, believing in me, giving me courage. I won't hold you back anymore, I'll do my best from now on. So…"

"Tamase, you're always doing your best. Don't cry and look up proudly! You've proved your worth today." The Instructor smiles at her, and after seeing that Tama regained her composure, she turned around and returned to the base, not without giving us a warning. "I think you probably know, but keep the matter of the OTH a secret. As well as all about this little mission." We nod, saluting her.

After returning the gesture, she leaves with a smirk on her face. Then, Mikoto starts hugging Tama again.

"Miki-san, you definitely were awesome today! We're gonna have to improve to catch up to you!"

"No, that's not true!" She was again blushing as Mikoto laughed.

"Yoroi is right. We all have to make our best efforts in the mock battles that will come. We can't hold back Tamase after all." Chizuru winks at her, making Tama look downwards as a blush stronger than the sunset made its way to her face.

"Thank you everybody. Really." She looks at us with shining eyes. Her complexion is the complete opposite of the one she had when she shouted at me, now making the first stars a bit jelly of her smile.

"No. Thank you for protecting us, Tama." She again smiles as she makes a little fist pump.

"But really, your dad is as cheerful as you!" Mikoto comments as we return into the base.

"Yeah, Papa is always trying to smile through all the hard stuff."

"I didn't knew he was someone so important. Forgive all those times I talked down to you, Tamase." Chizuru gives her a small bow, making Tama nervous again. Talking about her Dad…

"By the way, why did he ask you to look out for her, Meiya?" She opens her eyes wide and looks away in a hurry.

"Eh? I'm… I think I shouldn't say." She caressed her ponytail as she looked away.

"It's alright, Mitsurugi-san. I'll tell them myself." Tama stops in her tracks and steps towards the rest of us. She closes her eyes and takes a deep breath, then she timidly looks up at us. "I am… well… The thing is… My family… is part of the Tozama. We are… or rather were direct servants of the Shogun, when she still was only the head of the Koubuin House."

Chapter 44 : Underlying Shadows

[Takeru]

---

The base had gone back to normal, some more soldiers doing patrols outside as the sole difference. While some whispers filled the busy hallways, no one really knew what had happened in detail. And as the afterglow faded into dusk, the gazes of many curious onlookers rested on our shoulders since they had heard Sensei's call for us during the alarm.

Luckily enough, we were given the rest of the day free while the other soldiers had to remain on standby, and due to Sensei's permission I also was allowed to join in the PX, as an extraordinary exception due to the events that transpired.

We were all sitting on our usual table, us six being the only ones on the PX save for the kitchen staff that was prepping up the dinner for the soon-to-come horde of famished soldiers. Kyozuka-san brought dinner for the girls, giving them a smile and making chitchat about their trainings. Sadly, I had to make due with what I had in the paper bag, because obviously all I got from her was a scowl as if she were smelling rotten food. Sigh…

Tama coughed after we ate for a while, hesitating on taking her eyes off her plate. She said that she wanted to explain her situation to us, and is why we made sure to come here now that no one else is in the PX. Resting her chopsticks on the rim of her tray, she finally looks up.

"Um… So, about me and my family. You all know how the ranks work, right? Well, the Tamase family was always one linked to archery. We had our own dojo and all back in Osaka. We were of Tozama rank, and every generation we had to undergo a trial to keep our status. I, well, never had the chance to take part in that test."

We all waited for her to gather her thoughts, and after a short while she spoke up again.

"My family was close to the Koubuin House, due to our same values about how one should fight and maintain the lineage's honor. Even when guns became the norm, archery was preserved as a symbol of our traditions and as such my family was one of the few that was directly assigned under the command of the Koubuin family, despite being of Tozama rank, and it's why we eventually were given a dojo in the first place. I heard that was because my grandfather reached the highest honor rank in archery in the whole Empire."

The rest's eyes pop up like a full balloon, in whatever comes after shocked. I remember her dad was in the second of those ranks back in my world, so maybe that's also the same here.

"So due to that honor, we were placed under their orders. I suppose we were kinda like an anomaly, I think?" She tilts her head, looking at Meiya for confirmation.

"Well, that is not inaccurate." She says, nodding. "While it isn't common, it also is not odd for either Tozamas or inductees to be appointed under the direct command of a Regent." More gazes of surprise go to Tama, who loses her sight in her plate's depths despite it being mostly empty.

"Is that so? Meiya-san, is that something weird in the hierarchy?" Mikoto tilts her head, scratching a cheek.

"No, not in the slightest. However, I was referring to the placement of the individual who represents a House. While all those who belong to a fellowship are under the command of one of the Regents, there are those who are appointed to serve under the Head's direct orders, either in the Main House or wherever they are handpicked to work in. Or at the very least, that's how it used to be before the invasion." Deflating much, she sighs. "Such an honor is a rare one, only given to trustworthy fellows. Few are the Tozamas, and even less the inductees, that are given this treatment by a Regent. Therefore, it isn't odd at all, it is merely an uncommon practice since few are those who are bestowed said privilege."

"So what it means is that Tama's family was seen as very important fellows by the Koubuins, to the point of taking orders directly from the leader?" Meiya nods to my words, Tama also does as she looks down while scratching her head.

"Yes, it used to be like that, I think." Still unable to smile as usual, Tama keeps looking down. "When I was little, there were times when I accompanied my parents to pay a visit to the Koubuin Main House. But, for some reason, we were looked at very badly by some of the other servants. Papa was never a warrior, he always preferred to settle things with words, so I could hear some people calling him a coward behind our backs." Tama's voice creaked as she remembered that, her gaze trailed off the table, her figure clearly distraught with the memory she had recalled.

"… Such improper behavior. Tamase, you shouldn't feel ashamed of your origins. Be it by the sword or the pen, I am convinced your Father certainly worked much for our nation." Meiya firmly stared at Tama, who finally gave us a small smile and nodded.

"Well, things weren't so good with the last Head of the Koubuin House, since he wanted to be part of the vanguard in the war against the BETA, from what I heard from Papa. So when he tried to negotiate peacefully, it seems they argued about it. When…" Closing her eyes, taking a deep breath, turbulence comes to her breathing. "… the capital was attacked by terrorists on the 97, we had just gone to visit them and…"

Tama paused for a while, breathing deep through her nose as she closed her eyes. Squinting my eyes, felt as if I had been shot in the gut to see her wringing her hands so tightly.

"… W-Well, Papa got into an argument with the Head, and he ended up taking me back home in a hurry."

She shot out in a hurry, eyes tightly closed. She's obviously keeping stuff in, but to have her this hurt… Just what the hell happened to her then? No, wait…

Their parents used to always go together to the Koubuin House… And there was a terrorist attack… She said only her dad took her back home… And she said… that the flowers… reminded her of…

Oh God…

The rest also grimaced, unable to lift a word, sharing the silence as we waited for her to continue or call it quits.

"… I learned later that he resigned his title and decided to go work for the UN and the Parliament." Catching back her regular breathing, she finally looked up.

"Huh? But why would he… I mean…" Chizuru hugged herself with one hand as she looked at Tama.

"After that… Most of our fellows started calling us traitors, saying that we should be exiled… Since then, I… Well, many of my friends started shunning me out, and the ones who remained close were also secluded during school." Looking at the girls in the eye, her tone still deflated, the cracks beginning to widen. "That's why I don't like seeing you fight, why I always try to have us all get along. I'm used to being ignored by now, and I know I'm not that smart either, that's why I always do my best and try to stay positive. Because that's… that's all I'm good for."

Kei got closer and, hiding how tightly she was biting her lips a second ago, pet her head, causing Tama to look up. Her quivering eyes soon relax as she sees us smiling at her.

"That ain't true. You're a great squadmate." To say she flinched or twitched at Kei's word would be like comparing a hill with Mt. Fuji, tightening her lips as she tried, pointlessly at that, to prevent a few runaway tears to come out.

"Tamase, you're no burden." Chizuru spoke softly, looking tenderly at her. "And nobody here thinks you're a traitor, your Father is still working for the good of the Empire, just as we're doing now." I mean, she may relate to it after what she went through, since she's still trying to do her part while being on the UN, and while her Father is the Prime Minister.

"Really? You don't think I'm… dead weight? That I'm in the way?" Her downcast eyes looked at us, ready to recoil off a wall. All of us smiled at her again, making a sliver of tears appear.

"Miki-san, you're really good for so many more things you don't even notice! I mean, outside of your gun skills, you're always the one who notices when we forget something in the changing room or when we're moving wrong in the sim." Mikoto joined her hands and did little jumps in her seat, which made Tama laugh a bit.

"Yoroi speaks the truth." Meiya nodded to Mikoto, then to Tama. "Your attention to those little details is a most remarkable trait. And your positivity has always been an invaluable asset, you're the one who always keeps the peace between Sakaki and Ayamine, after all."

"Yup, without you these two would be at each other's throat all the time." Kei and Chizuru both narrow their eyes at me in perfect synchrony.

"That's not true…" Tama looked down again. And as if in sync…

"Pure slander."

"I wouldn't go causing us problems so often. While it's true that Tamase helps in keeping Ayamine in check, I am not so childish to-"

"Sassaki."

"What was that?! I'm just trying to-"

"See? So quick to anger." Kei smirks at her, Tama and Mikoto again stare at them worriedly, Meiya sighs. So harshly thoughtful as always.

"Grr… Why, you…"

"Please do not start again." Chizuru chills down at Meiya's words. "Tamase, none of us see you as a burden. You're our precious comrade, so please do not be so distraught."

"Good girl, you're really brave." Kei started petting her again, but more softly this time.

"I am glad you think me trustworthy enough to tell me of this, and as the rest, I apologize for the times where I talked down to you." Tapping her glasses, she then also gives Tama a bow. "Let's keep doing our best together from now on, Tamase." Both nod at each other, this time throwing Tama's stiffness far beyond the horizon.

"Man, I… I didn't knew you went through so much on your own. You should be more proud of yourself, Tama. It takes a lot of guts to turn your back and do what you think is right in a situation like that." I smile at her, but she drops her gaze again.

"I didn't really have a choice. I mean, not matter what I did everyone kept treating me like an outsider and pushing me away." Meiya and Chizuru's eyes tense up, they can't meet Tama's gaze.

Holding part of their uniforms roughly, moving their closed lips around. Considering how they acted towards me and how Tama tried to defend me from time to time… Maybe they said something hurtful to her?

"But you're with us now." Mikoto beamed again as she dove into her eyes. "So, uh, I have a completely new image of you now, Miki-san. Not just because of the shot with the cannon, but… I agree with Takeru, you were really brave. Sorry, for those times I ignored you."

"N-No, don't apologize, please!" As sweet as usual, despite everything.

"I would have to agree. You should not feel shame, Tamase. Your daily displays are proof enough of the type of person you are, and I am grateful to have a squadmate such as you with me." Meiya folded her arms, smiling brightly at Tama. Coming from her, after what Tama told us, has to hit differently.

"No, I'm just doing my best… I will try to not disappoint you." As if she were being scolded, she looked down as she grabbed her ribbon and slowly pulled it from side to side.

"You never did, Tama." She twitches as she hears me, again looking up. I give her a thumbs up, as does Kei, and she nods back, this time clearly quivering.

"Thank you… Really… I'll do my best to not drag you down anymore." She quivered a little, but she rubbed her eyes and then returned a bright gaze to us. "Well, that's the reason why I joined the UN, and why I always tried so hard to keep the peace. I didn't feel welcome where I was, that trying to reclaim my title would be the same as leaving Papa alone, and anyways most people there hated me. So I decided that I would try to help him, even if I couldn't do much. I'm sure he was just trying to see whether I was telling the truth on my letters with his cheerful act today. I'm sorry, he didn't mean any of the bad things he said about you all." And again, she gives us a deep bow.

"Don't worry, Miki-san. It's nothing, he even saw through our facade." Placing a hand on her shoulder, Mikoto smiled back at Tama.

"And after what you told us, I can understand why he'd choose to go along our play." Drawing circles on the air, she sighs. "It's okay, water under the bridge." Tama sighs, smiling a bit. "But I have to ask, if he was just testing if you truly were pleased in the squad, what did you actually write in the letters?"

"Eh?" Oh God, she's tilted again. "Awawa… S-Sorry, I can't tell you!"

"But… Just what did you even-"

"Sakaki-kun, don't make trouble for the Squad Leader." Smirking much, Kei chuckles as Chizuru groans at her.

"I agree, let us simply leave this behind." Meiya nods, Tama sighs. "However, I cannot deny I am curious as to why he said nothing about my person."

"He was afraid you'd cut him in half, Meiya."

"Wh- I-I would do no such thing!" Purple fire? Check. Folded arms? Check. Slight pout? Check. We've got bingo.

"Haha, but Meiya-san does look really scary from time to time." Mikoto giggles, Meiya's glare intensifies on me.

"That is not true."

"Awawa… Sorry, but I really can't tell you. It's too embarrassing…"

"Got it. No more questions." Kei again pats her head, the rest of us nod at her, and Tama finally sighs, coming back to her usual smile.

"Well, in any case, we are more than happy to have you onboard, Tamase." Tapping her glasses, crossing her arms, she gives Tama another nod. "Let's do our best effort to earn our commission, all together from now on."

"Yes, let's! Thank you all, for hearing me out."

"What are you saying, Miki-san? That's what comrades are for, we rely on each other when things get tough. And you saved the base, we should be thanking you."

"Saving the base… Awawawa…."

"And here we go again." Can't help but to chuckle at her usual nervousness.

"I always knew you were great." Kei gives her a nod with a thumbs up, she mumbles a thank as she fidgets.

"Indeed. I relish the challenge of facing such a fierce opponent from now on." Meiya's wide smile melted away Tama's stiffness as she also returned to her usual happy look. "It is an honor to be able to spar against someone as skilled as you, Tamase." And now she made Tama blush.

"And it isn't as if we didn't have a weirdo in the team. At least someone can shoot down Takeru now."

"Watch it, Mikoto. I won't cover you next time we fight." I fake a pout and look away. Everybody starts to laugh, except Kei who simply smiled faintly.

"Well, it will truly be a challenge to face you from now on." Chizuru says, before giving Tama another bow. "And I promise to make an effort as a leader, to not pressure you as I did before the CCSE, or as I've been doing with my fights with Ayamine."

"No, don't apologize. I didn't… I'm not holding that against you, Sakaki-san. So let's leave that behind, and start looking forward as a team, yes?" She truly is what brings this squad together when things go south. Her cheerful and honest smile melts the ice that had made its way into the other three's eyes, leaving nothing but a warm light within.

"That's right. In the end, Kei-san protected us from the soldiers, and you two helped Takeru finish the CCSE. And you've been trying to change your attitude, I can see you three are trying your best to mend that stuff. So no more bringing that up!" Mikoto points a finger at them and they let out a little chuckle, as me and Tama also do.

It's truly a blessing… to have mended the bridge. It truly is nice… just to sit with you, laughing at the most little things. Sighing away, feeling as if I had unloaded a backpack full of jagged rocks piking at me, I took in the view of these passing seconds, of all of us just laughing in the PX.

"Well, if we can leave that behind us, then let's do so. So don't be afraid of speaking up when you feel you have to." Tama gives a nod to Chizuru, leaving the traces of shadow behind.

"Thank you, everybody. Let's do our best in the mock battles, and let's get commissioned as fast as possible. As a team." Tama said with small flames in her eyes. Shame she doesn't know the 'FWOOOH!' here, she could use a battle cry to pump herself up.

"Yeah!" Mikoto raised her hand and, after a second of hesitation on Tama's side, both did a high five. Kei smiled at them, while the other two drank some water.

"Well guys, I can't really stay here, so I'm going back to my cell. Good night." I stand and wave at them, taking the paper bag to my pockets.

"Ah! Shirogane-san!"

"Hm? What's up, Tama?" Her eyes swayed away and without looking at me she again tugged at her ribbon.

"F-Forgive me for hitting and screaming at you. You were just trying to cheer me up and I… I…"

"It's cool, I was kinda pushy back there. I'm the one that should apologize." Tama looks at me and gives me a smile. Glad to see she didn't got all negative with how I pushed her. I mean, with all the shit she's gone through I'm lucky she doesn't hate my guts. You're too sweet to be true, Tama.

"Takeru, what did you do?" Meiya looked at me, scanning my face real slow.

"Nothing much, I was just being my usual obnoxious self." I shrug but Tama jumps in, protesting against my words.

"That's not true. He was just trying to get me out of myself. I ended up screaming at him when he only was trying to give me courage." She looks down as some clouds dull the sunshine of her eyes.

"Don't be so down. You ended up rising up on your own, that's what matters. You saved us today Tama, there's nothing to forgive. So stop being so mopey and give us a smile!"

"Huh, so Shirogane-kun can be kind when he wants to." Chizuru gestured towards me, as if she had seen some surreal thing happen in front of her.

"Hey!"

"The end is near." Kei, you're lucky you're so endearing.

"It is a relief to hear you can be considerate and tactful, Takeru." Meiya regains her smile, burying the premature signs of doubts.

"You're making it sound as if you thought I was some kind of brute." I give her a side glace, she then folds her arms and nods.

"Well, you always were a great hurdle to overcome. And I myself saw firsthand your resolve, so I know how determined you are. It is merely surprising to see that you could also aid Tamase back then, considering the pressure she must have felt. To see you are capable of such tactfulness is a welcome surprise." Giving me a small smile, I can't help but to narrow my eyes at her.

"Yes, that's true. He was truly formidable yesterday morning, and didn't mince words with us when he snapped." Again, she traces circles in the air.

"Monster-kun ripped us a new ear, such a savage." Kei then gives me a side glance, smirking. I know you want to cheer Tama up, but don't use me as fodder, dammit.

"Awawa… Don't say that! Shirogane-san has always been helping us out. And back then he didn't get angry, and he remained calm, a-and… and he kept encouraging me. Don't say bad things about him, please. Not even as a joke." Tama's soft and polite, but firm, tone made the other three drop their teasing smiles.

"Yeah, Takeru has always been giving us advice, hasn't he?" Mikoto nods, drinking some water. "Talking about the training and what's to come, how are we gonna fight in our mock battles? I mean, now we have two aces to look out for."

"How? The Instructor is the one that will decide that." Chizuru replied as she started to eat.

"But what if she puts us against both Takeru and Miki-san?" She asks, Tama scratches her head, not used to the praise, and the others got tilted hard.

"… We're dead, plain and simple." Kei answers, a solemn tone as passed her thumb across her neck.

"C-Come on, I'm not that good…" Poking at her plate, she blushes again.

"I for one hope for a chance to spar against you, Takeru. And if it also places me against Tamase, I couldn't possibly ask for better challenge." Meiya says with glee. Look at you, you think you can beat me. How cute.

"Someone wants to keep losing, it seems." I return a tease and she purses her lips at me.

"I will not lose! I'll make you kiss the ground this time." More of those determined, blazing purple embers appeared in those eyes of hers, the fire that I'm got used to seeing here. But now, they're no longer hateful. None of their eyes are.

"We'll see. I gotta go, later guys." Waving at them, they return it as I leave.

Finally… Finally, we're back as it always should have been. It took a lot… but now we're back to being a cohesive team, in the making at least.

It's nice to see that Tama got out of that gloom mood she was in, despite all the shit she had to go through. Makes me feel like shit for never trying to have a serious talk with her about family when we were together… But I can start by being more supportive from now on.

And it's also nice to see that we've left behind those tense days. Hopefully we can keep the peace for a little while longer. Now… for that to happen… I gotta keep Yuuhi at bay…

"Cadet Shirogane."

"Oh?" 2nd Lt. Pyatkh called out, we shared a salute as I stopped. "Good evening. What is it, 2nd Lieutenant?"

"The XO is calling for you, to the usual office."

"Understood, I've received my orders." Again saluting each other, I then turn and keep going to the stairs, but now directing myself to the elevator.

"Then, you have been making certain progress?" The Undersecretary asked, reading the bare bones report I cooked up for him.

"Indeed. So tell the Security Council Alt. IV is progressing at fine speed."

"Is the petition for a mission to Sadogashima so soon… well…" Choosing to instead drink some more coffee, I spin on my chair as I chuckle.

"Yes, it's very much serious. I also would like to have a talk with the UN's HC and our patrons of the Empire soon about my… developments in the recent months. Could you perhaps arrange the meeting?"

"Of course, I'm sure it won't take long, what with how curious they are growing about what's brewing here. However… There is one matter I must inquire about." Resting his cup on the table, tracing his mustache with a finger, his eyes took aim at mine. "Do you have any intel regarding the matter of the aggressors sent to the CCSE?"

"No, I haven't been able to find much from here." Not anything I'd like to share with the UN, in any case. "Were the soldiers released as per the agreement?"

"Sigh… Sadly, yes. Everything will be kept under wraps in the end. However, many are wondering why you'd… agree to pay for the treatment of the soldiers."

"Besides the fact that the UN needs the matter from remaining secret? After all, the HC was the one who insisted on sending the aggressors. I don't recall having much veto power regarding who was sent…" He twitches, suddenly chuckling.

"No, I know that well. However, well, they don't buy you're oblivious to what transpired. I mean, I am going to keep quiet about it, and yet you were completely prepared for this little accident."

"Well, what can I say? Things are surely going to become more interesting in the short term for us." Grinning much as I spin, he again chuckles.

"Haha, as expected of someone like you. Ah, well, I'll try to keep them at bay, however…" Again furrowing his brows, he leaned forward, covering his mouth. "Do you believe there are sleeper agents of that faction in this base?"

"No, at all. I merely received a… tip, let's call it, from a trustworthy source. That's why I was well prepared for this. And in any case, I am sure you also were aware of what could happen during this visit."

"Well…" Going back, he straightens his suit. "What can I say? The rumors have been brewing, and as impartial as I have to be, I am a father as well. Let's just say I decided to take a bet when seeing the hasty manner in which this visit was requested."

"I see… I suppose you were pleased with it?" Leaning on one of my palms, he again chuckles.

"More than pleased." Standing up, this time his eyes without any of the hesitation of our prior meetings, he offers me handshake. "Even if some will be displeased at the news, I shall arrange the meetings. Best of luck Professor, and keep up your guard."

"I will, be assured. Is there anything you think is dire enough to tell me in advance?"

"Well… I'm sure you must have heard of that radical group…" Such a grimace, far more biased than it should be. "Hopefully you manage to deliver results before the tensions escalate further."

"… That I will do. I'll be looking forward to the meeting." Smirking back at him, ending our handshake, he gives me one last bow before leaving, Pyatkh already waiting outside the room to guide him to his ride.

And once the door is locked, I crash onto my seat. Sigh… I guess that warning is what Shirogane told me about, the third accident that has to be prevented no matter what. Still, I'm glad this went well enough. Not only I gained data on the OTH, the Undersecretary is also now clearly on my side as well. Those lobbying bastards will have to swallow their buckets of cash, soon they'll be jobless.

Beginning to spin slowly, resting my head on the seat, my eyelids begin to close as I look up.

Sigh… Everything is under control… Another accident prevented… The meetings are going to also go well with… these developments. The request for a mission to Sadogashima… should be a good enough sign.

My elbows lodging themselves on my sides, the armrest welcoming my arms dock in, the spinning and spinning continues. With eyes closed I sigh, simply enjoying the motion.

The cadets will also probably join the Valkyries… The 00 Unit's new protocol is progressing… just fine… The XM3 is ready for mass production… And the memories of…

Drowning a yawn, rubbing my eyes, resting my chin on my shoulder, I continue spinning for a moment. Until my last trail of thought made my eyes shoot wide open.

"Wait, I didn't read… the last report… Ah… Ah… Yaaaawn…"

All the tension in me comes crumbling all at once, a few tears on my eyes as I stretch my back, hearing something crack. My legs feeling numb, a jolt comes through my ankles as I moved them.

"Ugh… When was… the last time I slept, again? Yawn… Dammit. Hmm?" I look at my watch, for some reason it seems half an hour passed already.

Did I… almost pass out? Urgh… I can't… I have to…

Thundering away from my seat, leaning on my desk until my legs rebooted, I then go up to the coffee machine and pour more into my cup, to the brim. Two fingers run a loop on my forehead, yet no matter how slowly I try to drink, a sudden hoarseness is left imprinted on my throat.

I cough a bit, rubbing it, and yet nothing can seem to ease this heaviness. Another yawn tears my mouth wide open against my wishes, my head lowers and lowers.

"No… It's too early to go to sleep. There's some… Ahem… Quite some matters left unattended." Breathing into the smell of the coffee, pinching the bridge of my nose, whatever was clogging me is sent back in for now.

Sitting again, opening my mail, it would seem the orders I sent are already taken care of. The Valkyries reported that no one suspicious was nearby, nothing happened during the visits besides from the HSST, the customary bureaucratic mails from the retinue are also flooding my inbox, and since nothing has come to my attention I suppose everything is as always.

Sigh… Good enough. Now, Motoko-nee seemed to have done some more tests today… And she believes the hardware is as ready as it'll ever be. I suppose it's time for the final trial run… Inhaling sharply as the image of my prior failures comes back up, I send word to her to ready the prototypes for a final test tomorrow.

I'll delegate to the CO the arrangement of the patrols and whatnot, and the other officials can handle the bureaucrats and their mutual sharing of empty pleasantries. I should also send word to Radhabinod regarding the mission for Sadogashima, so that he can review it and offer his hindsight. I wonder if I should speak with Shirogane about it… In time, I don't want to craft a perfect plan only to garner any unwanted attention.

Speaking of… Now that everything else is over and done with… What hour is it now? Around 7:40? He should have come already to my presence, what on Earth is he doing? No… What if he came while I was asleep?

Checking the cameras on my laptop's screen, he isn't with Yashiro. Actually, she also isn't in the cylinder's room or in our work aisle, and he isn't there either. Where is Shirogane now? Clicking to switch the view, a brow began to arch as I couldn't find him, my clicks began to lose delay between each of them.

Not in the hallway or anywhere in this floor, not in the elevator, neither on his cell or on the way to it… Where the hell are you?! He couldn't have- Oh, he's in the PX. I suppose… I could let him eat in peace, I did give my agreement just for today. But it's been an hour since the Undersecretary left. I explicitly said that the cadets were free for the rest of the day… Sigh…

By the way, I also didn't see Yashiro anywhere. Where is she? Hmm… On a blind spot of a camera? No, perhaps she already went to sleep. I'll check up on her later, to make sure she's fine.

"Nothing to be done, then. Let's read up on the last report of the memory business." I do wonder where she is, but I suppose she also is close by. I'd have been notified if anything had happened to her.

Now, the report should be… This one should be it. So, what do we have here? Opening the file, drinking slowly while taking my time to scour the intel provided, what figments of tiredness where in me faded away.

Saw the subject when she was little… This world's him seemed to get along just fine with her… Decent progress, I suppose. Now, let's bring up the data of the headband here…

"… How interesting. So the delay in the surfacing is lessening with each session…" So Yashiro is having an easier time with the process, and he is no longer feeling as burdened by the toll of an ESPer… This lines up perfectly with my plans.

Alright, enough is enough. Let's call him here.

---

A few minutes afterwards…

---

"Yeah, everything went as well as before." He nods, drinking some coffee. "All okay on your end?"

"Of course. I arranged some meetings to gain authorization for the XM3's test as well as all the tech we're making, but for now we should remain on our guard. Until I see the sign on the papers I won't believe HC is completely on Alt. IV's side."

"Well, I'm sure that at the least we may be able to keep the Empire on our side once we roll out the Kagerou's new parts and the Shin too. Once it's made know we gave the Empire a stealth system, I'm sure many important people will stop seeing you with the evil eyes." He says, not a hint of doubt in his voice or in his shiny eyes.

Of course that they'll be happy. But I still gave them the toned down versions of the radars and sensors. I'm keeping the real deal for my use exclusively, no way in hell I'll hand the Empire this work of art.

"So, how was Tamase? Did she have a breakdown or something?" He smiles at me as he chuckles.

"She almost had one, truth be told. But honestly, I'm glad she could do it on her own. I think she will improve a lot from now on." Seeing him honestly relieved is all the proof I needed. Glad my little bet worked out.

Marimo was really worried about both of them, and was why she came up to me after your 'proposition' to have Tamase be the squad leader for a day. Now that she also suffered it herself, she sympathizes with the Undersecretary's plight. To be scorned and treated as a traitor just for joining the UN, even if you're still devoted to your nation. And since she wanted to let them have a happy reunion, I gave the OK for them to fool around a bit. Considering Tamase's display and the effect this will have on her performance going forward, it was a small price to pay. And it's not like I care about formalities anyways.

… After all, who knows if they'll get the chance to see each other again? I do plan to send her to Sadogashima, with her already remarkable sniping abilities, so… it truly was a small compromise compared to the effect this will have on her skills.

"Well, it is good to hear that. And about Tamase's background, don't worry about it. I knew beforehand she and her Father used to be nobles, I thought you knew as well."

"Sigh… This world gets weirder every day. For them to be a Tozama family that served the Koubuin's… Do you think Tama's Dad knew about me?" He crosses his arms as he leans back into the sofa.

"I mean, he didn't seem to recognize you so I don't think so. It's doubtful that each servant of the Shogun knows about every other servant in the House. Remember that they were the lowest rank of nobles, and going by that memory, this world's you was quite close to the Shogun growing up. I don't think Tamase or her father ever got to meet the Shogun when she was little." Otherwise, he'd have asked about you during our talk.

"I see. Well, there's something I've been meaning to ask for while, actually." Resting his cup on his lap, he looks up away from me.

"Hm? What is it?"

"Do you think you could probe for intel on the archives again?"

"… I believe I did tell you that probing more about him won't do us good. Are you not confident on your recovery sessions going well?" I lean forward, drilling my gaze into him. And again, he looks away.

… What does this mean? Perhaps, he is actually still burdened by the constant projection? He did go overboard yesterday morning during his training, after the fight with Takamura no less… However, even if he is tired, he should simply push through this for the good of the project.

And yet, just like the ones in my reflection, those eyebags growing under his eyes won't make this any easier on him… Maybe I should allow him to rest… to avoid the Guard from thinking I'm actually preventing them to meet with him, or gain their animosity once they're deceived. It's also for the good of the project, of course. Shirogane is required in good health once we start up the 00 Unit.

"If you're feeling exhausted, I can authorize you to rest tomorrow."

"Huh? No, I'm not that tired, though."

"Then, why do you want me to look into his data again?"

"No, it's not that… Well…" And again, he looks down, avoiding my eyes, clamping up. Coming up empty and shutting down on me, as my trials have done oh so many times.

"… Shirogane, what is the matter?"

"Sigh…" Finally looking at me, he scratches his head. "Do you think you can look into my parents' data without making much noise?"

"… Your parents? Not this world's you?"

"Yeah. I know you must have your reasons to not want to look into that, but-"

"Wait, you remember their names?"

"I always did." Furrowing his brows, he tilts his head.

"… And why didn't you tell me about that?"

"Well… You had already searched throughly on all data about this world's me, and since you didn't ask me to tell you I assumed you couldn't do it for some reason. I mean, you wouldn't let that pass you up."

Just… Sigh… All this time I thought he didn't know, that it was something unique to this world's him… And he was just keeping quiet all this time… when we could have used that intel in the negotiations with the General…

"W-Why are you glaring at me like that?" Narrowing his eyes at me, he then, yet again, looks away.

"Sigh… Doesn't matter. So, why did you want me to inquire into this again? There's no mention of your parents in the reports that… Shirogane?" He grimaced harshly, letting me see for just a second his clenched teeth. Why… would he…

"I saw them in a dream this morning, in a hospital. Couldn't hear very well what was going on, but I don't ever recall my Mom having health problems. I'd like to know what was of them. So, can you look into their profiles?"

Leaving aside the fact that he kept quiet about this dream for a whole day… Why is he asking me this? He should know I can handle something as meager as that. Sure, I can't probe into the Guard's archive for the moment to avoid arising suspicions, but the standard databases are not out of my reach.

Leaning further back onto my seat, crossing my arms, I look up,

The real question is, why did he grimace? Why did he hesitate? He should know my reach, and how useful this data is for our plan… And yet, it doesn't align with our prior talks when he was, for some reason I still cannot grasp, putting some space between us. Is he merely saddened then?

"Sensei?"

"Hm? Oh, yes… It's not an issue, you should know that."

"Then, why were you doubting just now?" I don't know, why are you doubting me now?

"It's nothing, I was just pondering something."

"You sure it's okay?"

Okay, now what? Why are you giving me that worried gaze? Again casting doubts on me, perhaps?

"… Why do you ask?"

"Well, you look real tired. If you're too busy, it can wait." Again scratching his head, he sighs. No delay on his words, and no intent to escape from my eyes this time.

"… I don't recall saying I was busy, furthermore, this is intel that we would need for you to play your role to deceive the Shogun, Shirogane. Something as simple as this shouldn't pose any trouble to me."

"What about those eyebags, though?"

"Nothing you should concern yourself with." A small frown formed on him, and when I thought he was about to continue pushing he simply sighed and shook his head.

"Okay, if you say so… Just make sure to get enough sleep, Sensei."

"… In any case, your parents' names are…" He then tells me their names, with the proper kanji and everything. "Hmm… Easy enough. I'll have it done by tomorrow."

"Cool. So, in the meantime, can I go do another recovery session? I'd like to see something about them today."

"… Might I ask why? You can leave this on my hands, if you're that curious about their lives in this world. I believe you should focus on regaining memories that could be used to convince the Shogun of your identity." Pursing his lips, he holds my gaze without receding.

"Well, that's true… But still, I'd like to try that out today."

… And he then remains quiet, going for another sip. Refusing to tell me why, dismissing my offer without missing a heartbeat. Why is he still… No, in any case, whatever he sees Yashiro will tell me about it. And to continue to pressure him won't do me any good. While I could order him to focus on something else, if he wants to see this so badly… I suppose I can allow it, just this once. After all, I do get more data from the sessions, and that will help in the final stretch to tune the ESP protocol for the 00 Unit. A small reward for allowing me to deal with today's accident without issues, nothing more.

"Alright, I'll allow it. But just for today, I expect you to again focus on Her Purpleness from tomorrow on."

"Roger. Well, I'll be going to Kasumi."

"… Wait, Shirogane. Do you know where is Yashiro?" He freezes as he gets up, furrowing his brows at me.

"What do you mean? Isn't she in Sumika's room?"

"No, I sent her along Marimo to greet the Undersecretary but she never came back."

"Wait, so where is she then?" It seems like he doesn't know, but wasn't she with them when the alarm rang?

"That's what I want to know. You don't know where she is?"

"How could I… Ah." He opens his eyes wide as if he had closed a window without saving the doc he was working on.

---

One trip to the bathrooms later…

---

"Seriously, why do you always agree to that?" Shirogane questioned Yashiro as she ate her dinner. He looked really conflicted for some reason.

"She looked like she wanted to impress her Dad. So I helped." She smiles, causing him to sigh. Hehe, when you're with Yashiro you do make very amusing faces.

"Shirogane, did Yashiro do this before?"

"All the time." He raises both hands to the air while rolling his eyes before sitting on his sofa. "I haven't seen her refuse that order even once." Hehehe… So you go back to normal when around her, huh.

"Well, let's get back on track. Shirogane, while she eats, let me inform you that I have a mission for you this Sunday."

"A mission?" He straightens up, his eyes become focused on me.

"I want you to start training Yashiro to pilot."

"Wait, what? You want Kasumi to pilot?" He seemed surprised, he took a look at her and she gave a smile.

"So I said. She does have a personal TSF that only she can use to its full capabilities, and I know no better pilot to teach her than you. Not like she'll listen to anyone else." She then nods. Shirogane scratches his head, closing his eyes tightly.

"That's another difference to the list. So, why can't we have her ride a Type-00 or a modified Kagerou?"

"Because that TSF has many special sensors that were made especially for it. Even if we can't use it for its original purpose, I belive that it would prove useful during a Hive infiltration or during a crowded fight."

I did remember we had it when he asked me to put sensors on the swords. Even if its specs are outdated, it's nothing we can't improve with our current developments. Furthermore, if he is enduring the toll of an ESPer now, he just might be able to allow her to reach her top performance in the future if they work well together.

"And why can't we make new versions of those things for the Kagerou? Or for the Shin?" Pointing a finger up, he raises a brow.

… Wait, he's right. I do have new tech now, thanks to him. Asking for the license wouldn't be a problem with my current standing… Actually, it would work to my favor, to engage that company in my 'development's as well. They might even begin to fully support me if they get a nice slice of the cake…

And we need a test pilot for the Shin, and Yashiro's previous numbers are actually decent… It would require some modifications to the Shin's frame…

But I could definitely do this, it isn't out of my reach. And by doing this, by having more parts requiring my architecture and programs… Looking forward, this would ensure the UN will need to stay on my good side for the years to come… Without talking of the opportunities to gain further influence on-

"Sensei, you hearing?" And he apparently got fed up with me keeping quiet and raised his voice. You just can't sit still for a minute, huh.

"Yes, yes. I admit you proposed a good idea, and it isn't out of our reach. But we would have to modify the Shin Kagerou for it to work properly, and we don't yet know if it would work smoothly. For the time being, Yashiro will keep using the Mindseeker until we confirm whether we can replicate the ESP sensors."

"The Mindseeker?"

"It's my machine." Yashiro looks downwards as her eyes tremble a bit. "I was supposed to pilot it with… one of my sisters. But since Alt. III was scrapped, we never got deployed."

"Okay, hold up. Kasumi has sisters?"

"You didn't knew that? I thought I had informed you about Alt. III in the other worlds, going by your explanation." He groans as he takes another sip of his coffee.

"I knew Kasumi was involved in Alt. III due to being an ESPer, but I didn't knew she had sisters. I suppose she's talking about the other ESPers, right?" He looks at her and she nods, staring at him. Not a single change in her complexion, which means Shirogane doesn't think of them as witches or anything. It is a relief to have someone that Yashiro can open up to.

"Yes, I was told that ESPers were going to be piloting together, if Alt. III hadn't been cancelled."

"Huh. So, this Mindseeker can be piloted by two people at the same time?" He seems really interested in that, the minute furrowing of his brows as whenever he gets fired up.

"Yes, it's a variant of the F-14. I acquired one when Alt. IV started, when Yashiro was assigned under me. We're keeping it under wraps on Hangar 78, on B22F. If you accept, I'll transfer it to Hangar 90 under your care, Chief." I smile at him, causing him to blush. It's so fun to see him get all bashful.

"Stop calling me Chief. Well, if Kasumi is alright with it I'll do it. I mean, she's been exhausted these days, with the memory thing and all. You sure you can handle it?" Looking at her, a tint of concern grafted on his tone.

You really overworry about just everything. That's because she's also helping me with some programming for the 00 Unit. And yet, despite you being tired as well, you worry about her first, huh.

"I can do it." She moves her bunny ears up and down a few times, locking her eyes with him. He then gives a nod.

"Alright. Then I'll train you. But who is she going to pilot with? You did say the Mindseeker was a two-pilot TSF."

"You, of course."

"Huh? Oh, so I'll tag along with her to show her my movements on action. I get it."

"You'll be under the Viking callsign again. You're Viking 1 and she's Viking 2. I'll have you spar against the Valkyries this time. I already installed the XM3 onto the Mindseeker, so don't worry about it."

"Pfft…" He holds his mouth as he laughs. Yashiro pouts at him, then she starts lightly chopping his shoulder.

"Shirogane, what's the problem?"

"S-Sorry, I just imagined Kasumi wearing a viking helmet and waving an axe around. I couldn't contain myself, sorry about that." He chuckles a bit as Yashiro keeps chopping his shoulder. Can't help but to chuckle at this.

"Sigh… You're awfully relaxed, as always. Well, in any case, I'll have to see if Yashiro can eventually pilot by herself. If she does, I'll start making a second Shin Kagerou for her. You two can go to do another memory recovery now, just don't exhaust yourselves."

"Yeah, I know. Tomorrow I do start with the mock battles. By the by, I left a report on how things are going on the usual folder." I nod at him with a smile, now that he finally seems to be willing to send me reports on a daily basis.

"I'll do my best." She moves her bunny ears again, then she stands up and takes her empty plate to a shelve, wiping it clean herself. She's so diligent, as usual.

"Good. Now then, off you go."

"Yes, yes. But you do look real tired though, so don't stay up too late, Sensei. Everything should be fine for a while." Smiling again, he nods at me.

"… Shut up. Didn't you want to go do that recovery session really badly?"

"Sigh… Just take care of yourself, okay?" Mmgh… What's with him all of a sudden? "Well, let's go Kasumi. Good night, Sensei." Waving as he had always done before, he leaves the office with Yashiro right behind him.

So when you're around her you smile, but when she isn't you freeze over… Well, in any case, it's good that Yashiro has a partner again.

Standing up, drowning another yawn as I left my cup on its usual shelve, I then sent word to the crew on Hangar 78, to send the machine to Hangar 90 for the final touches on its maintenance for the mock battle, and so that they made sure the limiter of the ESP sensors was still working well. I do think they can handle it… and Yashiro wouldn't lose more than a day on the bed… but I can't risk his safety. In case the Guards try to inquire about the matter, and to ensure he can be ready for when the 00 Unit is started.

"Sigh… Yes, it's just to make sure the pawn reaches to other end… To get myself another Queen." Sitting back, spinning for a moment, my sight grew blurry as I couldn't help but to squint my eyes.

It's not like I enjoy seeing Yashiro turning into that silent puppet, but I was curious the first times. The sheer power of the Mindseeker when she activated a psychic link was unmatched, I can't even begin to understand what could be achieved if she could go into Prafka if we had another ESPer on the base.

However, no pilot could withstand the pressure of the psychic link. And no one could become a stable trigger for her either. I believe Shirogane might be able to endure the strain from the link, even if he isn't an ESPer. Of course, it would have been better if we could have gotten Yashiro's sister with her too. Even so, she'll be a good addition to our forces if she can copy Shirogane's style, and on the off chance that he can withstand the effects of the psychic link we could have an unstoppable duo.

But that's only if Shirogane can successfully link with Yashiro, and honestly I don't want to risk any damage to their psyche to test that out.

Though it's surprising I forgot about the Mindseeker. I can't keep everything in my head all the time, but I suppose… letting Shirogane oversee Yashiro's training, and the possible second prototype of the Shin Kagerou, is the right choice.

I lean back on my seat, crossing my arms, spinning a bit more slowly.

Now, I'll get to test those Type-00C the Valkyries have been training with this week and Yashiro's abilities… It's a shame the Shin isn't ready yet, but we'll get there eventually… And they'll be gathering more data about the Nucleus too…

Closing my eyes, inhaling until my lungs are full, one leg crosses over the other.

I just gotta look into his parents' profiles later… Yeah, that's easy as pie…

Hmm… How long has it been since I ate pie, again?

"… W-Wait, I can't… Yaaawn…"

Again, my eyes watered, my head began to fall down as if I had a brick tied on it. Swaying a bit, yet again my mouth disobeyed and teared itself open to yawn, a shiver running through my sides.

" D-Dammit… I should write down a memo to look into his parents' data… for tomorrow… Yaaawn… "

… I also need to put an alarm so that I don't oversleep, prep up the machinery so that Yashiro can ease up in case the recovery session is taxing on her, organize Motoko-nee's reports to read up on them before the tests… make another memo for the speech I need for the meetings as well as to look into the footage I asked to be prepared… and I'll also have to free my schedule to have time to read the CO's comments about the Sadogashima plan I should be sending him… I also need to stay on the lookout for what the Guards do from now on…

… Yaaaawn.

Weary Homecoming

Chapter 45: Weary Homecoming

---

June 15th, 1989. Close to 6:30 PM.

(Osaka Castle Grounds. Imperial Royal Guard Detachment Offices.)

[Kageyuki]

---

No sounds other than my scribbling reached my ears, taking a moment to stare at the suffocating narrow space of my cubicle I then rub my eyes. Alright, one last push and I'm done.

"… And no disturbances occurred for the duration of the patrols on the east wing…" Slowly, with simple and precise movements, I take care not to mess up my writing. I swear, if I have to redo this whole report again because of another mistake, I'm gonna headdesk.

Yet another requirement of the Guard, to deliver our reports in pristine and proper written letters. No, it doesn't cut it to just write a standard report. No, you gotta do it in Keigo. Three years and I still can't do this shit.

Fresh paint would dry faster in summer before I actually finish this. Feeling my arm cramping up, slowing down even more to make sure I don't screw this up, the tickling of the distant clock only serves to unnerve me even more.

Sighing hard once I finish, quickly putting the pen in place so that no small stains end up on the paper, a hand goes to my air as I lean back on my seat while I move the one I was writing with in circles, hearing my wrist complain a bit as I do. With this, my shift should be over. And that means, once tomorrow comes, I can go back home.

… I wonder how is Takeru doing now. According to Takahisa-sama, he has been left in charge of Col. Kazora's daughter. He said Takeru seemed happy to be with her when he visited the House on the weekends… Even if he refused to tell me why that happens. At least he gave me a week-long leave permit this time.

"Well, let's get this over and done with."

Placing my report in a proper envelope, making sure my small cubicle was tidy before taking my leave, I then ant march to the desk in the far corner of the office, giving the report to the Tozama that was sitting there.

No words are exchanged, not even a gaze towards me. I'd have more interesting conversations with a wall anyways. Turning around after a customary salute, filling my lungs with air, yet again I ant march towards the mess hall.

Head held high as if kept in place by suspension cables, steps coordinated and firm, all to hide my tiredness from leaking over the rim. Just like when I helped out at Dad's restaurant, when I was a waiter to earn my allowance, keeping my gaze fixed at an invisible point is all I can do to steady my pulse and pace, to avoid a reaction from coming to my face, to not spill the order I was given. To keep my cool no matter what others say.

" By goodness, it isn't even 1900 hours and he's taking his leave already."

" Whatever did you expect of a baseborn? The rumors of his performance must be complete rubbish."

Deep breaths… One step after the other… And yet, despite having boots on, it feels as if I were again walking barefooted on the wilderness. Just that there's no nice cabin to go back to, no friends to relax around. All that's here is the ever present cold pressure of the hounds.

" I am of the opinion the man must be doping himself to achieve such results."

" How ludicrous, to think he'd control a Zuikaku better than our fellows."

The heels of my boots began to cry as I sped up, my teeth sank into an edge of my lips like a hot knife through butter, and my eyes once more inspected the shiny floor and how well kept it was.

" Do you think he might be the… swain of a Shinpan or a Fudai?"

" Pah! If that is true, they surely lack taste."

" I find the claim most insulting. In no way a fellow would pay heed to a brute such as him."

More and more of those usual comments, more and more of the 'fellowship' shining for its absence. Sigh… Who cares about my efforts? Who cares about how hard I try? All they have is envy for those who wear the black dye. Not like the other inductees are any different, also giving me side glances due to 'how better treatment' I get than 'em.

Sigh… This shit blows, and it's only gotten worse since the battles against the Kagerou.

Finally exiting the office area, rid of the whispers, I sigh and shake my head. Easing up my stride, making it to the mess hall, I order my usual. The most modest food they had. Considering that we can order whatever we want from the Castle's kitchen, I could technically ask for something more… elaborate, if I had to describe the difference between the humble dinner I always have and the rest.

But I already learned what would happen if I chose to do that.

Sitting alone in a corner, the buzzing of the news on the TV as a background noise above the calm chatter, at least I can eat in peace. Monotonous and exhausting, but it's nothing I can't handle. Whatever they might say, the one winning the mock battles was our squad. For these three years I tried to reach out and be civil but I learned that keeping quiet is the best option I have.

Shame Koetsu works somewhere else… If only I was placed on his team back then… Sigh… It was the first time ever in which doing my best backfired on me. If I had been working with him, I would have been able to be more present… when she needed me there…

"Ahem… 2nd Lieutenant, sir?" Looking up, I saw one of the young fresh members of my squadron getting closer, tray in hand.

"Oh, Amato-san. What is it?"

His crimson dress as shiny as usual, he sat in front of me, placing his tray filled with the best food in the place slowly besides him. Taking a moment to try to comb his thistle hair backwards, only to yet again fail to tame that odd spike that for some reason shoots out from above his forehead as if it were an actual horn, his thick brows arching when that happened as I couldn't help but to chuckle, Amato then coughed, his gray eyes falling towards me.

"2nd Lt. Shirogane, you wouldn't be already ending your shift, would you?"

"… Uh, yes, that was my intention. Is there anything wrong?" Almost finishing my meal, I slow down as he again seems intent on not letting me turn in early.

"Well, it would set a most foul example as the leader of our flight, in my opinion." Nodding to himself before eating a spoon-fill, the young man remained staring at me in quite the obvious disapproval.

"Sigh… Our shift for the day is over, Amato-san. There is nothing left to report, our patrols are done, and we've already checked on our maintenance."

"While I concede you speak the truth, it is for the good of the squadron that we remain attentive to the duties entrusted to us." Firm as always, what a surprise.

"In that case, what would you rather have us doing at this hour?"

"Readying the reports for tomorrow's duties, for one. I believe the others would certainly agree with me in that preparing the papers beforehand would be in our best interests."

"Well, while that is true, I am going to take a one-week leave. I think you all don't really need me looming over your necks like that."

"I… suppose…" Closing his eyes a bit too tight, he continues to eat. On my end, I finish my meal and take a moment to drink, knowing he's probably not done yet. "However, even if you shall not be present for the following week, I am of the opinion that you should be showing some measure of interest in the activities we shall be partaking in during your absence, 2nd Lieutenant."

"I was informed already, and besides the habitual patrols, there's nothing as intensive as the mock battles we had just a few weeks ago. I'm confident that all of you can manage just fine. There's nothing to worry about." Not like me not being here will make a grand difference, all of you newbies are already decent enough pilots.

Continuing to eat in silence, those thick brows of him arch even more. Taking a second to rest his chopsticks and bring a hand to his chin, he looks at me with clear bother within.

"Sir, I would suggest you to try to maintain your poise when you speak. It does you no good to employ such informality during your duties, in my opinion."

"Come on, now. There's no need to be so stiff while we eat." Let me relax for a moment, dammit.

"Still, I am of the opinion that it is this attitude what spawns all those whispers that have followed our flight regardless of our performance." Not giving an inch, he slowly eats some more.

"Sigh… That's just how I am, Amato-san. There's nothing to be done." One of his brows twitches.

"However… Surely you do not find it pleasant, to be the recipient of such ill comments?"

"… And what is the core matter that creates those whispers?" Tapping my uniform, I simply look away into the ceiling.

He remains quiet, not even touching his food for a moment. It didn't last long, though.

"Even so… You could certainly make an effort to counter these misconceptions our fellows have of you."

"For example?"

"Well, you could begin to arrive on time to the trainings for one."

Guh… Waking up early is something that, to this day, I cannot do. My internal clock says seven in the morning, and no amount of training or tender hugs has changed that. Sigh… But I don't get the luxury of being stubborn anymore. I need this job, and Takeru needs me as well.

"… I suppose you are right in that. Though, I don't know how fast I'll be able to wake up earlier than I do now."

"I believe that the effort would be welcomed. Certainly that isn't out of your reach, 2nd Lieutenant." Smiling faintly, he resumes eating. Sometimes I don't know if he's just blunt or a well-intentioned douche.

"I guess it isn't, really."

And he does have a point. If I want to leave as much behind as I want, and someday be able to live with Takeru again, I gotta to redouble my efforts. And every little detail matters, so that no actual complains can be thrown at me.

Sure, the image others have of me will never change and that's a roadblock I'll never be able to overcome, but that's no excuse to let that ruin everything else I've done until now. I already failed Miho by not providing more and not being by her, I can't fail to protect Takeru.

"Furthermore, if I may, what sort of business requires you to take an entire week of leave, sir?" Again looking at me, a brow rose in curiosity.

"Hm? Oh, I just… want to go visit my boy. It's been… awhile, and I'm sure he'll be happy to have an entire week with me now."

"Oh, I wasn't aware… So you have a son?"

"Yeah, he's six and a half now. And no, I can't wait until my month of vacation." Shooting down his retort, he groans a bit. Again sending a hand to his hair, and again failing to flatten the spiky horn, his brows arch down more and more.

"Well… I suppose I can understand why you'd be in a hurry then. However, can you truly not delay the visit until your vacation?"

"No, I simply can't. He needs me there, now."

"Uh, is… Would he happen to be sick?"

"No, it's not that. It's… Sigh… It's complicated."

"My apologies, sir. I did not meant to pry."

"It's fine, really." Waving a hand in the air, I force a smile. "Anyways, my house needs me present over there, and this is what I have to do as a parent. So, you all simply keep up the good work as you've been doing so far."

"Eh? You… believe we've been faring well so far, sir?" Staring right at me, seems I caught him off guard for some reason.

"Yeah? I mean, you three are already good enough despite just joining in a month or so ago. Sure, you can get better, but your starting base is decent. You also deal with the office work in stride, and in your case I know I can leave knowing someone will handle any issues that arise nicely."

He might be a bit blunt and hesitant to affirm stuff, but Amato-san is by a long shot the most tactful of the new recruits. I mean, despite his obvious views and opinion, he still comes to talk with me, to actually hold a conversation with me despite being the son of a High Shinpan house. That's way, way more than what many others have done in the three years I've spent here.

"… Uh, thank you, sir. However, I… I do not believe I could handle any sort of issue that might occur." Hunching over a bit, lips turning into a small line, kinda seems as if he had swallowed brine.

"I mean, you're the most polite and proper of the flight. If someone has to handle the delivery of the reports to the Colonels, I honestly think it should be you."

"… And not because of my station, sir?"

"No, you just have to be like how you are when you talk with me, and you should be fine. I mean, I've been doing this for three years despite my manners. You have nothing to worry about, Amato-san."

"Is that so?" Easing up in his tension, he starts eating again.

"… I know that people also talk behind your back, and that part of that is thanks to me being your superior, but believe me when I say you're doing fine so far." Lips shook for a moment, then he sighed and nodded.

Of course, being the son of one of the four Shinpan Houses of the fellowship, the direct underlings of the Koubuins, having him serve under a commoner hasn't been received well by all the onlookers. And as hard as it is for me, the whispers also follow the three boys that have been placed under me. I know my words might not have much weight for them, but recognizing their good points is all I can do for now, until another batch of mock battles come and we prove to the others what we're made of.

"Well, best of luck in this week. I guess now it'll be your turn to face the Colonels in the dojo." Cracking a smirk at him, he twitches at my words.

"Eh? S-Surely you jest, sir?"

"Ohoho, I'm not. I am leaving for a week, so you three are under the Colonels' watch for the armored kendo practices. May the tailwind remain at your back, Amato-san." Hunching over as he rubbed one of his wrists, he groaned quite wearily like a puppy looking at an empty bowl.

"Are the matches as arduous as the rumors say?"

"Yes. The Tsukuyomi Brothers are truly fierce in a dojo. So don't take it too hard if you lose badly, I doubt any of you will be able to best them or their fellows." And I know that for all the spunk you show when you come talk with me, you take the comments of the others equally as bad as I did before.

"Sigh… It's just like back home…"

"Hm? What do you mean?" Does he have a fierce kendo teacher in his house?

"N-Nothing, sir." Plucking his lips, still as a tree, he looks away. "… I shall perform at my best. In that regard, well, did you have any advice to give us for this coming week?"

"No, not really. Again, just try to get a feel for what the Zuikaku can really do in the JIVES. Focus on what you do best, and then keep an eye for your worst trait. Believe me, you will be made to know what it is."

"Ugh… I shan't let those words hamper my efforts." Clenching a fist, as well as his cheeks, a long, heavy puff of air left him once he let the frown melt away.

"Just don't take things too hard, Amato-san. Everyone starts from somewhere. Well, I'll be taking me leave." Standing up, we share a salute. "Good night, and see you in around a week."

"… It should be 'in a week's time', sir. Please do remember to keep your poise while on duty." Narrowing his eyes and brows a bit, I can't help but to chuckle at the last minute correction. "In any case, I hope your week of leave is pleasant for you, sir."

Nodding back at him, I take my tray back to the counter and leave the mess hall. Now walking slowly, no longer minding the stares and whispers, I retreat towards my room on the barracks on the Castle Grounds.

Still, it's hard to believe they made me into a flight leader despite not getting a promotion. All of them might be fresh out of the training program of the guard, but they're all nobles. Worst, Amato-san is a High Shinpan so his family must not be very pleased about this arrangement. Just imagine when they learned of this.

" Hey, your son, that you've been raising to be at the top of this nation since birth, is now working under a baseborn!"

And then, whoever delivered the news was cut in half and hanged on a pike or something.

Sometimes I wonder why Takahisa-sama does what he does, it feels completely random and out of place. I know I performed better than ever on these last mock battles against the Kagerou, but to put these fresh recruits, and the son of one of the four Shinpan Houses of the fellowship no less, under my watch… Why did he do that? After all the mess with me wanting to leave and them sending the daughter of a Shinpan to look after Takeru… I don't get it.

Eh, at least Amato-san is tactful enough. Sure, he also is oddly insistent in marking my mistakes and 'lacking speech', but at least we can hold a conversation. And for all the poise he tries to show off, he's just like I was when I had just come here, taking the whispers as hard as a kick to the nuts.

Reaching my room, taking my dress off, entering the shower, I simply relax. It's going to be a long travel back to Hiiragi. All these time… all these months…

How has he been? Put under Col. Kazora's daughter no less, I doubt she'd have much patience for him, knowing how stubborn Takeru is at times. And… And as precious as this time is… it's just a week. And then, I'm gone until the end of the year. For only a month. And then… Who knows when I'll be able to see him again?

No, I shouldn't… I shouldn't worry like this… He doesn't need me like this. Gotta get my shit together, he's hurting far more than me, I'm sure.

Getting out of the bath and taking care of what little was left to do, I threw myself on my bed, since I need to wake up early.

Yet no matter how much I turned and hugged my sides, it took me a long while to fall asleep.

---

Next Day. Near 6 PM.

( Hiiragi District. Near Takeru's House.)

---

I slowly walk on the streets of Hiiragi, feeling the pleasant warmness of summer starting to appear in our weather.

In just a few minutes I'll be home, and finally… I'll see him again. As well as the person that's been taking care of him. Still, Takahisa-sama himself said she was doing a good job. But this is Col. Tsukuyomi's daughter we're talking about. How on earth is she taking care of him? She… hasn't been harsh on him, right?

As if I have any right to complain, I left Takeru all alone in the end.

Unable to lift my face off the street, I keep walking back home. As I got closer, I could see some lights were on. I licked my lips as my finger halted its way onto the doorbell. Looking down again, I took one deep breath. What am I even going to tell him? I can't stay for more than a week, I'll have to leave him alone again.

Even if Miho asked me to keep working… Even if Takahisa-sama says he will look after him… Is this the right thing to do?

I ring the doorbell after hesitating for another while. Soon, footsteps reach my ears. The door opens to reveal a young woman with turquoise eyes, like those of the Colonel, dressed in a simple crimson and white dress.

"Good evening. I suppose you would be Kageyuki Shirogane-san?"

"Ah, yes. That's me. Um… You're Col. Tsukuyomi's daughter, right?"

"Yes, that is the case." The woman then did a short bow towards me. "My name is Maya Tsukuyomi. I have been entrusted with the duty of looking after your son. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance."

"Yes, it's a pleasure. So, uh, is Takeru-"

"Please, do come in. I was preparing dinner, it will be done soon." She stepped to a side, making way for me to enter.

I bow to her and come in, taking my shoes off at the entrance. A strong scent reaches my nose as I walk into the kitchen. I don't know what she's making but it smells good.

"So… Tsukuyomi-san, where is Takeru?"

"Maya-san will suffice, Kageyuki-san."

"No, you're a noble. I can't use your name, and you don't have to address me so formally either." I say scratching my head as I give her a small bow.

"Please, I am working for you as of now. There is no need to show such stiffness in your words."

"Um… Are you testing me, maybe?"

"Testing you?" She looked straight at me as she tapped her glasses.

"Yes, your father did something similar to this when I had just arrived to the Guard." Once I relaxed and spoke in my usual way he rebuked me and told me I wasn't fit to be one of them.

"Do forgive me, but I am not my father." Despite not using the same words, her stare is as imposing as his though. "Furthermore, I am already acquainted to Takeru's speech mannerisms by now. I sincerely doubt you could be worse."

"… I see. How has he been? Where is he?"

"Oh, he should be upstairs. I shall be finishing dinner, please feel free to go to him. He has missed you much in these months." She doesn't seem to be a bad person… But I can't tell what she thinks behind that poker face.

"Alright, I'll be going. And… Uuh… Thanks for looking after him, Tsukuyomi-san. I really appreciate it."

"Sigh… No thanks are needed, I am merely performing the duty that was entrusted to me. And as I said, Maya-san will suffice."

"Okay?" I didn't think she would be so frontal. "So, he's upstairs in his room?"

"Yes, we can talk at large after dinner. In the meantime, please do go to Takeru's side." She gave me another small bow then turned around and went to the kitchen.

She… doesn't seem to mind being here as much as I thought she would. Or maybe she's just being polite. I leave my bag on a chair and go up the stairs. Going to his room, feeling my heart pounding against my chest, I manage to grab the doorknob and open the door.

"Takeru?" I slowly enter the room.

… And I'm met with nothing.

He isn't here. His bed is neatly done, so I can tell he isn't under the sheets. The room isn't so big to give him a hiding place. I look under his bed, but he also isn't there and he also isn't hidden in his wardrobe. And if he was hiding for whatever reason, he would have… come to greet me.

… Takeru isn't here.

My heart starts beating faster, now for a different reason. Entering into alert mode as if I had just heard the 991 Alarm, I rush down the stairs into the kitchen.

"Tsukuyomi-san, what is the meaning of this?!"

"Eh? Excuse me, whatever is the matter?"

"Don't play dumb! Where is Takeru?!"

"As I said, he's in his-"

"He isn't there. His room was empty!" And he would have heard me coming home if he was in the bathroom.

"Huh? What do you mean?" She moved away from the pots, narrowing her brows.

"You heard me. Takeru isn't on his room. Where is he?"

"He isn't in… For the Holy Emperor, don't tell me he…" Tsukuyomi rushed past me as she frowned.

I followed her and we wound up on the door that leaded to the backyard. It was unlocked, but she closed it immediately. She sighed and seemed to be rubbing her forehead.

"Takeru, why you… How could I forget to lock the door?"

"Tsukuyomi-san, where is Takeru? What is the-"

"Please rest assured, Kageyuki-san." She turned around and tapped her glasses, still frowning. "Whenever this happens, it means Takeru went to the Kagami's house. Forgive me, when I received a call that you would be coming home I was in the middle of picking up the laundry. I seem to have forgotten to lock the door." She gave me a bow, hands joined as she did.

"… Why? Why does Takeru runs off to Haruna-san's house? Is he not pleased to be here?" Takeru never ran away while Miho was here. Why would he… What is she doing to him?!

"Because he's bored."

"… Bored?"

"Yes, I cannot tend to him while I am cooking or working. So, from time to time, he goes to the Kagami's house to pass the time until dinner is ready after he does his homework. Though it has been a long time since he did so without me noticing." She again tapped her glasses as her tone took that severe edge the Colonel makes all the time.

"So Takeru leaves to Haruna-san's house when he's bored? Have you not scolded him when he does it?"

"Of course I have, but I believe you would know how stubborn he is." Well, yeah. Takeru can be very hard to deal with when an idea gets in his head. "I will not complain about your reaction, considering how you must worry for him. That being said, I find your scowl and words towards me most insulting." She took a step forward, folding her arms. "I have been taking proper care of Takeru. I would like you to know that his grades have improved much since I have been supervising his lessons. You do not need to doubt me so, I know Father can be most abrasive even when unnecessary, however I am not such a hostile person. Your son is in good hands, you can place your trust in me."

"… Sorry, I shouldn't have screamed at you." Not when she's the one taking care of him and I'm the one who's never around. I hang my head, sighing the tension out.

"No apologies are needed. Please do go bring him here. I shall-"

"Can I ask you something, Tsukuyomi-san?"

"… Yes, you can. However, I believe I said you could simply refer to me as Maya-san." I ignore her complaining and exhale loudly, scratching my nose.

"Why did you accept?"

"Accept what?"

"Taking care of my son. I know many nobles dislike us commoners, I know this task must be something like a punishment for someone of your station. Why did you stay with Takeru?"

Both Tsukuyomis in the Guard are nothing short of the stereotype of the old prideful and stoic men. Being the daughter of one of them, having been raised as the member of a Shinpan House… What reason could she have to stay here? What did Takahisa-sama do to have her accept the orders and to stay here for so long?

She closes her eyes and remains silently standing there for a while. Barely opening them, she takes her glasses off to rub her eyes and brush some hair out of her face. Once she put them on again, she directs a calmer gaze my way.

"At first, I was most upset at this turn of events. To be frank, had Yohime-sama not been the one to give me the order I would have refused to be the caretaker of your son." She then brings a hand to her ear, playing with her hair. "However, in my stay here I learned many valuable lessons. I know my Father and Uncle have most assuredly been harsh to you due to your roots, however I realized there is no need to show such hostilities to my peasant fellows. Your son… was most kind to me when I was feeling dejected at this task I was made to perform."

"Takeru? What did he do?"

"He… praised me and remained by my side." Why did she stop for a second there? "Your son is a very kind person, and even if his manners do leave much to be desired I do not regret staying here. He also has aided my own sister on his visits to the Main House."

"Talking about that, why are you two going there?"

"Oh, Takeru said he wanted to learn kendo so he practices there on the weekends. I believe you had left him a wooden blade for that purpose?"

"… Ah, that's true." After Miho died I completely forgot about that present we gave him. "So… So you're getting along with him?"

"Yes, to the point that he refers to me as his sister."

"Huh?! Really? Sorry, he's just a kid. Takeru doesn't-" She extends a hand, her expression relaxed.

"It is alright. Again, I am not troubled by his usual demeanor. You can trust in me keeping him safe while you work, Kageyuki-san."

"So… Until when will you stay with him?" She suddenly furrowed her brows.

"I was assigned as Takeru's retainer, therefore I shall stay with him until the day you finish serving in the Guard. For that reason I was given a computer and a secure connection to aid my fellows in their work back at the Main House while Takeru is at school. And while I do not intend to boast, I believe him to be comfortable with me as his caretaker. Has someone suggested the idea of replacing me, by any chance?" She took a step forward, not letting go of my gaze as if she were an angry crab.

"No, no one did. I just… assumed you would want to return to your duties in the Guard."

"Well, I can still do some of them while I am here. Worry not, your son is in good hands." She's being honest, since she got really pissed off at my last words. So she really… is taking care of Takeru well.

"I see… Thanks… Thanks, Tsukuyomi-san."

"Please, Maya-san is enough."

"No, I'm… really thankful to you. Sorry for having screamed at you."

"It is alright. Please go for Takeru." I nod at her and go to the door.

She really is very patient. Sigh… What an idiot I am, screaming like that. She even said she's willing to stay here with him until I can finish my active duties on the Guard, whenever that is. And… I don't feel that rejection her father has in his words from hers.

Going back to the street, I reach the Kagami's door and ring the doorbell. Just a moment later, Haruna-san opened the door.

"Kageyuki-san?! I didn't knew you were home!"

"Good evening, Haruna-san. I just arrived. I was told Takeru might be here?"

"Oh! Yes, he's in the living room reading with Sumika."

"Does he come here frequently?"

"Haha, yes, he does. He says reading by himself isn't fun and so he comes to be with Sumika all the time." She says with the same sunshine she always has on her face. I am so lucky to have found such good people to look after him.

"I see. Thanks a lot for having so much patience for him."

"No, on the contrary, it's a great help to have him come visit. Come on in, please."

I enter her house, it hasn't changed at all since I last was here. Looking into the place, I saw the two little ones sitting on the small sofa that was near a wall.

"Takeru-chan, how come the granny survived being inside the wolf?" Sumika asked him as she leaned on his shoulder.

"How should I know that? Even the foreigners' tales are weird." He was plucking his lips at the book.

It seems that they were reading Crimson Raiding Hood. I simply stood by the doorway into the living room watching him as he read the book out loud as Sumika kept making questions about it. Once he finished it, he looked up from the pages. And our eyes met.

"Hey, Takeru."

"Dad!" He dropped the book and came rushing to my side. "Welcome back!" I crouched and gave him a hug as he got to my side.

"How have you been, Takeru?" I ruffled his hair as I took a good look at him. He seems healthy, has no bruises on him, sounds as fine and energetic as always.

"I'm fine, don't worry."

"So, what were you doing here?"

"I came to read with Sumika. It's boring waiting alone until Maya-nee finishes dinner."

"Maya-nee? Takeru, does Tsukuyomi-san let you call her like that?"

"Yeah, she said it's fine. Why?"

"… Nothing, don't worry. So, were you having fun with Sumika?" He smiles widely as he nods.

"Yeah, she always reads with me at night. Though…" His brows lowered a bit. "All these tales are really weird. Dad, how did the granny survive being inside the wolf if he ate her?" Sumika also came close, wanting to hear my answer.

"Huh… That's because… The wolf didn't eat her, he swallowed her."

"Isn't it the same?"

"No, to eat something you have to chew it. If you don't, then it doesn't count." I laugh as their widening eyes, how much did I miss fooling around with you.

"So… If I eat some fruit and I don't chew it, what happens?"

"A tree is gonna grow on your belly. So, you better start chewing your food, Takeru." I ruffle his hair as he raises his brows in surprise.

"Well, dinner should be done in a short while. Let's go home, Takeru."

"Yeah, let's go home." He grabbed onto my arm, a smile plastered on his face. "Well, we'll keep reading more tomorrow Sumika." He then went to Sumika's side and gave her a tight hug.

"Yes… See you tomorrow, Takeru-chan." He nodded and ended the hug.

"Thanks for reading with him all the time, Sumika." I went to her side and ruffled her hair. She giggled as I did.

"No, it's really fun. But all the tales are really weird." Takeru nods to her words.

"Haha, they are old tales after all. Well, we should be going. Thanks again, Sumika." She smiles and follows us as we made our way to the door.

"See you tomorrow, Haruna-san." Takeru said once we got outside.

"Yes, see you tomorrow."

"Thanks for looking out for him all this time." I give her a small bow, she sighs and then smiles at me.

"It's not a problem. It helps a lot to have him visit. Right, Sumika?"

"… Yes." The little one nodded, her eyes on the ground in embarrassment.

"Well, we should be going. Thanks again, and see you tomorrow."

I give her a small bow, Takeru waved at them as both of them did while we walked to our house, before then closing the door.

"So, do you come visit them often?"

"Yeah! Reading alone is boring, so once I do my homework I go to read with Sumika." He says, all smiles in him.

"I see… That's good to hear."

"Hey, Dad…"

"What's up?"

"Did Mom come back home too?"

"… Not yet. Let's be a bit more patient with Mom, okay Takeru?"

"… Yes. Are you going back to the samurai tomorrow?"

"No, I'm staying home for a week this time."

"Really?!"

"Yes, so we'll get to read together all the books you want." He then hugged my arm again.

"Thanks, Dad. Oh, but tomorrow I gotta go train. Will you come with me?"

I open the door and bring us both inside, after closing I look at him again.

"Takeru, what do you mean by training?"

"Hm? Maya-nee takes me to train with Mion and Shion. And I visit Yuuhi while I'm there too."

"But… What the… Takeru, since when have you been doing this?"

"Um…" He folds his arms and looks up, furrowing his brows as he groans a bit. "The first time we went was in March, I think."

Why did nobody told me of this? And more importantly…

"Takeru, when you say Yuuhi, do you mean Yohime-sama's daughter?"

"Yeah, we're really good friends." He smiles again as he nods.

"… And Mion and Shion are… the little sisters of the Tsukuyomi, right?"

"Yeah, that's right. The Pickles are also my friends."

"… Pickles?"

"Don't they look like pickles? Their hair is all green, and they're always so bitter… At first they didn't really like me, they were making this really scary face all the time, so I thought they were like those pickles Maya-nee made me eat once." He says as he puffs his cheeks.

As we go into the kitchen and sit, I think about what he just told me. It seems he's been made to interact with the young nobles, and nobody told me a thing about it. Why? Knowing how both Tsukuyomi brother think, I can't see them agreeing to this.

"And do they treat you badly now?"

"No, not anymore. Well, Shion sometimes does. She gets really angry from time to time when she doesn't do something as she wants. I don't get it, she's so good but she still gets so mad about stuff. She's such a dumb pickle." Takeru says puffing his chest.

Tsukuyomi-san was carrying some plates when we got to the kitchen, and so I helped her serve dinner while Takeru told me of his trainings. Of how he's starting to get better at shogi but still is learning the basics of kendo, of how he and Shion are evenly matched in juggling, of how he and Mion are reading together that book of pirates he didn't want to read back then. Tsukuyomi-san sent a glare at Takeru as she served him his food when he again called the young ones pickles.

"Takeru, I told you to not call them in that way. It is rude to refer to Shion and Mion in such a way."

"But they're always so bitter…"

"Tsukuyomi-san, why has Takeru been meeting your relatives?"

"Well, Takeru told Yohime-sama he wanted to learn to use a blade and she allowed him to go train in our dojo during the weekends."

"I see…" Is that really all there is to this? It can't be, why would they allow a normal boy to be so close to them? "And what about Yuuhi-sama? He said they're friends…" Tsukuyomi-san sighs as she shakes her head slightly.

"Yes, that is the case. Takeru approached her as he usually does when they met and she seems to have taken an interest in him. I believe they get along well as of now. He gave her a spinning top as a present, and since their birthday is on the same date, they promised to share their birthdays from now on."

"Wait, what? I… Wait, so you're telling me Yohime-sama and Takahisa-sama are okay with this?"

"… Were you not told of this, Kageyuki-san?"

"No, not a word. I mean… How did he even manage to get in her good side?"I look at Takeru, who didn't wait for us to sit down to start devouring his food.

"Well, Takeru can be very kind when he wants to. As nobles, Yuuhi-sama, my sister and younger cousin did not know what… friendship was."

"How do you mean? Why would they allow a commoner to be so close to her?" Just to be friends? That… doesn't sound convincing at all.

"… As I said, Yuuhi-sama was truly happy when they met, and albeit they didn't welcome his presence at first, both my sister and younger cousin seem to be growing to favor Takeru as well."

"… So, can you tell me how it happened?" She nods, once we both sit down.

She then tells me of how she saw their exchanges as we ate. Of how Yuuhi-sama was overjoyed to have a friend, of how her sister disliked Takeru at first and of how she's slowly warming up to him as they go visit them and play with the toys and books Takeru takes with him, of how her younger cousin started talking more and regained her smile thanks to Takeru helping her realize how good she actually was when practicing together and by simply wanting to read and have fun with her.

"He actually noticed how much time Shion takes before moving back during his very first practice against her. Then, he told Mion of it and thanks to that their duels are more even now. And thanks to his open friendliness, Mion is no longer as silent and stiff as she was. She even seems to have developed a sweet tooth thanks to him." Tsukuyomi-san said as we ate.

"A sweet tooth? How so?"

"That's because I told them to have cake and Mion ate it all herself once." Takeru said in a pouty voice before continuing to eat at his rice.

"… Cake? Did they have a birthday party?" She then sighs as she nods.

"Yes, Takeru suggested them to hold parties for their birthdays, which were around a month apart from each other. Mion enjoyed sharing cake with Takeru and Shion during the latter's birthday as they read one of those books about pirates, which was how Shion began to find him entertaining. So, when her birthday grew closer, Mion asked my older cousin to have cake as well. Her sister then baked her one that she liked much, and then proceeded to eat most of it herself." Furrowing her brows, tapping her glasses, she sighs again. "Despite my Father and Uncle's repining at the time, Mion said she had much fun that day, and she smiled as she hadn't in a long time. Sadly, since then she seems to look forward to eating sweet food, and my cousin has told me she has come down with a stomach ache a few times."

"… So Takeru was a bad influence for them, huh."

"No, on the contrary." She again taps her glasses, then looks at him softening her gaze. "Thanks to him, my younger cousin and sister are getting along much better than before. While Shion is still rather rude around Takeru, he isn't a bad influence at all. They needed a friend to relax around from all the pressure of our training as Royal Guards, and he also seems to enjoy his time in the Main House."

"Takeru, do you like going there?"

"Yeah! It's really fun. One of these days we're gonna beat Shion at something." He rose a little fist up, puffing his cheeks again.

I smile and laugh at his reaction. So he's a friend of them… I let out some air, my shoulders relaxing a bit as I let go of the ball of nerves that was making my heart race in worry. If he's this happy about it, it means he isn't being treated badly. We kept eating as Takeru told me of his trainings and Tsukuyomi-san commented on his words. Once we were done, I took him to his room.

"So, you really practice with them every weekend?" I ask Takeru as we go up the stairs.

"Yeah, but I still can't win. They might be girls, but the Pickles are really strong. Did you also have to train like that to be a samurai, Dad?"

"Well, yeah." I was put under Col. Kazora's care for my kendo lessons when my induction was approved. My arms and rear are crying all over again simply by remembering those days, at times it felt as if he would end up slashing me in half to be honest. "It was really hard, so I can understand how you feel perfectly." He never held back, not even once. It was like diving into a sea of fire, entering the dojo. "By the way, nobody treats you badly when you go to the Main House?"

"Hmm… They Pickles' Dads don't really like me." He plucks his lips as we get to his room's door. "They always have these scary eyes on their face, like they're always angry at something. The other samurais there also look at me kinda scary."

"I see… But they're not bad with you?"

"They don't really talk with me, and don't answer when I greet them. There's also the old woman that's always with Yuuhi, she also doesn't talk with me. But nobody is being mean like back in the other school." He then smiles, which means I can rest easy.

I will have to ask about what's going on here, though. They wouldn't… be planning to have him join the Guard as well, right? What reason could a Regent House have to let a simple boy like Takeru be so close to their heirs? They're always so detached from the rest of us, the common folk only ever gets to see them in the news or in some odd announcement.

I help Takeru to get in his pajama, sitting by the side of his bed once he gets under his sheets. I breathe in, softly ruffling his hair for a moment. All the aching I was feeling vanished for a moment, because he's alright. Alert mode finally turned off, I simply smiled naturally at him.

"Dad, can you read me a story?"

"Sure. By the way, does Tsukuyomi-san read you something before bed?" He pouts, looking a bit away.

"… Only if I'm good."

"Hahaha… Do you really like her, Takeru?"

"Yeah, she can be scary sometimes, but Maya-nee is really nice." And again, he smiles without delay.

"I see… That's good to hear. Really… That's good. So, what would you like me to read you?"

"Hmm… Oh, what about Banzel and Kretel? I haven't read that one yet."

"Lemme see… This one?" I went to the rack with the books, picking up a foreign tale. "I didn't knew you liked these tales."

"Me and Sumika wanted to see if they were also as weird as our tales. But I still don't get most of them…"

"Hm? Are they hard to read?"

"No, they're really weird." He raises a hand, then makes it a tiny fist.

He then told me of what he thought about Heater Pan, Crimson Hood, Liger in Boots, Binocchio, and all the other books he and Sumika have been reading, for school or just for fun. The, he complained about how Sumika doesn't like scary stories.

"So, there's a part where Binocchio gets ambushed by these two mean thieves… So, when we got to it, Sumika screamed when she saw them attacking Binocchio."

"Are they that scary?"

"Well… N-No." He looked away, so he's trying to play tough. You silly, little Takeru. "But they were all dark because they had these long, black capes covering their faces and it was raining, so the sky was all dark too in the drawing. I… wasn't that scared, but Sumika didn't like them at all, so we stopped reading then because she started complaining. So when I went to visit her the next day to keep reading, she had scribbled all over those pages!"

"Eh?! Really?"

"Yeah, she just grabbed a bunch of pencils and scribbled them over, and when I tried to read them she just passed them in a flash. We don't need to read this part, she said." He pouts, crossing his arms.

"What did Haruna-san said then?"

"She started laughing at us! I asked her for help, because Sumika wasn't letting me read, and she just laughed for a while."

I would have laughed at that too, I bet seeing Sumika doing that was too precious for her, considering what she told me before. She simply must have been delighted. I wish I could have been there to see you two quarrel about that.

"Well, don't worry. So, does this book have the scribbles?"

"No, that was Sumika's book. I asked Maya-nee to buy me this one so that I could read it all. She had me pass a history test with a good grade, though."

"So you're also doing well in school?"

"Yeah. Maya-nee is really strict about homework."

"And… you're not getting into more fights?"

"… Sometimes I do. Especially with that dumb Jouji."

"Is he mean to you?"

"Well… He's kind of a jerk." Furrowing his brows, again he pouts. "He thinks he's so great because he's good in baseball, and is always being so loud. He's not bad but… I dunno why he keeps bothering me."

He then tells me this Jouji usually competes with him to see who gets the better grades or does things better in PE, and that he's always trying to convince Sumika that he's better. However, when I asked if he was also being mean to Jouji, he admitted he also poked fun at the boy whenever his scores were higher.

"Maybe he's just trying to be your friend, in his own way. Don't be mean to him, Takeru."

"Really? But, why is he always asking Sumika who she thinks is better?"

"Beats me, maybe he just wants to be friends with both of you?"

"Hmm… I dunno, he's so dumb if that's true. Why can't he just say he wants to play with us?"

"He might be shy, you never know. But remember Takeru, you don't have to punch anyone, no matter what they say." It would be troublesome if he did that in the Main House, and it's time for him to stop reacting like that too. Now that Miho is gone, I have to be more strict with him too. "If you get in trouble, I'll get angry at you."

"Okay… I'll try to not get into fights anymore. But then there's these girls, and they're really mean to Sumika."

"Oh, so you're defending her?"

"Yeah, since she starts crying on the way back home sometimes. I hate those dumb girls. Jouji also hates them, they're so mean."

"Sigh… Still, no fighting." I ruffle his hair softly, I can't blame him after all. It's what I did for Koetsu all those years ago. Until Dad reprimanded me for harming someone. "Can you promise me you'll be good?"

"… Yes. So… Will you be coming home more often?"

"… I don't know. I have a lot of work to do, but I'll see what I can do. Well, should we start?" I open the book, sitting by the side of his bed.

"Thanks, Dad." He got closer, giving me a kiss on the cheek before I started, making my eyes almost let out a few tears for a second there. Back on his pillow, he stared at me as he waited.

And so, I read him the book. I did so slowly, both to prolong this moment for as long as I could and to help him fall asleep. I enjoyed his stare on me, and his surprise at things he had forgotten. Once I saw him start to nod off, I lowered my voice, getting closer to him.

Once he fell asleep, I remained by his side brushing his hair off his forehead. Again simply lying by his side, our forehead touching, I closed my eyes and again let the minutes tickle away. A certain pleasant numbness spreading through me, I don't know how much time it passed until I mustered enough willpower to stand up.

Kissing his cheek once softly, delaying my exit for some seconds to whisper good nights into his ear, I left Takeru's side. I also left the shadows that had been following me all this time. No longer walking with strong steps, no longer with a pressure in my chest, my breathing calm and relaxed, I descended the stairs.

"Is he asleep now?"

"Yes. Thanks again, Tsukuyomi-san. For everything you've done." I give her a bow, remaining down for a second.

"… There is no need. I am merely doing what is expected of me."

"So, now that he's sound asleep…" I sit down on a chair, she sits in front of me. "What can you tell me of these visits to the Main House?"

"There isn't much more to say. He insisted on coming with me when I was called back for my report, and since I had promised to give him some basic sword training when I found him using that sword, Yohime-sama allowed him to go there each weekend."

"And why is that? Why was I not told of this?"

"I do not know. However, all I said is true. Me and my older cousin believe both Yuuhi-sama and our sisters needed a friend, a confidant if you may. Takeru simply was his usual self when around them."

"I see… And what about both Colonels? I doubt the other members of the Main House enjoy seeing him there, to be honest."

"While that is true… Our lord gave him his blessing, so you can rest easy for nothing shall happen to Takeru while he's there. I shall make sure of it." Tapping her glasses, she returns a straight gaze my way.

"Sigh… Thanks, really. So, well, forgive the question but… Nobody is planning on inducting him into the Royal Guard, right?"

"Perish the thought, Kageyuki-san." Her eyes grew piercing, her voice imposing as her father's. "I myself am against such an arrangement, and furthermore, Yohime-sama herself said she harbors no such intentions. Worry not, no one is going to force Takeru to join the Guard."

"Sigh… Sorry for asking."

"It is fine, and understandable. If I may, might I ask a personal question to you?" She said, tapping her glasses. I nod, resting an arm on the table. "Does Takeru know of his mother's passing?"

"… No, I couldn't bring myself to tell him what death means. Why do you ask?"

"He once… asked me not to leave him. He seemed to think you also had left somewhere and weren't coming back." Her gaze lowers, I can't even begin to guess what she's thinking about.

"I see. Could you… well, try to explain it to him if you find the right moment? I… I don't… know if I…" Again, a knot forms on my throat.

"It is alright. I shall find a way to deal with this matter." She said, in a business-like manner.

"Thanks, Tsukuyomi-san. And sorry for pushing this on your shoulders."

"No thanks are needed, I am merely performing my duty. Also, I told you Maya-san was fine." She narrows her eyes just a bit. I suppose she isn't testing me, so I could call her that, if it bothers her that much.

"Okay, thanks again Maya-san. Well, about these trainings… If not to join the Guard, what was the reason behind this?"

"As I said before, Yohime-sama said she merely wished for Takeru to be a friend to Yuuhi-sama, my sister and younger cousin. To be someone they can consult in the future. Since they don't interact with people outside of their circles, Takeru is the only one who can show them how it is the life of the peasantry. And he said he wanted to learn to use a sword to see you once more, so Yohime-sama simply allowed him to train there during our visits."

So Yohime-sama is as random as Takahisa-sama, huh? Are they really… just being kind to Takeru? No, why would they? Why him instead of any other kid, from those around Osaka even? I'm sure it must be hard to have him visit from so far away, would be really bad if someone came asking why was a commoner coming and going to the Koubuin Main House.

"But, why him? Why not another kid from the nearby area of the Main House?"

"I believe I said so already. Takeru was friendly with Yuuhi-sama instead of growing tense as others tend to do."

"… Just that?"

"It is no small feat, actually. Never trying to gain favors or ask for anything in return more than some time to play, honestly enjoying himself in their company while treating them normally, and coming from a family who we know has been loyal to our House, I doubt there are many young children who would act as your son does. Either they would grow respectful or… well, their families might try to gain a benefit out of the interaction."

"… Well, but now you're here taking care of him… You can't say I don't gain anything by this."

"Yet, this arrangement was a reward our lord Takahisa-sama gave you for your devoted service. Were you… wishing to ask for anything else?" Narrowing her eyes, I sigh as I shake my head.

"Of course not. I just… don't get it. I'm just a soldier, and Takeru's just being himself. Why would they let him be there?"

"Is it so hard to accept they see a good, honest fellow in both of you?"

"And just for that… they allow a commoner to be around the heir of a Regent House?"

"Well…" One of her brows lowers. "While I was told your services are much appreciated, and at first I also saw this as you do, I do believe it is doing good for all four of them. Perhaps that is why Takahisa-sama has given his agreement for this visits to continue. And to reiterate, I myself voiced my opposition to use this dream of his to induct him, so you can rest assured Kageyuki-san. Takeru won't be forced to join the Guard, not while I'm his retainer."

Her tone was strong enough to tumble down a TSF, her eyes had that piercing feel just like the Colonel's. She is being honest. Again, I let out a long sigh. Alongside it, the toxic thoughts that clogged my mind also left my insides. He's in good hands… Thank the Holy Emperor, he's in good hands.

"… So, I have one final question for today."

"What is it?"

"Were you told of what would happen to Takeru if I died during my duty?"

"… No, I was not. I suppose he would be sent to an orphanage."

"… I see."

Of course, they're already doing more than enough. Sending one of the Tsukuyomi here, letting Takeru go to the Main House… I am relieved beyond words to see he's in good hands. For now, that will be enough.

"Then, could I go with you to the Main House tomorrow? I would like to clear some of this stuff with Takahisa-sama or Yohime-sama if they have the time."

"Hmm… I don't see why not. We usually depart as soon as he comes back from school, would that alright?"

"Yeah, don't worry. And thanks again for everything, Maya-san."

"Please, it is alright. Did you need anything else of me?"

"Yeah, I was wondering if… you could tell me of how he's been all these months. I know you must be tired… But…"

"It is no problem. Now then… Where should I begin?" She brought a hand to her chin, moving her head as if she were nodding off. "Oh, I suppose I should start with our first week together. You see, Takeru gave me much trouble when he didn't want to do his homework. At the time, he-"

Chapter 46: Ignoble Integration

---

June 17th, 1989 Around 2 PM.

(Near the Koubuin House.)

[Kageyuki]

---

After going to pick up Takeru from his morning classes in school, we were ready to depart to Osaka. I thought we would have to use the public trains, and that's why Maya-san had gotten up so early to ready herself, and why she asked me to go buy 'souvenirs' to take with us. I still can't believe they would send a freaking limo to pick us up at the station, even more to have had us use the Royal Guard's private trains to get to Osaka.

Even less for us to now be entering through the main gates, as if we were important guests. I remember seeing the main houses on TV, being amazed at how imposing they looked… But seeing them in person is completely different, I'm simply awestruck. Being but an inductee I was never called here, I always stayed in our outpost near the Osaka Castle. And, well, my 'fellows' don't exactly like me, so I never thought I would ever set foot in this place. To think Takeru did so before me… Life is weird sometimes.

"Maya-san, is this really alright?" I say in a whisper, while she was trying to keep Takeru from staring out the window.

"Hm? Yes, why would there be a problem?"

"Well, two commoners are coming in a limo, using your private trains, entering through the main gate. I think some people are not going to take this nicely."

"… I can understand you worry, but rest assured. As much as some would like to voice their opposition, this has been allowed by Yohime-sama. Let me be the one in the lead, in case anyone sees your presence with foul eyes."

"Yes, I agree. Thanks again, Maya-san."

"No, it is nothing."

"Say, Dad…" Takeru looked back from the window towards us. "Do you know why they put a pond over there?"

"… I think it's just for decorating. Back in my school, we also had a pond with Koi fish."

"Really? Why does my school not have one?"

"Well, it's kind of an old custom, so new schools probably don't have them."

"Ooh… Why were there fish in the pond? Did you eat them?"

"Of course not, Takeru. It was just to have some… sort of atmosphere set."

"… I don't get it." He furrows his brows, shrugging his mouth again.

"Don't worry about it. You'll understand once you grow up." Maya-san sighs as he groans in disagreement.

During that conversation, we had finally parked within the large state of the Koubuin Main House. Getting out of the limo, I saw a woman with emerald hair coming our way. I suppose she's Col. Bazora's daughter.

"Welcome, Maya. And I suppose you must be Kageyuki Shirogane-san?"

"Ah, yes." I stood up in attention by reflex, giving her a salute. "Good morning, Miss."

"Please, there is no need for such formalities. You are not here as a member of the Guard, Shirogane-san. You are our guest today." She smiled, more sweetly and caring than I ever expected someone of the Shinpan to do towards me. "My name is Mana Tsukuyomi, and regardless of my station you, as a permanent member of Takahisa-sama's squadron, are one of my fellows. I am pleased to make your acquaintance." She gave me a small bow, politely and without any tension or signs of rejection.

I gulped, hesitating a moment, thinking it may be yet another test of character. However, after a sigh, I returned the gesture. I'll just stick to doing my best speaking formally.

"The pleasure is mine, Tsukuyomi-san. Thanks for your hospitality towards me and my son."

"Ah, no, it is nothing. Also, Mana-san shall suffice. We are many Tsukuyomis in this house, so I do not mind you using my name to refer to me."

"In that case, shouldn't I use the -sama?"

"As I said before, you are our fellow. Also, I am used to little Takeru, so I do not mind. However, I concede using said honorific when around my Father and Uncle would indeed be the correct choice."

… Not like I was planning on calling the Colonels by anything other than their ranks. They're terrifying enough when they're not upset, and I don't want to return to my first weeks in the Guard.

"Oh, hi Mana-nee!" Takeru came rushing from behind me, coming up to Mana-san… and giving her a hug.

"Hello, Takeru. How have you been?" And she smiled… widely. Patting his head, she seemed to be in cloud nine. Does she like children, maybe?

"I've been fine. But Maya-nee made me study until late for a math test… It was a lot." He complained, as usual. He really doesn't get along well with numbers.

"Oh, that is awful." She said, raising her tone a bit, purposely talking funny. She seems to truly like him, it's good to see at least someone else is honestly nice towards him. "You must have been so tired."

"Yeah… That was so mean." He replies in a pouty voice, making me chuckle when I see him puffing his cheeks. It's a surprise to be sure, seeing a noble be this warm to a peasant.

"Ahem…"

Maya-san had taken some steps forward, tapping her glasses as she did, looking just as her father does when he is about to begin berating one of us for something.

"Allow me to clarify that it wasn't anything you should concern yourself with, Kageyuki-san. I merely had Takeru studying half an hour more so that he could achieve the score he required to reach a respectable passing grade."

"Oh, I see." I would ask more, but her narrowed eyes and dry tone are making me think I should stay out of… whatever this is.

"I think you could have been slightly more receptive towards Takeru." Mana-san replied, smiling and caressing her hair. "Having someone study for longer periods of time does not guarantee success."

"Still, he achieved the score he needed, which proves I was right in my method." Maya-san retaliates.

"Even so, such approach could backfire, making Takeru unwilling to study for math in the future. Taking into account his own learning pace is of utmost importance." She said as she patted Takeru's head.

"Thank you kindly for the suggestion Mana, but do remember that I am Takeru's retainer. Therefore, I do know more about his habits and limits than you."

"Um…" Both of them look my way, almost making me flinch. "I do think forcing him might not be a good idea, but Takeru can be really stubborn from time to time. Takeru, was studying bothersome?"

"No, I just don't get the stuff we see. I did manage to get some of the problems right thanks to practicing more, that's why I got a good grade on the test." He smiles, sticking out his chest in pride.

"See, Mana? My method was the right one."

"It was a lot to study, though." He continued, folding his arms and puffing a cheek. "You could have given me a small break to rest, Maya-nee."

"… You were saying, Maya?" Mana-san curved an edge of her lips into a smirk while placing a single finger on her cheek, lowering the inner side of her brows in what I can only call a smug gesture.

They then remain staring at each other for a moment, saying nothing. Maya-san with a stone cold expression, Mana-san with a slightly more relaxed but still somewhat confrontational smile.

What the hell is going on here? Are they… arguing over Takeru?

"Well… Yohime-sama is waiting. Let us go." Mana-san said, smiling my way.

As we walk towards the house's entrance, Maya-san made quite an obvious effort to place herself between Takeru and her cousin. I was on Takeru's left side, holding his hand. When Mana-san seemed to bring something up in a low tone, making Maya-san focus on her, I used that chance.

"Hey, Takeru…" I whisper to him.

"Hm?"

"Do these two usually argue like that?"

"Yeah… Maya-nee and Mana-nee sometimes start arguing like that. Maya-nee then gets all angry, her eyebrows get all spiky and low. I don't get why they fight like that." Me neither, Takeru. Me neither.

"Kageyuki-san?" Maya-san turned towards me.

"Ah, yes?"

"Would you prefer to go meet with Yohime-sama now, or to join us in the dojo?"

"Do I get to choose? If Yohime-sama doesn't have the time, there's no way I'd demand to see her." Lowering my head a bit, she returns yet another smile my way.

"She seems to be free as of now, however, the lessons at the dojo have already started. Takeru would have to come with us there. What would you like to do?"

Well, for one, I would like some cold water. To see if I'm not actually dreaming. Why would they be treating me with such respect? I don't get it. Well… As much as I'd like some answers, I want to be there seeing him train. Just in case something happens.

"I'd like to accompany you to the dojo, I want to see how Takeru is doing." His grasp on my hand tightened a bit.

"Very well. Allow us to go there, then." She said, and then we four picked up our pace.

As we entered the house and they guided us to the dojo, while I asked Takeru about his fights in the dojo, I could clearly see some people throwing glances as we passed them, some clearly frowning. Sigh…

When we made it to the dojo, Mana-san excused herself and said she had to return to her duties. After giving her a bow, leaving what we brought from home in her hands, we entered the dojo and when we did I could see Col. Bazora overseeing the training of two little shapes in the normal protective gear. So they don't spar with the Armored Kendo gear? I would have thought they would prefer to use that.

The Col. sees us and gives a nod, finishing the duel as one got a certain hit to the other's abdomen.

"Welcome, Maya." She bows to him, he nods at her once she rises. "… I didn't expect to see you here, Shirogane." He looks at me in the eye, with that unchanging stoic expression and dull tone.

"Greetings, Colonel." I give him a salute, he remains inexpressive.

"Dad, his name isn't Colonel."

"Takeru, that's his rank in the Royal Guard."

"Rank?"

"I'll explain it later. Don't worry about it." He again furrows his brows and groans.

"Well… I suppose I should introduce you to your son's sparring partners." He said, moving to a side and gesturing towards the little shapes that had come closer, taking off their head gear. "The one on the left is my nephew, Shion Tsukuyomi, the one on the right is my younger daughter, Mion Tsukuyomi. Both of you, your greetings."

"It's a pleasure to meet you, sir." Both of them said in unison.

"The pleasure is mine… Uuh…" How should I call them? Normally, I would have to use the -sama, however, even if Maya-san said that wasn't necessary, the Colonel might not agree.

"You might refer to them merely by name, Shirogane."

"Oh… Ahem, would that be fine, Colonel?"

"Sigh… Your son does so all the time, I see no reason to force you to use an honorific on this occasion. I hope you understand the honor it is, to be bestowed this privilege."

"… Yes, sir. I am well aware." He nods, seeming satisfied with my court answer. "Then, it's a pleasure to meet you, Mion, Shion." Both gave me a nod, staring firmly at me.

"Well then, Shirogane, are you ready to begin?" He looked at him, Takeru gave him a nod, pursing his lips a bit.

"Dad… I'll do my best, so look really well. Okay?"

"Haha, yes, I'll be looking." I pat his head, his eyes seem to shine brighter as he smiles.

"Hehe… Get ready, Mion, Shion. Because today I'm gonna win!"

Maya-san sighed while the one called Mion smiled at him. Col. Tsukuyomi merely closed his eyes, tapping his forehead with a single finger.

"I wonder about that." Mion said. "You barely can trade blows with us after all."

"Uh… You'll see today! Shion, you too get ready to finally lose." Takeru said with a confident smile, raising another fist up. And yet…

The turquoise haired little girl folded her arms and looked away from him, seeming to be really pissed off for some reason. I can see she is truly Col. Kazora's daughter, perhaps she doesn't like Takeru much. Maya-san said she was warming up to him, but still…

"Shion? What's up?" He got closer, staring directly at the turquoise eyes that refused to budge on their animosity.

"… You're late." She said, sounding upset.

"Huh? I'm here, I'm not late."

"Yes, you are!" Placing her hands on her waist quite hard, she glared at him. Feels as if her tone suddenly heated up, tightly shrugging her lips as she did. "We had to start training without you. I most sincerely dislike those who don't keep their word."

"Shion, we had to wait longer for a taxi to come for us." Minding my tone, getting closer and crouching by Takeru's side, I look into her eyes. "It's not Takeru's fault. I also had to come here, so we took some more time to be ready. Please don't be angry at him."

"I see… Um, did you bring the souvenirs at least?" She politely asked, cooling down her tone but still with her brows tense.

"You mean the sweets? Yeah, I went to buy them myself."

"Dad brought more than usual, so we have a lot of ice cream today!" Takeru said happily, nodding once.

I mean, Maya-san told me to go buy something sweet for the kids, and I just brought what we had when Sumika and Haruna-san visited us for his birthday, since there would be three kids. I also tried to buy something 'good' even if I know they would have access to better stuff. Maya-san said it was fine, though.

"Um… What flavor did you bring, sir?" Shion asked, this time clearly interested and leaving the anger behind.

"Strawberry, lemon, apple, and pear, all in their own separated packages. I brought a kilo of each, since Maya-san told me you enjoy sweet food."

"Oh, I want the pear one!" Mion suddenly said, a small smile in her face.

"No, you always get that one." Shion practically hissed at her cousin, dropping her manners and puffing a cheek. "Today I get the pear, you eat the lemon cream." Mion grimaced for some reason, I guess she doesn't like lemons.

"… Takeru, are they always like this?" He nods, giggling as the cousins glared at each other.

"See? I told you they were always so bitter. Dumb pickles." He keeps giggling at the cousins' quarrel.

"That's enough." Col. Tsukuyomi said, as composed as ever. "The one of you who wins the most duels gets to choose first. What do you say?"

"Yes, Bazora-sama!" Shion immediately replied, smirking for some reason.

"… Yes, Father." Mion did the same, not as loud but still showing a resolution I didn't expect to see in a noble over some ice cream. Mion then looked at Shion, one of her hands shaking when she did so, and narrowed her eyes. "I'm winning today."

"In your dreams, perhaps." Shion replied with a smirk, clearly not intimidated at all.

"Maya, take Shirogane to the changing room." She nodded and grabbed his hand. I gave him a nod when he looked back, and then they went to the room. "You two, another duel." Col. Tsukuyomi said, and the two girls took their poses, beginning to duel again.

… They might be young, but they are really good. No wonder, they are members of the Tsukuyomi family after all.

"So, it seems you came along this time." The Col. says as he comes to my side, not letting the dueling duo out of his sight.

"… Is my presence an inconvenience, Colonel?"

"There is no need to force yourself to speak formally, Shirogane. It doesn't suit you."

"… So, does me being here bother you?"

"Not necessarily."

"Huh. Then, what is the matter?" He never speaks up without having something to say, so what's up with this?

"… Surely you noticed how the girls acted up at the mention of something as simple as the ice cream you brought."

"Are you upset at that, sir?"

"All the contrary." He made a small smile, grasping his chin. "It's thanks to such simple interactions that Mion finally began progressing. It was fine indeed to have been proved wrong."

"Did you disagree with Takeru being here at first?" He nods.

"I didn't think it would bestow any boons to anyone, as my brother did. I cannot speak against the results Mion is achieving now, however." I turn to see the girls, who were still evenly matched. "This would have been impossible months before."

"I see… How did Takeru manage to help, if I might ask?"

"He simply gave both of them some time to relax. I admit I was pushing both of them too harshly at the time. Your son isn't anything special, but his honest friendliness was welcomed by my daughters, so I have no complains as of now. Even more considering the results you produced during the test battles against the Kagerou."

"So, I take it no one is being harsh to Takeru?"

"Worry not, we would never allow him to be injured during the trainings. Your loyalty and efforts for our faction won't go unrewarded, Shirogane." His tone grew low, stern, yet somehow… accepting. It lacked the edge they always have when they reprimand me for a miss. "I suppose, you have no more reasons to quit your post, do you?"

"… If you've been this kind towards my son, there is no way I could want to leave now. It's just…" I look down, tensing my hands.

"What is it?"

"I don't understand why would you go so far. We're commoners, your image would suffer if this were known. Why do so much for us?"

It's unheard of, at least for me, for a Regent House to give this much good faith to an inductee without a history of service. Despite those who clearly don't see us commoners in a good light, the honor that is to be here, to be treated as an equal by the members working on a Main House… it's not something that's achieved easily. Hell, Koetsu is still a Tozama despite all the generations of service his family has dedicated to the Koubuin House, and he himself has said that he's only ever come here a few times. And I'm sure he wasn't treated this nicely, he probably wasn't here as a guest but as a vassal.

So… To give me and Takeru such an honor… when I haven't really done anything worthy of it… Despite the trouble that would give them with the nobles that would get royally pissed off at this gesture…

"I'm just confused, to be honest. I can't see why we'd receive such treatment."

"… Perhaps you are not seeing the value you have for our Regent, Shirogane."

"What do you mean?" I am just a useful pilot, nothing else. And that's being generous on myself.

"Your skills were vital in our victory in the last battles, as well as in all prior mock battles and trials. Your honesty is also welcomed, for we can see you are not one to lie."

That's just the minimal requirements to being a decent person. Who in the right mind would try to deceive a noble? Lies are short lived, nothing good will come out of hiding my own limits and failures.

"Considering your recent performance, despite what you were going through, I think it to be obvious that you should be treated with the respect you earned."

"Is that so…"

"You should be more proud of your results, Shirogane." His voice calmer than ever, taking a moment to look at me. "I believe Takahisa-sama has told you this before, but perhaps you should begin to see yourself as a permanent vassal of the house."

"… Wait, he was serious about that?"

"He never speaks if he isn't sure to follow through his words, as troublesome as that trait of his is at times." He narrowed his eyes, shaking his head a bit. "While rare, it isn't unheard of to have commoners become vassals of a Regent House. I believe you have earned the right to be a fellow of ours."

"Oh… I…" Blinking a few times, rubbing my eyes, and taking a moment to look at my hands, I see this is no dream. Huh… "… I wasn't expecting that, to be honest. The idea of being a formal member of the Guard never crossed my mind."

"Truly? After all your displays and the results you bestowed us?"

"Well, I just wasn't expecting any further rewards for my service. Becoming a permanent member of the Guard seemed like such an impossibility… I honestly still can't believe Takahisa-sama was being serious." I look back at the girls, that were still dueling.

"Sigh… Trust in my words when I say he never backs down from a promise. Furthermore, these three years have shown us you are deserving of the honor of becoming a vassal of this house. You should hoist some more pride after what you have achieved in this time, Shirogane."

"I'm just not used to… Wait… Colonel, when you say a vassal of this house… You can't be implying that Takahisa-sama wants to me to be under his direct command, would you?" He looks down my way, arching his brows as he does.

"Why, yes, that was his intention. I believe he was clear enough before. Would you be inconvenienced by that, perchance?"

"Wait… Huh? He was… being serious? Me, placed as vassal of the Main House?"

"… I can understand your surprise, more so considering how many see you at the Castle, but as I said before, your own efforts have granted you this chance. Hoist it with pride in your heart."

"Huh… I just… can't really believe this is happening…"

One thing was to make me a Flight Commander, but this? To become a formal member of the Imperial Royal Guard and being placed under a Main House… It's what the Fudais and Tozamas aim at, what the top spots of their ranks dream of reaching one day. Commoners getting this treatment is… well, it isn't as if this hasn't ever happened as far as I'm aware… but it's very, very rare.

"I see. Well, I think it's just a matter of time and bureaucracy. And if you continue to excel, I suppose we could make this arrangement of your son into a formal induction."

"… What?"

"Well, since you've been serving us so devotedly, and considering your son's situation as of now, I am sure you would be proud to see him following in your footsteps." Not a single spec of hesitation in his words, absolutely not a second of delay in them.

I look down, tightening my fists. That's the exact opposite of what I want. I don't want Takeru to have to fight in the war, all I've done… what I promised to Miho… If this is why they've allowed him to be here…

I see… That's what they're expecting in return of the promotion. Another family of vassals in their service… I see, now it makes sense. Hahaha… To think I once dreamed of having this chance, and now that's it's here… It's as if I had a noose on me, as if a chair was slowly leaving my feet.

"… You'll have to forgive my rudeness, Colonel." I somehow mustered a serious, low voice, despite knowing how my words will be taken. I inhale through my nose, clenching my lips into a line. "However, that's not what I wish for my son's future."

He slowly looks my way, brows arched. Scanning my face for a second, he puts a few fingers on his trimmed beard, I can pretty much feel the pressure of a bonfire irradiating from his stare.

"… So you're saying you do not wish for him to follow in your footsteps?"

"No, I don't want Takeru joining the Royal Guard. All the sacrifices I made, all I've done so far was so that he wouldn't end up entangled in the war." I look at him, arching my brows. And then, he moved his head back, rising his chin as his eyes narrowed.

"Despite the honor of being placed as a permanent member of the squadron, despite the offer to become a vassal of the Koubuin House, and despite all that has been done for your son… You do not wish for him to remain in our fellowship?" It feels as if I were talking with a Fort-Class, my knees shook for a moment under his emerald gaze, under his slow but clearly angered tone.

"I want him to be happy. Fighting in the war… will take his freedom from him, as it did to me. I know how much all what has been done for me means and what an honor it is, but if all this was done with the expectation of having my son become a vassal… Then, I will have to refuse your kindness." Giving him a bow, placing my gaze under his again forced me to take a few breaths to not recoil back.

He remained still, looking at me without changing his expression. Only the sounds of the wooden blades clashing against each other could be heard. He slowly folded his arms as he held my gaze, as I slowly breathed in, as I felt a twister turn in my stomach. I know that this will be seen as an insult, and I will probably be kicked out of the Guard. But I'll be damned if I let them have their way. I won't bow down and let them turn Takeru into a soldier.

After a moment, the door of the changing room opened and Maya-san's and Takeru's voices reached us. The Colonel looked at them and nodded.

"Well, let's begin the training."

"Wait Colonel, I don't consent to this." He looked back, somehow taken aback.

"You don't consent, huh?"

"I already said my opinion, I do not agree with what you're doing."

All of this makes sense now. The younger Tsukuyomis were being so respectful because they assumed I would become their vassal, and have Takeru do the same. Maybe that's why Maya-san chose to stay back home, to teach him how to 'behave properly'.

I had thought they were telling the truth back then, that Maya-san and Mana-san simply were being nice to Takeru, that they had taken a liking to him for some reason. What an idiot I was. We're just peasants in their eyes, after all.

"Dad, what's wrong?"

"Nothing Takeru, we're just having a talk."

"But my training is about to start. Why are you angry?"

"I'm just… discussing something with the Colonel."

"Shirogane, you're here merely as a guest." He said, folding his arms. "What reason could you have to be against this?"

"I believe I already stated it."

"Bazora-sama, what is going on here?" Maya-san furrowed her brows, seeming to not understand the situation.

"Nothing of importance." He then looks at Takeru. "Shirogane, you're ready to train?"

"My name is Takeru!" He complained as he usually does. "But yeah, I'm ready. Why were you arguing with Dad, Bazora-san?"

"Matters not. Go and take your pose."

"Wait a second, I don't-"

"Do you not want to see your son train, Shirogane?" He said, making Takeru look at me, I could see his eyes lower in worry.

You son of a bitch… Using him as a shield… I should have known better. What do they want from him? Are they using Takeru to make me continue serving them? Inhaling through my nose, a few fingers piked at my palms, hands shaking a bit. What have they been teaching him all this time? Leaving him in their hands… when they want to turn him into another servant…

"Shirogane, I am convinced you are looking forward to seeing how your son is-"

"Don't mess with me Colonel…" One of his brows twitched, I couldn't stop my teeth from grinding each other. "You're touching my son's future here…"

"Kageyuki-san, please calm down." Maya-san came to my side, still looking taken aback, placing a hand over my arm as I was about to take a step forward. "Please do take in mind how important this is for Takeru. Nobody will harm him, so please do not be so alarmed."

"Yeah, don't worry Dad. I'm gonna be fine!" He replied with his usual cheer.

"… You want to train Takeru?"

"Of course!"

"Okay… I got it." I send a look towards the Colonel. "I suppose we should have a talk later."

"… It seems so, yes."

Takeru gets in position, paired to fight with Mion. As they do, Maya-san circles to my right, standing close to me.

"What happened while we were in the changing room?"

"… Don't feign ignorance, Maya-san."

"What do you speak of?"

Takeru and Mion begin to trade blows, but it's clear she's not taking this seriously. Unlike Takeru, who is trying really hard, going by how much force he's putting in his swings and in his steps to not fall back.

"Heh, stop acting please. The Colonel told me you all are planning to induct Takeru into the Guard."

"Wha… Excuse me, what ?" Hm? I looked at her and found her squinting her eyes. "Are you being serious?"

"Do you think I would joke about this, Maya-san?" I return the harsh gaze, she then looks at the Colonel, who simply looked at us as if bored.

"… I didn't knew of this. What did he told you?" She's… pissed off. Just like yesterday.

She doesn't seem to be lying… so, is this idea something the Colonels have? No, Col. Kazora is pretty much allergic to commoners. Then, what's going on here?

Takeru's defense was broken, Mion struck his chest and won their duel. He started complaining.

"Next pair!" Col. Tsukuyomi said, Shion took Mion's place as Takeru's adversary. "Well done, Mion." The little girl bowed to her father, standing by his side.

The next duel began, with Takeru being in an even bigger disadvantage. What's the point of doing this? He is learning, but what do they gain? Someone to talk to? As if the nobles didn't have enough fellows, and they could simply have chosen someone from the local area, to avoid all the bother with the train and the limo from being noticed. It was obvious from the start, they were just disciplining a 'vassal'…

"Bazora-sama…" Maya-san had gone to the Colonel's side. "Is what Kageyuki-san told me true?"

"… Regarding what?" She gets closer, whispering her question. "Well, there is some truth to it."

Maya-san seemed to be frowning for a second, she tapped her glasses and took a step back. All the while, Shion had Takeru on the back foot without a chance to get out of her lock. It didn't took much for her to win.

The Colonel orders for the next duel and both girls take their stances in front of each other as Takeru comes to my side, hanging his head.

"Hey Takeru… You did a good effort."

"… But I still lost." He finally looks up, letting me see his low, dejected eyes.

I sigh, crouching to meet his gaze. Letting go of the anger that was flooding me, I pat his shoulder as I make a small smile towards him.

"Wanna know something? When I was your age, I still hadn't learned how to use a sword as good as you do now."

"Really? But didn't Uncle Koetsu taught you?"

"Yes, but that was in high school. You're doing great for having started just a few months ago." His eyes regain their usual shine, smiling widely.

"Then, will I get to join the samurais like you?" His tone was like cat seeing fish being dangled above it. I, on the other hand, sobered my face and lost some of my glee.

"… Why do you want that, Takeru? Being a samurai is really hard."

"Because then I'll be able to help you out."

"You don't have to worry about me. Dad is going to end the fight before you know it. It's a promise." I pat his head, covered by the cloth keeping his hair tidy.

"Uuh… Then, will you stay home then?"

"Yes, when that day comes. So, you just wait for me. You can practice if you want, but there's no need for you to fight. Dad is not going to lose, Takeru."

"Okay… But I wanted to help out." He sulks a bit. Sigh… Stubborn to a fault.

"You can help elsewhere. Once you grow up, you can decide what you'll do. But leave the fighting to me, okay?"

"… But what if you get hurt?"

"… I'm not going to. Have some faith in the samurais, Takeru. There is nothing we cannot defeat if we fight together." I force a smile, trying to sound like Takahisa-sama does whenever he gives us an important briefing.

"Really?"

"Really. So, you don't worry about me. I promise you we'll beat the bad guys soon." I again pat his head, this time more slowly. I stand up, Takeru comes to my side as he watches the duel.

"So, how good are you with a sword, Dad?"

"Well… I'm not as good as the rest of the samurais, but I can at least give them a challenge."

"Can you show me? Come on, we're here so have a duel!" He tugged at my arm, being again all smiles.

"We don't have any armors for me here, Takeru." And if I were to duel now, I'd probably would end up reacting aggressively towards someone. He puffed his cheeks as he groaned again, still tugging at my arm.

"Sadly, it is true. We don't have any armored kendo gear here." Maya-san said, coming towards Takeru. "Perhaps another time, Takeru."

He pouts, groaning again. Once the duel was finished, he was again made to face off against Mion while Maya-san practiced with Shion. The kids had some more duels, Takeru didn't win a single of them, and then Maya-san took charge of the training as they practiced their swings side by side.

It's amazing, how much he has learned in so little time. It took me three years of on-and-off practice to learn with Benmaru-san just the basics. I was mostly fooling around, but still. And yet… Why would they, specifically the Tsukuyomi brothers no less, have their heirs train with a commoner? Even if they expected us to become their vassals, this is too much for people of their station.

"It looks like you have something on your mind, Shirogane." Col. Tsukuyomi had come to my side, we were rather far from the kids so he had no need to whisper.

"One could say that."

"It is rare, seeing you unwilling to be open." He narrows his eyes.

"I think I already said what I have on my mind."

"I see… I had thought you weren't planning on leaving your post, alas it seems I was mistaken." He folds his arms, now looking at the kids.

It's like talking to a mountain. Another test, is it? I should have seen this one coming, of course the Tsukuyomi brothers were not going to let my wish to leave my post go without a single reprisal. I guess he thinks I'll turn tail one day, the question here is… Is he merely baiting me, or do they really want to induct Takeru? Or… Is their plot to use him to keep me from leaving?

As much as this angers me… I can't lose this position. Miho was right, if I leave I'll be called a traitor, and then Takeru will also be called that. Dammit…

You wanna test me again? Fine by me. I may not want to have Takeru be a Guard, but that doesn't make me a traitor. I'll say it as many times as it takes to get into their daft skulls.

"I never said I wanted to leave my post Colonel, just that I don't want Takeru to be inducted."

"That is… puzzling, one could say." He grasped his chin, a finger threading his beard. As the ceiling was scanned by his eyes, the confusion in 'em grew more when he finally looked at me. "Plentiful have been the gestures you have been bestowed with in these months. I cannot comprehend why would you not wish to become a vassal of our fellowship. What honor could best such a proposition?"

"It's not a matter of honor, sir." I lower my brows, feeling a small jolt run through my arms. "I do not wish to have my son join the Guard."

"And why would you not? If you became a vassal, you would receive an ample raise, be the one who gives your family a road to follow into the service of the Royal Guard. It is rare, to give such an opportunity to a commoner. For you to refuse the chance to stop being an inductee and begin to be a proper member of the Guard, a fellow of the Koubuin House…"

He took a few steps towards me, I remained still. As if I were a scarecrow trying to endure a downpour while simultaneously being pecked by lightning, I didn't lose grasp of his eyes. My hands tensed up to stop shaking, and despite knowing what words would come next I managed to stay calm.

"It means you would rather be serving elsewhere, 2nd Lt. Shirogane." His voice filled with contempt, he simply returned my gaze.

"That is not the case, Colonel."

"Then, why would you refuse such an offer?"

"I already said why. I don't want my son to fight, safeguarding his future has always been the reason why I've endured the pressure all these years. I know that if I do become a fellow, it will be expected of Takeru to also serve the Koubuin House. And I… don't want to take more things from him." I look at him, swinging that sword trying to keep the rhythm of the other two, despite beginning to clearly start delaying his swings. "I want him to be free to live a life unaffected by war. So, if all these favors you've given me were done with the expectation that I would formally join you… I will have to decline them. And if that means Maya-san has to stop looking after him, if that means ceasing to be a Flight Commander, then so be it."

"… Surely you know what you're saying? To knock away the hand of a Regent… Do you think this will go unpunished?"

"I am not insulting your or Takahisa-sama's aid. I wish to remain as an inductee, until the day you no longer find me useful. No other honors or privileges are needed, I'm content as I am." I frown, gritting my teeth for a second, choosing to simply let out my thoughts for a second. "I live for my son, his happiness is my priority. That's all there is to this."

And then, he simply remained staring at me.

I gulped, breathing through my nose. Feeling a small jolt run across my shoulders.

He slowly blinked, folding his arms. Scanning my face without a hint of an emotion in his.

I licked the inside of my lips, feeling as if my legs were being piked by iron barbs.

"… I do not comprehend it." He finally said, shaking his head.

"I believe I made myself clear enough, Colonel."

"Then, let me be frontal with you. Shirogane, you still wish to remain in the Royal Guard?"

"Yes, I am not displeased with my position." Even if some of my 'fellows' can go fuck themselves with a Destroyer-sized drill up their ass. Maybe then they'll be able to get their heads out of it.

"Then, why would you not wish to become a vassal of the house? Your son could be allowed to serve the Guard as well, perhaps one of your descendants will manage to earn the honor of being granted the rank of Tozama. And you could also aim to become a Captain in our forces."

"… Colonel, I said that I have no need for that."

"Do you not wish to safeguard your family's future? To serve your nation?"

I sigh, remembering my last talks with Miho. For a moment, I look down and could hear her voice again. When I meet the Colonel's eyes again, my face had relaxed.

"I made a promise to my wife before she passed away, to protect our son no matter what." And for the first time ever, he grimaced for a second. "If I become a vassal, then Takeru will also have to serve the nobility, and I don't think that's the best for him. You've seen how he is, I doubt the other nobles would take kindly to him."

"And yet, you have adapted just fine."

"Do you think I enjoy being badmouthed behind my back all the time, Colonel?" I narrow my eyes, he does too.

"I believe you said you weren't displeased…"

"I'm not, I just accepted that as part of this position. I know you and your brother dislike us commoners, as well as many others in the Guard, and while I've endured this for Takeru's and my wife's sake, I don't want this life for him." I frown, crossing my arms again.

"I was under the impression that you had asked Takahisa-sama for aid so that, if you were to die, he would look after your son."

"Yes, I did. I only asked him to look after Takeru so that he doesn't end up in a cruel place, and only because he insisted on offering his helping hand. If it was out of place, I shall apologize." He grasps his chin, again silently staring at me. "I am not ungrateful… I merely want to keep him safe."

"Hmm… I still cannot understand you. You are given this chance, yet you would turn your back to it? You do realize that if you become our vassal you won't have to return to being a pawn of the IJA in the future, do you?"

I can't tell if he's upset or if he's still testing me. Why is he still insisting so much? He would have raised his voice and called me a fool by now, or worse considering what we're discussing.

It's not that I am ungrateful, and I do understand how rare this chance is. I once also dreamed of being a Royal Guard, of doing good for the people. I know that I'm still rejecting them, but I'm only doing that to keep Takeru safe. That's… the only selfish desire I have in me.

I don't think they would understand, though.

"… I just want to keep my son away from the war if I can help it. That's all there is to this, Colonel. I will keep serving as I have been, I'm not going to quit my post." If only because Takeru would suffer more from that than me.

"… I see. I suppose there is no further need to cross words." Still without showing emotion in his voice, he turned around and went his way towards Maya-san.

If they took offense… and in the end they'll brand me a traitor anyways… Then, I'll just leave. I don't think Takeru would understand, but it's for the best. I'll keep working as I have until they eventually kick me out. It was too good to be true, all this respect and favors they gave us. It was just obvious from their eyes, to wish to gain another family of vassals… And while I know that joining the Royal Guard isn't the sole path available for those who become part of the fellowship, I know Takeru won't be welcomed here. I don't want him suffering through those whispers as I've had to do.

The training is finished, and I go to Takeru to take him to the changing room.

"So… What did you think of the training, Dad?"

"You are better than I was at your age. So, good job Takeru." I pat his head, he giggles. At least he's happy for now.

"Do you think I could become a samurai someday?" He again asks once we had entered the room.

"… There's no need for you to do that."

"But I wanna be like you."

"Come on, don't be stubborn." I help him get his gear off, sitting by his side on the small bench that was in the room. "There are a lot of other jobs you can choose once you grown up."

"Hmm… But aren't the samurais the ones who help the people?"

"Sigh… Let's leave this talk for later. So, what do you do after this?"

"Oh, we go to play with Yuuhi." Smiling much, he nodded once.

"Huh… So, when do we go back home?"

"Hmm… Sometimes on Sunday's night, other times in the afternoon."

"You… stay to sleep here?"

"Yeah." He nods, simply and calmly.

Why… would they let him stay over? I know I asked Takahisa-sama to look after Takeru, but that was if I ever died. I never asked him to be put under the Guard's care…. I'm just a pilot. That's all I can do. There's no reason to go so far. Why would they do this? Even if they wanted us to become their vassals, this is just…

I finish helping Takeru get back into his clothes and then along Maya-san and the little Tsukuyomis we went towards where Yuuhi-sama should be.

"Maya-san?" I got closer to her as the kids talked with each other.

"Yes?"

"Is it true that we'll have to stay the night?"

"Oh, didn't you knew? I had assumed you already were informed."

"No, this is a first. Why would you go so far for Takeru?"

"As I said, Yohime-sama allowed it."

"… I suppose I should ask her if I want an answer?" Confronting her about this… Sigh… I can only hope I can leave with my head above my shoulders.

"Kageyuki-san, I assure you Yohime-sama has no intentions to have Takeru join the Royal Guard. She said so to me the first time we visited the house together."

"It's not that…" I briefly tell her of the proposition Col. Tsukuyomi said would come my way, and of what that means for Takeru. "… So, well, I suppose I am in a tough spot as of now."

"… Indeed you are." She taps her glasses, eyes almost closed. "I didn't think Bazora-sama would suggest such a thing, but I can see why you would be wanted as a fellow."

"Huh? Please, be serious. I'm just a pilot, I don't think I've done anything worthy of such an honor."

We're talking of having me join the fellowship of a Regent House. Not from a link with a lower house, no, joining under the direct service of the Koubuin House is what's being offered to me here. And there's also all you're doing for Takeru. I don't think I did anything to deserve this.

"Perhaps you have merits that go beyond your abilities inside a cockpit?"

"For example?"

"Well, I heard you are someone worth our trust, and you are Takeru's father. He might be rude, but he was been raised with good values. I believe you have served for three years already?"

"Almost three years, yes. Still, I… I don't want Takeru to be forced to become a vassal. I don't think that's the best for him, considering how I'm treated by the rest."

Maya-san looks down, seeming to want to agree with me but, due to obvious reasons, being unable to voice it.

"Hey, Dad?"

"Hm? What is it?" Takeru and the other two were looking at me, the little Tsukuyomis straight into my eyes like their fathers know to do.

"What do you do with the samurais?"

Right, I never told him much about my work. Though, I don't know how much I can tell them. Most of our tasks are classified, since they're to make new protocols for the Guard. And I doubt I want to have Takeru saying I'm a pilot on Takahisa-sama's squadron, I don't want those kind of people to have more reasons to be harsh to him, both back home and in this place.

"Well, I work as a tester of sorts."

"A tester?"

"Yeah, I see whether things work well or not." He mulls over my words, not entirely happy with my answer.

"Sir, may I ask what is your rank?" Shion asked, shortly and coldly.

"… Why do you want to know, Shion?"

"I'm just curious about what kind of person Takeru's father is. I don't see why you'd not wish to answer." Her reply was rather… rude, I think she might have taken after her father.

"Well… I'm just a Second Lieutenant, and I wear the pale black uniform."

"So that would mean you belong to the bottom of the hierarchy, then?" Sigh… Here we go again. And from a child, no less.

"Shion, do not be rude to our guest." Maya-san immediately retorted.

"I only spoke the truth." She lowered her brows.

"… It's alright, I'm used to it." What did I even expect from a Shinpan? "So, is there anything else you'd like to ask?" Shion looked at me again, and this time she frowned.

"Why is Sister looking after your son, if you're in the lowest rank of the Guard?"

"Shion, don't be mean to Dad! He's still a samurai, whatever this low rank is." Takeru puffed a cheek at her, she folded her arms and looked away from him.

"I'm just asking a question." She then plucked her lips. "You're funny to be around sometimes, but why is Sister staying with you if your father is on the lowest echelon on the Imperial Royal Guard, with such a low rank to boot?" Takeru then looks down, plucking his lips. "As a Shinpan, I would like to know why an inductee is having Sister take care of you." Raising a finger, she pointed it at me accusingly, the same inquisitive frown of her father in her face.

I was about to react, not necessarily nicely, but Maya-san patted my shoulder. Looking at her, she had her eyes narrowed as her mouth became but a small circle. Seeing her, Shion stiffened up like a cat hearing a thunder, comically shifting from the serious expression to the open shock.

"Shion, apologize for your rudeness this instant."

"Eh? But I just asked a-"

"I'll have you know that Kageyuki-san asked the favor of having me watch over Takeru to Takahisa-sama in person."

"EH?!" The three kids shout in unison as they stopped walking, kitties and thunders all over again.

"Um… Maya-san? I don't think saying that is a good idea."

"Why would it not be? I know you are under secrecy, but I see no issue with telling them who you work for, as it would explain Shion's question." Her tone a business one, she still sent a scolding gaze towards her sister.

"Still, you should know how others will-"

"Please, it is merely the truth. Anyone offended by it is clearly an obstinate fool." Tapping her glasses, she nodded to herself.

"Dad, you work with Takahisa-san?!" Takeru asked, coming up to me with a shocked face as I haven't seen in him for a long while.

"… You know him too?"

"Yeah, I saw him last time I came here. He's even better than Yuuhi at Shogi." Takeru frowned, folding his arms while the other two nodded in agreement. "So, you work with him?"

"Well… Yeah, I work under Takahisa-sama." I do wonder why he kept quiet about it. I mean, he could… have said something… about how you were doing.

"Um…" Mion looked at me, tapping some of her fingers together. "Kageyuki-san, does that mean that you're a surface pilot?"

And there is the question I don't want to answer. I look at Maya-san, who nods in approval for some reason. But… I don't think Takeru should know. If he said something…

"Dad, what's a surface pilot?" Sigh… At least he doesn't know yet.

"Takeru?" Again, while I was doubting, Maya-san spoke. "What your father does should remain as a secret, you can't tell it to anyone."

"Is it something dangerous?" He looked at me, curving his brows and giving me the puppy eyes.

"No, it's not that. But…"

"It has to stay as a secret, and you can't tell it to anyone, not even to Sumika." Maya-san said, giving me a nod when she met my gaze. "If you ever end up speaking of it…" She then tapped her glasses right in the middle, arching her head back.

Both me and Takeru twitched upon seeing her piercing eyes glaring at us. Of course, she is the Colonel's daughter.

"I get it, I won't talk." Takeru said, with a creak in his voice. "So, are you a pilot, Dad?"

"… Yeah, I am. I'm in Takahisa-sama's personal group of pilots, which is why this is a secret. So don't tell it to anyone." He nervously nodded twice, almost made me laugh.

"U-Um… Kageyuki-san?" Shion was looking down now, the confrontational tint in her voice gone. "Forgive me for speaking rudely to you." She gave me a deep bow, one I know would make her father angry if he learns of it.

"No, it's fine. Sigh…"

"So… What's a surface pilot?" Takeru asked again.

"They're the ones who ride the TSFs, Takeru. You know, the flying robots?" Mion said. "Kageyuki-san, how does it feel to fly a-"

"Wait, Dad flies the robots?!" Takeru shouted his surprise, drowning Mion's question. This time I couldn't hold it in and I chuckled at his reaction, his voice is popcorn in the making.

"Yeah… So, don't tell it to anyone, okay?" He nodded again, this time his eyes shining like dawn.

"So, um…" Shion again tried to look at me, but couldn't. "How is it to fly?"

On the rest of the way I told them what little I could, exaggerating some parts of the flying experience. Shion and Mion seemed more knowledgeable than I thought they would be, asking me what was my highest altitude, if I could perform Kulbits, and other rather technical questions. It seems they have seen some mock battles in preparation for their duties, according to what Maya-san told me while we spoke, so it is possible they have seen me piloting already.

Takeru however just made the most innocent questions, if the robot was like the ones in the mangas, what 'special moves' I could use, and if my robot had a special name.

For a moment, I forgot about the discussion I had with the Colonel, simply enjoying the kids' curious questions. Until we made it to the room we were going to, where those standing guard gave me one nasty stare again as we entered the place where both Yuuhi-sama and Yohime-sama were awaiting us.

I had never met Yuuhi-sama before, but she seems to be as calm as her mother. Yohime-sama seems unchanged to the scarce times she has visited the Castle, it is the first time I am in her direct presence however. Both of them dressed in a traditional dress, the mother dressed in teal and lily matching her hair and the young one in a white one with some flowery patters in the same tone of purple as her hair. We bowed to them once we got inside, and my worries returned to my mind again.

"Good afternoon." Yohime-sama said, her voice being a soft caress of spring. "You may rise." We did so and I saw her face, her lily hair and amethyst eyes gazing at us with a calm smile, just as her daughter. "I believe it is the first time we meet in person, Shirogane?"

"Y-Yes, it is. It is an honor to be here, Yohime-sama." I'm face to face with a Regent's wife, in their Main House and as a guest. Maybe this is all a dream? All that's left is for Takahisa-sama to suddenly manifest himself out of thin air and we got bingo.

And yet… What I'll have to ask her isn't entirely pleasing. Sigh…

"It is a pleasure to finally meet you. Yuuhi, dear, your greeting."

"My name is Yuuhi Koubuin. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance, Shirogane-sama." She's so well mannered… And you're telling me she's friends with Takeru?

"No, the pleasure is all mine, Yuuhi-sama. And there is no need for honorifics, Shirogane is enough."

"Is that so?" She replied, slightly lowering her head. She truly seems to be a nice girl, she didn't take any offense at my words despite being who she is. "Then, it is a pleasure to meet you, Shirogane."

"Well, I'm sure the children must be waiting to play, so let's leave them be. Mana." Yohime-sama didn't even finish speaking and Mana-san appeared right by her side.

Like… She just manifested herself there. How… did she even do that?

"The souvenirs are right here, Yohime-sama. The cards and board have already been arranged." She reported dutifully, as if it were an official mission's report.

"Thank you kindly. Now then, let us go to the hall." She stood up and we followed behind her.

Both young Tsukuyomis went to Yuuhi-sama's side, and then the girl remained looking at Takeru, waving at him. He looked up at me, grasping my hand.

"It's okay, go have fun." I smiled, he did too before going towards the girls.

… I wish I had that bravery to approach girls as he does when I was his age. If Miho hadn't been so forward with that cake she baked me, I would have ended up alone or forced into an arranged marriage.

Still… I feel so out of place here. The room is literally better than those expensive rooms that appear in TV sometimes, and here I am with my 'best' formal clothes, a modest attire to be honest. I'm like the young swan when it was an ugly duck in the pond, just that I'll never become a swan.

We went further into the room, where a table with the sweets and food we brought were laid on. On another corner of the table, there was a deck of cards and some notebooks and pencils, and some ways away there is a small table with a Shogi board set up ready to play.

"So, what have you brought on this occasion, Maya?" Yohime-sama asked.

"Kageyuki-san was the one who chose the items today. I asked him to choose a mixture of sweet foods he found proper, as well as other appetizers, while I brought a few of the latest picture books I bought for Takeru."

"I see. You have my gratitude, Shirogane." She smiled at me, looking like an angel incarnate.

"No… It was nothing, Yohime-sama."

"So, what manner of sweets did you choose?"

"I… Ahem, I choose to bring ice cream. I don't know if it'll be of your liking, but I bought what was best in the local stores."

"Um… What flavors did you bring?" Yuuhi-sama asked, to which I answer as I did before. She smiles for some reason. "Which one would be the strawberry one?"

"Yuuhi, dear, please show moderation." Yohime-sama lowered her eyelids, raising a finger at her daughter. She nods, but despite that she's pouting.

"I suppose she favors strawberries?"

"Indeed she does." Yohime-sama says with a smile, patting Yuuhi-sama's head. "Sadly, there was one time where Takeru brought a small cake with strawberry cream and… well, Yuuhi forgot her manners for a moment." She smiles widely at her daughter while running a hand over her purple hair.

"That is not true." Yuuhi-sama then protested, pout still in place.

"Hehehe… Well, you may play at your leisure today. Maya, I leave them in your care."

"Yes, milady."

And with that, the four kids marched towards their table. It seems Shion won the most duels so she asked to have the pear ice cream first, to Mion's complains. Yuuhi-sama, on the other hand, monopolized the strawberry one, only giving some to Takeru, that also asked for some of the apple one. If it weren't for the dissonance between his clothes and theirs, one could simply mistake this for an everyday scenery of some kids playing around.

And yet, that difference is all too important. Their gratitude aside… this is nothing they couldn't have bought, it's certainly much worse than what they could buy using their influence. Yuuhi-sama… seems to enjoy talking with Takeru, but why are they allowing this? A future Regent being this close to a commoner… I never heard of anything like this.

"Shirogane?"

"Ah… Y-Yes, Yohime-sama?" Shit, I was lost in thought again.

"Please do not be so tense. Do take a seat." She gestured towards her left, to a seat rather close to her in the table.

"Ahem… Thank you kindly for receiving me, Yohime-sama." I bow to her as I sit, remaining in position.

"It is alright, you may rise." She was still smiling, playing with a strand of hair. "I had heard you were a rather rude fellow, yet it seems those rumors were incorrect."

"No, I am merely doing an effort."

"I see. Please do not be so tense, you are my guest today."

"Thank you very much for your deference, Yohime-sama. So…"

"Yes?"

"Well… Is there anything you were wishing to speak with me?"

"Oh, yes." Resting her hands on her lap, again smiling like an angel. "First, would you be pleased with Maya's performance as your son's retainer?"

"To be honest, I think she's doing much more than the money I'm sending her."

"I see, it is good to see you have been pleased." She nods, still smiling. "So, am I right to assume you have no qualms with her staying in her role?"

"… Actually, I was meaning to ask something."

"What would it be?"

"Um… Don't misunderstand please, but, why has Maya-san been sent to take care of Takeru?"

"I chose her myself, based on the requirements the person who we had to sent needed to meet. Is there a problem, perchance?" She tilted her head, a slight change in her tone, now slow and stinging like hot wax, made me shift in my seat.

"It isn't a problem per se… It's just that I don't understand why you would go so far for a commoner like me. Maya-san is a member of the Shinpan, I'm sure you would need her somewhere else."

"Has someone told you she was required elsewhere?" Freezing over, her change in tone almost made me stutter.

"… No, I just don't understand why we received such deference from your House, Yohime-sama." I give her a bow, eyes closed.

"Rise, it is fine." I do so and see her moving her fringe away, letting some air out. "Well then, as for why we sent Maya, it was because we needed someone who we knew wouldn't divulge the specifics of the mission and couldn't be tracked, while also being capable enough to tend to your son's needs."

"Well, but why go so far for us?"

"I do not see it as anything 'too far' myself, I only did what I had to do to ensure this task went as well as it could." She smiled widely while leaning slightly back and nodding, as if proud. She's as extreme as Takahisa-sama, maybe more.

"I see… Thank you kindly for your aid."

"No thanks are required. Now then, I suppose you are not against having Takeru visit the house on the weekends?"

"… About that, actually. Why did you allow him to come here, if I may ask?"

"Well, I had heard from my lord husband quite many stories about you." Smiling again towards me, clear as the sky in her acceptance.

"Huh? About me?"

"Indeed. Takahisa-sama is very pleased with your performance, and he believes you to be someone worth our trust, due to your stellar conduct while on duty."

"I… don't think I've done anything to deserve such praise."

"Well, he has seen you worthy of such words, so please do take them to heart." Her voice soft as silk, she remained smiling my way. "So, when your son came to visit us for the first time…" She then tells me of what happened that day.

"… Forgive him, please. He just doesn't know how to give others space."

"Please rise, I haven't taken offense. I found his interactions with Yuuhi rather… precious." She looks towards the children, I do so too.

The sound of their game fades into my ears, seeing Takeru completely relaxed and smiling from ear to ear as they play some sort of card game. Yuuhi-sama was sitting by his side, also smiling as she looked at her cards.

"As you can see, my daughter lacked what you would call a friend, someone who treated her as an equal instead of a superior. I was wishing to have Takeru be some form of confidant for her if they were compatible, and yet they are getting along far better than I ever thought they would." The clear joy in her words was contagious enough to make me smile for a while, despite my worries.

"So they're just good friends?"

"Yes, that is the case. As such, since it does both of them good, I allowed Takeru to accompany Maya on her visits, so that she could also be with her sister here. Does that answer your question?" She looks at me again, her aura overflowing with the grace of a peacock and the shine of a good jewel.

But… I still don't get it.

"Well, but why us in particular? If you wanted a confidant for Yuuhi-sama, I'm sure there are many others who could have taken the role, and without all the problems you have to deal with to have us come here, and leaving Maya-san back at Hiiragi." She bring a hand to her chin, curving her brows and lips.

"I do not believe this is something anyone could have done. We knew beforehand you are someone trustworthy after these years you've worked for us, and even if we asked, there aren't many who would act as naturally around us as your son does." She smiles as she looks at Takeru, who seemed to be winning the game this time.

"I just…"

"Yes?"

"I don't understand. For someone like me, receiving the honest compliments of someone of your importance, it truly… it truly is an honor to hear such words coming from you, but I haven't done anything to earn this deference. I know Takahisa-sama can be rather obstinate at times, but still, this is a privilege that I don't believe I've earned. The fact that I am allowed to be in your presence in this way, despite being a mere commoner, is hard to believe. I am just a normal person, I don't think I've done anything to earn these privileges from one of our Regents." Giving her a bow, I then remain in place in silence. After a moment, I hear her sigh quite strongly.

"Shirogane, rise." I do, and, contrary to what I was expecting, the graceful smile was still there waiting for me. "I have heard you have done a fine work in your position in these recent months, however."

"Well, perhaps, but I am just a pilot. And there are some who are better than me."

"I wasn't speaking solely of your piloting skills."

"Huh? Then, what else could you be speaking about?" My reports are, well, not bad but they're not what others expect of a Royal Guard with three years of service under his belt. I can't Keigo to save my life.

"You have helped us in disciplining our fellows, according to Takahisa-sama."

… What?

"Excuse me Yohime-sama, disciplining the other members? I never did anything like that."

"Not directly perhaps, however your presence has aided in bringing certain pressing matters to light. I am convinced you are aware of all those who speak ill of you behind your back." Sobering up, she stares into my eyes. I nod, looking down. "Tell me Shirogane, do you know why the Imperial Guard employs different colored dresses for its members?"

"Huh?" Where does this come from? "To showcase one's station, wasn't it?"

"Indeed, that's one of the reasons. Do you know of the second?"

"… There was a second reason?" She giggles at my confusion as the shouts of the kids reach our ears.

"You see, we also have such an arrangement to force visibility upon every member of the Royal Guard."

"Visibility?"

"Indeed. By looking at a dress you can already size up who that person is likely to be merely by the color of the dress and the insignia of their rank. For example, people now could easily tell you are an inductee, but if you had the insignia of a Captain they would know you're actually a fellow. If a Tozama had such a rank, then it could be assumed they are actually a second-in-command of a higher ranking fellow."

"I see…" So it's for organizational purposes, huh.

"Then, the same is applied regarding what is expected of our fellows." Her smile waned, her tone also became dulled. "Someone from the Fudai will be encouraged to take action if everyone else nearby is of lower rank, and if that person were to behave in an unsightly manner, it would be easy to notice. In this way, since we are a small organization divided into other five smaller organizations, we have all of our members watching each other's back, for supporting one's fellows and notifying their wrongdoings."

Constant surveillance, all to push everyone to not slack off and do their share without any room for mistakes. I knew some people usually kept staring at us, but I thought it was more due to my presence, and the fact that we are the main squadron of the Castle.

"In this way, your presence has allowed us to notice a… most shameful side of our fellows." She grimaces, and then… she gave me a small bow. "I can only apologize for the taxing situations you must have been enduring all this time."

"N-No, it's fine Yohime-sama! There is no need for you to apologize like this, really. So, um, I was some sort of bait to snuff out troublemakers?"

"Well, one could say that." Taking a moment to trace some of her hair in her hands, she again looked away, this time towards the ceiling. "When many people in the ranks begin to cover each other's backs for their own benefit, it brings harm to the overall structure. While you weren't intended to fulfill such a role, your presence, performance, and composed conduct during all these years have brought to light quite a few…" She narrowed her eyes, sending a jolt down my back. "… unpleasant attitudes in some of our fellows."

"I see… But still, it seems like a small matter compared to all you're doing for me and Takeru."

"I have deemed you worthy, as has done my lord husband. As our fellow, I ask you to receive these favors open handed, and to continue working as you have been until now."

… She called me a fellow. Despite the fact that I am still an inductee, despite who she is. I breath in, knowing the pleasant talk might as well be over. Still feeling the jolt running a race on my back, I lick my lips and look straight into Yohime-sama's eyes.

"Yohime-sama, might I ask why you referred to me as a fellow?"

"Hm? Because you are one of us, of course."

"But I am only an inductee, I am not part of your fellowship." And technically, I'm loaned from the IJA until further notice.

"I believed a proposal had been made available to you?"

"… Well, Col. Tsukuyomi did say something of the sort. However, there is something that… worries me about this situation." I gulp, let out some air and feel small, painful pokes in my stomach. "If I do become a vassal, then it will be expected from Takeru to also serve your house, is that correct?"

"Yes, that is the case."

"Well… Sigh… In that case, I will have to decline the offer."

"Might I ask to elaborate on your reasons?" Her smile disappeared like snow upon reaching the floor, yet her voice was as cold as it could get.

"I… I've been living for my family's wellbeing, Yohime-sama." I look down, towards my hands as I entwine my fingers, resting them on the table. "I don't want Takeru to go through what I had to. I know that all you've done might have been with the idea that I was going to become a vassal… And if that is the case I cannot apologize enough. But my son's future is my priority, and I don't want him to be forced to follow my footsteps. I want him to choose what he wants in his life once he is old enough. Therefore, well…"

"Is the matter a monetary one, perhaps?"

"Huh?"

"Would you be wishing to acquire an exemption draft for Takeru, and because of this you would prefer to work for…" She closed her eyes, bringing a finger to an edge of her lips, trying hard and failing at restraining the small frown that surfaced. "… someone that gave you a better reward for your services?"

"No, that's not it."

"Are you displeased in your position, then?" She shoots out immediately after.

"No, it's not that either."

"Do you favor another Regent, perchance?" And again, instant retaliation.

"Of course not, Yohime-sama. I am truly grateful for all the chances Takahisa-sama has given me, I am not displeased in-"

"Then, why not accept our proposal?" She leaned forward, narrowing her eyes.

"… I said so a moment ago. If I accept, Takeru would be forced to serve in the Shogunate, either as a Guard or a public servant."

"I believe he does admire the Royal Guard, however?"

"I… I just…" I close my eyes tightly, sinking my fingers into their lock. Remembering our last day together, I had to choke on air to prevent some tears from running away.

"Shirogane, what is the source of such worry?"

"… My apologies, Yohime-sama. I already said what I wanted to."

"Please, do not think yourself capable of beguiling me." She scolded me, dulling the edge in her voice, leaning back into her seat. "What is ailing you to such lengths? I would rather not have to deliver such awful news to Takahisa-sama tonight, between your negative and your current complexion."

"I… well… It's a personal matter, I don't think it proper to push this onto your shoulders."

"I would rather not have to use my station to force you to speak… So, please feel free to confide in me if anything is troubling you." She smiled again, sweetly and kindly.

I let out some air as I relaxed onto my seat, the laugh of the kids seeming to be fading away.

"… I swore to my wife that… I would protect Takeru, no matter what. I know he might choose to join the Guard on his own, but I don't want to force that choice on him. I don't want to have him lose all I had to lose in these years. And since I am a pilot, it might be expected of him to follow in my footsteps and… I don't want that for him."

"However, if Takeru becomes the son of a fellow of mine, then he could be given a fine career path from under the options available in the fellowship, isn't that right?"

"And that would be equal to me forcing the path on Takeru when he is but a child. I already am an absent parent, what kind of guardian would I be if I also took his freedom away from him?"

For what was but an instant, Yohime-sama's hands shook unnaturally. She closed her eyes for a long time, caressing her hair. I thought I had angered her, spitting in the face of her goodwill, yet when she opened her eyes she was still emanating that kind glow she had for the most part of our talk.

"… I am glad to hear you harbor such thoughts for your son. And with all the more reason, I must insist that you become our fellow, Shirogane."

"Huh? Yohime-sama, forgive my rudeness, but I just said that-"

"Your main concern is taking your son's freedom, as well as having him fall on the wrong hands should something happen to you, am I correct?"

"Yes. That's correct."

"Well, if you become our fellow, you would be giving us a… connection to use to safeguard Takeru if the worst comes to pass."

"I… well, I don't really know much of how the child care services work, but I'm sure it must not be easy for a Regent to… well, prevent Takeru from ending up in the wrong place."

"Worry not, we have ample resources. We shall find a way to keep him safe while not compromising our standing, I assure you of it." Her voice could tear through a TSF with sheer willpower, it was enough to make me unconsciously give her a nod, to which she smiled. "And also, while we shall look over him, I will make sure Takeru isn't forced into any one path by anyone. He shall choose his own future himself, and he won't be forcefully inducted. The money you earn will also remain on his name, so that if he doesn't wish to stay in the fellowship he has the option to leave whenever he desires."

"However… Why would you go so far? To give me such special treatment, to protect Takeru in such a way… To still give me all the benefits of being a fellow while not expecting my son to serve you as well… I don't know if I'm worth your trust, what could I possibly do to pay back these deference?"

And then, looking up, she took a second to answer as she played with her hair.

"Well, you have already helped me in a very… delicate matter." She again closed her eyes, her tone slowing down as her hands rested onto the table.

"I… I have?"

"Yes… It is thanks to you that, perhaps, the night will one day set in this house once more."

"… What?"

"Worry not, I was merely thinking aloud." She waved a hand in the air, then sighed. What… caused her to show this much worry? Something I did… Something related to the night… No, don't have a clue. "So, I swear to you on my name that I shall make sure your son remains safe in case you were to perish. And he won't be made to follow any path forcefully, Takeru shall choose his own road himself."

"I… see." It's obvious she is being honest, she isn't even veering her gaze a little, and she spoke with such serenity, such conviction. But… Why?

"However, for me to be able to do what little I can, I would need you to officially become our fellow. And that comes with certain… responsibilities."

"I won't be able to return to the IJA, I will have to swear my loyalty to your house and mind my actions in public from now on, even when I'm not actively serving the House."

"Indeed. Your son will also have the choice to work for us, even if not as a Royal Guard. However, in your case, you shall become a vassal of this House, and will have to be always at the ready for our orders, even if it is during your breaks. Your military achievements will also fall under the Koubuin House's effects from now on."

"… I think I always did that, however."

"Is that so?"

"Yes, all the data I generated, all the test courses me and my squadmates designed and tested were given to Takahisa-sama himself back at the Castle." I thought that was the standard rule.

"Hehe… It isn't hard to see why he has you in such high esteem."

"I just thought that was what I had to do, since I am working under Takahisa-sama."

"Well, but there are others who would have tried to remain as the main beneficiary of such developments, or sell the data in the black market, however."

"Has that happened in the past?" She nods, seeming to be really angry now.

"More times than I'd like to recall. Many are the ones who insist on having their names be featured in what little achievements they generate." She let out some air, I relaxed once she seemed to have calmed down, a hand cruising through her long hair. "However, it is good to see your hesitation was not because of an inconvenience but generated by your duty as a parent. Such protective thoughts are what we need in our fellows, so that they can serve the people as well as they could. So, allow me to ask again… Would you be willing to become our fellow, Shirogane?"

"… You truly won't force Takeru to become a vassal?"

"If he joins us, it will be on his own volition. I shall keep him safe, it is the least I can do as your Regent's wife." She smiled while entwining her fingers. "Yuuhi would also be truly saddened if anything happened to him, so it is in my best interest to have Takeru be safe as well." She looks towards the kids and I do too.

Yuuhi-sama and Takeru seemed to be arguing about something, her pouting again with narrowed eyes…. It seems he won the card game to eat the last bit of strawberry ice cream and now she's upset. It's not like with Sumika, it's a more quiet, one sided argument, with Yuuhi-sama unmoving in her position, but still not angry or anything, and he trying to make peace with her, and failing spectacularly at it.

"… They do seem to get along well."

"Indeed they do."

Yohime-sama giggled as her daughter practically dragged Takeru to the Shogi table for a match to 'win the ice cream', Takeru scratching his head as he complains that they can share it instead, to which Yuuhi-sama seems to stall a reaction, seemed to have been pacified. And then, still holding his hand, she returns to the table, sitting right by his side as they begin to eat together.

"Hehe, she truly does show many amusing expressions when around your son." She giggled again as they began to play again, I couldn't help but to also chuckle as I looked on as they played. Yohime-sama coughs, facing me frontally once more. "So… Would you be willing to join our fellowship, Shirogane?"

I close my eyes and breathe in, then set my sights on Takeru, who waves at me when he notices I'm looking. I wave back and remain gazing at him for a moment.

"… You truly will look after him if I die, Yohime-sama?"

"… Yes. I know the pressure that… one feels at the prospect of losing one's own flesh and blood. I will make sure Takeru remains safe if the worst comes to pass."

"No one will force him to… endure those whispers I've had to endure?"

"No, and I shall be taking action to banish such attitudes from my fellowship. I know you perhaps might not see your actions with much worth, but you have earned such an honor. You can place your trust in me, I shall protect Takeru." Then, again narrowing her eyes a bit, she looked straight into mine as she folded her arms. "And I assure you that, regardless of the opinions of the Tsukuyomi brothers, I shan't allow him to be forced to join us. It is the least I could do, after what you've done for us."

Taking one last look at him, seeing how happy he was now compared to all the years before, then again looking at Yohime-sama and finding the angelical smile unchanged, the firm impulse of her words still resonating in my ears…

"Then… It will be an honor to serve you with my life, Yohime-sama. All I ask is for you to keep watch over Takeru, as you've said you would." I bow to her, finally relaxing my shoulders and losing the tension that was in my stomach.

"On the contrary, it is a pleasure to welcome you into my fellowship, Shirogane." She smiled at me, wider than before. "Worry not, your son shall be safe with us. Please do keep supporting my lord husband as you have done until now."

"Yes, milady. To my last breath."

Lull in the Masquerade

Chapter 4 7 : Lull in the Masquerade

---

December 1st. Near 8 AM.

(Classroom.)

---

Dawn broke to the scheduled patrols and meetings, to the chorus of breakfast, to the buzzing of the hangars. Undisturbed by the prior day's HSST event, business in Yokohama Base resumed as per usual at the start of the new month with soldiers lying in wait in meeting rooms, others scrambling to their daily duties, and those higher in the chain of command quietly debating key matters behind tightly bolted doors.

And in another habitual event, those present in the classroom of the 207th Cadet Squad were debating something or the other as they awaited the arrival of their Instructor after eating their fill of synth breakfast.

"Come on, stop it," Tamase sourly demurred, "I managed to do that because I could feel your encouraging me. It still feels surreal, to be honest," She then sighed, hunching over her desk.

"You still did great," Ayamine, yet again, then proceeded to pet her head.

"Nevertheless, I believe this topic to be but an obvious cause for concern," Mitsurugi remarked, a lone finger on her chin, "For should both you and Takeru were to be placed on the same team, I loath to admit the battle shall become one-sided."

"Precisely, which is why we're placing you besides him as of now on the list of concerns," Tapping her glasses as per usual, Sakaki said,

"Your marksmanship is the only surefire answer we have against Shirogane-kun's acrobatics. If you're covering his back, and he starts to do those aerial charges…"

"We're dead," Ayamine deadpanned, nodding slowly as Sakaki also did in agreement.

"Come on Kei-san, don't be so pessimistic," Yoroi smiled, leaning over her desk, "We just have to train more to learn to imitate his jumps, then Takeru's moves won't be such a problem."

"Yeah, we can't start bracing for something that might not come at all," Tamase said, looking at the others one at a time, "We should be focusing on how to improve from now on. After all, we're finally piloting our Fubukis today!"

"Yes, I suppose you're right," Sakaki said, relaxing onto her seat, "In any case, let's hope the Instructor doesn't force us to go against both of you."

Their talk was then cut off as the door opened, giving way to the sole male of the squadron to slug himself inside the room. Eyes half open and eye bags growing in both size and intensity, Takeru closed the door behind him making next to no sound and slowly approached the rest.

"Hey Takeru!" Yoroi rose a hand to welcome him, "How's it going?"

"… It goes, I guess," Waving back, he then proceeded to slump into his usual seat.

"Shirogane-kun, is everything alright?" Tapping her glasses, she asked while getting closer.

"Yeah, just… tired," He wearily replied, any signs of his habitual cheery attitude shining for their absence.

"Takeru, you wouldn't have been made to work past lights out, have you?" Mitsurugi inquired, arms beginning to fold as worry tainted her voice.

"It's what it is… It was…" Stalling a follow up, he looked out the window instead, "necessary to do that. I'm fine, for real."

"Special-kun, you sure don't look fine. Think you can do the trainings?" She asked, not liking one bit how his eyelids refused to fully open.

"Don't worry 'bout it," Smiling, he gave them all a look, "No way I'll miss our first mock battle. Or more like, no way the Instructor would let me," Shrugging, he started to chuckle.

While the two smaller ones of the group easily fell prey to his misdirection, chuckling along him, the other three hadn't missed the waning intensity of his laughter, the rather lethargic pace his gestures now took. However, before inquiries could be said, the door opened yet again and in stormed the Instructor.

Saluting her cadets, no time was wasted as she began the lecture with the last details she deemed necessary for the upcoming mock battle. All of them opened the textbooks, beginning to read the material, the cadets again on the receiving end of the never-ending stream of questions forwarded by the Reaper.

Amidst the questions and reviews, Mitsurugi and Ayamine couldn't help but to take peeks at Takeru, who was again absentmindedly staring out the window. Despite this, whenever he was called to stand he managed to deliver a correct answer as he always had. And yet, the tonality of his voice sounded off to their ears.

Ayamine having been on the sharp end of his assault, recipient of his reprimands, and Mitsurugi finally noticing due to her, in her mind at the least, furtive glances that he was for the first time twisting his lips in a saddened manner as he explored the clouded skies outside. Takeru hadn't made such a gesture when they had shunned him off, what was just a hint of worry soon turned to mild concern as his disposition did not improve during the lecture.

Distracted, almost apathetic, despite his gaze returning to the classroom Takeru wasn't truly there at the time.

Closing the book and giving it a strong palm, the Instructor finished her lecture and freed the cadets so that they could go get changed for the battle. And while the other three remained chatting over the lecture, both Ayamine and Mitsurugi approached the one who was still who knows where.

"Takeru, are you truly alright?"

"Hm? Yeah, why?"

"Well, you've been out of sorts during the lecture," She repined, arms folding in as usual for her.

"Sigh… It's nothing," Halfheartedly replying, he waved a hand to and fro.

"Special-kun, you don't usually stare out the window so much. You sure you're feeling well?" Getting closer, perhaps more than Mitsurugi would have liked, Ayamine stared at him. Thinking that, in part, her behavior which made him fight to exhaustion was to blame.

"… I'm just a bit tired, is all," Scratching the back of his head, he then began to examine the ceiling.

"Perhaps, are you not allowed to speak of the matter?" Mitsurugi asked.

"Kinda, I guess. It just… wasn't what I was expecting." And again, his gaze lost itself upwards as he uttered no more words.

Slightly unnerved by this, both girls shared a gaze as he remained silent.

"Then, do remember to show some restrain during the mock battle, Takeru." Meiya told him.

"Don't go overboard today, got it?" Ayamine said, making a point of staring at Takeru at point blank.

"Heh, don't worry. I'm not that dumb. For real, I'm just a bit tired." He said, trying and failing to muster some vigor.

"You have already said that, however." Mitsurugi eyed him sideways.

"Take it easy, Monster-kun." She said, patting his shoulder. Which, unexpectedly to her, made him smile back.

"I will, don't wanna end up busted after all. Thanks for worrying, Kei," Still smiling, he so said.

Which gained him a shocked stare from Ayamine, who was not expecting him to again refer to her in that way as he had done when reprimanding her during their fight. Unsure of how to answer, she merely nodded back at him with a neutral expression.

"… Takeru, please do remember to keep that habit at bay," And he thus elicited such an answer from Mitsurugi.

"Huh? What're you talking about?" Dumbfounded, he replied.

"You just referred to Ayamine by name," She answered, fuming much at the little matter.

"Oh… Sorry, didn't notice. I tend to do that when I'm tired," Again scratching his head, Takeru gave a small bow to Ayamine.

"No worries. You're off the hook for today," Who returned a small smile his way, which spurred him to return to his usual cheer.

… Even if that only served to further bolster what embers were on Mitsurugi's eyes.

Finally shedding the shell, Takeru diverted the matter to the mock battle, if only to not suffer from Mitsurugi's glare, on what remained on the way to the changing rooms.

And seeing that they all could once more share a conversation, despite Ayamine's jabs catching him off guard today, he could finally sigh what heaviness remained on his stomach away, leave the coldness that enveloped his back since he awoke.

For amidst the memories that surfaced yesterday he saw for the first time who his father was in this world, how much he cherished him, and how much he had to endure on his own after his mother's passing. However, the dissonance that spurred on him when seeing little Yuuhi play with his small self was enough to keep Takeru awake for hours on end. Because for all the unbound joy that overflowed his heart when seeing said memory…

… An equal amount of grief was left in him this morning as he yet again saw a nightmare with himself trapped in a graveyard, running away to no avail from a piercing, ruthless voice that he could only attribute to Her Highness.

December 1st. 0 1 :43 PM.

(Mana's Room.)

[Mana]

---

"… And as I said before, his performance was not what one would expect out of a cadet." Kamiyo said, remaining bowing in place.

"Is that so? What of after he was back at the hangar?"

"The man seemed rather exhausted, Mana-sama. However, his squadron now seems to no longer hold any reservations towards him…" Both tone and expression then turned solemn, "including Meiya-sama."

"Is the man free at the moment?" Daizaburou-sama inquired, to which she shook her head.

"No, General. No sooner was their exercise finished, Takamura-dono was already in wait for him. However, should you give the order, we could approach her and-"

"No, we shall desist for the time being," He says, my three subordinates as well as my two younger relatives stiffen upon hearing.

"… Mana-sama, may I?" Ebisu raised her hand slowly, trembling very subtly.

"What is it, Ebisu?"

"Well, we noticed a few odd things about Cadet Shirogane when we were following him and the other cadets on their way to the changing rooms."

"What do you speak of?"

"Well, we noticed him meeting up with that Yashiro girl before he and Takamura-dono returned to the lower floors." Yashiro… The foreigner that for some reason bears a Japanese name. Another one of the many mysteries of this base. A moment, wasn't she an ESPer? What kind of business could she have with him, I wonder.

Tomoe then takes a step forward and, after a small bow, speaks up.

"And we also noticed that… Meiya-sama was referring to him by his name."

"Eh?! She was?!" Mion and Shion replied in unison before me pr Daizaburou-sama could. All four of us shared a look, leaving the silence hanging.

We did ask Meiya-sama about what she knew about him, and told her that he might be a spy using a fake identity… or possibly one of our fellows. According to their talks during the CCSE, he said he had amnesia and seemed to truly be shaken to the core after the trial.

Without giving us respite, she proceeded to staunchly defending him when she thought we were judging him for being a foreigner. I've never seen Meiya-sama in such manner, so openly aggressive. As he would have said about Yuuhi-sama, it was as if fire was pouring from her eyes. Well they are twins, so I suppose it isn't odd for some similarities to exist between them.

Of course, she became truly anxious when we told her he might be a spy, and that the possibility of him being the person he claimed to be was very slim. But if she's openly calling him by his name and acting amicably with him… Is she being blinded by her feelings; or, is she trying to deceive him?

"I see… Did she seem tense in the slightest?" All three of them shake their heads in unison without delay, "Daizaburou-sama, what do you suggest?"

"We must not move until we're certain to reach our objective," He thus said, some vigor in his tonality now, "We shall deal with the man during a talk with him. You three, remain watching Meiya-sama as per usual."

"Yes, sir!" Thus they saluted, then turned on their heels and left.

We four then remained seated in silence, drinking some tea after having our afternoon meal. Sighing as I bring a hand to my hair, my gaze meets his.

"Daizaburou-sama, whatever shall we do? If the schedule proceeds as it should, we will again be stymied in our efforts to approach Ta… the man."

"We can await for tomorrow, to see if there is an opening available," He somberly said, "Otherwise, we shall have to employ an encrypted frequency to speak to him during the mock battle."

"Daizaburou-sama, sir, said matter has already been arranged, has it not?" Mion asked, slightly leaning forward.

"Indeed. While the UN wishes for us to use some of the modified Gekishins Mana's squadron has been testing thus far, I shall go ask for permission to at least allow her to deploy in her personal machine so that we can establish the connection with it as the antenna," He then sighs, taking a moment to look at each of us, "I know I am reiterating myself, however, you three are certain that the man is indeed him?" We all nod, holding his gaze.

"Sir, I know well why you harbor such doubts," Shion said as she gave him a small bow, "however, the answers he gave us were plentiful enough. I am of the opinion that the man is truly him."

"And yet, he has not recalled anything by interacting with you three, nor is there an answer regarding his supposed survival. Yuuhi-sama has been clear, Takeru is dead," Thus he solemnly said.

Both Mion and Shion lower their heads, frozen in place despite the palpable desire to continue to argue as they did when they returned from their talk with him.

"By the by Daizaburou-sama, have we received word from HQ regarding our report?" I believe we should already have received an answer, considering how we were dared to hustle in our efforts.

"Sigh… Yes, we did," He wearily answered, crossing his arms, "According to Maya, Her Highness is most adusted at our lack of definitive proof and continued failings to approach the man, reiterating that unless solid proof is presented that man cannot in any way be Takeru. Tsuhi also mentioned she was willing to request a talk with the XO should our plan prove unsuccessful. Both Maya and Tsuhi also were quite insistent on learning of what we had gathered from our interactions with him."

"So we are understandably running out of time, huh."

Her Highness wouldn't lose her composure if she believed this man to be a faker, the fact that she's now asking for proof is a stark change from her initial position. I suppose it is obvious she was as astonished as we by his answers. However, for Maya to admit she is adusted at the situation, and for Tsuhi to be involved… Perhaps, she might have begun to show the fangs he sharpened for her during those years.

"… In any case, it is imperative that we speak to this man, to ascertain whether truly is Takeru or not," Daizaburou-sama thus spoke. Our orders were clear now, we had to act. "I shall be going to confirm the details of the mock battle, you three should go check the units the UN will be handing us," He then stood up, and we soon followed.

Sharing a salute as we left the room, he went his way as me and the cousins took a different hallway towards the hangars. Unwilling to pronounce a word, rigidly following me, no amount of meditation nor planning seems to be able to sooth the anxiety permeating their complexion.

However, it is completely understandable. For his first mock battle only showed what I began to affirm within. To hear proof that his skill not only hasn't waned, but that it has actually been further polished brings such elation to me. For him to be once more calm, for him to have learned to mind his pace.

And yet, this might be proof that it is not him but a spy, and that tears up my heart. If he is indeed an impostor, I myself will give him the torture most cruel we have on the Empire. After all, despite the similarities, it is odd to think he would find pleasing the idea of serving the UN nor that he would remain so serene after being forced to endure this punishment. However, if all of our suspicions are indeed correct…

Then the UN will have to give us a good explanation for this. How was he rescued during Lucifer? And why didn't they sent him back? Of course, once the data was erased there was no possible way for anyone to know who he was, but he should still have been wearing his red suit of the Royal Guard. Why didn't they ask the Empire about his position? I cannot believe someone asked and we didn't notice, unless someone simply checked the databases, told the UN off and didn't even write that down.

It doesn't matter how this is resolved, our relations with the UN will suffer. If he isn't Takeru, we will have to take legal actions against them for this offense against the Empire. And if he is… I don't know what Yuuhi-sama may do to bring him to her side.

Same Day . 07:44 PM.

(Takamura's Office.)

[Takeru]

---

"I can't believe we're ready to start building it," Takamura's hands gripped her chopsticks tightly as she ate.

"Isn't that a good thing? In just a little over a week you'll be able to test the railgun. You're making great progress, right?"

"Yes, indeed. Nevertheless, I am most anxious truth be told," She said, unable to hide the creeping slowness in her tone, "It took us a half year to build a working prototype last time, and yet now…" Yeah, these guys are insane. The passion they have is truly enviable.

"Well, you already had data this time to fall on, so you could work more efficiently, right?"

"Sigh… Yes," She looks really tired as she keeps eating.

It most be a very heavy weight, and now that it's time to see the results she must be made a nerve wrack. It's the same for my own projects, even if I'm nothing but an overseer.

"1st Lt. Takamura, you don't have to worry so much. The railgun is gonna turn out perfectly, I'm sure!"

"Ah… Thanks, Cadet Shirogane. But that was not what I was mulling over."

"Huh? Then, what is worrying you?" She moves one hand backwards, moving her hair behind her ear.

"Well, the Professor asked me to participate in a mock battle a few days ago, and to be frank I am still recoiling at the exhaustion it brought me. It wouldn't be inaccurate to affirm that I completely collapsed after it," Huh. So she was spent after it too, and it's why she still looks super down.

"Did you had some trouble during it?" She closes her eyes, bringing a finger to her lips.

"Hmm… I believe that this could be useful for you," Nodding with a smile, a finger goes to her chin, "I had the advantage, technologically speaking. And yet, I was surpassed in skill. Don't ever underestimate your opponents because they use older models when you get commissioned," I give a nod and she continues, "Well, to be perfectly honest, I had to fight seriously to keep up and even so I almost lost. No… If I guide myself by the honor code, I lost to that pilot," She nods solemnly as she crosses her arms.

"Um… Why do you say that? First you said you 'almost' lost."

"My sword was knocked away from my hands. Losing my blade equals losing the duel, according to my samurai teachings. Of course, if I consider my TSF as my blade, then I can say I came out victorious. And yet, I can't say that confidently," Eyes closed, she then softly sighs, "However, it was truly a welcome surprise. I didn't knew another member of the Royal Guard was stationed here," Huh? What did she just…

"Another member? You mean 1st Lt. Tsukuyomi?"

"Oh, you've met her? But no, I wasn't referring to her. I wasn't allowed to know who the pilot was, and I know the 1st Lt. wouldn't be piloting such a machine, but I recognized the patterns. Those were clearly the ones of the fabled Mugen Kidou style. But it is obvious, since the Shogun gave her blessing to this base when it was built. It is only natural she allowed one of her retainers to be here," She said, nodding as if in understanding, slowly eating again.

"Um… 1st Lt., I have no idea what you're talking about." I feel like I just accidentally stepped into something useful.

"Huh? Oh, right! You were abroad for a long time, didn't you?" She gives me a small bow, "Well, allow me to explain. You know I am a member of the Fudai, right? Well, I had to attend many meetings in representation of my house and I could see many test runs and the like, even before officially joining the Royal Guard. The Mugen Kidou is the name of the fighting style the House of the current Shogun uses, and so all of its members and retainers know to fight in it. It is easy to recognize by its quick frontal attack patterns and how it employs a few but precise blows. Though the pilot I faced was a bit peculiar in its movement, he most certainly employed the Mugen Kidou when in close range."

"I see. So that's how it is."

I grab the… dough, I guess, and finish my dinner. Of course, the Mugen Kidou was something like a family tradition in Meiya's family back in my world, it's normal it would be here too. Which means that since I know how to fight in it, I can use that to prove I am indeed Takeru Shirogane to the Royal Guard. I… hadn't thought of that.

"Yes, it was a marvelous match, even if I was on edge all throughout it," We both nod slowly, saying nothing for the moment. So we both were doing our best, huh. No wonder what we did to the ruins, "So, as I was saying, that pilot was truly something else. If I have to face that person again I'll end up exhausted, and that worries me a little. I was ready to work overtime for the railgun, but I most certainly did not expect to have to face such an opponent," She sighs again, dropping her shoulders as the cloud over her gets bigger. I might have been a bit too rough on her last time.

"Well, just do your best. Also, thanks a lot for helping during the evening trainings."

"No, it is nothing. However, seeing Tamase's progress today was shocking to be honest. I did not know she could manipulate the Feedback Protector with such precision," Smiling again, she says.

"Yeah, today was a surprise for sure," I might have been a bit off through the training, but they're all doing good progress. If only we could get the XM3 soon-ish… "Well, anyways, thanks a lot for helping. We're gonna miss your remarks once you leave the base," However, despite my smile and friendly tone, her expression sobered up in a flash.

"… What do you mean, when I leave the base?"

"I mean, the railgun is almost done, right? After that you may get a break from your duties when you return to the Empire." Her chopsticks stop suddenly, her eyes suddenly light up. Hoho, nice reaction indeed.

"I… My intention is to remain here, as a member of the UN," She breathes in deeply, looking to the ceiling, "Regardless of the result of this endeavor, I shall cleave a path forward for their sake," Small embers coming out of her eyes, she catches herself and coughs once, returning to her usual, "… Forgive me for voicing out my worries, Cadet Shirogane," And then, another small bow. She's too serious, even more than Chizuru.

"No, it's cool. But I didn't knew you wanted to stay here, you aren't returning to the Royal Guard?" Sensei, you didn't tell me about this! What could she have to do here? Monitoring me, perhaps?

"I know what you're thinking but not all of us see the UN with hatred, Cadet Shirogane. There is something I can only do here, and I won't leave until I've done it. But let's not get all gloomy, we have our dinner to enjoy. Tell me, how has your training been so far?" Did she change the subject because she didn't want to slip up?

I tell her of how everything is going in broad strokes, trying to catch anything in her expression. Nothing comes up, so I just chill and ease up.

"So, there is much to learn yet so I can't relax," She nods at my words as she eats.

"Indeed. The road never ends, so you do well to keep honing yourself," Nodding twice, she smiles, "By the by, have you given some thought to what I said before? About your piloting career?"

"… Well, being a test pilot might be hard work, but it does play a key role in our system," Takamura's eyes shine at my words, making it hard for me continue, "And well, I guess I wouldn't mind helping out, but I do think I'll fare better in the frontlines."

"It's not like test pilots never see battle, and you could save many lives with your developments. I do share the sentiment of wishing to be part of the vanguard, but someone has to stay behind polishing the new blades. Without skilled pilots fool-proofing our new TSFs we won't be able to gain an advantage in the war, wouldn't you agree?" Ugh, she's just like Meiya, she always has a convincing counter argument.

"Yes, I guess. Anyways, it's still to early for me to decide. I'll see when I get commissioned."

"Hm… Yes, that is also true. Well, I won't hold you any longer, go to the Professor for your evening orders. Good night, Cadet Shirogane."

"Good night, 1st Lieutenant." I salute her and then leave.

Walking slowly, watching my surroundings, it looks like no one is close by. Making use of the chance, I pick up my pace to make it quickly to the elevator. Once inside, I breathe a sigh as I lean on a wall.

… I can't read Takamura at all. Is she keeping tabs on me or is she being honest? I mean, those eyes and that smile make me think she's truly curious about me, but she is a member of the Guard. However, I'm amazed I got so used to sharing dinner with her. If I make it to the end of my punishment it's gonna feel weird going to the PX again.

After checking up on Hangar 90's developments, I go to my office. Let's send him a message… What should I say though? Hmm… Well, I do need to get more people to my side for the IST to become a reality, so let's be civil about it. Some court words, a formal request to meet up, and a reminder to keep this secret should suffice. Let's ask him to do something to prove he isn't going to back-stab me too.

After taking care of that and closing my office, I make my way to Sumika's room. Getting out from the elevator, my ears pick up some footsteps noises coming closer. Taking a turn, I see a black figure rushing to my side.

"Hey Kasumi, how's every-"

TUG!

PULL!

"K-Kasumi, don't pull me! Hey, what's up?" She stops and looks at me, with such a happy expression that the moon would be left jealous of its brightness.

"I could talk with Sumika-san! Hurry, let's go!" Nodding back, I pick up my pace and we arrive at the dark room.

Kasumi quickly moves to the side of the cylinder, barely able to contain her eagerness.

"So, how did it go? What did you talk about?"

"It wasn't much, but she asked me about you. That seems to be the only thing she cares about," The bunny affirms.

Yeah, if she also went through the same horrible shit as the Sumika from the other world, the memory of her Takeru might have been the only thing keeping her sane.

"Do you think we could talk with her again?"

"Yes. I'll try to link your thoughts to hers, but I don't think I'll be able to do that for long. I'll do my best to give you as much time as you can," She moves her bunny ears and circles to my back, placing her head against it.

I close my eyes. The usual tingly feeling on the back of my heads appears, yet I can't feeling anything going on.

Taking a deep breath, trying to relax, I focus on the feeling like I do when trying to recover his memories.

Sumika, are you there? Can you hear me?

… Seems like not. Kasumi is doing her best though, so I can't just-

"… ru-chan." Huh?

"Sumika? Can you hear me?"

"Is that… ru-chan?!"

"Sumika, it's me! I'm here, just by your side."

"Takeru-chan? Is it really you?" Once it clearly reaches me, her voice sounds completely drained, broken.

"Yes, it's me. I'm right here besides you, Sumika." I hear something similar to a wail as a distorted image appears on my sight.

A dark sea, in the middle of a storm. The waves roar high, closer to the moon than the clouds, as they keep clashing against each other. Is this… how she's feeling right now?

"… Did you like the santa rabbit I brought you?"

"Yes, it's just like the one you gave me before. Kasumi has been showing me some of your memories. I… I had forgotten about our friends," Her voice creaks, as if she suddenly got out in the middle of a snowstorm.

"Hey, it's alright. I can't even imagine how you must feel right now. But I'm here, like I've always been for you."

"Takeru-chan, you were so awesome back then. You were always smiling, always finding new things to play with, and you always kept me company at night by the window when I felt sad. You were… my light…"

"Sumika… I've missed you so much. Forgive me… for leaving you alone." Both last loop and back home, you were right besides me… and I couldn't even be there for you.

"But Takeru-chan… You're not… You're not my Takeru-chan, right?" She said, and the waves began to swirl more for a sec.

"Huh? Oh, did Kasumi tell you about my memories?"

"No, I know that… that my Takeru-chan died," I can feel it, that tone… it's the same she made when- "I saw it. Those BETA… Those damn BETA! I'll kill them, all of them!" Her voice again turns into that deranged one, screaming bloody murder away.

"Sumika, calm down! I'm here, I'm alive! No BETA will kill me."

"You're lying! Those damn BETA! They… They…" Her tone picks up on speed, repeating the same things over and over.

The waves of the sea roar high, shredding themselves on top of each other, meanwhile Sumika's cries continued to repeat themselves.

"Please, Sumika! It's alright, we'll take care of the BETA. I'll make sure they're gone forever, so please-"

"No! No! It's not my fault!"

"Sumika, please! I… I've been looking at the moon, just like you asked me to. You don't have to suffer alone anymore, we are here for you," It's still so hard to hear her like this. What could I possibly say to her? What can I do for her? Is there… even anything I could do? Feels as if I had knives thrusted into my sides, being unable to give her any measure of comfort.

"No! No! You'll die again. You' re gonna die again! Don't go, you'll die!" She keeps repeating that over and over, her voice becoming more twisted, her tone dropping with every word.

"Sumika, I promise you I won't! And I swear I'll avenge you, and all of our friends. So don't be so sad, I've been here besides you since a month or so. I'm… For this little while, I'm here all for you. Just like when we were little, right?" She then became silent, the storm in the sea calmed down a bit.

Everything slowly became darker and darker, until I could no longer distinguish anything.

Did Kasumi reach her limit? Or is Sumika in shock?

"I'm sorry."

"Huh? Why're you apologizing? Sumika, you did nothing wrong."

"I'm sorry."

She keeps repeating this for a while, not listening to a thing I say. It gets smaller and smaller as if she were fading away.

"Sumika, what happened? It's okay, please calm down."

"Takeru-chan… I'm sorry."

"Don't apologize, Sumika. Tell me, what is it?"

…

I can no longer hear her voice. The silence returns, filling me with a stagnant feeling in my chest. Opening my eyes again I let out a deep sigh as I wring my hands to bite back the frustration. For a moment, I stay there with my eyes closed, feeling empty all of a sudden.

"… Kasumi, how are you?" I turn around and she her massaging her temple.

"I… I'm alright," Her tone betrayed her words, so I patted her head again until her breathing steadied back, "Thanks, Takeru-san."

"Come on, now. This was all thanks to you, Kasumi," Patting her head a bit more slowly, she moves her bunny ears, "So, you sure you're fine?"

"Yes. However, it really hurts when she goes into shock like that. But it's the first time she says something different."

"Different? You mean she never started apologizing before?"

"Well, I've never got to talk with her for so long, but only when I mention you she gets so overwhelmed by sadness. Before you came she usually got enraged or terrified as soon as I mentioned or showed her anything that remembered her of the BETA," She sighs, looking down to the floor.

"It's not like I didn't expect his, considering the torture she had to go through and how she must be feeling right now. I froze up and didn't knew what to say to her. Last time she was already the 00 Unit when she reacted like this, so at least I could hug her. But now I can do nothing, and it felt that no words could get her to listen."

This must be the reason why Sensei gambled on me running away and making my world's Sumika's memories come to that other world, she knew this Sumika was too unstable. But I'm not willing to go back and have to make another Sumika go through that again, so I'll have to heal her heart somehow once she becomes the 00 Unit.

"I thought she would be happy to talk with you… Sorry."

"Hey, don't apologize. We can now work with this to at least have an actual conversation with her before we have to say our goodbyes forever."

"… Yes, you're right. Let's do all we can to stabilize her," I return her firm gaze, her crystals recovered their usual light. I then tenderly ruffle her hair again, and she again moves her bunny ears.

"Well then, think you can do the memory recovery session today?"

"… Yes, leave it to me."

[Native Takeru]

---

"If you bite it and you die, it's poisonous. If it bites you and you die, it's venomous." Maya-nee said, tapping her glasses.

"But what if it bites me and it dies?"

"Then you're poisonous, Takeru. Could you please try to listen and think before asking such questions?" She sharpened her gaze on me, sending a shiver down my back.

I was just asking, why does she always get so mad?

"B-But… But what if it bites itself and I die?" Sumika asked, her eyes trembling at the images on our books. Again with the nonsense questions, Aunt Haruna should stop telling her all those fairy tales.

"Oh, that would be voodoo." Mion answered, caressing her ponytail.

"But what if it bites me and someone else dies?" Sumika then asked. Sigh… She's always saying this random stuff that makes no sense. How do they come up with this ideas anyways?

"Sumika, that's just impossible."

"That's enough, you three." Maya-nee tapped her glasses as she glared at us, making us shut up. "Alright, let's continue with the lesson."

Back in school, we got assigned some homework about different types of animals. Me and Sumika got assigned to cover snakes and mushrooms, but things aren't going too well. Sumika hates snakes, so she hasn't even started her part. And I was just going to mention how both things are poisonous, but then Maya-nee corrected me and insisted on overseeing our work today.

… This sucks. Just when Mion and Shion came to play…

"Takeru, why are you not using the proper kanji again?" Maya-nee came behind me and looked at my paper, squinting her eyes.

"It's bothersome. You only save one hiragana with it, why would I use it?"

"Sigh… Takeru, how many times do I have to tell you a kanji's worth isn't measured by how many hiragana you save when you use it? It gives context, it differentiates similar sounding words. You have to start using more kanji in your writing. Otherwise, breaking the habit will become harder for you."

"… How could anyone confuse it? If I write 'eating a mushroom', what other meaning could it have? And anyways, writing 'ta' is faster than writing the kanji. There's no reason to- A-Aaah! L-Let go of my ear!"

"Takeru… You will write every kanji that you should already know in this assignment, else you get half dinner today and tomorrow." Speaking calmly, but with that quiet, angry tone she looked at me with the scary eyes again.

"Don't be mean, this kanjis aren't useful! If what I write is right, then that's good enough!"

"Stop being so contrarian! You will write it and that's that!" She let's go of my ear and softly smacks the nape of my neck. "Sigh… By the Emperor, why are you this stubborn?"

"I'm not wrong."

"Don't you start pouting. Look at Sumika, she's not only writing as many kanjis as she can, her handwriting is so much more clear than yours." Maya-nee looked at Sumika's paper. She tried to hide it in embarrassment, but Maya-nee gave her an approving nod. "See? You should make a conscious effort to be better like she does."

"That's right, Takeru. You'll never be a samurai if you can't even write your own name." Shion teased me from the kitchen as she ate a manju.

Uuh! You dumb pickle… Fine! I'll write this dumb kanjis! Stupid mushrooms, snakes and all this nonsense. Why do I have to learn this if I want to be a samurai? This is stupid. School is stupid.

"Ah… I think it would be better if you used another page for the comparisons." Mion said, pointing to the paragraph with all the different types of snakes and stuff.

"Hmm… You're right. Thanks a lot, Mion!"

"Mion, do not make his homework for him." Maya-nee sent a glare our way. Mion's smile goes away as she looks down, her face now scared and tense.

"Don't be mean, I'm the one writing. Mion just gave me advice." Maya-nee is too serious when it comes to homework.

She sighs and returns her attention to Shion, while we continue to do this dumb homework.

---

Around an hour later…

---

"Uhh… I can't write anymore…" I slump onto the table. My hands hurt…

"Takeru, let me see." Maya-nee picks up my papers and starts reading them.

I sit up again, waiting for her words. I gulp, trying to calm myself a bit. W-What will she say? W-What if she gets mad?

"Hmm… See? You can do it when you try." She smiles for a brief moment and pats my head.

"Then… It's good?"

"Your handwriting still needs practice, but you did use more kanjis than usual. Well done, Takeru."

"Yay!"

"Good job, Takeru-chan!" Sumika raises a hand and we do a high five.

"Now, let me see yours Sumika." Maya-nee comes closer and I also take a peek at Sumika's papers.

… Her letters are so nice. How does she do that small writing while managing to write the things that well?

"Another fine work." Maya-nee nods, Sumika smiles as she taps her fingers together. "Well, you two earned your rest. You all stay inside, me and Haruna-san will go shopping. If anything happens while we're gone…" She taps her glasses again, looking at me.

"… Why are staring at me?"

"You know why, Takeru. No sword fights while I'm gone." Tch, she's so picky. What's the worst that could happen? I already broke the lamp that's outside last week. There's nothing else left to break outside.

"Don't worry, Maya-nee." Shion said, puffing her chest as she came closer. "I'll make sure he behaves correctly." She pats my shoulder strongly while smiling, showing me her teeth.

"But you're the one who's always taunting us."

"Oh? A samurai never puts excuses, Takeru. And you two have never beaten me yet." She then laughs quietly. Uuh! One of these days I will beat you!

"Shion, try not to tease them too much. Overconfidence is a slow and insidious killer after all. Well, you all be good with each other while we're gone." Maya-nee grabs a purse and after looking at us one last time, she goes towards the door.

"Well done Takeru, Sumika. So, what do you wanna do now?" Mion asked, "Shogi? Cat's Cradle?"

"I'm… not that good at Shogi." Sumika lowered her gaze. Right, she does not like that one…

"What about this?" Shion said as she came towards us. "Let's make a juggling competition. The one who can juggle for the longest time gets to pick the game." Again rising a finger upwards she smiled widely.

"… She says that because she's good at juggling."

"Yeah, she's just going to win again and pick Shogi." Me and Mion whisper, nodding to each other's words. Shion, you always do the same.

"Oh? What is it you two? What are you whispering about?" I really don't like it when she smiles like that, showing us all her teeth.

"W-We were just discussing what to do, right Takeru?"

"Yeah, just that."

"Really? You sure you weren't going to start kissing again?" Bringing a finger to her cheek, she started giggling. She's still mentioning that? Why is she so bothered by it?

"S-S-SHION! You promised you would keep it a secret!" Mion rose up and stormed towards Shion, her face was all red for some reason.

"And I am keeping it a secret. All of us here already know of that."

"Sumika didn't!"

"Oh, right. Well, it sucks to be you, I guess." Shion just shrugged Mion off, which made her start spouting steam from her ears.

"Takeru-chan… You… kissed?" Sumika's face was switching between different shades of blue. That lone hair of hers was down and all swirly.

"I was just trying to cheer Mion up. You see, we went to a forest last week and then we got lost chasing a squirrel. Then, Mion started crying, saying we were never going back. So, since I couldn't calm her down, I gave her a hug and-"

"TAKERU, SHUT UP!"

THWACK!

Gwah! T-That hurt… What's her problem?!

"Uuh… Mion, you dumb pickle! Why did you hit me like that?!"

"Y-You can't tell others of that! It was an accident! A secret isn't a secret if you go telling it to others." She puffed her cheeks and moved a finger up and down at me. Well… she does have a point. But still, there was no need to smack me like that.

"That was your fault for being dumb. We weren't that far away but you didn't stop bawling."

"You can be so mean. I was really scared! It was getting dark and all quiet…" She drops her gaze as her voice grows weaker.

"And then, Takeru gave you a smooch and cheered you up."

"Yes, and then… SHION!"

Mion starts berating Shion again, as she usually does. Seriously, why is she so embarrassed about it? Dad told me people give kisses to the ones they like, especially when they're sad or scared. How is that any different than all the hugs I always give them?

"… Takeru-chan." Sumika pulled my sleeve.

"What is it?"

"… Do you like Mion?"

"Yes."

"Eh…" Sumika opened her eyes wide. Her face again swirling through a wave of blue colors, she shivered a little.

"I mean, of course I like her. Just like how I like you, Shion and Yuuhi. Why are so surprised?" I don't get it, why is she looking at me like that? Girls are too dumb to not get this kind of thing.

"… I see. Hahaha… Yes, you like everybody in the same way." What's wrong with her?

"Anyways! Let's do some juggling! Takeru, let's go get the beanbags." Shion grabbed my arm and started pulling me to the stairs.

"I can walk, you know?"

"I do. This is just funner." Ugh, again with that smile…

We go to my room and after rummaging through a box we found the two beanbags.

"You have a lot of toys in here…" She was looking at them like how I look at natto rolls.

"Do you want to take one or two with you?"

"Eh?" Shion looked at me as if I had said a bad word. "Are you sure?"

"Yes. I mean, I don't use them all everyday. And we can play with them when I go over there."

"… You can be nice when you try. Good boy, Takeru." Shion started petting my head, that creepy smile still there.

"I'm going to get angry, Shion."

"Oh, I'm just being a good sister to you. Now, let's go back. I wonder how many times you'll juggle them today…" She said teasingly, winking at me as we leave my room.

We went back to the kitchen and started the juggling competition.

… Shion won again and we had to play Shogi. Since she's the only one that can somewhat play against Yuuhi, this didn't end well.

"Fuhuhu! Looks like I'm the winner again." Shion said as she finished her movement.

"Aah!… I lost… so fast…"

"Don't be sad, Sumika. Shion is really good at Shogi. I haven't won once against her." I pat Sumika's head softly, trying to cheer her up.

"You two can't win in Shogi or Kendo against me. You need to try harder! You'll never become samurais like this!" Shion grinned at us, looking as smug as usual when she wins. Uuh! One of these days I'll show you up!

Me and Mion shared a determined nod and challenged her again.

And again we lost.

"We're back. Kids, where are… Oh, what's up?" Aunt Haruna stared at us.

Shion was smiling with flowers around her face, us three were slumped onto the table.

"You all lost again?" Maya-nee comments as she enters the kitchen.

"They're all no match for me!" Shion said, loud and proud. I would speak up, but having lost so badly I have no energy to do so.

"Well, you can watch TV or something. We'll start making dinner." Aunt Haruna said, leaving the bags on the table, giving us some drinks and a few sweets.

We passed the sweets around and turned the TV on, changing it to the TV manga channel.

Today has been so much fun. Shion and Mion rarely get to visit, and since I have exams coming up Maya-nee didn't take me to Yuuhi's house this weekend. So, they came to visit today. I'm glad they're also nice with Sumika, since we can't play with the others outside of the park.

Dinner was delicious as always, and just a little after we all had finished, Maya-nee's Dad came to pick the pickles up. I don't like him much, he's always staring at me with this scary face… What's his problem?

"See you next week, Takeru. Good luck with your exams." Mion said, giving me a smile.

"Don't you dare to fail, you hear? I'll get bored training alone with Mion." Shion commented, leaving Maya-nee's side and going towards the car.

"I won't. Tell Yuuhi I'll go see her next week. Did you two have fun today?"

"Yes! Visiting you is always fun. Thanks for today, Takeru, Sumika." Mion gave us a bow and Shion soon followed.

After giving each of them a hug, we say our goodbyes. I have to pass this tests or Maya-nee won't let me go to practice. And that means I also won't be able to visit Yuuhi. Mion and Shion got inside the car, and the old man said something to Maya-nee before getting in too.

With a loud noise, the big car zooms away.

"Well Takeru, let's go back inside. You have to wake up early tomorrow." Maya-nee said as the big car became tiny on the distance.

"I know."

"Sumika, we have to go home too." Aunt Haruna went back inside and grabbed Sumika.

"See you tomorrow, Sumika."

"Yes, see you tomorrow." I was going to hug her, but Maya-nee grabbed me and stopped me. Aunt Haruna laughed along Sumika as they went their way.

"Takeru, it's cold so let's go back inside."

"Uuh… I know." Stop pulling me, I can walk.

Now it's so silent. I would have liked Dad to be here today. Yes, next time he comes back we should all get together! Though I do wonder why Mana-nee hasn't come in a long time. Even when we go to Yuuhi's house she doesn't come to say hi. Did she… go away too?

"Takeru, don't forget to go wash your mouth before going to sleep."

"I know."

"And no talking by the window tonight, you have to wake up early tomorrow."

"Maya-nee, I know!" She smiles and pats my head again.

"I'm just making sure you remember. Now, to the bathroom. The tube should be ready for you."

"I know… Thanks Maya-nee, today was really fun!" I give her a tight hug. She could have said no to Mion and Shion coming here, but she didn't and she helped me with my homework.

She smiles faintly as she pats my head, but then goes back to her usual face as she taps her glasses.

"There's no need for you to thank me. I'm just doing what I usually do. Now, be on your way. Otherwise it might get late."

I nod and go to the bath. She's always like that, I'm always the one that bathes first, the one that goes to sleep first. I once asked her to let me help her cook and she locked me in my room. So, if you won't accept my thanks, I'll just keep hugging you.

Well, I do have to wake up early tomorrow. I can't arrive late on an exam day after all. Maya-nee would get super worried if I did that. I just gotta do my best this week and pass all those exams! I can do it!

The Next Friday. 05:54 PM.

(Street.)

---

"I'm telling you, I'll be fine." Maya-nee was again holding my wrist, though not so tightly, as we went back home.

"Hmm… Well, we'll see in a few days." Why do you not believe me? I did my best so I should be fine.

"Maya-nee, can I ask you something?"

"What is it?"

"Where is Mana-nee? Why isn't she in Yuuhi's house as of late?" Maya-nee closed her eyes for a second, her lips moved a bit.

"Mana is… taking care of someone else."

"Who?"

"I can't tell you. It's something like us, she's there as the retainer of that someone."

"And she can't come visit?"

"Sadly, she cannot. Just like how I can't leave you alone, she also cannot leave that someone alone." Why is she saying 'that someone'? Who is that person?

"Then, can we go visit her?" Maya-nee stops walking and looks at me.

"Sigh… Takeru, Mana is very busy. So, visiting her would only give her trouble."

"Why? Then, can we call her?"

"Takeru… No, she's working very hard and we'll only distract her. When she has some free time, she'll go to Yuuhi-sama's house and you'll see her then." She starts walking again, ignoring my stare.

Where is Mana-nee? And what is this job? Hmm…

As we got closer to home, I saw a car parked right besides our house. It's one of those big black cars that are always in Yuuhi's house. Oh! Maybe Mana-nee came to visit!

"T-Takeru, don't run!"

"But someone came to visit! Don't you always tell me that it's not polite to keep people waiting?"

"Why do you have to remember my words at the most odd times?" She still keeps my wrist in place, not letting me rush towards the car.

As we got closer, someone came out of it to greet us. And I could see a familiar face, dressed in a white dress of the samurais.

"Uncle Koetsu!" I break free of Maya-nee's hold and run to his side. He crouches and hugs me back. "It's been so long! How have you been?"

"I've been fine, Takeru. I've been fine. How about you? How's school?" He ruffled my hair softly. Something is weird about him though. He's sad. His eyes are squinted as if he were cutting onions and his smile is not his usual.

"Are you okay, Uncle? You look sad." He opens his eyes wide at my words, but then laughs softly as he keeps ruffling my hair.

"As expected of Miho-san's son. Aren't you a sharp one, Takeru?"

"Good afternoon, Kurosawa-sama." Maya-nee came to our side and gave Uncle Koetsu a bow.

"Good afternoon, Tsukuyomi. May I come in?"

"Of course. Takeru, let's go." Maya-nee grabs my hand and we go inside.

Unlike how he usually is, Uncle Koetsu comes in quietly and sits down without making much talk. He's weird today. He's sighing a lot, his eyes move around as if he were looking for something.

"So, how have you been lately Takeru? Is everything fine?"

"Yes, I'm doing fine in school and I'm getting better at Kendo."

"Oh, can you beat Mion and Shion now?"

"… Not yet." I look away, puffing my cheeks. Those two are too good, I always end up sitting on the floor trying to keep up with them.

"Haha… That's good to hear. It's good that you're healthy." Uncle gazed at me, though something feels weird about him.

"Uncle, is anything wrong?" He looked down for a second, licking his lips.

"Well, I don't know how to say this so… I suppose being frontal is the best way to do this." His voice sounds dry, he then takes out a letter from a case he had on him and passes it to Maya-nee. "The news came just a few days ago. Between the bureaucracy and all the papers, I couldn't come deliver it any faster."

What is this about? Why are his eyes so cloudy? I look at Maya-nee, that's reading the letter. Her eyes turn sharp, focused as she makes that scary look she does when she scolds me. What is in the letter?

"Takeru…"

"Yes?" D-Did I do something bad?

"Listen to me closely, okay?" What is wrong with her? She looks like Sumika when she sees a spider.

"What's wrong?"

"Takeru, your… your Father was… killed in battle, along the rest of Takahisa-sama's squad."

… Eh?

Dad was… killed?

By the monsters?

… Eh? B-But… But he said he'll be alright. T-The samurais were all there with him… Why?

I look down as my eyes gets filled with tears. My hands tightly turned into fists, I clamp my mouth hard. It's a lie. Dad couldn't have… He was… He promised he would…

It's a lie.

It has to be.

I mean… Dad couldn't have… He isn't…

"Takeru…" Maya-nee pats my head, then grabs my chin and makes me look up. "This letter here… is from your Father. He left you a message alongside his will."

"Eh? Dad did?" B-But…

Maya-nee hands me the letter, that was written in a smaller paper compared to the other, bigger one she had on her hands.

My dear Takeru.

If you're reading this, it means Dad has gone to meet Mom and Grandma.

I know I couldn't be with you much, and that you must be feeling all alone right now, but I want you to know that you always gave me courage to keep fighting every day. You and your mother were the best thing that ever happened to me. If I left you alone, it was only because I had to do it to keep you safe.

Dad is going to go fight the monsters in only a few hours. It's not going to be easy, even with all the samurais here. But I won't run away. If you're reading this, it means that I lost. But I fought for you, Takeru. To keep you as safe as I could.

I love you.

I always did. You and your mother mean the world to me.

My only regret was not being able to spend more time with you and Miho when I could. Forgive me for never being there for you when you needed me.

Takeru, even if you're alone, even if Dad is gone, I want you to be strong. You have to keep smiling like you always did, like Mom would have wanted you to do. I only wish you can be happy from now on without me.

Life isn't over for you Takeru.

So, please promise me you'll do your best from now on. Live, Takeru. Live as happily as you can.

Be grateful to all the people that have helped you and make sure you repay their kindness. Please give Tsukuyomi-san and Koetsu my regards in my place.

Forgive me for not taking you to eat sushi on your birthday as I promised.

Forgive me for not taking you to see Chop-kun's show like you wanted.

Forgive me for leaving you.

And thank you, for giving me my happiest moments.

Thank you, for being always so cheerful.

Thank you, for being with Miho when I couldn't.

Thank you, for always calling me on my birthday.

I love you, Takeru. I only hope that all I left behind is enough to give you as happy a life as you deserve.

Goodbye, my son.

Kageyuki Shirogane.

When I finished reading it, the letter was dirty with my tears and snot, and all wrinkled up by my shaky hands.

It's a lie. Dad isn't dead… H-He and the samurais were… Hic… He promised… he would come back…

"… It's a lie."

"T-Takeru… I know it must be hard, but this isn't a lie. Your Father is-
"

"It's a lie! Dad promised… He promised he wouldn't leave me! And he never lies!" I throw the letter to the floor and stomp on it. Dad didn't write this! It's all full of lies!

"Takeru, stop! That's your Father's last latter to you!" Maya-nee grabs me tightly from under my arms.

"Let me go! This is all a lie!"

I struggle but she's holding me tighter than usual. As that same feeling, that cold and hollow feeling I felt when Mom went away, comes back to my heart I stopped struggling.

And I cry. It has to be a lie… Dad wouldn't… He wouldn't…

Maya-nee hugs me and pats my head as I cry onto her.

I don't know how much time passed until I calmed down, until this needles stopped poking my heart.

"Are you calm now, Takeru?"

"Maya-nee… Is Dad… really gone?" I looked up at her, and my last little grain of hope was crushed as she nodded, looking as calm as always.

"Yes, your Father passed away." She said as she brought her hand to the back of my head.

"Takeru, please sit down and listen." Uncle Koetsu said, he was tightly holding his entwined fingers together. "Since Kageyuki is dead, that means you're now an orphan."

"An orphan?"

"Someone who doesn't have parents. And, well… You're nowhere close to being an adult, so someone has to take legal custody of you now."

I didn't get a single word of that. What does it mean to be an orphan? Am I… going away too? Are kids without parents bad?

"I don't get it." I look down as my hands start to shake. Am I bad? W-What's this about?

"Don't be scared. Well, since you have no blood related aunts or uncles, you would have to go to your grandparents. But, well… I talked with Kageyuki's parents before coming here and… they didn't want to accept you." Dad's Dad was alive? He never told me of them… I always thought Grandma was the only Grandma I had…

"Why do they not want to see me? I mean… I never knew I had more Grandmas or a Grandpa." Uncle Koetsu grimaces, closing his eyes tightly.

"That doesn't matter. The thing is, the laws can't force someone to take legal care of a relative if they refuse to do so, after the change a few years ago. So, that means that… You would have to go to an orphanage."

"What's that?"

"Think of it as a home for kids that lost their parents."

"B-But… But why do I have to go there? This is my home, I can stay here." It makes no sense. I have a house, and Maya-nee is here. I'm not alone. Dad… Dad might be gone… B-But I'm not alone!

"Takeru… You see, you can't stay here if you don't have a legal tutor with you. You're a kid, so you need someone to look after you."

"But Maya-nee is here." I look at her and… she looked away, closing her eyes.

"Takeru." Uncle Koetsu said, looking at his hands. "Neither me nor Tsukuyomi have a blood relation with you. So, we cannot take you into our custody."

… What is he saying? Maya-nee has been taking care of me since Mom went away.

"But… Maya-nee has been here for-"

"That is different. She was here hired by your Father to look after you. She's a retainer, not a familiar."

"Then, are you saying you want me to go away?!" I hit the table, Uncle brings his hands up in a hurry.

"No, I didn't say that! Please calm down and listen, Takeru. We cannot take you under us right now because we're not relatives to you. But there is a way for you to stay here, and that is… well, to get adopted by someone else."

"Adopted?"

"That means that someone takes you into their family."

"Then, why can't we do that?" I look at them, both look down avoiding my eyes and moving their lips weirdly.

"You see Takeru, to formally take custody of a child the laws require a number of things. First, a single person can't adopt a children, to avoid certain people from… well, doing bad stuff. I am engaged but not married at the moment. My fiancee is still fighting the monsters, so until she comes back we cannot get married. And Tsukuyomi is single as well."

"So… So you can't adopt me?"

"… Yes, that is the case."

"T-Then… Then, can't Aunt Haruna-"

"Takeru." Uncle Koetsu speaks up in a high, serious tone, making me shut up. "Even if Haruna-san was already married and has a child, she does not have the income to support two children. That's another requirement, if one is to adopt a child, said person needs to have the money to provide the child with all the necessities he or she might need."

"Then… Then…" I start shivering. That means… That means… That I'm alone.

Uncle Koetsu can't, Maya-nee can't, Aunt Haruna can't, Dad's parent don't want me for some reason.

But this is my home. Why can't I stay here?! This is stupid… This laws are stupid! The adults are being unfair!

"But this is my home! Why can't I stay?! Why?!"

"Takeru, nobody is taking your home from you. You'll just have to go somewhere else until someone that can take care of you wants to-"

"NO! This is my home! Why do I have to go away?!"

"… Takeru." Maya-nee tapped my shoulder. She looked at me with her usual serious look. "You cannot be here alone. Without your Father, the rules say that you need someone else to take care of you. Neither me nor Kurosawa-sama can fill the role, according to the rules. But… But once you find someone…" She couldn't finish. She looked down, her hand on my shoulder is trembling a bit.

"Maya-nee?" Is she… going to leave? She… She too…

"Takeru, listen." Uncle Koetsu said, bringing my attention to him. "Some people might say that finding a family for a ten year old kid is hard, but even if some people pressure you, you have the last say in it. If anyone treats you badly, you don't-"

"… Why?"

"Eh?"

"Why do you want me to go away?" Again, tears fall down. What did I do wrong? I passed most of my tests, I did all my homework, I didn't fight with anyone… Why do they want me to go away? What did I do?!

"Takeru… Sigh… If you ever need anything from me, all you have to do is call. I might not be able to do much, but I have a huge debt to repay to your Father. The social service should be coming in a few days I believe." He stands up and comes to my side. "Takeru, once you grow up, if you ever need me, I'll be there for you. And if anyone ever treats you badly… You tell me, and I'll take care of it. I'll leave my number here, okay?"

I can't even nod. He's going away too, I'm sure. They all seem to hate me now that Dad's gone.

Maya-nee was here only because Dad hired her. Uncle Koetsu was a friend of Dad. Now that he's gone…

"Takeru, you just… don't get too down about this. Just think the orphanage is a small vacation from school until you find the right person to form a family with again."

"And what if nobody wants me?" He bit his lips, his relaxed eyes got all wrinkly. See?! The orphanage is a bad place, and you want me to go there! You're all horrible… What did I do wrong?

"Just… Just know that if you need me once you're bigger, I'll be there for you."

Uncle Koetsu pats my head, I think he said something more but I didn't hear him well. Maya-nee went with him to the door. But then I heard another voice, an older voice arguing with Uncle Koetsu.

Looking up, I saw Maya-nee's Dad coming into the house with loud, heavy steps, dressed in the red samurai dress. He looked at me with that same stern face he always has.

"Maya, pack your stuff." He said without looking at her.

"Eh? F-Father, I-" Maya-nee looked nervous, but her Dad sent a look at her and she grew quiet.

"Did you not hear me? Pack your stuff. You didn't have much things here, if I'm correct. Shouldn't take too long."

"However-"

"Maya. I told you to go pack your belongings. That's an order."

"… Yes, Father." She bowed to him and went to her room in the back.

… Packing. That's what you do when you leave somewhere.

So… So Maya-nee is leaving too.

That's… Hic… This is…

I look down, clawing at my knees, bending my pants so hard they might break.

What did I do wrong? Why are they leaving? Was she only here because of Dad? Then… Was all she told me a lie?

… Where will I go? Where am I going to sleep? What about school?

"Shirogane."

I look up and see the sharp turquoise eyes of Maya-nee's Dad. His long beard in the same color, a small mustache and eyes that were more cold and piercing than Maya-nee's staring back at me with that scary look he always has.

"Go and pack what's most important to you. You're leaving now."

"… Eh? B-But…"

"Did you not hear me? You're leaving now. Go and pack already."

"Sir… I believe the social services will-"

"Kurosawa, I think you're overstepping your boundaries right now." The old man turned around and stared at Uncle Koetsu as he folded his arms. "Your time is up, you said your goodbyes to the kid already. You have no more business here. I'll be taking care of this. Leave."

"However, sir, taking him by force is-"

"I'm just taking him to the nearest orphanage. I'm doing our society a service, sparing the social services the work of coming here. That is all there is to this. Leave now, unless you have anything to say to me?"

Uncle looked at me once, biting his lips. Then after shaking his head slowly, he gave a bow to the man and quietly went towards the door without looking back.

"Shirogane, go and pack your belongings."

"… Uncle Koetsu said… that the people would come later…" I tried to say something more, but his glare made me look down, my mouth suddenly coming shut. A knot on my stomach prevented me from talking.

"And I'm telling you you're leaving now. Don't make us waste our time, go and start packing already!" He hits the table really, really hard. Maya-nee sometimes does that too, but never so strong.

… Why? Why is he being mean to me? What did I do wrong? Hic… I didn't do anything bad…

"Stop crying already. Go to your room and begin packing henceforth." He grabs my arm and drags me to the stairs, then pushing my back he makes me go up some steps.

I stopped at times, but I was too scared to look back so I kept climbing the stairs. Legs shaking, I went back into my room.

… So am I leaving? When will I come back?

… Am I coming back? What if… What if I never come back?

T-Then… I grab my small bag that I use when I go to Yuuhi's house.

But… But it's too small… I can't take my toys, or the books Mom bought me, or most of my clothes…

Why? W-Why…

"Hic… W-Waaaaah!" I don't wanna leave! This is my house! Why do I have to leave?!

Dad, why did you leave me? Why did you go away? Why is everyone trying to make me go away? I don't get it…

Kneeling by my bed, I rest my head on it as I cry. This isn't fair… I did nothing wrong… The adults are all mean… I don't get it! Why do I have to go away?

I hate this… This rules are all wrong… If only I were bigger… They're all wrong… Why do I have to leave?

"Takeru?" I hear the door opening and some steps coming closer "… Takeru, we have to go." Maya-nee shakes my shoulder a bit. "Come on, I'll help you pack some stuff."

"Don't bother, Maya. Waste no more time on this peasant. We've taken long enough already, let us go."

"Father, do you plan on sending him away with nothing on him?"

"Why should we care? Or, what is it? Are you going to oppose your Father?" He raised his voice a little. Why is he so awful with us?

"… I am merely-"

"Maya, bring the boy downstairs. It's high time you returned to your rightful duties. We're leaving. Now."

Why does he sound so angry? What did I do to him?

I hate him.

I hate him.

I hate him!

"Takeru… Please, let's go."

Maya-nee pulls my arm softly. She's going to leave me… Of course, she still has a Dad. And Mion and Shion. They're… her real family.

I grasp my sheets tightly. I don't wanna go… This is all wrong… This isn't fair…

"Takeru, please…" Maya-nee patted my head softly. "This isn't the end. You still have your whole life ahead of you. Let us say goodbye with a smile, please."

"… No. I don't wanna leave."

"Takeru, even if it isn't now, the people of the social services will come for you. That's just the way it is. It's the rules we live by."

I hate that. This isn't fair. The rules are all wrong.

"If all of us only did what we wanted, everything would fall into disorder. I cannot imagine how hard this is for you, but please Takeru… Let's go in peace."

"… Will you come visit me sometime?" I look at her, she closes her eyes and shakes her head.

"I will be going back to the samurais, so I won't be able to visit you." She stopped and crouched by my side, then she brought me to her and she gave me a hug tighter than any she ever gave me. "This… This is goodbye, Takeru."

I don't wanna. I hate this.

"… Let's go, Takeru."

Maya-nee grabs my hands and I get up slowly, without looking at her. She softly pulls me away from my room, away from my house. I look at her, but she avoids my eyes as she looks forward.

In the end… I'm all alone… No one will visit me…

I feel as if I had just went outside during winter with only a shirt on, as if I had ants walking all over my back. I try to not cry, and that makes my neck hurt.

Mom… Dad… I-I'm scared…

A/N: And with this, we've reached the end of the first batch of new chapters. Once I'm happy with the drafts of the next chapters, I'll start bringing one a day until we're either back to the prior point this was at pre-rewrite or I take another small break.

Regarding the story, so far I've placed more flashbacks, both from stuff of the old The Days Before arc as well as some D&R bits, in this rewrite which has made the word count shoot up more than it was before. How did these long flashback segments felt? I'm mulling over on how much of D&R to put in here, to either keep doing two or three long flashback chapters every so and so, or to do a single character-centric flashback chapter, despite it probably ending up being really long.

Also, on a side note, I've not been entirely on the best mindset as of late and I'm sure that reflected on the writing being more angsty than before, especially in the case of Chapter 40 and Takeru's interactions with Kei before the fight, as well the openings of Ch. 37 and 39. A simple warning that some stuff might come out crude and raw, more angsty than before for sure, once I redo the old Paranoia arc. If I end up going overboard and make either Yuuko or Yuuhi OOC, let me know if you have the time.

As usual, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Chapter 4 9 : Disciple

---

December 2nd.

[Takeru]

---

"Haa… Haa…" Gasping for dear air, I keep on running in between the rows of graves.

The fog thickens, the eerie voices do as well. Encrusting more and more rocks into my feet, my breath rugged as my throat begins to close up, once more that foreboding cold feeling creeps up my back until it rests on my nape.

" I told you to release me!"

Suddenly, one of those dark silhouettes appeared out of nowhere trying to strike at me. Using my arms as a shield, feeling as if they had been lashed at by an iron whip, I'm sent crashing down onto a tomb.

And yet, as I tried to catch my breath, the cold feeling rang out in warning once more. Rolling to a side, I barely dodged another strike from a different silhouette. Far more grand than the other, imposing in its posture, yet with a glare that breathed curses back at me.

" You're leaving now. Don't make us waste our time!" Following the scream, it also tried to pounce at me.

Again barely dodging it, a sharp pain in my chest as I exhausted all air in me, with wobbly movements I stood up, again fleeing the silhouettes, again feeling the skin of my feet being peeled off.

The more I ran, the closer the tombs got. Rising tall, far beyond the clouds and fog, the few patches of grass and moss withered, and the once lush earth turned to a desolate wasteland as I fled. The freezing vice grip choking my nape, another voice rumbled through the fog. It immediately filled me with dread, halting my stride dead.

" Hereby, I declare you to be remov ed from the inner echelons of our fellowship."

My throat clamping up, a rain of glass might as well have pierced my chest just now. In that instant of inaction, something clawed at my ankles and began to drag me down.

The harsh, loathsome voice kept talking, splitting the ground apart as the crushing claws of the silhouettes dug into my legs as they pulled me down. I grabbed onto the edges of the dried earth, feeling my nail beginning to bend as I fought their grip. However, as I got half of my body above the rift, that same cold feeling returned to my nape, cutting my breathing short as if it had been stepped on.

"… Farewell, Shirogane."

Losing my grip, I fell and fell. The fissure closed up, crushing me no matter how much I rebel. Acid burned from within, coughing and hacking I felt more and more ill.

Urgh… Head hurts… Hard to breathe… C-Can't feel my arms…

No matter how much I push, I'm locked in. Can't move… Can't even muster enough strength to scream… Urgh… I'm gonna be crushed…

Something moves me, slowly shaking me left and right. Unlike everything before, it feels gentle. Feeling the pressure ease up, my breathing steadying down, the shaking becomes a bit more strong.

"Takeru-san."

… That voice… Who was it from?

"Takeru-san."

The shaking keeps picking up speed, yet it is so tenderly that it's almost like a massage. The crushing feeling fades away, a small jolt runs through my limbs as I can sense them once more.

But the shaking feels so nice… so soothing…

"Takeru-san!"

Like rocking on a ship, I'm slowly massaged by the shaking. Easing up my tension, I simply relax and enjoy it. But… that voice… it was from…

"Mmmgghhh…"

"Takeru-san, you have to wake up."

… Kasumi's voice, right. Yeah… It was… Huh…

Barely opening my eyes, my blurry sight catches her figure as she shakes me again. Letting out a small groan, rubbing the sluggishness out of my eyes, my mouth opens wide as I yawn and shiver.

"Good morning," She says, smiling my way. Immediately after, I sink back into my pillow. She shakes me again right afterwards. "Takeru-san, you need to get up."

… So cold. Five more minutes… I wanna rest some more…

"No. Get up."

Something rustles softly on top of me, suddenly the cold got worse.

"… Kasumi, give me my blanket back." I look at her, not moving from my pillow, as she smiles again.

"Good morning."

" Yawn… Good morning."

"Are you still tired?"

"… Yeah."

She comes closer, giving me my blanket back and petting my head softly. Uuh… It feels nice.

"Was it because of the last session?" Her voice tarnished by worry, I drown a yawn as I shake my head.

"Nah, it's not… that. I'm just sleepy, is all," Don't remember what I was dreaming about, but I'm just in a kinda lazy tired mood. Like, not feeling like getting out of bed at all.

"Is that so? Do you think you can train with me, then? Maybe you should rest?" Dulling her tone as her hand leaves my head, her mood fell off the stairs.

"Nah, it's no problem. I just… am having a slow start today. Yawn… After all, it took me a lot to fall asleep yesterday."

To be honest, I'm having some real trouble in balancing what we saw with how he felt. Thinking about it just makes my head hurt but… I can somewhat see why he would resent the Royal Guard, if they took him from his house like that. Still doesn't explain how or why he joined them after that…

And it also feels different to the sadness I felt in the CCSE. That was… crushing, cold, and with a tint of anger. But the one of the last memory… is just plain sadness, complete and utter fear. In the end… they took Dad as a soldier, sent him to his death, and then abandoned little me to his luck… I'd be lying if part of that wrath wasn't coming back up the more I think about it.

Sadly, that memory was too much for me and I ended up cutting the link forcefully yesterday. Left me out of breath, barely able to hold back the tears as he read Dad's letter, to say that someone tore my heart outta my chest and dropped a gallon salt water on the wound wouldn't make justice to how we both felt as we read Dad's last letter, and even more when that old bastard kept pushing him around. But due to how I closed up, abruptly ending the session seemed to shock Kasumi a lot yesterday, to the point that I had to help her to her room since she began to feel faint after the recoil of me shutting her off from my mind. Looking at her, she does look worn down.

"Well, but are you feeling fine, Kasumi?"

"Huh? Yes, do not worry about me."

"Hmm… You sure?" Rubbing my eyes, she nods back at me, "Well… Let's take it easy today, okay?"

"Yes, understood. It's almost seven, so please get ready. The training starts at eight," She says as composed as always.

"I know, I know. I'll hurry it up," Stretching to leave the stiffness back while still half-buried in the sheets, I smile at her. Promptly as always, she began to leave, "Hey, Kasumi?"

"Yes?" Looking back, she got closer again.

Then, tenderly grabbing her by the hand, pulling her slowly towards me, I gave her a hug, not too tight, not too soft, rubbing her back slowly as I did.

"Thanks a lot for caring, Kasumi. Your shaking helped me a lot right now," Brushing her hair, I tell her in a hushed tone.

"No… It's nothing…" She barely whispered it out.

"It isn't nothing for me, though," Ending the hug, bringing her face into my sight, I smile at her as I play with her bangs, "So thanks a lot, I don't feel that heavy now."

"So…" Her hands hesitate for a second before docking under mine, then they begin softly rubbing my back again as she returns the hug, "Did this help you with your nightmares?"

"I dunno if it was a nightmare today, but I've been feeling real tired lately," Returning the kindness, I ruffle her hair. She moves her bunny ears as she leans closer, they tickle my chin as they do, "So, thanks. And sorry for yesterday, I didn't meant to hurt you."

"No, it wasn't your fault… So, does this help you feel better?" Her hands' pace picks up, can't help but to sigh as my back finally relaxes completely.

"Yeah… Sigh… Thanks a lot, Kasumi," Again ruffling her hair, she nods while not moving away one inch, "So, uh, I should be getting ready. Just wait a while, I'll make it quick."

"Eh? But… If you're feeling tired, we could delay it for-" Bringing her closer for another hug, this one tighter, she makes a cute whimper, her hands forming a lock on my back.

"It's okay, I'm all better now," Drawing a circle on the back of her head, her bunny ears slap my shoulders softly as I do, "Plus, this is your training day. Let's do our best today, okay?" Again pulling her away, her hands hesitating for a second, a radiant smile greets me as our eyes met.

"Yes, let's do our best together…" Her hands tracing my arms for a moment before finally pulling away, her gaze took a second to admire the floor for some reason, "But… But you still shouldn't rush. I can wait for you and then we can have breakfast together, so please don't hurry up unnecessarily if you're feeling tired."

"I get it, don't worry. I know how to take care of myself, even if it doesn't look like it as of late," Extending my hand, her head lowers to welcome it as I ruffle her hair again.

"Understood. Well then… See you in a moment," Giving me her usual bright smile, we waved at each other as she left my cell, leaving the key on the outer lock of the door.

Yawning again, I stretch my arms up. Dunno what's up with my sleep cycle as of late, but thank God Kasumi is here to lend me a hand with it. Yet another reason to get cracking and do my best during our training today! I doubt she'd be able to imitate me perfectly, but I'mma give you the best glimpse of my skills I can muster as of now, Kasumi.

Getting out of bed, moving my ankles to wake 'em up, the coldness of the water as I splash my face brings me completely into focus. Shivering a bit, my feet refuse to move towards the shower, my shoulders again begin to cramp up, and my hands lag as they start to take my lithe clothing off me.

But I can't leave Kasumi waiting overlong… And I need to hear a report from Sensei about Mom and Dad too, since I freaked out yesterday… And, above all, I'm real hungry right now.

"Alright, no point in wasting time. Into the cold shower, now! Chaaarge!"

Not a second had passed after I opened the thing that I regretted my decision with all of my soul.

---

Some time after that.

(B17F. Hangar 78.)

---

Entering Hangar 78, now completely in my suit with the helmet and all, the buzzing and shouting of the teams reaches my ear as fast as the smell of oil and steel does towards my nose.

The walls made of a mossy green plating, taller but more compact than other hangars, it seems to make the sounds echo more for some reason. Streams of cables on the floor, the lifts right on the back end of the place, and the aisles for the maintenance teams left little free room to walk. Illuminated by the overhead beams, there's some dust clearly floating in the lights' direct shine.

Walking over the sprawling cables, the smell of dust and fuel intensifying, I reach the base of the area with the lone TSF the hangar had docked in. Painted in the standard UN colors, but looking as if they were fading a bit, as if it hadn't been used or even dusted off in a long while, thin stinger-like pods stretch from its arms, and odd-shaped sensors were in its shoulders. Some sharp and egg-shaped, others curved but hollow claws. And the curvature of its head, sunk in as if it were a triangle, does somewhat resemble the patterns the face of an owl has.

Slowly pacing around to get a view from different angles, I watch the Mindseeker as the engineers proceed to make the last minute checks to it. It looks nice honestly. I can see why it was nicknamed the Rock Owl, with a head like that. Though, it looks like it is a second gen machine. The overall shape of it does remind me of a Kagerou more than any of the third gen machines I've seen. Though, if it was made for Alt. III, then it makes sense. The Shiranui, the very first third gen TSF, was officially unveiled just the year before Alt. IV was started, if the notes I read are to be believed.

"So Shirogane, what do you think?" A PDA on her hand, Sensei strode towards me, smile plastered on.

"Looks nice. What will Kasumi do differently with this one?"

She moved closer, pointing to the shoulders of the Mindseeker, "She will control those extra sensors. I know you told me you've never piloted a Carrier-based TSF, so I'll explain how you're supposed to operate," Bringing her PDA near me, an image of a cockpit was displayed in its screen, "The one sitting on the front controls the weapons, while the one in the back is in charge of maneuvering. For this test, I want you to focus on piloting as you usually do and let Yashiro be the one that decides when to attack. Due to her ESP powers and the sensors, she should have no problems spotting and taking down your adversaries."

So it'll be the opposite of when we rode the XG, I fired the weapons and gave the commands that moved the thing while Kasumi connected me to Sumika to actually move.

"Got it. So, you didn't paint it in ARP. Are the Valkyries going to be using the stealth protocol?" She then shakes her head, fuming a bit as she sighs.

"No, we still haven't even started to make diagrams for the modifications to the Takemikazuchis. We will hold some test against stealth units at a latter date, since the Shogunate will have access to stealth tech. Do be ready for that too."

Sigh… It's hard being a test pilot. Still, the odds are already tough for today, "So who will we fighting against today?"

"Hayase, Takahara, Isumi, Munakata and Asakura. Your comms will be distorted again, so don't worry about them finding out who you are. All of them in their new Takemikazuchis with the XM3 installed, of course," Beaming cheerily at the last part, she then chuckled a bit.

"Okay, I'll do my best. I see you did change the jump units on this one, though."

"Oh, yeah. I honestly thought of this just a few days ago, so it's not like I can just fit in one of our new internal engines in the thing and expect it to work. The sensors should be on par with what you're used to with Yashiro on board, so I only changed the jump units of the thing. You'll have one dagger in each knee, a sword on your hand and two rifles in your back, since we can't mount stuff on the shoulders thanks to its sensors."

"Wait, so you're sending me against five Takemikazuchis, that are focused on CQC, with only one sword?" She chuckles at me, a smirk spreading like wildfire. Ugh… Dammit, Sensei.

"We can't help it, it's just how things are," Beaming again, she pointed at the machine, "The Mindseeker's arm joints are not fit for swinging the sword around, even if I improved them a tiny bit. Since this TSF is supposed to be a High Performance Hive Infiltrator, its knee blocks and tanks are larger than the rest of the other 2nd Gen. TSFs of its time. You have four magazines of 36mm on the left knee and six of 120mm on the right one, along your two daggers," Staring back at me, her tone sobered up as she again strode closer, "I know you prefer to fight in CQC, but let me see how you hold up as a ranged fighter against a team that has the clear edge over you in CQC. This isn't solely a test for Yashiro, got it?"

"Sigh… Roger. I can tell that this will give us nice data, but you really like to give me tough missions," I scratch my head again as she chuckles lightly.

"I do this only because I know that you can somehow pull this off. Your data against Takamura was better than I expected, though I did think you would win. I'm basically testing where your limits lie, and you did say that maneuvering is your biggest strength so go out there and show me what you have," Then, her eyes locked onto mine, unwavering. No longer smiling, she simply stared at me.

"Roger. I'll drive this thing to its limits. I do have a question about it, though."

"What is it?" Hand on her chin, she leaned in curiously.

"Are the pods on the arms' sides used for something?"

"Yes, they have extra sensors that will give you clearer data to move and attack. They should extend your effective range for you to shoot precisely from far away without missing, and to allow you to move much more nimbly in crowded spaces," She so remarked.

"Alright. I don't know how this will turn out, but I'll do my best out there," Even if this gives me another headache.

Sensei then smiles, brightly so, far more than the reflection of the lamps onto the Mindseeker, "That's what I wanted to hear. I'll be monitoring everything in the CP, so feel free to go all out," Arms folded, she gave me one firm nod I returned. She seems real happy for some reason.

As Sensei finished saying that, Kasumi walked into the Hangar in her suit. Briefly, memories of our last mission come back up, of the only time I saw her in that suit, of all the trainings we did with the XG back then. Though… I wonder what's different this time, to have her piloting a TSF. Why would Sensei risk her in this way? Because we have a surefire way to complete the 00 Unit, so she wants Kasumi to do something else of worth?

"Are you ready, Kasumi?" Giving me a small nod she then slowly paced to my side.

"Well, you two get in there. Go and check everything is working properly and get ready to fight," Sensei firmly stated, beginning to go her way out of the hangar.

"Roger. Let's go Kasumi."

"Yes."

We take the stairs to the railway and open the cockpit. It looks just like our usual units but with two seats instead of one. Slowly entering first, I sink into my place on the back seat as Kasumi sits on the front.

"Say Kasumi, have you ever piloted before?" I am worried she might pass out from the G-Force of my movements, but she looks back at me and gives me a wide smile.

"Yes, I do have some experience. Don't worry about me," Her small voice was firm as steel, those cerulean eyes of her showed hesitation when meeting mine.

"Alright then, just do your best. I know it might be a bit hard to aim with how fast I move, so tell me if you need me to tone it down a notch."

"Yes, you can count on me. I won't disappoint you."

Proceeding to bolt ourselves to our seats, after a small pause to double check that everything is in working order I connect to the Command Post.

"Here Viking 1, all systems green. Ready to launch whenever," Sensei's face appears on my view as the data link is formed.

"CP, roger that. Yashiro, how are you?"

"Viking 2, all green," She immediately replies, as composed as usual. Sensei curves her lips upwards as a lioness surfaces in her glare.

"Good to hear. Vikings, proceed to the launch pad."

The small rumbling of the cables coming off our shoulders shook us a bit, but the bracing system started and a jolt came from the controls as the rotary gears took us to the pad. All systems remain in working order as the hangar becomes more and more distant. Ending up in the usual aboveground railway, the ramp and everything was prepared already. The crew waving the light torches to signal the okay, a few taps onto the buttons and the jump units begin to heat up.

"You ready, Kasumi?"

"Yes, anytime."

On her positive, I push the control and step on the pedals, my back getting glued to the seat as I do, my arms pushed onto the sideways armrests, the impulse also docking my neck firmly in place. The difference in height compared to my usual gives me a slight feeling of disorientation at first, like when Uncle Koetsu made me ride in his car after he outfitted it with racing seats, but seeing the small bunny ears on a corned of my vision made me smile. It's nothing like when me and Meiya rode together, the point of view, the space available, the vision of the cockpit behind the projection… It's far more comfy than I thought it'd be.

The rumbling easing up, we proceed to steadily fly towards the spot marked in the radar.

"How're you feeling, Kasumi?"

"Fine," She gives me a thumbs up.

"Okay then, let's speed up a lil' bit."

Just a few minutes afterwards, we reach our destination on the eastern side of the ruins. And immediately after, the beeping of the CP opening the common channel came up.

"Vikings, your adversaries are already in place. The exercise will begin in one minute. The winning condition is total annihilation of the opposite team. That is all," Sensei leaves us as a timer appears on my view.

"Well, time to play. Kasumi, how do you prefer to fight?" She looks back with her usual blank stare, moving her bunny ears.

"I don't really have a preference. Just fight as you normally would," She's really calm about this.

Maybe it's because I never piloted a TSF along someone in a fight, but I'm kinda nervous. I mean, the only experience I have is when we struck down that rock to save that old lady and the XG. But this time I have to actually put some effort in moving in a way to allow Kasumi to do her thing.

"Alright, you take care of the ranged part of the fight, and focus on the sensors during CQC. Let me take care of the dogfighting."

"Roger," She nods as she answers immediately, smiling my way before facing forward again.

Sighing, I lean back as the seconds tick away. The clock shaves the timer down closer and closer to zero. Closing my eyes, I take a deep breath and fill my lungs.

Five Takemikazuchis. I had trouble trying to take one down. And with the upgraded Kagerou, no less. No stealth to help me this time, too. I guess I'll have to go seriously against them, without being too fast either. Like my world's Mikoto said, more speed is not the same as more mobility. Let's use the XM3's liberties to their fullest, like when I took on all those Forts. Otherwise, I'll get done in real quick, and that won't do anything for either Kasumi or Sensei.

The timer reaches zero, a siren blooms in ti signal the start of the match along the usual green message in my view. Wasting half a second, I open with a dash along the street. Gotta get close under some cover, and I need to scan the map to devise an escape route if the gang up on us.

However, as soon as I moved a bit into the city, a bleep appeared in my radar. Wow, this thing is something else, they're so far away and-

"Hayase-san and Takahara-san are coming after us," Kasumi informs me.

"Huh? You can tell which is which?"

"Yes," Looking back, she smiles again, "The sensors make it so that I can feel what's around our TSF. I can tell who is coming, at what speed, and with what weapons. They're coming at us with one sword and a rifle, to our Ten. Takeru-san, could you get into a sniping position?"

"Sure, is between those buildings fine?"

"Yes."

Erupting into a sudden boost towards two big buildings, I walk right between them and crouch. Tapping the switch, the left pylon moves upwards. Leaving my sword on the ground for a moment, I take aim with both hands holding the assault rifle.

Shortly afterwards, a small figure appears on my vision as the auto-aim warning appears. Kasumi was right, huh. The Mindseeker's arms move, Kasumi is aligning her shot. Her aim is… Yeah, a bit off. She should try to strike a bit lower, the auto-lock will do most of the corrections anyways. Zooming into the target should be what she should try out.

A tingly feeling suddenly appearing into my head, she then triggers manual aim and lowers her firing line. Well, this makes things easier for sure. After a second of wait, she fires off a 120mm round. The hit confirmation rings out, one of them begins to stagger in the air. Zooming in the view, looks like she hit the arm of that one, causing the Takemikazuchi to drop its sword. And from such a distance, too.

"Damn. Nice one, Kasumi."

"… I wanted to hit its cockpit," She sounds slightly upset at herself.

"Don't worry. So, do you want to keep shooting or do we go face them?"

"The others are already closing in, let me take that one out," Upon my agreement, she quickly starts sending more shots, the Takemikazuchis starts moving erratically on the air, doing some side dodges, but they're no match for Kasumi's sniping.

After missing two shots, Kasumi hit the one from before again, taking one of its legs out, and directly after she assessed a hit at its cockpit. One down already, huh. Kasumi 1 - Valkyries 0.

Though, I can't believe they aren't doing barrel rolls, or diving under the buildings, or something! Do they think that just because the XM3's reaction time is better they can just speed up and dodge the fire? Like, for real, what the hell are they doing? The girls weren't that basic in their approach last loop.

"Kasumi, the other one is closing in. Let's go."

"Roger."

Once we pick up our blade and re-lock onto the lone charging hostile, I dash out towards cover.

As the Takemikazuchi on the air was getting closer, it dove to the ground, surfacing on it, and then boost jumped towards us, sword at the ready to slash and dice.

Halting our stride, canceling the movement, we bounce away with a short boost jump as the hostile's slash met the air. Kasumi opened fire against it just as I started to spin, sending a shower of paint in a circular pattern at the Takemikazuchi. However, it just dashes backwards and takes aim at us undeterred.

"Don't think you'll get me so easily, Eight!" Ugh, Hayase.

Her cocky tone was clearly full of glee as she sidestepped away from our shots, returning the pleasantry. We play with each other, going back and forth in between some buildings, giving 'em a new paint job. Kasumi's shots were badly timed with my jumps and dashes at first, but she slowly began to time them more precisely.

"Takeru-san, the other ones are in an inverted arrowhead just in front of us. They will shoot at us soon."

"Thanks for the warning. I'm going to-"

"Go full boost past Hayase and deal with them, right?" She moves her bunny ears at me. Alright, that makes things easier. Get ready Kasumi, after we dodge that next barrage, we're moving out! "Roger."

Hayase kept boost dashing on the ground with gusto, shooting at us, trying to lure us to the middle of the others' aim. However, I kept canceling my dashes and doing back-boosts, coming in and out with the rhythm of a wave on the shore while Kasumi fired just as I cancelled my dashes, forming a dread lock for Hayase to get close enough to strike.

So long as we keep her at bay she won't be able to get in CQC range, and then she'll get upset and charge at us. I know Hayase's boner for close combat, I know she won't be able to keep it-

"What's up, Viking?! Too scared to come closer?!" Lashing out, fuming much, she roared into another forward dash.

You know, it's kinda cute how she gets upset at these little things. Back in my training last loop she was the same. But just because she gets upset doesn't equal she gets careless, it's all on me to make the most out of what little frames she gives away. And to make sure she does give us an opening… Hehe.

"All I can hear is the tears of someone who can't even graze me," Returning to my cocky tone, I then chuckle. Her groaning comes up on the common channel. C'mon Hayase, charge at us.

"Viking 1, is this what you call a noob?" Oh God, Kasumi is the last person I thought would go around spewing insults. Thanks for following on my plan, Kasumi. She moves her bunny ears a bit then.

"Yep, she's a noob through and through. Can't hit anything outside close range, it seems."

"What was that?! I'll make you two eat those words!" She takes a step back and comes after us in a vindictive full boost, grazing some buildings as we took a corner.

Retreating and as she gets closer, I do a boost backflip while changing the angle of the jump units on mid air, arching our TSF above hers. However, she cancels her boost, comes to a complete halt, and shoots at us. Dammit!

The shaking dives my elbows into my sides, again glues my back to the seat. Kasumi reacted in a split second and opened fire as well while I did a roll to dodge the shots, but this was too close for comfort.

… Shit, we got hit. It's not heavy damage, but any more hits will leave our hands out of commission.

"Hehehe! Looks like you can't escape anymore!" Hayase seemed very pleased with herself.

"Takeru-san! Behind us!"

"I know!"

I did look at the radar as I landed, so no seconds were wasted on the following double boost jump to our left. Just as I did, the spot we were on was drenched, badly soaked in paint. And yet, the danger ain't over yet, not by a long shot.

Hayase was now tailing us, shooting at us every time she started to close the distance. Kasumi threw both arms backwards and started shooting back at her, however the Takemikazuchi did one jump cancel and boost dashed in the opposite direction, effectively evading any and all shots.

"Damn, we can't lose her like this," I've been using the tall buildings as cover from the fire of the other three, that are still rather far. But that won't work for much longer, either.

"Takeru-san, let's go after them. Don't be afraid to do your best because I'm here," Kasumi's usual calm tone was firm, but she's not the only reason I'm being careful.

"Once we get to the main avenue, I'm charging at them at top speed. Just do your best to keep up, okay?"

"Charge at the one on the right, if the Captain falls they'll be demoralized," She remarks. I think Hayase is still going to come after us, but whatever.

I keep canceling my jumps and doing my zigzags, somehow managing to get us away from Hayase as Kasumi keeps spraying paint behind us. She actually managed to graze Hayase's Takemikazuchi despite its greater speed and quick maneuvering. The bunny has a hawk-eye, for real.

Blazing into a dash to my right, a canister of paint explodes from above and soaks the spot we would have been in. Hayase seized my brief stop to full boost her machine in front of us. Barely managing a step back to dodge the swing of her sword, a short reposition in the middle, I trigger a crouch and then dash forward in a flash, extending one leg sharply to kick at her. As if I were a defender tackling a forward in a soccer game, Hayase fall to the ground after our fierce sliding foul-play.

Quickly canceling both the dash and the crouch, the Mindseeker stands up in one fluid motion and, without losing momentum, I storm into a boost jump towards the avenue, while Hayase is still getting up. Jumping once again and, stepping with only one foot as I land, I change our direction to move along the street as we break into a sprint.

Taking a second to switch the sword for the second rifle, juggling with the stuff in our hands and in the pylons, we're good to go now. We gotta get some distance between us while she's grounded. A beep comes up in the radar shortly after.

"Takeru-san, they're close by. Should we attack?"

"Yeah, let's," Smirking cockily, my hands tighten their hold onto the controls. It's time for the counterattack, Valkyries! "Get ready, Kasumi!"

Opening into another full boost as I dash towards the others, paint rounds rain down on us like a drizzle, but, thanks to the updated info on the radar, our rushing stride doesn't even fizzle.

"Takeru-san, jump in ten."

"Okay!"

As Kasumi asked I cancel my dash and go into a sudden full boost jump, leaving the chasing Hayase right in front of the others' shots. Practically a frame perfect dodge, using her teammates' attacks against her. Sadly, Hayase cancelled her rush and backboosted in time to avoid getting painted in orange.

Now on the air, Kasumi takes aim at the rest of them and locks on. I start dashing on the air towards them, doing one barrel roll to avoid their incoming fire, edging closer to the ground and descending. Kasumi then opens fire, and unlike theirs some of our shots hit.

The Captain lost her left arm, apparently. Landing with a loud crash, I then dash behind some buildings. I should take some distance, bait them again and whittle them down little by little.

"Takeru-san, please go into melee. The one in the back shouldn't be a problem."

"You sure? The thing is gonna shake a lot with my erratic way of moving," She then looks back, firmly staring at me through the projection.

"I want to learn as best as I'm able. Please?"

"Sigh… That ain't fair, you know," You cute, little bunny, when did you learn to use the baby doll eyes? "I'm glad you're trying so hard. So, if you're sure this will work, let's go for it."

"Yes, I'll update the radar as best as I can."

"Then, let's rumble!"

I dash backwards as the Captain and Munakata, going by the naming on the radar, open fire from both of my sides. The one who should be Asakura tried to snipe me, but, thanks to the sensors, I could easily read her and boost jumped out of the way. The radar updates, showing me a path along the ruins. All right, let's do this.

As the Captain and Munakata cancelled their attacks and went for a boost dash towards me, pulling out their swords and trying to do a flat-scissor as Kei and Chizuru were planning before, I took a step back and, upon contact with the ground, exploded into a full boost dash again.

The Mindseeker blasted past both Takemikazuchis, straight through the open space in between them, leaving them tilted and in off-side. As I follow the path in the radar, I take my Mugen stance while doing some more zigzags to avoid the paintballs that are coming from behind and in front.

Kasumi bends our left arm backwards and shoots what is left of our 120mm ammo, forcing the Captain and Munakata to put some space by back-boosting away. And now, we've got time and enough space to take down the one up ahead!

Asakura's unit comes into view as she keeps boost jumping sideways. That's a nice technique, she's canceling the jump as soon as she does it, and she keeps doing consecutive jumps as she practically glides over the ground. Her aim, however, is far from perfect. Probably not used to her new ride, mastering a Takemikazuchi is probably no easy task.

Now that I think about it… I'm piloting this kind of model for the first time but I'm not having much trouble with it. Half of it is thanks to Kasumi's help with the radar but… Listening to the shaking, to the response of the joints to my moves, and double checking the numbers after my reckless moves has been enough to adapt well enough. Are they not doing that, then?

Could it be that they're forcing the machine to adapt to them, and in doing so all they manage to do is end up trapped by the superior specs? After all, with such a nice piece of tech, it wouldn't be weird to end up being merely riding it instead of properly driving it.

After giving some time for Kasumi to change the magazines in our guns, I boost jump above a building, landing on its roof to do then jump again. Canceling it in midair, entering my Mugen stance again and moving the boosters backwards, again I blast into a full dash towards Asakura, completely avoiding the Captain and Munakata's feeble attempts to stop me.

Our Mindseeker draws an arc in the sky as we descend upon the Type-00C, nearing top speed. Asakura only tried to backboost away but a quick, simple slash hit her hands, making her drop her rifles. Landing hard, carefully shifting the weight backwards, I manage to turn around without wasted seconds and then, seeing she was still in range, I let loose a decisive strike at the cockpit. The Takemikazuchi falls back with a booming thud, crashing into the concrete and remaining unmoving. Vikings 2 - Valkyries 0.

No time to rest, though. I quickly retreat away behind more tall buildings as the other three's rain is closing in on my position. Now that we took the newbies out, we're left with the real deal. The fight has just begun.

"Takeru-san, do you have an idea to take them down?" Kasumi sounds a bit tense, seems to be quivering just a tiny bit right now.

"Yeah, I'm going to charge forward and try to use the XM3's mobility to get 'em by surprise. You just focus on gunning them down."

"Roger."

Alright, they're closing in. We are slower than them, only by getting them by surprise we can do this. And I know how!

I rush forward and jump. Triggering the Variable Wings as I deactivate one jump unit to spin myself, I send our TSF towards a skyscraper. And as we approach it, tilting my controls our feet make contact with building as I activate my Jump Units to trampoline myself off the bricks. Then, I keep rebounding on the buildings in a zigzag patter, just like I did during the tournament.

We have the range, we have the speed, and we have the ammo. I'll rush through you as Kasumi pours her paint all over your frames.

"Get ready to be creamed, Valkyries!" One last pull of the controls, one last jump off the bricks, and their machines come into our sight.

Kasumi locks onto them in perfect sync with my jumps. I take one last, sharp, hard breath as I strengthen my grip on the controls to do one last full boost to make sure they can't catch me in the rush.

Paint flies from our spiraling frame as we dive hard towards the three Takemikazuchis. Since we have more range thanks to Kasumi and the special sensors, and also thanks to the patterns she displays in my radar to help me coordinate my cancels and spins with her aim, we avoid their first barrage as ours rains down on them hard.

I didn't chose this place for anything, they have two toppled down buildings right behind them. They can't escape so easily!

Not letting the pedals rest, keeping the boost on and off, then I cancel it, using the momentum to carry the rest of the distance while the boosters cool off. And as we begin to lose altitude, as full control returns to the boosters and our unit, I reactivate a full boost as our feet greet the ground. Again dodging their firing lines once I crouched, Kasumi starts firing just as the Mindseeker picked up its stride.

Hellfire raining over them, the Valkyries start retreating away to our nine. Once our boost had ended, Hayase's unit sharply took a turn, tumbling part of a building with her right shoulder, as she took out her sword ready to meet our assault while the other two take cover behind the rubble.

Quickly shifting the stick, pressing the pedals with my heels, I cancel the boost and align the thrusters to change my direction sharply. Gliding outwards but forward into the street, the Mindseeker power slides right under Hayase's slash, who thought we were going to clash with her in melee. The unnecessary impulse of her charge left her vulnerable, and a swift kick send her unit tumbling down again.

"Takeru-san, why did she opened herself like that?"

"Because she expected a direct parry, an outwards glide like I just did wasn't in her plans," Which means, they're not even scratching the surface of the XM3's potential.

An outwards slide into a crouch, followed by any attack, is one of the most basic moves of the XM3. It's what my world's Mikoto was so good at. Spreading the angle of the glide, as if trying to draw half a circle, does take some fine control of the boosters, but we're up against the Valkyries. They should be more than capable of something as simple as this.

I slowly ease up on the propulsion to soften my stride. Ending up hovering on a street parallel to the one the Captain and Munakata were on by the tail end of the boost, without wasting a second they open fire on me. Like I'll let this chance slip me by!

Almost in perfect sync, Kasumi dropped the guns to let me take out both daggers. Crouch, reposition to the left, cancel, and a forward dash! The Mindseeker avoided all the shots aimed at its body with the crouch and was now positioned under a Takemikazuchi, dagger rising at its cockpit. In a swift instant, another Type-00C fell to the ground.

However my feeling of triumph was cut short as I had to run away when Hayase came boosting towards me, and the other one almost got me at point blank. Dashing on the ground, kicking Munakata too while I was at it, and docking my daggers in the same motion, once I locate the guns and pick them back up, we ran away for dear life. Quickly dashing into another street, I keep taking turns when I get the chance, but I can't lose them.

"Kasumi, I'll do some consecutive jumps to get away from them!"

"Be careful, they're too close. And I'm low on ammo."

"Don't worry, this will end up just fine."

Unable to gain ground, Kasumi starts shooting the 120mm to keep our distance. I speed up a bit, doing some more cancels and jumps as I try to get away. They're not doing any flashy movements as they chase me, I can't lose them so if they went for some triple boost jumps they could get me in trouble.

Munakata is circling to my right, if she gets any closer she might land a hit. Starting a double boost jump to my left, I have to cancel it immediately.

"Come and face me already!" Hayase full boosted through a building, landing right in front of me with a vengeance, slashing her sword about towards me.

Damn! A side step to my left, one step backwards, crouch, cancel, backboost! The sudden shaking, the intensity of the movement, clamps me to my seat. Gulping my tongue to not bite it, lashing it against the back of my teeth as my knees buckled hard to not release the pedals, I could hear Kasumi let out a small pained groan.

"Think that will be enough?!" She opens fire, bending her pylons forward and pointing both guns at me.

Shit, Hayase! I boost jump away from her in a frenzy, noticing Kasumi isn't following up with her shots. A beeping reaches my ears, barely managing to do a barrel roll to dodge Munakata's shots. But one hit my left arm, disabling it. I backboost to give us some space, but we are getting worn down.

"Hey Kasumi, you alright?"

" Cough… Yes, I'm fine. The shaking was… a bit too sudden, so I couldn't brace for it," Her voice crumbling down, a weary whisper compared to her usual.

Damn you, Hayase… If her slashes had connected, even I might have bitten my tongue off. What's her damage? To come at us so violently… Kasumi's bending over, clearly exhausted after that last tight dodge… How dare you bring harm to her… Let's see if you find it funny when you're o n the receiving end of the axe.

"… Takeru-san? Are you alright?" The strange tinge of worry of her tone refocused me back to the cockpit, where I found her staring right at me.

"Huh? Yeah, just bracing," She remains staring for a moment as she groans, as if not convinced, "So Kasumi, seems like we reached the end of the line. Wanna go out with a blast, or would you rather call it quits?"

"… No, let's fight until the end," She moves her bunny ears, facing me with a dead serious expression, her tone again blazing up. For her, anyways.

"If that's what you want, let's do this then. Keep your mouth shut, and your tongue behind your teeth. Don't ever move your mouth for anything, alright?" She nods, tightening her posture.

I rush out of my cover and do a crouch dash to avoid Munakata's fire. While remaining like that, I do a boost jump as I veer to my right.

"That's how I like it!" Hayase shouted over the common channel, stopping her guns and taking a fighting pose with her sword facing at us. She boost dashes towards us, ready to trade strikes with us.

Now, let me see if his technique works with mine. You gotta slowly arch the knees, move the torso a little bit to the right… As we got closer and closer, I tried to envision Maya-san's training again. The XM3's most vital strength is not its increased sensibility that gives us more speed, both to move and to process data.

The best trait of the XM3 is how it allows us to make more precise movements in closed spaces! All that superb processing power is used to its fullest when you have to make frame-perfect moves in quick succession, cancel after cancel! I'm gonna flow into you Hayase, with the might of an unending waterfall!

Sharply canceling the boost, grounding myself in the process, repositioning the Mindseeker for the attack as I take out the sword. Kasumi must have read my mind, as she pointed the pylons forward to shoot while I charged. Her shots delaying Hayase for the second I needed to take my Mugen Stance in the right moment of my stride, the coming slash goes at her in all its power.

Our blades clash, we keep struggling against each other for a few seconds. I take a step back and dash backwards into a building. Cancel the dash, jump in quick succession, use the bricks as a trampoline again, end up veering to my left. Cancel the bracing after landing to then do a double boost jump as soon as I hit the ground, sending us upwards in an arch above Hayase.

She apparently couldn't keep up with the sudden movements, and as we were landing Kasumi opened fire at her. Hayase reacted in an instant, barely managing to avoid a hit to her engine, but ended up losing her right hand.

"Tch, don't think you can just take all of us out!" Munakata started firing at me from behind, forcing me to take cover.

"Munakata, don't get in the way!" Hayase breathed fire on top of her eruption over the common channel back at her partner.

"What are you saying? We have to coordinate our attacks to-"

"Munakata, do I have to spell it for you? They. Are. Mine. Get it?"

I can't see her face, but going by her bloodthirsty tone I can tell she is pissed. Heh, looks like Hayase deems us worthy enough for a one on one resolution.

"Takeru-san, she seems really happy for some reason." Kasumi's bunny ears dropped, confused and lost.

"Well… That's how she is, as reckless as it might seem."

Munakata boosts away, after a really heavy sigh, and Hayase faces us with her sword at the ready again.

Once more I boost forward but Hayase's movements become more fierce and fast. She keeps canceling her slashes, moving to our left side, trying to overpower us. Kasumi is having trouble keeping up with the speed that I have to make to drive her swings off, so she can't lend me any firing support.

Mostly thanks to my footing, we're able to slip past her charges and get some breathing room in between her onslaught. However, Kasumi can't get the timing of the cancels of her attacks right, so we can't outmaneuver Hayase's onslaught even when we do get to a position where we could have taken her down. Kasumi is too green to keep up with me, and at this rate this won't end well for us. So, I gotta guide the bunny as her teacher!

"Kasumi, get ready to pick up a dagger."

"Huh? A dag… Takeru-san, that plan is too risky."

"Hey, it's just a mock battle. Let me see how good your reflexes are."

"Hmm… If you want to do this, I'll follow you. But I might miss the timing," Hey, don't sound so sad. Hayase is the weird one here. "Takeru-san, you can keep up and avoid her attacks," Oi, are you saying I'm weirder? Don't give me that smile!

"Whatever. Get ready, she's coming!" Hayase's yells roar over the common channel as she rushes at us.

We parry her strike, moving to our right. I boost away from her, cancel the boost, and come at her again. Kasumi takes a gamble to shoot our remaining ammo, only for Hayase to jump over our firing line as she had been doing.

The Takemikazuchi stops in its tracks as it lands, sending a slash to our head. Reacting in the nick of time, we parry the offense only for her to start boosting. We're being pushed back, unable to meet the force of the Takemikazuchi.

Damn, I just need to find an opening. Wait, what if… Kasumi immediately catches onto my thought, displaying some dots on my radar. Then, diving the Mindseeker's heels onto the concrete for a second, our sword moves backwards as we spin on ourselves.

Her blade losing its parrying partner, the impulse makes Hayase fall forward, freeing us from her rush. Backboosting with all I've got, I ready the Variable Wings for the next step.

Hayase chases after us, she's too close for her own good. Blasting into a boost jump, making us spin in the air, I move my arms back as if I were preparing to swing a bat. And just like in that memory I saw, out Mindseeker throws the sword at the charging Takemikazuchi, and Hayase has to suddenly stop and jump to avoid getting a sword to the cockpit.

Now, Kasumi!

She quickly makes both daggers come out, letting me focus on out position and landing. Using the last of the momentum from the spin I throws one dagger towards Hayase, who didn't see it coming. Her Takemikazuchi's head got struck by the dagger, I think it should have been disabled.

I land and break into a run towards the Takemikazuchi. Moving so that our right hand is facing forward we close in on Hayase, and after a crouch cancel I aim it right at the cockpit.

Hayase, however, did not want to give up. She activated the Retractable Dagger on the right hand, that thankfully had a safety sheathe on for the practice, and dashed forward swinging it downwards as we were charging forward at her.

Both of our TSFs clash into each other, driving the daggers into the other's cockpit. The impact shook us left and right as Hayase's Type-00C collapses on top of our Mindseeker, molding me into my seat and stirring my stomach.

… Ugh.

Man… That was rough… I can feel my heart on my neck, sweat flooding my forehead, and I can't stop gripping the controls. Phew… Damn…

"CP to all units. The exercise is finished. Return to your respective Hangars, that is all," Sensei's usual bored voice reached my ears as I had my eyes closed. So we lost, huh.

Hayase slowly moves her Takemikazuchi and gets off of us, easing up the pressure on our unit.

"Ugh, that was more shaky than I expected. How are you feeling, Kasumi? You alright?" She rubbed her head a bit in circles very slowly.

"My head hurts a bit. These last few minutes were too intense. But I'm fine, don't worry," She then looks back, smiling radiantly again.

"Sigh… That's a relief. So, what did you think of your first training session?"

"It was… harder than I thought. Sorry, I couldn't help out at the end," Hunching over, her prior glee clouds over.

"Hey, you did great. You're better than I thought!" She blushes a bit as I pat her head but returns her usual calm look at me after a while.

"That's only because your thoughts are simple. I can follow your ideas very easily, since you think in simple terms. Instead of thinking on how to do a certain movement with complicated terms, it's a sequence of 'Move-Cancel-Move-Direction'. It's very easy to get a hang of that pattern, even if you think scary from time to time."

"Huh, neat. Glad you found it easy. What do you mean by thinking scary, though?"

"Well… Sometimes it feels as if you were screaming, your aura felt all dense and spiky…"

"… You mean people don't scream internally in this world?"

"Not like you do. Why do you do that?"

"It's… like… a habit? Like, when I sing anime openings, or say the name of special moves, I can't help but to shout like that to hype myself up."

"Is that so… You still sound scary."

"Hahaha… Well, besides that, you found it useful?" Then, she beams at me, nodding with much impulse.

"Yes, very much. Could we keep practicing together, please? When you have the time, of course."

"Anything for you, little bun," Patting her head again, her bunny ear move slowly as her gaze burrows away, "Maybe we could practice with the Stallion from now on? Can we still use that?"

"I think we should. Anyways, thanks a lot for this, Takeru-san." Aww, she looks so cute when she's beaming like that. And now she's all embarrassed. Hahaha!

Chop!

"Hey! Don't hit me, I'm just messing with you, Kasumi."

"Don't tease me," You look even cuter when you shrug your lips like that. "Stop it, please," And she keeps chopping me.

"Ahaha, sorry, sorry. Well, let's go back. By the way, how is the Mindseeker holding… Oh…" As the images appear on my view I can't help but to tense my brows as a whiff of cold air comes out my mouth.

"Oh, indeed. Everything is red," Kasumi let out a few surprised yelps at the state of our TSF as she shuffles around the images with the state of the Mindseeker.

I have crashed my fair amount of TSFs in my loops, but aside from that time on Mt. Tengen and when I literally destroyed my Fubuki during the XM3 trials, I have never left a TSF in such bad condition. Everything is on red numbers. The joints, the legs, the arms, the hip block. I literally almost broke it, the Mindseeker is hanging together by a miracle apparently.

"Let's be kind to it on our trip back," She moves her bunny ears to agree, and I can see her reflection on the panel. She looks real worried at the numbers.

I slowly boost upwards, taking off towards the launch pad that'll take us to Hangar 78.

"Hey, Eight." Hayase connects to the common channel as her unit comes closer.

"Viking 1 here, what is it?"

"Say, you're the XO's bodyguard, right?"

I think Sensei told them that I was her personal guardian or something along those lines, and considering our state of affairs that isn't wrong.

"Yes, something of the sort. What about it?"

"So, like, when are you joining the Valkyries?" Clear and serious in her curiosity, yet firm as well, expecting a definitive answer.

Well, duh, I just forced her to a draw with a super inferior TSF, of course she'll be curious.

"That is for the Professor to decide. As you can see, I'm helping her test many things within the base, so I cannot join the A-01 STF in their missions just yet."

"Oh, I see," Deflating fast, she took a moment before continuing, "But you will join us at some point?" Oh shit, she's got me on her sights. I can already hear her petitions for a rematch.

"I may or may not. Depends on the Professor entirely." And since I'm a hazard right now… that day might never come.

"Huh. Well, I will be looking forward to it. Don't think I'll let you off like this, I am going to make you kiss the ground someday!" First she sounded terribly disappointed, now she's all fiercely motivated. She can swing her mood faster than her sword.

"Hayase, just be honest. You've been asking about the Viking since we worked together in Niigata," Munakata, with a nice amount of sparks in between, just couldn't help yourself.

"Munakata! Shut it! I am just happy to have someone decent to spar against."

"Yeah, sure. To spar in the bedroom, perhaps?" Ouch. She's on literal fire today.

Maybe she's angry that Hayase told her off during our fight? I can see Kasumi trembling a bit on her seat.

"S-Shut up! That's insubordination. I'm the second-in-command here, you can't diss me like that. A hundred squats for you!" Ouch, Hayase's also really angry. I never thought I'd get to hear an embarrassed Hayase ever.

"Mitsuki, you need to be more honest with yourself. There's nothing wrong with getting interested in someone." Haruka-san too?! Friendly fire is on, apparently.

"Haruka! You're betraying me?!"

"Oh no, I'm just doing you a favor. Since you were so happy when we were told we could spar against them, I thought that you should seize the chance to-"

"Aaah! No more! Shut up! Vikings, these two are just messing with me, it's all just a big teasing, okay?!" I would have laughed along, if not for the blades coming from Hayase's tone.

"Of course. In any case, it was a pleasure to cross strikes with all of you," Kasumi nods too.

"Uuuh… I couldn't do a thing. Why did you take me out so fast?!" A voice I don't recognize, a feisty and energetic one, speaks to me as another Takemikazuchi gets closer.

"Takahara, you got careless again. You're so confident in your speed that you don't factor in the other's accuracy," The Captain scolds this Takahara, as calmly as always, making her groan loudly, "Look at Asakura, who's not as fast as you. She still managed to keep up decently."

"But in the end, I also got shot down," Another voice, more calm and sweet, speaks this time. This is Asakura, I guess, "It was a surprise when you did that sudden dive. I almost couldn't react, I didn't think the XM3 could allow us to do that."

"Yes, as I showed you today, there are many combinations of moves you can do with it. You should try to break through the usual conventions and patterns, there is a vast ocean of possibilities yet unknown waiting to be made a reality with this OS," The Captain hums in agreement and speaks up.

"Viking 1 and 2, I thank you for your assistance in our training today. I was told you have very tight schedules, so you have my utmost gratitude for giving us this chance to spar with both of you. I await the day you can become part of our squad, I'm sure the new recruits will benefit much from your skills," Cpt. Isumi firmly stated to take the reins of the conversation, probably to stop Munakata from teasing Hayase further.

"No, the pleasure was ours. And I hope we can work together in the future too."

"Yes, it was a nice experience," So Kasumi enjoyed herself, despite the violent shaking? She then nods twice.

"Likewise. We did think we would have the clear advantage with our new units, but it's clear we still haven't mastered them yet. Again, thanks for your cooperation today. Best of luck in your endeavors.

Valkyrie 1, out." The rest of the Valkyries also send us their parting words and close their channels.

"Well… At least this went well."

"Yes, it was fun, albeit a bit too shaky," She insisted, again rubbing her head.

"Don't worry, you'll get used to the XM3 in time, even if my style is too crazy for you. Just keep on training, Kasumi," She nods, again beaming at me.

Reaching the base again, we ride the launch pad and begin our descent towards Hangar 78, Kasumi asking me questions about my decisions on the way down.

Interference in the Masquerade

Chapter 50: Interference in the Masquerade

December 2nd. Near Noon.

(Hangar 78.)

[Takeru]

---

Moving my shoulders for a while as the cockpit opens, Kasumi descends first. Double checking that my helmet is in place, the faint smell of oil and the buzzing of the mechanics greets me once more as I leave the Mindseeker. Soon after, the initially curious whispers burst into bewildered shouts.

"What's with this damage?! The carbonic actuators are almost out of order!" A hoarse, old voice with a thick accent, one that was clearly not from Japan, fumed about.

"Sir, the left hand is completely unresponsive to our checks. We can't even get a reading through the data link," A younger, more panicked voice this time.

"It would seem the boosters' auxiliary arm is also in need of heavy repair, Major Sergeant, sir. Perhaps a complete replacement of the block would be in order," A female voice this time, also foreign, was dismayed at what showed up in her monitor, then took a brief glance towards me and Kasumi as we descended to ground level, "Just what sort of maneuvers did they do to abuse the craft to this extent?"

"The shutters of the boosters are also on the brink of getting stuck for good, and that's saying nothing on the noise the turbine is doing now…" And again, all of the mechanics give us the evil eye, making

Kasumi hide behind me, "How the hell did they do something like this in a single battle?"

… Well, to be fair, I fought with all I had. Making multiple double boost jumps by alternating the jet and rocket engines of the jump units, manually setting the angle of the shutter to what I prefer for short but intense bursts of speed, and the constant reposition of the things to veer my angle of flight right after doing one of said full boosts must have done a nasty number on them. And I didn't even do a Gliding Charge or a Sky Rend today, the Mindseeker would have broken down in awesomeness if I had done that.

Well, if he was the Swordbreaker, I'm the TSFbreaker then I guess. I wonder if you also left your machines in tatters? Oh, but I do this because I learned through Valgern-On. Even if his moves were real good, he shouldn't have been as reckless as I am, given that my style is practically madness to everyone else in this world.

… I guess that would work against me if I try to prove who I am to the Guard, even if I try to use the Mugen Kidou as well. Not like they seemed to care much about little me in that memory, anyways.

"Viking 1, everybody is scared of us," She whispers, still using me as a shield from the gazes around us, "Also, really angry."

"It's understandable, it's a one of a kind TSF and I almost sent it to the scrapyard. At least this data will be of use for the Shin, 'cuz if it can't take this much, then I'm gonna to need a Shiranui for sure," Sighing as the whispers continue, along a complain or two once they see yet another damaged section, I keep on slowly pacing to the exit of the place.

"But they might be right. You moved way too fast at times," And she holds the fort behind my back.

"What, you scared too?"

"… Somewhat. Some turns made me a bit dizzy," Not lifting her tone from a whisper, she slows down her pace.

"Hey, why didn't you tell me? You holding up alright?"

"Yes, don't worry. I didn't want to get in your way, and the Valkyries weren't going to give us a breather."

"… Was it when Hayase broke through a building?" Hesitating for a second, she then nods.

Goddammit Hayase… Leave Kasumi out for a sec, I could have bitten my tongue at the sudden intrusion. She didn't sound hostile on the way back, but an elite like her should know better. Hmm… Maybe she isn't used to the Type-00C as of yet? I mean, reckless she might be, but Hayase is no one's fool. Perhaps I'm the first that forced her to use a full boost since she switched models.

"Well, from now on I'll try to be more careful when we pilot together. It might be for the best to start training on our own instead of against others, until you get used to the G-Forces of my stunts, if you wanna keep training with me of course."

She then shrugged her lips, looking unnerved as the grip on my arm got a bit tighter, "I do, so if you find some time, please give some more lessons."

"Got it, but still, we should take our time. I wonder if we can use the Stallions again…"

As we were getting closer to the exit, 2nd Lt. Pyatkh entered and told us to go report to Sensei in person. Thus, we left the echoing chamber full of complains towards the usual elevator. Once we reached Sensei's floor, Kasumi went to her room to change so I made my way to the office, where I found her reading something in her laptop while drinking coffee, again without anything to eat nearby.

"Hey, Sensei. Pleased with the battle?"

"It was truly a surprise, to be comple- What are you doing in the suit?"

"… I mean, I was told to come here immediately, and can't exactly get changed in a normal changing room without someone noticing I left right after the Viking entered, right?"

Sighing a bit too strongly, a rather disappointed glare came at me, "Your clothes are in the cylinder room, weren't you told? Go and get changed then come back."

"Yes, yes…"

Sigh… Why didn't she tell me that? Is she so out of sorts she outright forgot that? Eh, whatever.

Quickly going back to the office after getting into my clothes, leaving my suit in the steel box that was near where my fatigues were waiting for me, I sit in my usual sofa as she passes me a mug and some muffins.

"… So, how did you see everything?"

She chuckles as she sits down, spinning slowly, "Spectacular. I didn't think you'd drive the Mindseeker to its literal limits. Why didn't you ever fight like that until now?"

"Well, during Niigata you explicitly told me not to do something stupid and I was using an unpolished XM3 at the time, and showing off all my cards during training wouldn't have done us any favors in disguising the Viking," She nods, humming as if bored, "And during the development of the XM3 you never placed me against anything that demanded my outright best performance."

"Is that so… If I might ask, what is in your opinion your best performance?"

"Hmm… If I go by numbers alone, it has to be when I offed like a thousand BETA all by myself in-"

"Blurgh!" Without any warning, Sensei spit out her coffee and began coughing real bad.

"H-Hey, you alright?"

Then, she shot me a vicious glare, subduing the coughing fit, "One. Fucking. Thousand. That's what you said, right?" Fuming much, she took off her now drenched in coffee coat, never taking her eyes off me.

"… I mean, yeah? I don't remember the exact number, though. I was more focused on the Fort-Class back then."

Still not leaving me out of her sight, sending a cold shiver down my back, she began to grab some papers that had been splashed by coffee, "Is that so… Then, how many did you kill during that mission?"

"Twenty something, I guess? Again, don't remember the exact number but it was around that. Uh… Sensei?"

Now clutching the papers, bending them real hard to the point I don't think she'll be able to fix 'em, her blazing eyes never leaving mine, she began taking small steps towards me.

"You took down…" One step, narrow eyes, "twenty Forts…" Two steps, tone freezes over, "aaall by yourself…" Three steps, she tilts her back, filling my view, "and you kept quiet about it because…"

"… You never asked?"

"Sigh… What else have you not told me then, hmm?" Eyes still blazing, her expression sharpened even more, "You're not gonna tell me you also took down a hive all by yourself now, are you?"

"… I mean, I do remember telling you I did take down a Reactor and a really large number of BETA on the worlds after Babylon. Sure, it's all blurry, but I clearly recall the shine of the reactor and the way to it, in pieces at the least."

And in all this time, those memories haven't cleared up at all. Save for the nightmares of Iceberg, that is.

Then, she remains staring, blinking in quick succession for a moment. As I wondered whether to speak or not, she finally restored my personal space with a quick turn towards her seat. Sigh… What's with her now?

Leaving the crumpled paper on the desk, sitting with a loud thud, she then faced me with quite some fire still in there, "So, this is your limit then?"

"Well… I haven't tried to do a Gliding Charge or a Sky Rend yet, and I was sort of trying to be careful since Kasumi was there. But I did do a serious effort, so yeah, you can say it's close to my best," Finally easing up, I let the coffee help my relaxation.

"Is that so… In any case, your performance was astounding. Taking down four Takemikazuchis, piloted by the Valkyries no less, with a modified Tomcat…" Sighing again, she begins to spin once more.

"Well, to be frank, Kasumi did help a lot with both the first kill and the navigation," Half of the result is hers, after all. No way can I shoot in midair while doing a barrel roll with such precision.

"I see… By the way, do you still feel fine? No headaches, no dizziness, no fogginess," Taking a moment to again stare, seems as if she were scanning me whole.

"No? Sure, I did some reckless stunts back there, but I'm holding up well," Giving her a thumbs up, eating the muffins, I sink into the sofa as I stretch my legs comfortably.

However, she says nothing for a while, still staring.

"… Good enough, then. Even if you left the machine in tatters, the data you produced will be of much use to the Shin project and the XM3. Was Yashiro satisfied in the end?"

"Oh, yeah. She seemed a bit scared of my stunts, though."

Sensei chuckles as she starts spinning again, "I suppose that is to be expected, from the piloting of someone who subdued twenty Fort-Class all by himself."

… She's not gonna let that go now, huh. Why is she so pissed, again?

"So, now that we're done with that…" Now facing me in complete sobriety, she entwined her fingers and rested them on the desk, leaning in, "The Guard tried to pay your cell a visit while you were piloting."

"… I see. And? Did they insist?"

Fuming much, she nods, "Much, very much. Even went as far as requesting official permission, saying they wished to inquire about who you obtained the blade from. I missed the moment when you neutralized Isumi thanks to that," Doing a fast, sharp spin, it does nothing to placate those embers, "By the way, who gave you that blade? They were particularly insistent on that point."

… My world's Meiya.

The one who I couldn't save despite being right there, the one I left alone for two years.

"If it's someone who's dead or missing I could… Shirogane?"

In the end, I wonder how's everything over there? I know going to check is out of the question, but… Did that world get reset after I left? Are they safe back there?

"Ahem…" Looking back up, she held my gaze with a completely solemn expression, "Who gave you the blade again?"

"… Someone we can't use."

"Are you insinuating you don't want to answer?"

"Why do you wanna know? We can't use that person as a shield."

"Your position in Alt. IV as the tuner of the 00 Unit requires your safety to be assured, let me remind you," One brow sinks, her tone does too, "Who gave you the blade?"

"… Sigh. You really wanna know, even if you can't do anything about it?"

For a second, her complexion blazed up again before sobering into the usual bored expression, "Are you, perhaps, holding some reservations towards my influence, Shirogane?"

"I mean, what exactly can you do to use Meiya for this?"

And, she got tilted.

Blinking fast for a second, confusion spreading as she stared right back, until she rebooted.

"You're saying Mitsurugi gave you the blade?"

"Yeah, well, not her exactly, but it was her sword. By the way, Maya-san was the one who gave me the thing, so we can't use that either."

"Is that how it is, huh… Nothing we can do, it's true," Then, why are you still spewing fire? "Well then, I suppose you should at least have a talk with them before they get any weird ideas in their heads. Did you get anything out of yesterday's session in the end?"

"… About that… I don't think… I can go and talk with 'em today."

"… Huh, what do you know. Another thing you didn't tell me about."

"Come on, now. It was… hard, even for Kasumi."

"So, what was it about?"

"Sigh… Did you get any intel on my parents in the end?"

"Do you even have to ask, really?" Very quietly lashing, she picked up some stuff from the piles, throwing them my way, "Both died when he was still young, as you had told me your father was a Royal Guard here, and he perished during Operation Swaraj. Let me tell you one thing, though. Your mother was registered with her single surname, and neither had any intel on their profiles regarding marriage or having a son. Whoever wanted to hide you did a thorough job indeed."

"… Huh."

Didn't knew Mom had health problems, dammit. Why was that not a problem back home? And anyways, why would they have had to live in some rundown town? Mom wasn't from the city, sure, but they had moved together once they started dating. I don't see my grandparents, from Dad's side, letting them live in the sticks. To say they were super chill and welcoming would be an understatement. Maybe this world also changed them somehow?

But… But if anyone went to this length to erase his past…

"So Shirogane, what did you see yesterday, and why do you not want to speak with the Guard now?" Fingers still entwined, gaze unmoving from my shape, she awaited the answer.

"… Remember when I asked you if this was safe and what not?"

"Hm? What has that to do with this?"

"Well, back then I asked you if you were sure that Yuuhi was on good terms with him, remember?"

"… Yes, I recall. And I told you Her Purpleness is most likely fond of this world's you. Did you see anything that disproves this assumption?"

"No, not really. I think she liked him, at least when they were kids."

"So then, what's the issue?"

"… That we never put into question if he was on good terms with her."

Stalling a reaction, the sober facade let way for a hawkish glare to flourish, "… What are you talking about? How could he not be on the Shogun's good side? I told you he joined them when he was but a teenager, and all this protection, all this insistence hints that he was, indeed, someone important for them."

"… And what if he despised that?"

"Enough with the questions, start answering. What did you see?"

"… The day when he got the letter of Dad's passing, and how they wanted to send him to an orphanage."

Breathing through clenched teeth, I start telling her of what I saw yesterday, of how I ended up cutting off the recovery as his fear overwhelmed me, and how Kasumi was kind of groggy due to that, which is why we didn't give her a report.

How he was beyond broken at the news, how Maya-san's dad was a dick to him, and how she didn't do anything to stop him. And how it seemed that, after using up Dad, they threw little me away without a single care. Heh, what did I even expect of those dastards, really? Silly me, believing the nobles would treat me fairly.

"It was… It was too much for me, so I practically shut down the projection as I heard his inner thoughts," Sighing as I hunch over, the last drops of coffee fail to clear the raspy taste in me, "And even if it feels different to the sadness of the CCSE, it got me thinking. What if this world's me didn't like Yuuhi?"

"Then, why did he join the Royal Guard?" She presses immediately.

"Well… I dunno, but-"

"Shirogane, if he had been sent to an orphanage, he would have never been able to join the Royal Guard afterwards."

"Bu-"

Not giving me an inch, she takes a mile while leaning onto her desk, "Furthermore, the place you said was your house remained under your father's name through the years, so nobody adopted you."

"They could have changed the databases, though."

"True, however, want to know what we found in it?"

"Huh? You… went to inspect my house? Why?"

"Well, first to see if 'your room' had vanished as you said it had. And yes, it did. However, in the remains of the place we found some… interesting things to be sure," Smirking a bit, she gets up and goes to a steel locker. Taking out a folder, she hands it to me, remaining close as I begin to look at what's inside.

And in the thing were… pictures of my house. Of a ruined version of it, with a different table than the one back home, with less furniture on it.

But there were photos in the walls, in the entrance hall. Photos of my parents, of them with little me and Uncle Koetsu, and… a picture of their room, left intact save for the dust and damage of the war. Even those same dumb orange sheets Mom liked so much… As well as my own room, even with my jet poster and all…

Sighing softly, can't help but to smile as I see the place, "… I see. So it was left in peace…"

"Indeed. If you had been adopted or if it had been sold, your house wouldn't have been left in this state. I assume you can confirm this was your parents' room?"

"Yeah, even that dumb sheet… Yeah, this is my house. Not exactly the same, but it is," Looking up, our gazes meet in silence for a moment, then another, "Why did you keep quiet about this, Yuuko?"

"… I didn't really, this was merely to confirm your room was truly gone, to scan the place for any possible hints about how the transfer worked," The slight veering of her eyes, the faint grumbling in her tone just now tells me she didn't find anything useful there, "And the team only took more pictures of the rest of the place as a protocolar measure. Didn't think it would be of use, to be honest," Shrugging, she rolls her eyes, letting me see she's telling the truth, "So, if your parents' bedroom was left alone despite both of them being dead for almost six years when this area had to be evacuated, then it is obvious this world's you wasn't sent to an orphanage nor adopted."

"Then, the hell happened to him? Did they erase him back then?"

She then stares at me, very dismissively, "A child, really? All of this bother for a toddler?"

"… Okay, that was dumb on my part. But what could have happened?"

"How should I know? You're the one getting memories from him. You're sure he had some manner of animosity towards the Shogun?"

"Towards the Guard. I… to be honest, I don't see how he could have remained on good terms with any of 'em, seeing how they treated him after Dad died. And… I know I tend to get emotional under pressure, even if I try not to. So, well…"

"You're not confident in your ability to convince the Guard of your identity since you could react negatively to their probing, which could then make them believe someone is manipulating you to see them in a bad light?"

"Yeah… save for the second part, I didn't think it that far. You think they might believe someone is influencing me?"

"Not someone, more likely me," Crossing her arms, again she fumes, "I bet you anything you want that they'll blame me for your 'sudden distrust' towards the Guard if they truly believe you're this world's you. And if they don't it's all the worse, since they'd get against both of us and assume I was planning to use you to influence Her Highness. Which means…" Shooting a look at me, the devouring tension returned to her, "You absolutely need to ascertain what happened to him after your father's passing. Shirogane, as soon as Yashiro comes back, you're going to do another memory recovery session."

"Sigh… Got it."

A hand going to her chin, she again began to scan me, "… Why are you hesitating, again? Do I have to remind you of the importance of this matter for Alt. IV, and by extension your wish for a peaceful life?"

"No, I know that… It's just…" Leaning back onto the sofa, gazing at the ceiling, parts of his words as they took him away come back and I can't help but to grimace, "Something… doesn't feel right. I dunno how to put it in words… but part of that sadness was in the CCSE… And, well, I guess we could just use these early memories as proof, without risking me getting negative due to his emotions, right?"

"Don't be an idiot," Ruffling her bangs, she again goes for a spin, "Inherited memories, more so in the case of forced ones, cannot influence someone in any meaningful way in such a short amount of time. This is all on you getting emotional when seeing these flashes," Facing me again, making me recoil under her gaze, her tone again froze hell over, "So, if you wouldn't mind, I'd like you to stop wetting the pillow over someone else's life. Start to take the necessary steps to ensure our plan comes to fruition. You're just gathering intel, and if you're getting emotional over it, it's all on your shoulders."

"H-Hey, you can't… It's not that simple."

"Yes, it is. Stop being such a pansy, are you truly the same man who killed twenty Forts all by himself? The veteran who wants to end large scale wars and reach a peaceful world?" Leaning into her desk, her glare intensifies, another layer of dry ice on her tone, "What can I expect you to do for Alt. IV if this is enough to take you down, Mr. Ace Pilot?"

Feels like I got stabbed multiple times in a row, can't even hold her gaze anymore, "… Just because I'm a good pilot doesn't mean I'm immune to sadness, you know. After what happened in my world… It's not easy seeing him also lose his everything like that…"

Leaving the silence hanging for a sec, the calm but sharp whisper teared right into and through me, "It's on you. If you let someone else's life bring you down, it's your own damn fault. Could you get a grip already? We need to ensure your safety, so that you can remain here without issues. Do I truly have to remind you of what and who we're dealing with here?"

Stealing a gaze at her, I only found more and more fire. As I broke eye contact, I only could hear more and more frustrated groans and a really heavy sigh, followed by a few fast steps towards her seat.

Yeah, I know. This is on me. Yuu… No, Sensei doesn't have to care about my own problems. She doesn't need a crybaby on her team, she needs someone who gets shit done. As Hayase said, don't throw your burdens onto others. If you can't smile when talking about it, if you're just looking to vent… Shut up and keep it inside, deal with it on your own. Your problems are yours, don't go pawning them off on the rest first chance you get.

This is my cross to bear, can't really expect anyone to lend an ear when it comes to the mess of my world… And she doesn't have to understand what I'm going through, she doesn't have to listen. Yeah… Remember it well… She isn't the Yuuko I fell for… She's merely someone I work with, and you don't vent your personal problems while at work.

And to reach my own goals while trying to help this world as much as I can, both for mine and his own reasons, pacifying the Guard is a must.

Now that I got the squad to accept me, I can't let this stop me.

Even if it hurts, even if it only confirms he indeed wasn't in good terms with 'em…

… The ball is on my feet, the dice is on my hands. It's a play I gotta do all on my own. Otherwise, if Sensei doesn't find me useful… She did say she only would keep helping me 'so long as I helped her', so if I fail to meet her expectations…

It's all over for me. As the stranger I am, I can't expect anyone to spare me any sympathy anymore.

This is my own fight.

"Sigh… I get it, I'll make sure to endure the visions."

"Good," She begins spinning once she sits, looking up and back to the poker face, "I'd like to solve this matter today, before the mock battle if we can help it."

"… Mock battle? What're you talkin' about?"

"Hm? Oh, right. The Guards requested a mock battle with your squad, on the grounds that they wish to test Mitsurugi. They shall be using the modified Gekishins with the parts we developed, save for the older Tsukuyomi in her Takemikazuchi. That happens tomorrow, by the way."

"… Huh, neat. So… You think they might try to harm me during it?"

"Or worse," Simply saying it, not even fazed at the prospect, "They also seem to be setting up an encrypted frequency in their units, probably to contact you or Mitsurugi during the fight. Which is why I'd rather solve this peacefully, if you wouldn't mind cooperating."

"Drop the blizzard already. So, why are you not calling them out on it?"

"Hm? Well, because, in the case that they do not believe your words, I can use the encrypted channel as a deterrent. Accusing them of wanting to break UN protocol, or effectively doing that, could give you a window to flee your cockpit and get to the underground before they approach you. If that happens today, I could delay the talks and accusations for a moment, and my presence would probably be enough to make them reticent to chase after you, but they'll assuredly come after your head soon enough if you don't convince them."

"… And what then?"

"Well, I suppose that if they actually press charges for identity theft… I'd have to kill you."

"Haha… Ahaha… So it comes down to that, huh."

"Seriously, what did you expect?" Rolling her eyes, she sighs afterwards, "I cannot, under any circumstances, lose the Royal Guard's neutrality towards me. Should Her Highness begin to hoist animosity towards me, if this matter makes too much noise, couldn't that be used to spark up the third incident you mentioned?"

Oh right, Sagiri. Considering all the deals for the parts, the railgun project, and the loan of the Type-00C, I'm sure many of the more fervent members of both the IJA and IRG are very nettled right now. Any excuse would work for them to try and wrestle things back to the 'proper order', and no way those plotting against Alt. IV will let that chance pass them by.

All it takes is Yuuhi saying or hinting at being displeased with the UN, or either anyone actually going the identity theft route… That just might trigger the coup.

If the UN became an enemy in their eyes… Yeah, the rebels would also come after us. And in this more nationalistic world… maybe more soldiers would take their side… maybe the Royal Guard would…

… Maybe Yuuhi would legitimize the coup here…

I cannot leave any option out of the table, not after what happened last loop with the butterfly effect my actions had back then.

So, yeah. If it's either me or the Empire, the choice is obvious. Of course she'd dispose of me… Of course she'd abandon me… I'm a stranger, after all. What a fool I am, how could I have placed any measure of trust in her? Someone so powerful, so influential… would only ever see me as a mere pawn. It's on me, I was the one who got unreasonable expectations of camaraderie in the first place, the idiot who thought we were allies rather than circumstantial partners.

Repining about it will bestow me no answer, moving forward is all I can do. In solitude, just as it was when I arrived.

"So Shirogane, I expect you to-"

"I know. I'll do my part, Vice Commander," Standing up, I leave the mug on her desk before turning around.

"And, exactly where do you think you're going?"

"To the restroom. I rather be ready when Kasumi comes back."

"You do know my room is literally a door away, right?"

"… If you'd excuse me, I rather have some alone time now. I'll be back in a sec."

Walking to the door, she didn't lock it again so I could leave unimpeded. Stomping my way to the floor's restroom, I saw Kasumi coming closer in the opposite direction. Hesitating for a second, her complexion seemed to tighten as she got to my side.

"Did anything happen, Takeru-san?"

"No, nothing. We just were talking some serious stuff, Sensei should tell you we need to do another recovery session. I'll be back in a sec."

"Um," Timidly grabbing onto one of my sleeves, her eyes admired the luster of the floor, "I'll try to… not hurt you during the projection. I will… do my best, so…"

"It's not on you, Kasumi," Patting her softly, I raise her chin and smile back, "You were not at fault yesterday. I just gotta… Sigh… get my shit together. So, just wait for me in the office, okay?"

"… Yes."

Limply dropping the hand that held my sleeve captive, she remained in place as I went my way. I waved back, then she began to go to the office.

Turning around, slowing down and sighing hard, after reaching the restroom, taking some off time in the toiled, and cleaning my hands, I splashed quire some cold water on my face. And again. And again. Resting my hands on the sink, my eyes return my own reflection's gaze unblinking, enduring the strain

I know… I always knew… I was alone here… She made it clear after the CCSE, that she would only help me if I'm useful for her. Someone who just follows orders ain't an ally, that's just a pawn. That's… all I am for this world's Sensei, just like last loop.

Finally closing my eyes, becoming aware of my breathing, I take a rhythm as I hold the air, only to let it go after a second, time and again.

So… This is all on my shoulders… In a way, it's a good thing. My life is on my own hands, no one else can screw me over now.

"… And like hell I'll let this hold me back. I haven't even confirmed if my world is safe or not yet…"

I just gotta brace up and brave through those memories, as he did as well when he was little. Like I'd let the Guard screw me over again. Time to get my shit together, I'll despair after I'm dead.

Chapter 51: Enduring the Restart

May 22nd, 1992.

(Takeru's House.)

[Native Takeru]

---

"B-But I haven't packed anything-"

Kazora-san sent me another scary look, groaning quite a bit, "You had ample time, Shirogane. We are leaving, now."

"Father, please," Maya-nee said, her voice getting lower than before, "Why can you not wait but a moment? What image will this course of action portray?"

"… He won't need much in the orphanage, that small bag is plentiful enough as it is. Let us go, posthaste," And without waiting, he goes to the front door.

I look at Maya-nee, who avoids my gaze as she begins to pull me towards the street.

Why? What did I do wrong? I thought… we were like family…

Sniff… In the end… In the end… I'm… Hic…

Ring! Ring!

"Ugh, a call at a time like this… It was ringing a second ago, too. Let us go," Maya-nee's Dad grabs her suitcase and goes to the door.

Ring! Ring!

"Who is calling here now? Why would anyone…"

"Maya, let's go."

"Father, if someone is calling then let me answer it. If it's one of Takeru's friends, it's better that I explain the situation now, isn't it?"

The old man groans a bit but he nods at her, "Fine, make it quick."

Maya-nee leaves me by the stairs and goes to answer the phone. Who's calling? Nobody ever calls. I mean, Uncle Koetsu sometimes does but he was just here. Jouji and the others are studying for the tests and we had no group homework to do. So… So, who's calling here? If Dad is really gone…

"Hello? Eh… Yohime-sama?!"

Huh? Yohime-san is calling? Why? She never ever called here before… Kazora-san's face went pale like a paper right now. What's wrong with him? I mean… Yohime-san was who chose Maya-nee to be with me… Maybe she's just calling to have her go to Yuuhi's house faster…

"Um… Yohime-sama, why did you call? No, I have no such… Yes, understood. Father, Yohime-sama wishes to speak with you," Looking really serious, Maya-nee offered the phone to her Dad.

The old man seemed surprised, almost scared somewhat. But then he returned to his stern face and took the receiver quite harshly from Maya-nee's hands. What's his problem? It's their fault that they have to talk now… What does she even want, calling out of the blue? Adults are so weird…

"… Yes? Yes, it is me, Yohime-sama.… I was merely going to take the boy to… Huh?! You cannot possibly be serious!" The man hunched over and placed a hand on the wall. His eyes looked about to pop out of his face, "Yohime-sama, please reconsider! This is… No, I am not criticizing your judgment, however… I do have a complain, he's but a peasant! What could he have to… N-No, I am not opposing you, milady. I am merely-"

… What are they arguing about now? The forehead of the old man was now full of sweat, he's giving me an even scarier look. Maya-nee came behind me and placed a hand on my shoulder. What's wrong with her? Her hand is trembling…

"… Shirogane, Yohime-sama wishes to speak with you," The old man said as he looked towards me, handing me the receiver.

With me? W-What does she want from me? Dad is gone now… Will she also scream at me? Tell me I have to go away?

I slowly go towards him and grab the phone.

"… Yohime-san?"

"Forgive the screams, Takeru. I did not wish to have Kazora-san raise his voice. How would you be? You're healthy, I hope?" She's not angry, sounding as nice as always.

"Yes… I'm fine."

"Now then, I believe you were already told of your situation?"

"… Yes, I'll have to leave somewhere."

"Yes, that is the case. However, would you instead wish to avoid going to the orphanage?"

"Eh? Y-Yes, I would! But… But they said that-"

"Yes, I can surmise what you were told," Her voice got scary for a second, only to return to her usual, "So Takeru, I have an offer for you. Please listen closely to what I'm about to tell you," I press the receiver hard onto my ear. If I can stay… I don't care if I'm all alone if I can stay in my home. "On your current situation, you will have to be sent to an orphanage. And even then, finding a suitable couple who would like to adopt you at your age shall be a tall ordeal, more so in these harsh times we are facing. So, I have a proposal for you. Would you agree for me to be the one to adopt you?"

"… Eh? You? But… But there's a lot of rules and-"

"Takeru, let's just say that I amply fulfill all the requirements, being from a samurai family. There are some conditions that will be forced on you if you become one of us, however."

"Conditions? Like in the raffles that come in the cereal packs?" Those things that say you need to have the paper to claim the prize, and send a letter somewhere, and a lot of other bothersome things. Me and Sumika never won any, and we don't know anyone who did.

"Yes, something of the sort," She giggled a bit before continuing, "You see, being part of the nobility, all of our members and retainers have to dedicate themselves to our nation, in one way or the other. While I am aware that you've been training very hard every weekend here, it is not the same as if you trained here every day. And the education that you receive in your school cannot compare to the one Mion and Shion receive from their tutors. If I were to adopt you, you would have to start training here every day, just like they do, and you would have to live according to our rules."

"Um… What does that mean? Would I be a samurai then?"

"You would be trained to be one, yes," Then, her usual happy tone disappeared, getting all quiet and serious, "However, being a samurai is no easy task, Takeru. It takes more than swinging a sword to be able to fulfill the role. If you choose to become part of my House, you will have to live a life similar to the one your Father lived."

"Eh? Similar to… Dad?"

"Yes, your Father wasn't able to spend as much time by your side as he desired, right?" Groaning as I nod, my eyes water a bit, it feels as if a lot of needles were hitting my chest, "He had not the freedom to do as he wished. You can now opt to go to the park, to do or not to do your homework today, to go to sleep at the hour you so desire, to watch TV until late if you so please, to choose the future you wish within the options you have. Do you follow?"

"Um… So… Now, I can do what I want, that's what you're saying?"

Did I get that right? I mean… They weren't letting me choose here, they were taking me away without listening. And Maya-nee never lets me watch TV until late, even when I pass my exams.

"Yes, that is right. Even if you end up in an orphanage, you would still have certain freedoms available to you. However, should you choose to let me adopt you, that freedom will be taken away from you. You will have to train when you're told to, go to sleep when you're told to, and follow the career that you're told to. It is also very likely that…" Leaving the silence hanging for a little while, she sighed and then her tone got all scary again, "you might have to fight against the monsters earlier than everyone else as well."

A cold shiver went up my back when she said that. The black monsters that appear on TV, the monsters that killed Dad…

Those awful monsters… That destroy the flying robots so easily…

Me? Fight them? But… if Dad and the other samurais couldn't win… What could I do?!

Kinda going back to her calm tone, Yohime-san continues, "Your Father had to sacrifice much while he was alive, and being a samurai eventually sent him to his death. So, I cannot blame you if you hate us now. However, allow me to extend a helping hand to you. Sadly, I can only ask you once. If you go to the orphanage, there will be little I will be able to do without… drawing certain eyes upon me."

"Eyes? What do you mean?" Why do the adults always talk like that? I don't get what she's trying to say. Is the orphanage so scary that even she doesn't want to go there?

"It matters not. Point being, once you leave I won't be able to help. I know asking this of you now, just after you learned of your Father's passing, is a cruel thing to do. However, it is all I can do. Takeru, do you have an answer?"

… An answer? I… I don't know… I mean… I don't wanna go away… But… if being a samurai is what killed Dad… If I have to go fight the monsters…

And… And if she adopts me… I look back, at the scary old man. I would have to live with them, and he hates me. I never beat Mion or Shion in our duels, despite being girls they're much stronger than me. I'm not that good…

I don't understand that about having to do what you're told, how is that different than what Maya-nee always does? But… But… If Dad was killed by the monsters… What can I do?

Then the cold feeling comes back.

Because then I'll have to go to the orphanage. I'll never see anyone I know again.

I'll be all alone. I'll never come back home.

"Takeru? Are you there?"

"… I'm scared." I start shivering in place, closing my eyes tightly.

"Huh?"

"I'm scared. I mean… If Dad couldn't win, what can I do? If all the other samurais got together and lost…"

"Takeru, that's why we train every day. To turn our failures into victories."

Maya-nee also says that. But… But Dad died! There's no training that will make him come back!

"But… If Dad died…"

"Takeru…" She then speaks with that silky, kind voice she sometimes uses, "Your Father fought to protect you. And even if he perished, he didn't 'lose'. Because you're still alive, he reached part of his objective."

"Huh? I… I don't get it…"

"I'm saying that your Father's death wasn't pointless. He loved you and wished to protect you above everything. Even if you don't choose to come to us, at the least know that your Father didn't die in vain for being a samurai. Giving the fight and not 'winning' doesn't mean you can't achieve your objective. You are his victory, Takeru."

I'm Dad's victory? B-But… But I'll have to go away…

I inhale a bit… Dad's letter said… That he fought for me… He asked me to be strong and do my best… Mom also asked me to keep smiling before going away…

If I go away… I don't know where I'll go. I don't know who will want to adopt me. Maybe no one will. What happens then? Uncle Koetsu made a scary face when I asked, so I don't want to know. It must be something like those horror movies Maya-nee doesn't let me watch, the ones that air past midnight.

One thing I do know, I won't be able to be with Maya-nee, Mion and Shion anymore. Will I still be able to go to school? What about Sumika and the rest? Will I still be able to see them?

I don't know… I'm scared… My legs are shaking so much, my neck is all tight as if someone were holding my head underwater. I don't know what should I do… But… But Dad asked me… to do my best…

And if he fought for me… T-Then… Then, could I train to one day be as good as him? Can I help out too? If Yohime-san says she'll train me to be a samurai… even if it's hard… If I can stay with Maya-nee… But… But what if…

"Um… Yohime-san?"

"Yes?"

"What would happen if… if you trained me but I ended up not being good? Would you then send me to an orphanage?" Would they send me away then? Would they start screaming and being mean?

"Do not worry, there are many positions you can take. And you won't be expected to excel in any of your courses. I was merely wishing to let you know that if you become one of us, your work will be chosen for you and you won't be able to say no. I shan't send you away, Takeru. So choose freely without fears. Would you like to come to us?"

"You won't send me away if I'm bad?"

"Of course I won't."

"And you won't scream at me or be mean to me like the old man?"

"I will not," Then, her voice got scary again, "And I assure you, I shan't allow anyone to do anything of the sort."

"R-Really?"

"Yes, truly. I know it might be hard to grasp for you, but once you become our fellow you'll be part of the House, so nobody would ever try to be unnecessarily mean to you as long as you behave."

So they won't be mean? Then… I look towards Maya-nee, who had her eyes filled with clouds as they were half closed. The old man was still glaring at me.

What do I want to do?

I… I don't want to be alone. I don't want to go away.

But… Can I do it, Dad? Can I be as strong as you? I don't know… But… But… he asked me… to do my best…

So… All the other adults were mean, they all said they could do nothing because of these 'rules'. But if Yohime-san can help me… She's always so calm, so kind… Will she really help me?

"Yohime-san?"

"Yes, Takeru?"

"Are you really… going to adopt me?" It took a lot to say that without stuttering.

"Yes, if you agree."

"Then… C-Can you do that, please? Please don't leave me alone. I don't wanna go away. I'll do my best so… Um…"

"Don't worry, Takeru. From now on, you're one of us. Please, pass the receiver to Kazora-san."

"Yes… Um… Kazora-san…" The old man slowly came to my side and took the receiver, not so harshly this time.

I quietly move away from him. My hands are still shaking, I still feel cold all over… My neck hurt and my nose is running… Ugh…

"Takeru…" Maya-nee came to my side and cleaned my face with a handkerchief, "You were really brave right now."

"Huh? Brave?"

"Yes, it takes a great effort to ask for help when you're so scared. I was sure you were going to start crying. How are you feeling?" She crouched by my side, placing a hand on my shoulder.

"… Scared. What's going to happen to me now?"

She taps her glasses, looking concerned, "Well… I suppose we'll have to go arrange some paperwork for the adoption. I also believe you'll have to come with us and live in Yuuhi-sama's house from now on."

"Huh?! But… What about this house? This is my home!"

"Yes, but… well, until you finish your training you'll have to stay there with Mion and Shion. That being said, are you sure of this?" She stopped and placed a hand on my cheek, scanning my face "Training to be a samurai is not an easy task. Let me tell you I was holding back on you all this time. What awaits you is a much more harsher training, Takeru. And you will have to become a public servant, regardless of your wishes. Are you sure you wish to come with us?"

"… You don't want me to go with you?"

"That's not it. I am merely worried about you. Even if you end up alone, you still are free to choose what to do with your life. If you come with us…"

I would be just like Dad. Dad wanted to be with me and Mom, but he couldn't. Mom always said that all we had was thanks to Dad being a samurai. I don't know what a public servant is, but if I can be like Dad… If I can help out Maya-nee and the rest…

I can't be scared, Dad asked me… He asked me to do my best. I don't know why they didn't tell me this before, instead of scaring me with those rules… B-But…

"Maya-nee, will you be with me if I go? Even if I'm bad at studying?" I look at her, I can feel a few tears running down my cheeks.

She wipes them off and gives me a smile, nodding, "Yes, I will be looking after you whenever I can. Matters not how you perform, I won't leave you alone."

"And you all really won't send me away if I'm not good?"

"Of course not, perish the thought."

"What about the rules?"

"Well… Certain people are strong enough to be able to… navigate around the rules," Again tapping her glasses, getting all serious, she looks away. What does that mean? You adults are so complicated… "But rest assured, Yohime-sama can meet all the rules needed to adopt you. So, do you truly wish to come with us?"

"Yes, I'll go. I-I'll do my best so… please don't leave me alone…" I hug her and she hugs me back, patting my back, making that awful cold feeling go away.

"There, there. Don't worry, it'll be okay. I'll be with you, Takeru. So don't be scared, okay?"

"Yes…"

"Maya, Shirogane, Yohime-sama has ordered us to go back to her. Just to make sure, you are prepared to be one of us, kid?" The old man said in a loud, harsh tone as he glared at me again.

"Father, please stop trying to frighten Takeru. He already said-"

"I wish to hear him, Maya. Move aside and let him speak," He said in a loud tone, giving Maya-nee a harsh glare.

"Father, he is but a child. What do you expect you gain from this?"

"I told you to move aside! Have your ears gone daft, Maya? Let me remind you that-"

"S-Stop bullying Maya-nee!"

"What did you say, Shirogane?!"

"I told you to stop bullying Maya-nee! Why are you so mean to us?! I hate you! Bleh!" I hug Maya-nee tightly, giving him a nasty glare back as he groans.

"Why you… You think this kind of behavior will be tolerated?!"

"You're the one that's being rude! Maya-nee is awesome, don't be mean to her!"

"Grr… See, Maya? A kid like him won't-"

"Father," Maya-nee pets my head as she looks at him, her tone cold and scary as it hasn't been in a long time, "I believe that Takeru speaks the truth. You've been unnecessarily hostile since you arrived, especially to a young boy who just lost his father. Perhaps speaking in a more amicable tone would yield better results? Surely you're capable of that."

"… Hmph, to think you would talk back to me." They remain quiet, glaring at each other. After a while, the old man sighs and rubs his beard, "So Shirogane, are you prepared for training to be a samurai? If you choose to come with us, no matter how much you cry later you won't be coming back." And again, stared at me with those scary eyes.

… I know. I know that I'm not as good as Mion and Shion. But… I just gotta learn! If Dad could do it, so can I! And if he fought to protect the ones he loved… Then I'll do the same! I'll be just like Dad!

… Even if my legs are still shaking and I'm really scared of being with this old man. I don't want to leave… But if I have to leave, I rather go with Maya-nee and do my best with her.

"Yes, I'll do my best in the training. And I won't cry."

"Oh, really now?"

"Father, I'll have you know that when Takeru affirms something, he usually manages to do what he says. He is very stubborn and hard working when he wants something." Maya-nee says as she taps her glasses, glaring at the old man.

"… I see. I suppose you have been teaching him a good thing or two. In any case, let's not waste another second. Yohime-sama is awaiting us," Kazora-san then turns around and quickly goes to the door.

Maya-nee pats my back and gives me a smile, then she pulls my hand. I follow her, and before leaving I take a look back.

… Will I ever come back here? How will I do these trainings? What about school and my exams?

I'm scared. And sad. Dad is… Dad is really gone? We'll never talk again? Never read again, never eat anything together again… Sniff…

And… now I'm going away… B-But… But I'll do my best… Mom and Dad… I'll become a samurai you can be proud of! Even if the old man is really scary… I don't know what I can do or how I'll do it, but I'll do my best effort to be good from now on.

Once we got inside the big car, I looked at the shape of my house as it became tiny in the distance.

When I couldn't see it anymore I leaned on Maya-nee's arm, grabbing it tightly.

And then I cried. I cried and cried quietly until I fell asleep.

---

Same day. 10:24 PM.

(Koubuin Main House.)

---

"Takeru… Takeru, wake up."

"Mmgh… Yawn…" I rub my eyes, feeling someone shake my shoulders, "… Maya-nee?"

"Are you awake, Takeru?" She said in a low voice, still shaking my shoulder.

I blink a few times until I see everything clearly. Nodding as I rise up from where I was sleeping, a sudden cold gusts makes me shudder.

The long car had stopped and it was really dark outside, Maya-nee was looking at me from outside the door. Getting out of the car, I saw that we were already on Yuuhi's house. It's really cold and dark though, what hour is it?

Maya-nee grabs my hand and takes me towards the door. There, a lot of samurai rangers were waiting for us. They looked at us and gave us a bow as we passed the big wooden gate.

A man with two coffee-colored spiky horns of hair on the side of his head came towards us as we got closer to them. He was wearing the uniform of the samurai in a red that was stronger than the one Mana-nee uses.

"Col. Tsukuyomi, we heard the news, Yohime-sama is waiting. This way, please," All of them immediately stood aside once Coffee Horns said that, bowing to Kazora-san as he walked to the door.

As me and Maya-nee followed behind, I could see some of them gave me those same scary eyes Kazora-san made when we were back home. Maya-nee pulled me closer to her as we entered the house, her hand feeling really tense.

… What are they going to do now? Yohime-san said she was going to adopt me… but how will she do that? What about the rules?

I still feel really, really nervous about this… What if I'm not good at all and they send me to the orphanage? Dad… Mom… Will I ever go back to my house? I shiver and look down, thinking about how it will be to live with Kazora-san and the rest, about what may happen now. I gulp and grab Maya-nee's hand tighter as we got to Yohime-san's room.

As we enter, I saw that Yohime-san and the other old woman that's always around Yuuhi were sitting on their usual spot. Then, as usual, we give her a bow.

"Welcome, please take a seat," Yohime-san said with a smile, sounding as always as we sat down.

"Yohime-sama, if I may," Kazora-san didn't sat down though, and instead took a step towards them, "I would like to have a word in private with you."

"There is no need, I believe I have made my wishes clear enough." She looked at Kazora-san as she stopped smiling.

"Even so, I must insist. Is this truly the best course of action, milady?"

"I believe Takahisa-sama already had a talk with you regarding this matter. When a samurai gives his word, he must see that his vow is never broken. And now, it falls to us to ensure his words are followed upon. I assumed you adhered to the honor code as well, Kazora-

san. What is it that has you speaking against the wishes of both of your leaders?"

I didn't knew Yohime-san could be so scary. She slowly moved some of her hair off her face, giving Kazora-san an angry glare like how Maya-nee does when I get in a fight in school.

"… Nothing but worry towards the outcome of this decision. Shirogane is not qualified to walk this path," He threw another scary gaze at me as he said that.

Why does he hate me that much? I didn't do anything to him… I look down, tightening my lips.

"In that case, you should banish all worry from you, Kazora-san," She said, again calm and kind, "We shall ensure Takeru is comfortable enough here. And you, as a servant of the Koubuin House, will undoubtedly do your best effort in aiding him to familiarize himself to his new lifestyle, I am sure," Again, she made that scary face as she rested her chin on her fingers. Kazora-san stood there for a second, then bowed to her and sat down by Maya-nee's side, "Now then, Takeru?"

"Y-Yes?"

"Considering Kazora-san's fair placed worries… Allow me to ask you one last time. Do you truly wish me to adopt you?"

"… If you don't, I'll end up in an orphanage, right?" She nods, "Then, yes, I do. I promise I'll do my best from now," I couldn't keep my hands quiet as I spoke. I will do my best, but what if I'm still not good enough?

"I see," She then smiled as sweetly as she always does, "Worry not, Takeru. From now on you're one of us. Now then, allow me to first give you an explanation of what you'll have to do from now on. Chamberlain, the papers please."

The other old woman came towards us with some papers. Yohime-san explained to me that people can't just adopt a child because they want to, the rules say the child has to also agree. That's why there's a lot of rules in what the new parents have to do to adopt a kid, just like Uncle Koetsu said, to prevent bad people from ever taking a child with them.

They told me all I had to do was know that Takahisa-san had prepared some papers before he and Dad left with the other samurai, and that when tomorrow someone from the care services would come to talk with me all I had to do was say I wanted to stay here. Yohime-san said she would take care of all the bureaucracy, whatever that is, and then she explained to me what I had to do from now on.

"So I can't go back to my school?"

"No Takeru, you cannot. For the following months, you'll be home schooled here," Yohime-san replied.

"But what about my tests? Or my friends? Can I still go visit them?"

"Hmm… Well, I suppose we could allow you to visit your friends from time to time. However, from now on you'll have to study here. Once we see how good you are and which role we'll bestow you with, we'll assign you to a school after summer vacation."

"I don't get it, what's this about a role?"

"It means you'll be studying in a special school designed to prepare you for your job," Maya-nee said.

"Exactly as Maya said," Yohime-san nodded, "I believe I did tell you that you would become a public servant if you chose to be one of us, did I not?"

"Oh, right. Um… What is a public servant?"

"Someone who serves the Empire. Think of police officers, doctors and teachers," She again smiled sweetly, entwining her fingers together, "It means you will have to work for the good of this nation. Whether it is in a public role or as a member of one of our businesses will be decided after these next months."

"So… After you see how smart I am, you'll tell me what it is that I can do?"

"Precisely. That being said, I suppose… Did you wish to become a Royal Guard in image of your father?"

"Yohime-sama, if I may, I believe Takeru shouldn't-"

"Maya, stand down. This is something Takeru has to decide on his own,"

Why are they getting so upset? I mean… I know the samurai have to fight against the monsters, but…

"Milady, forgive the rudeness, however I do not think it wise to offer Takeru such a position. You should know he is nowhere near the same skill of Mion and Shion," Maya-nee sounded weird, worried and tense but… also scared?

"They are a year older than him, so I do not find the comparison fair," Yohime-san is still calm as always, though, "Regardless, you shall continue to monitor his performance in these days to come."

"The training he'll need to become a Royal Guard is one too harsh for him. Takeru isn't-" I pulled Maya-nee's sleeve and she stopped.

"Maya-nee, I want to be a samurai just like Dad. Why do you not want me to?" Closing her eyes for a second, then she tapped her glasses as she relaxed again.

"I am merely worried about you. No one receives special treatment here, no one will wait for you to catch up. I don't think you're ready."

"But if Dad became a samurai, why can't I?" Her lips moved weirdly for a second again.

"… Being a samurai is not an easy task, Takeru. Are you certain you wish to train to join the Royal Guard?"

… I really don't know. I mean, I know Mion and Shion are smarter and stronger than me. So that means I'll have to study a lot, and a lot of math and history too. But… But Dad could do it, so I can too. And if they give me another of those roles I might not be able to be with Maya-nee anymore… And I don't want that. So… I just have to do my best!

Plucking my lips as I give a nod, my eyes don't leave hers. Maya-nee remains staring at me for a second until she also nods at me, Kazora-san was now giving me an even nastier look. My stomach felt empty and hurt under his glare, but I refused to look down this time.

"Well, I believe Takeru has made his wishes clear enough," Yohime-san said, smiling again, "Now then, it is late already. Maya, take Takeru to his room. He'll have to rise early tomorrow for both this paperwork and his first lessons to adapt to his new home. Takeru, please do rest assured. You're safe with us now," Her eyes softened up as she slightly tilted her head, it somehow… reminds me of Mom's gaze.

I nod and Maya-nee got up, helping me up as well. Kazora-san stayed behind, though. After we gave Yohime-san a bow, we got out of the room and one of the samurai rangers in gray lead us to what was going to be my room from now on.

Still… Yuuhi's house is really big. If I have to live here now I'm gonna get lost. Did Dad spent his days in a place like this? How was it for him, to be a samurai ranger? He never told me anything about that, always said it was a secret, and Takahisa-san also said the same.

Did the others look at Dad with those same scary eyes? Were they also mean to him? Dad… How did you become a samurai? Why did you lose, if all of you were together?

Again feeling as if I had slugs crawling on me, but that were slowly biting needles into me too, my chest gets all cold and tensed up, as if I had ran a lot and had to gasp for air. It's like that poem said, like a fruit of a tree wildly slashed by the wind, falling and rolling away from its roots. I feel like that, like an apple that fell to the street and got crushed by a car.

After walking a lot, we arrive at what they called the dorm area. Though, the place still looks like rest of the house, just with more doors on the sides. It's not like my house, the walls and doors look really thin. My house… will I ever go back there? What about my stuff?

"The third room down this hallway shall be Shirogane's room from now on," The gray samurai that was coming with us said, "The few belongings he brought with him should already be there. I shall be taking my leave here," She gives us a small nod, turning around.

"Well, let's go Takeru," Maya-nee pulls me and we go to my new room.

We slid the door open and enter. It's a bit smaller than my room, there's a futon instead of a bed, a small window in front of us, and a wardrobe like the one back home. The small bag I brought was left on the floor near a wall.

Maya-nee helped me put my clothes in place, and, after getting in my pajamas, she sat on the floor by my side as I got inside the futon. She looks kinda sad, her brows are all tense and wrinkly.

"Maya-nee… Will everything really be alright?" She pats my head softly as her face relaxes.

"Yes, everything will be fine, Takeru. However, do you truly wish to follow in your father's footsteps?"

"Is being a samurai that scary?"

"Well… It is a harsh work. You'll have to follow the rules closely and mind your manners, but above all you'll have to shoulder many responsibilities. You will have to study much if you wish to stay here, but even more if you wish to become a Royal Guard. Also, you should start using that term instead of samurai rangers."

"… Maya-nee, did Dad also have to do the same to become a samurai?"

"I suppose so."

"And…" I grip the edges of the sheets, pursing my lips a bit, "We are gonna be alright? The monsters… aren't coming here soon?"

"Don't worry, we're safe here. Takahisa-sama and his fellows fought bravely so that we can be at ease now."

"… Is Dad really gone then?" Unable to look up, I ask.

She ruffles my hair slowly as she sighs, "Yes, that is the case. But don't be scared, no matter what path you're made to follow I'll be keeping an eye on you from my position. Now, try to sleep as much as you can. I'll come for you in the morning."

"You can't stay with me until I fall asleep?"

"No, I have to go back to my own room and rearrange my belongings as well. Do not worry, you're safe here," She stood up, went to the door and flicked the light switch, "Good night, Takeru."

"… Yes, good night."

As Maya-nee left, I looked at the window from where I was. I can't see much from here, but some light enters from there.

… What will happen from now on? I wonder how hard these new classes will be… Dad, did you also have to go through this? I roll to a side, hugging myself. I inhale slowly through my nose. I can't be scared, everything will be fine… Maya-nee is here, Yohime-san was nice too.

Despite having heard their words and seeing they were saying the truth, some tears still come out. Dad is gone… Just like Mom. Can I do it, Dad? Sniff… What will happen if I fail all the tests?

I cough a few times as if a cloud of dust covered me. Mulling over what may happen as I slowly cried a bit, remembering both Dad's letter and Kazora-san's yells as I rustled under the sheets, I closed my eyes and tried to fall asleep.

Chapter 52: At Square Zero

---

May 23rd. Near 10 AM.

(Guest's Room.)

[Native Takeru]

---

Maya-nee came to wake me up really early today, to have a light breakfast just the two of us. After that she took me to a room that looked like an office where Yohime-san and some other samurais were, and there we waited for a while. When the people from the social offices came, they started asking me a lot of questions but in the end everything was fine.

Yohime-san had to sign a lot of papers, but she told me not to worry. Smiling as always, she said I would keep my last name, something about how nobles can't just adopt common people out of the blue or something. According to her, since Dad was their fellow, whatever that means, I now was also a fellow of them. I don't really understand it well, but it must be like with Uncle Koetsu. People you like become almost like family or something.

After that, Yohime-san said it was time to arrange some important matters and, after we gave her a bow as usual, she left the room along the other samurais. Me and Maya-nee were told to go to another room, since we had to meet someone else now. Yohime-san had said this person would help with these 'important matters'.

"Is this about something bad, Maya-nee?"

Remaining calm as always, she replies, "Nothing of the sort. Someone else has come to meet us, is all."

"Who?"

"I wasn't told. Let us make haste, you have to start your preliminary classes today after all."

I narrowed my eyes at her as we picked up our pace, Maya-nee also doesn't seem to know this time. Which is weird, why wouldn't they tell her who we're meeting with?

Reaching the other office, Maya-nee opens the door and we enter. Inside, a gaze of light blue eyes looked at me as we got in. Sitting on a chair on the right side of a table, the person in question nodded my way after Maya-nee closed the door and came to our side, giving us a bow.

"Good morning, Tsukuyomi. As punctual as ever."

"… Yoroi-san. Are you the one who has come to speak with us?"

"Yes, that's right. Yohime-sama asked me to… gather some intel regarding the little boy. Do not worry, I am not going to be pressuring him much."

I peeked from behind Maya-nee, staring at the smile of the woman. She's weird, everybody else is really stiff when talking with Maya-nee but she's really calm now.

"Well, let's start," Maya-nee moves to sit down while I follow her, as the woman also returned to her chair. Then, after tapping her glasses, she looks at me, "Takeru, this person here is Yoroi Koume-san. Do be honest with your answers."

Yoroi-san gave me a smile and a nod, "Good morning, Shirogane. I am Koume Yoroi, it is good to meet you."

Her short cyan hair slowly moved, letting the lone, long strand of hair on her left side to dangle down her shoulder. Wearing a business attire similar to those people that appear on TV but in pale blue, the rather petite woman kept smiling as she looked at me.

"Good morning, Koume-san. But my name is Takeru, don't call me Shirogane,"

She giggled at me, I puffed my cheeks a bit. What's with her? "I was told of this preference of yours… It is intriguing, to think you'd allow this, Tsukuyomi."

"Sigh… I have tried to mend his rudeness, alas he refuses to change his ways," I pluck my lips at Maya-nee as she again gives me a rather worried glance.

"So… What did you want to talk about, Koume-san?" I look back at Yoroi-san, who again smiled at me while she giggled.

"Don't worry, I'm merely going to inquire about your life for a moment."

"… Okay. So, are you a samurai too?"

"Samurai?" She said, looking a bit confused.

"Takeru refers to the Royal Guards with that word," Maya-nee stated, tapping her glasses again.

"Oh, I see. Sadly, I am not a samurai. I am… someone more suited to work in the backrow," She then made a rather weird grin, a hand going to her lone, long strand of hair.

"Backrow? Like the pieces of Shogi?"

"Ahaha… Well, something of the sort. I am good at… catching people by surprise."

Maya-nee now looked rather serious, a hand on her chin. It's really weird, she's usually so cold but this time she's keeping quiet. Who is Koume-san? What does she do in the 'backrow'?

"Well, as I said before, I came here to ask you some questions, Takeru," Koume-san leaned onto the table, locking her fingers together, "First, allow me to ask, would you be interested in going to live with your grandparents?"

Eh? They… But they said that… Feeling a shiver on my knees, I remained quiet for a moment as I looked down.

"But… But Uncle Koetsu said they didn't want to be with me."

"Yes, that was the case. However, it seems they somehow found out about… your father having joined the Royal Guard," Koume-san narrowed her eyes, twisting the edge of her lips.

As she heard the words, Maya-nee's nose got full of wrinkles for a second, almost closing her eyes as she made a small groan. I don't get it, what has that to do with anything?

"So, due to the new laws passed some years ago, you can refuse to go with your family now that they refused to take you in before. However, the decision is yours. What would you like to do?" Koume-san asked, tilting her head.

"No, I'm staying here," I then hugged Maya-nee's arm, really tightly. She moved a bit, somehow surprised at my fast reply.

"I see… Well, that's it with that, I guess," Koume-san leaned back into her seat, sighing.

Maya-nee looked at me, back to the usual calm face, but said nothing, "Ahem… Yoroi-san, what other matters did you wish to discuss?"

"Let's see… There are some questions I wanted to ask you two, regarding Takeru's acquaintances."

She then asked us of who we were friends with on Hiiragi, so that she could explain my situation to them and the school once I get 'officially' adopted.

"Yoroi-san, might I propose a suggestion?" Maya-nee said as I finished telling Koume-san of my last week back home.

"Hm? What is it?"

"Would it be possible to place Takeru under the training program of the Tsukuyomi House, reporting it as an early induction due to his circumstances?"

Huh? Training… as part of her house? As if… we really were family?

"… Why do you wish to do so, Tsukuyomi?"

"Considering our… losses from a few years back, the Tsukuyomi House has been looking for recruits to train as guardians for our Security Forces," Losses? Did they also fight the monsters some years ago? "If Takeru were inducted, it wouldn't be far off for him to be appointed to our House as our protegee. This would also allow him to retain his surname without arising suspicions, which would make your work easier, would it not?"

"Maya-nee, didn't Yohime-san said she was going to adopt me? That I was one of you already?"

"Yes, that is the case. However, we must present the papers in the right way to not cause her unnecessary trouble, Takeru."

"… I don't get it. Will I be part of your family then?" I grab her arm a bit tighter, feeling a few feathers tickle my sides when she gives me a faint nod.

"Well… It is a possibility that's available to us, is all I'm saying," She taps her glasses, trying to sound composed again.

"Ahaha, worry not," Yoroi-san waved a hand as if she were one of those small cat toys that seem to bring good luck, directing a nod to

Maya-nee, "We will take care of this, Takeru. So Tsukuyomi, may I hear your thoughts on this matter?"

Maya-nee nods and lets some air out, shifting in her seat a bit, "Perhaps, this whole affair should instead be filed as an early induction without any sort of hidden meanings. His father having perished under service to our House and his family refusing to take custody of Takeru, instead of being sent to an orphanage the House offers to take care of him under our own training program, since he is the son of one of our fellows. That is not unheard of, albeit rare. Even more so for a commoner. However, I believe it would be the best course of action, to not burden Yohime-sama or your fellows."

"Maya-nee, would Yohime-san get in trouble for adopting me, then?" If I'm giving them problems… Maybe this isn't a good idea.

But then she shakes her head, patting mine softly, "Nothing of the sort, this is no trouble. However, should we arrange your situation in this way so that you fall under the Tsukuyomi House's care. It might not seem too different from your eyes, but it is easier to manage the papers for us if we proceed in this way. Are you… against it, perhaps?"

"Of course not! I'd love to be part of your family," I hug her arm really tight. "But why is it easier?"

"… Let's simply say it is easier to justify you becoming a samurai if you join the Tsukuyomi House," She said, not wanting to speak more.

I still don't get it, but I'm really, really happy. So I'll be really part of her family from now on… I feel my chest flaring up, like when her or Dad praised my test scores, the cold slugs all over me running away, leaving only the feathers around.

"This would mean we still need to report his stay here as him being a recruit after the paperwork is filed," Koume-san said as she looked at some papers she had on her, "Are you certain he will meet the requirements to be inducted into the Royal Guard?"

"… Takeru made his voice clear as the sky. You can speak with Father if you wish to hear his opinion on the matter. In any case, it would be less troublesome for us if we presented the matter in this way, provided Takeru does manage to meet the expectations desired of a Royal Guard trainee."

"I am going to!" I puffs my cheeks as I tug at her arm. Maya-nee sighs again as she looks at me.

"In any case, Takeru, is there anything you would like to bring from your house in Hiiragi here?" Koume-san asks as she rests her chin on a hand.

"Hmm… My book about poetry, some of my toys, and a picture of Mom and Dad. By the way, am I going to visit my home soon? Can I see my friends over there?"

"… After you finish your tests, I suppose," She smiles slowly, the softness of a spring breeze reflected in her words, "Now then, allow me to inquire about your studies in your past school. How has he been faring so far?"

Then, we tell her of my daily routine back home in detail along the last tests I took. Koume-san doesn't seem to be a bad person, she doesn't have those scary eyes or that harsh tone in her voice. Still, Maya-nee remains as serious as before. Koume-san then asks me about our Kendo lessons, and I tell her of the stances Maya-nee taught me and what we did when I came to the dojo here.

"It is good to see he has confidence in himself. It is such a shame we don't have any free time…" She looked down, almost closing her eyes, looking as sad as a dog looking at an empty bowl.

"Hm? Is something the matter, Yoroi-san?" Maya-nee asks.

"Oh, nothing much. You know, my husband always wanted to have a boy…" She smiled wryly, running a hand over her hair as she looked down.

"Do you have kids, Koume-san?" Maybe we could be friends if she does.

Her smile waned, her hand seemed to slightly tighten it's hold over her hair, "Well, yes. But regardless of that, I have one last question for you, Takeru. If you don't manage to become a Royal Guard, which path will you-"

"I will become a samurai," I narrowed his brows at her, letting my tone be like Maya-nee when she gets upset.

How was it that the book said? A small pebble soon to become an avalanche tumbling down if she says I won't, that's how I tried to sound.

"… I see. I do wish you good luck, Takeru," But she smiled back, not intimidated at all.

Maybe I should have tapped my brows like Maya-nee does with her glasses… That always work with the bullies back at school.

"Tsukuyomi, I'll come meet with you once the papers are properly arranged. I shall be contacting you for advice on how to file this induction if it happens. However, I do not know whether I will come back to bring the papers, so do expect my husband to come deliver them."

Husband? I wonder what kind of person he is. Maya-nee… tensed her brows and lips. She doesn't like him.

"… Is there no way you can deliver them yourself, Yoroi-san?"

"My, Tsukuyomi. It sounds as if you didn't want to meet Sakon for some reason," Her smiled curved like a moon, giggling for a while.

"I merely have trouble dealing with him," Maya-nee taps her glasses, sending a sharp gaze at Koume-san.

"I do know he can be hard to understand from time to time, but please be patient with him. Well, I have to be going. Takeru, good luck in your trainings," Yoroi-san came closer and offered me a hand.

I softly grabbed it and then shook it with my usual spirit, "Yes, thank you. See you later, Koume-san."

"See you later to you too. Tsukuyomi, we shall be seeing each other in due time," She gives us a bow and then we exit the room.

Yoroi-san goes into the hallway to our left, towards the gate, while Maya-nee took me to another hallway.

"… Maya-nee," I pull her sleeve as we walked.

"What is it?"

"What is this about papers? Is it really that much work?"

"We need to present the right papers to send you to your new school, regardless of whether you become a Royal Guard trainee or not."

"Okay. So, why did Koume-san come to ask me so many questions? What is that backrow she said she was?"

"Do not worry about those matters, Takeru," Mmgh… She closed her eyes and looked forward, making her fringe move a bit, "We told you before, this is to properly explain your past school of your situation. We have to follow the regulations, otherwise this will only cause us trouble."

"Hmm… I see," I don't buy it.

"In any case, there is something I want to ask you," I look up at her, unlike how she usually is Maya-nee delayed her question for a second, "Are you certain you do not wish to meet your grandparents? You might never get another chance to do so."

"… They weren't there for Mom and Dad, so I don't want to see them," I tightened my hold on her hand as I puffed one of my cheeks. "And I'm with you now, so I'm not sad anymore," Relaxing a bit, I leaned on her arm.

Smiling as we walked, I slowly took some breaths as I calmed down. Maya-nee seemed to be smiling a bit, until she realized I was looking at her.

"… In any case, let us make haste to your classroom. We have to give you the customary explanation."

"I see. Say Maya-nee, am I really gonna be part of your family if I become a Royal Guard?"

"Well… One could say that you'll formally be recognized as our protegee, just like how you were these two years."

"… I don't get it."

"Well, don't worry. Simply focus on what you can do now. Let us make haste, your classes should start soon," I nod and we start walking a bit faster.

She then guided me around the house, showing me where the baths were, where the dining room was, how to get to the backyard and garden, reminding me I couldn't play or break anything here now as I groaned back at her, and then we returned to the room we'll use as a classroom.

"Well then, Takeru. I have to attend to some matters, so I will leave you with the professors here. Do behave as you should."

"I know," She then pats my head before leaving.

I sit where the books were put on a table, an old woman dressed similarly to Maya-nee then entered the room.

I wonder how this will go… But I have to pass these tests too. I coil my fists for a second, breathing deeply. Remembering Mom and Dad for a second, pursing my lips really hard, I opened my eyes and looked at my new teacher.

"Well… I shall be your teacher in math and arithmetic for these coming months. Shirogane, how far were you in your classes?" She seems nice, at the least. But, she does teach math.

"Um… We were doing stuff with fractions and some graphs."

"Can you show me?" I open a notebook and start making one of the last problems from the last test. The teacher grasps her chin, her eyes growing smaller, "I see, it seems you're far behind than what I expected. What are they doing in the commoner's schools anymore…" She then shakes her head and sighs, seemed to be really bummed for some reason.

"So, what are we going to be doing today, Sensei?"

"Do you know what the words sine, cosine and tangent mean?"

"No."

"Well… Looks like this will be a tall ordeal. Open that red textbook on page thirty four."

---

One very long, and painful, math class later…

---

"I suppose this is all we can do for today. I recommend you practice on your free time."

"… Yes."

I hate this. What is this even? We were making some stuff with one or two letters back in school, to try to see what number X was, but this is nuts. I wanna dive under a pillow and cry, these problems are too hard! Who even thought about this?! Stupid math, stupid equations…

"Ahem…" The teacher placed her books under an arm, looking at me, "I know this might be too hard for you, Shirogane. However, let me tell you that this wasn't what the other young heirs are seeing. You're still far behind them, so if you wish to become a Royal Guard you'd be well served in polishing your knowledge."

At least she had patience with me, unlike the teachers back in school. Yeah, she wasn't a scary teacher.

"Yes, Sensei. Um… Why does everything have to do with math?"

She narrowed her eyes a bit before answering, "Well, most, if not all, of our endeavors are reliant on mathematical operations. Let me give you an example you'll understand, when you go buy groceries you need to know how much money you can spend, do you not?"

"Yes, that's right."

"Then, when you buy clothes, books, silverware, you also must know how much they cost to see whether you can afford them," I nod, "You also need to know how much of a certain ingredient you use when cooking as well, am I right?" I nod again, "So as you can see, numbers surround our everyday life. And to make sure everything regarding this House is kept functioning, we need to have our numbers polished. Once you learn more, you'll see how important it is to be well versed in math. I was not told about your situation in much detail, but you'd do well in doing an earnest effort to bridge this gap in knowledge you're facing."

"So I just gotta study hard, right?"

"No, just reading won't be enough. To properly gain the knowledge you study, to properly apprehend these concepts, much practice is required on your end. Let's see how you progress these next days first, however. Well then, I shall take my leave here."

"Okay… Um, thank you very much for your help, Sensei," I give her a bow like how Maya-nee taught me to. She briefly smiles before saying her goodbyes and leaving.

Is Maya-nee coming now? I'm kinda hungry… Two hours of math, this was a lot. Did Dad also had to do this when he became a samurai? How did he learn all of this?

… And despite knowing this hard stuff, they still lost. Even if I want to, I can't ask him anything anymore… What went wrong? Dad… wouldn't break a promise so easily. I wonder if I could learn how to always win if I'm good at math.

… But studying alone is really hard. Will my classmates be nice? Or, will they be like Kazora-san? I wonder how they manage to understand all these things…

Imagine Sumika trying to solve this. Jouji would rip the paper in half as he screams or something! Heh, of course they'd do something like that. This is so nuts, after all.

"… How are they now?" Did Sumika try to visit me? How will they be when they find out I'm not going back?

… They won't forget about me, right? We're still going to be friends, right? I rest onto the desk, burying my face into my arms.

After a short while, another teacher came into the room. This one was a short man who was wearing glasses and a black suit with a tie like those people that sometimes appear on TV giving those really long speeches that Maya-nee hates. I stood up and gave him a bow, he nodded at me.

"Good afternoon, Shirogane. I will be your teacher in your classes of Civic Education."

"Civic… What is that?"

"You never had Civic Ed classes before? Were you never taught how the Parliament works, about our laws and such?" The man tapped his glasses and his voice sounded as if he was trying to scare away a stray dog.

"Hmm… Do you mean Social Studies maybe?"

The man furrowed his brows and then asked me to tell him what I knew of that. He didn't seem very happy about it.

"Sigh… What have I done to be put on this position, Yohime-sama…"

"What's wrong, Sensei?"

"… Nothing. Open that cyan book, we'll have to start from the beginning. I hope you behave as you should, we have much to cover it seems."

"Um, can I get something to drink? I didn't have a break during math class."

"No, you'll get your break after this class is done with." Eh?! But… How long will this class be? What if it's another two hours? "Now then, let's start."

---

Same Day. Around 6 PM.

(Hallway.)

---

"It was really hard! They only gave me twenty minutes to rest too."

"I did tell you the regime was going to be severe," Maya-nee said as we went to the dojo, "What did you think of your classes?"

"I hadn't seen anything of what they showed me today. It's all really hard to understand."

"… If you do not wish to continue under this course, you can simply say so Takeru. You don't have to force yourself if this is too much for you."

"But then I won't become a samurai. It's really hard… But I'll do my best!"

Maya-nee looks at me for a moment as she stops, then she sighs, "You do not need to force yourself. The same applies for the lessons in the dojo. Don't push yourself needlessly."

"I'll be fine. I won't give up," Dad told me to do my best so I can't get down so easily. And… if I give up, I may end up alone.

I don't want that to happen, not when I might really be a part of your family from now on. I would like to talk with Sumika and the rest… I don't want to stop being friends with them… But… I guess I just gotta study until I pass these tests, and then I can call them or something.

Once we arrive at the dojo and enter, I see Mion and Shion were already here. Kazora-san was here too, he came towards us as we entered.

"Welcome. Maya, the girls are ready to train. I shall leave them under your guidance."

"Huh? What about Takeru, Father?"

"I shall look over his efforts myself," He said as he gave me another of those scary looks.

"Father, I am Takeru's-"

"Not anymore, Maya. You're no longer a retainer of his now that he has joined us. He's but another servant, and no one deserves special treatment. Shirogane, you'll come with me to the other end of the dojo after you've changed into the gear. Maya, I leave the little ones to you."

Maya-nee pursed her lips as she looked at her Dad, she then looked at me for a while and then gave a nod.

"Takeru, do as Father says. No getting angry."

"I know, Maya-nee," I puff my cheeks, you always tell me the same whenever we come here.

I go to the changing room and put on the arm and leg guard. Once I get out, I saw Maya-nee watching over the Pickles as they begin to practice. Keeping an eye on their duel, Kazora-san, who was already in the armor too, approaches me.

"So… What are we going to do, Kazora-san?"

"It's Tsukuyomi-sensei for you, Shirogane. How many times do I have to tell you?"

"But your name is Kazora… If I called all of you Tsukuyomi you won't know who I'm talking to."

"I believe you were told you had to cease this foul habit of speaking back you have. You shall refer to me as Tsukuyomi-sensei while we're here. Now, take your stance," He took some steps away, getting his pose done.

What did I do to him? Why does he hate me so much? Back home too, he was awful to me and Maya-nee. He's horrible, I don't like him. Taking some steps back, I do the pose Maya-nee always taught me to use.

"Are you ready, Shirogane?"

"Yes!" I said as I tensed my feet to charge forward.

He blocked my attacks without problem, even when I took that step back Maya-nee told me to do sometimes. Coming forward and doing two swings at me, I barely manage to block them somehow.

He keeps advancing, doing just a few swings. Forced to keep going back and back, I can't stop him. He then did a rising slash at me, sending my sword away like Maya-nee always does. I again end up sitting on the floor.

"… So this is all you can do? You think you can become a Royal Guard with this meager skill?"

"I just have to keep practicing!" I say as I stand up and go look for my sword. I return to face him, taking my pose again.

"That won't be enough. Mere effort cannot bridge the lack of talent."

"Then… Then I'll keep doing my best."

"Sigh… Shirogane, perhaps you don't realize it yet, but you don't have the time."

"Huh? Time? Why do I need a watch to be a samurai?"

He shook his head again, another bothered gaze coming my way, "No, I was not speaking about a watch," His tone sounded like Maya-nee when she scolds me. He relaxes his pose, bringing his sword to one of his shoulders, "You see, you have until the end of June to show us where your talents lie. If by then you're not deemed worthy, you shall be sent to a school where you can hone whatever skill you possess. So, if that happens, you'll never become a Royal Guard."

"Eh?! But… But that's just a month away!"

"Precisely. I suggest you give up on this futile dream of yours. I can see you're nowhere near the skill necessary to become a Guard from this one bout. It would be more productive for you to focus on learning something that is in alignment with your natural talents, something that will aid you more in the future. As is, you're just wasting our time here," Again, his tone got all serious and cold.

… I know that I'm not that good. But I wanna fight like Dad, I want to be like him. And… And I don't want to leave either, I want to stay with Maya-nee, Yuuhi, and the Pickles. I'm not going to give up just because you tell me to, dummy old man.

Puffing my cheeks, taking my pose again and pointing my sword at him, that makes him shake his head again. Then, Kazora-san takes a different pose now, similar to the one Maya-nee showed me once with the sword above the shoulder.

This time, he attacked faster than before. It was like when Shion is on a bad mood. I'm just holding my blade tightly and planting my heels firmly on the ground. My hands start to hurt a lot just from parrying the swings.

But… If he's like Shion… He'll take the step back in just a while! Then, as I watched his attacks while barely parrying them, I saw that he was moving for a downwards swing. I parried it, almost tripping backwards, then he took the step back. But I could tell he was going to and I kept pushing forward, taking one step and swinging my sword at him with all I had. But then…

SWISH!

He reacted super fast and sent my sword flying again, making me fall backwards.

"Hmph… You fell right into my trap. You can't even tell when an opponent is baiting you."

I stared back at him as I got up, frowning. I did my best… It's not my fault you're already so good… You're not like Maya-nee, you're just beating me up. You're no different than the school bullies.

"Father, I do not think this will bear any fruits," Maya-nee got closer and helped me get up, "Takeru, are you unhurt?"

"… Yeah, I'm fine."

"Father, this is not what you were supposed to do. He's learning nothing from this."

"He's learning how much skill he lacks. I am the one who'll oversee his training for this month. Stand back, Maya. Shirogane, go pick up your sword."

"Father, please. What do you-"

"Maya, Mion and Shion are waiting. Leave him to me, that's an order. Do not forget, I am the Head of the Tsukuyomi House as of now. My orders are absolute," He sounded really scary, Maya-nee gave me one look and went back to the other two, that were also looking towards us. But they didn't say anything. "Shirogane, waste no more time and go for your sword!" Why do you scream at me? I didn't… You're…

"You're… You're…"

"What? Speak up, kid. I cannot hear you. What is it?!"

"You're just a bully! You're not teaching me anything!"

"Oho, so that's what you think. Clearly, you are not made to be a Guard."

"Why are you so mean? Were you like this with Dad too?!" His hand moved weirdly for a second. Looking up, once more he put his sword on his shoulder.

"… You're as uneducated as him, as well. Do you think that you'll become a good Royal Guard by shouting in this manner? Or, have you given up on the practice?"

"Uuh… I'm not giving up!"

"Then, go for your sword. I want no more whining from you until you can assess a hit at me!"

I bit my lips as I went for my sword, groaning much. Taking my pose once I got back, this time going for quick attacks to finally hit him once.

In the end, I couldn't hit him once. He kept winning in no time, sending me to the ground and my sword away. Always saying I was never going to be a samurai, that I wasn't good enough. I'll show you that I can be a samurai too… I'm gonna beat you one of these days, just like how I beat the bad boys in school.

"Well Maya, take the girls to the dining room," Kazora-san said as I remained hunched over, my mouth open as I gasped for air.

"… What about Takeru, Father? Surely you are not planning to continue to practice with how exhausted he is."

"Perish the thought," He said as he again looked my way, another serious expression in his face, "I merely wish to have a small talk with him. On your way, you three. We shall join you in a moment."

Maya-nee and the Pickles looked at me for a second, but then they bowed to Kazora-san and went into their changing room. Wiping the sweat of my forehead, I walked towards my changing room, with Kazora-san following behind. Entering the room, dropping myself onto a chair and gasping for a little while, I then started to slowly take off the armor pieces I had on.

"Allow me to aid you in getting off your gear, Shirogane," He got closer and helped me take off the shoulder gear, and removed the lock so that I could also take the leg protection without much trouble.

"… Thanks, Kazora-san."

"It's Tsukuyomi-sensei, Shirogane," He said, groaning a bit, as he started to take off his gear too.

"Why are you always so mean with me? What did I do to you?"

"I am not being hostile to you because I enjoy it. If you wish to become a Royal Guard, you need to learn to hoist our values, to follow our code. And if you cannot show a sliver of respect towards your tutors, you will never become a samurai," His eyes grew smaller, sharper and scary, his tone was even rougher than before.

"… Then, what do I have to do to get better?"

"It's not a matter of being 'better' or 'worse'. There are signs in your conduct that show you are not fit to walk this path."

"What? If you don't tell me what I do wrong I'll never get better. Aren't you supposed to be my teacher?"

"… And yet, you refuse to even refer to me as one," He shook his head, sighing really, really heavily. Like when me and Maya-nee made it out of the super during the days with discounts, "However, you bring up a fair point. Let us discuss my impressions of today's training before dinner."

Having finished changing into my clothes, we both got out of the changing room. Kazora-san told Maya-nee to go ahead again, I waved at the Pickles as they left. All three of them were looking at Kazora-san like how I look at Jouji after he gets in trouble, or when he falls down the games at the park.

I sat on the floor as he sat in front of me, twirling his beard for a while as he groaned. I rub my arms as I wait, they hurt a little after training so much. Are all of them that good? Were they always holding back on me? How did Dad…

"Um… Kazora-san?"

"What is it?"

"Do you know how… how was Dad's life when he was a samurai?"

Letting both of his hands rest on his lap, he closes his eyes, "Your father… Kageyuki Shirogane was a rather… unorthodox member of our Guards."

"What does unorthodox mean?"

"… That he did not match what was expected of a Royal Guard, even less a member of our private squadron. Your father was very much like you, despite his efforts he could not show the proper respect to the authorities."

"He also called you Kazora-san?"

"No, he wasn't as rude as you," And again, he gives me another nasty scary glare, "However, one could not deny that he was both skilled and loyal. Your father was a very hardworking person, and he was as honest as a fellow can be. For that reason, he was allowed to join our ranks and become our fellow."

"And did he also have to learn all this complicated stuff to be a samurai?"

"Royal Guard is the proper term, Shirogane," He crosses his arms, making another scary gaze again, "… In any case, yes, he also had to partake in many trials to demonstrate his abilities. And even before his induction, he had to train very harshly to become a soldier."

"… Was he strong?"

"Yes. Even if 'strength' is not the most appropriate word to describe it, he was a very skilled soldier, in and out of the battlefield. Despite his fruitless efforts to learn Keigo and poise, he was indeed a fine Royal Guard."

"Then… W-Why did he lose?"

"Sometimes… No, most times victory cannot be obtained without sacrifices."

"And why did Dad have to… to die?"

Why are the monsters even attacking us? What did we do to them? Biting my lips as I sniff, trying not to cry, I look down and make tight fists with my hands, remembering the letter Dad left me.

"… Your father was not the only one who perished. Takahisa-sama, along most of his squadron, fell on the last battle."

"Huh? Takahisa-san… died too? But… But he was really strong! How… How could he lose too?"

He always won in the Shogi matches we played when he was home during my visits, and I still remember how he defeated Maya-nee really fast in a kendo duel once, and how scared Dad was when Takahisa-san joked about facing him after that. How… How did he lose? It's a lie, isn't it? Kazora-san is… just trying to scare me.

"Indeed, tis is truly a tragedy," Kazora-san looks down, his forehead getting all wrinkly as he closed his eyes really tightly.… He wasn't lying, "Such is the reason for why we must continue to hone ourselves, especially now that our Lord Regent has passed away. That is why our Royal Guards must be the best of the best, elites within the elites. And is the reason why I do not believe you should pursue this path, Shirogane."

"Why? Dad… Dad told me to do my best, and I don't… I don't…" I don't want to end up alone. I don't care if he thinks I'm not good enough, I'll show him I can be a good samurai just like Dad was!

"It's not merely about effort. I do not think this to be a wise idea, considering your attitude."

"But you're not even giving me a chance, you're always screaming at me. You're not a good teacher," I puff my cheeks and fold my arms, looking away from him.

He remains looking at me as I furrow my brows, stroking his mustache again. Kazora-san then looks up, his face losing all wrinkles, "Shirogane, has Maya taught you what meditation is?"

"Meditation? She told me to do that whenever I get angry at school."

"And do you effectively practice it?"

"Well… Not really. I end up asleep when I do."

"… I suppose relaxation is another path to clearing one's inner clouds," He nods a few times, eyes closed as he keeps stroking his mustache, "Has Maya told you why meditation is of such importance to a Royal Guard?"

"No? Do samurai need to meditate a lot?"

"Sigh… Royal Guards, Shirogane. Use the proper term."

"You don't call me Takeru, so I'll keep calling them samurai."

It's unfair. Why do you get to call me however you want, but I can't keep calling the samurai like that?

He puts a finger between his brows, massaging them slowly, "Well then, I suppose I could teach you the reasoning behind my actions. Shirogane, what did you think of today's practice?"

"Huh?" What has this to do with meditation? "You kept beating me up, and I couldn't even counter you."

"And what did you do in front of such adversity?"

"… I did my best to fight back and failed," I puff my cheeks, looking down. I'm sure he'll start saying I'm bad, that I can't do it, that-

"And how did you fight back?" He looks back at me, kind of like how Maya-nee did when she helped me with my history homework.

"With all I had."

"No, that's not… One could say you fought back with aggression, did you not?"

"… Yeah."

"And, did I ever fall to such aggressiveness while we sparred?"

"You did keep beating me up, so yes."

He narrows his eyes at me, "I never returned a strong swing, did I? I was not using my full strength on you. Do you know why that is?"

"Because you would have hurt me?"

"Indeed. A Royal Guard must remain calm during active duty. Meditation aids the mind and body, it then reflects in all endeavors one pursues during the day. You lack calmness, Shirogane. Skill and knowledge can be obtained through practice and repetition, but if you yourself do not change your ways, you shan't be allowed to join our ranks."

"So I just have to stay calm?"

"No, that alone isn't enough. It's a way of living, a way of conducting oneself."

"I don't get it. Do I have to meditate all day long, then?"

"Well… Allow me to tell you of the code we of the Imperial Royal Guard follow. Ponder these words tonight and the coming days, if you still insist on pursuing the path of the warrior. Ahem…"

Kazora-san cleared his throat and inhaled for a while, eyes closed. I gulped and also inhaled deeply, waiting for his words. If this helps me be a samurai, if Dad also went through this… Then, I have to learn this code and why being calm is so important. Kazora-san opened his eyes slowly, and, rising his chin a bit he looked towards me, he started to talk.

"Within the warrior, only two roads are seen. The just and the unjust ones. Nurture your own honor, to never lose your path.

Within the warrior, dread must not make nest. Nurture your own valor, to luster your life and mind.

Within the warrior, selflessness must flourish. Nurture your own compassion, to be your fellows' guiding light.

Within the warrior, there is no place for vainglory. Nurture your own poise, for your acts are a mirror of your values.

Within the warrior, there is only place for truth. Nurture your own honesty, for one's word should be followed by one's actions.

Within the warrior, there is no need for masks. Nurture your own judgment, for your name shall be forever tarnished should you betray your honor.

Within the warrior, no hesitation is shown upon conflict. For you are a blade and a shield, guardian of your fellows.

A warrior ends all struggles swiftly, to the ultimate consequences. We, the Royal Guard, are those who protect the Empire's peace.

Reject fear, for you have a road to follow.

Reject passion, for you have a duty to uphold.

Reject hesitation, for you have a vow to protect.

Reject vanity, for you need no further honors.

Embrace death, to free yourself from your shackles."

He then closed his eyes again and inhaled deeply, exhaling through his mouth.

Furrowing my brows as I plucked my lips, groaning a bit, I can't make heads or tails of what he said. I don't get it… What's with all those weird words? But… But…

"Kazora-san, why does that poem say that we have to hug death? That's… horrible. I want to live and I don't want anyone to die."

"No, it isn't to be taken literally Shirogane. But let us discuss this on the way to the dining room, we have stayed for too long here," He stood up and I followed behind him as we left the dojo, "So… Regarding the poem…"

"Yes? Why does it say death is a good thing?"

"… It does not mean that. You see, if you fear death, you will be frozen when it is time to act. However, if you restrain your fear, if you accept death is an inevitability, you will be able to fight and move without anything holding you back. The meaning of that line is to release yourself from anything that might impair your actions. We of the Royal Guard are servants of the Empire and our own individual lives matter little when compared to the nation as a whole."

"That's… sad. Your life does matter, Kazora-san."

"I never said it didn't. However…" He sighs as he starts walking slower, his hands going from being relaxed into a fist, "A warrior must never waver, not even in the face of death. I am sure your father also mastered this teaching."

"Huh? Dad did? But… But he never told me anything as sad as this!"

"Ponder it for a moment," He looked back at me, raising a finger upwards. "Your father must certainly being fearful during this battle with the monsters. He must have wanted to survive to see you once more. If he had succumbed to fear, the fight might have been lost. But he chose to be brave, to see beyond his own selfish wishes, to do what would be better not only for you but for his fellows. As Yohime-sama said, even if he perished your father managed to secure the greatest victory he could achieve, for you are still alive and healthy."

"… But he's gone now."

"As true as that might be… You were something worth protecting. We of the Royal Guard see the Empire and all its citizens as what must be protected at all costs, and so, we must be steadfast to not lose sight of what must be done. If you wish to become a Royal Guard, someday you might face a battle similar to the one your father was in."

"But that doesn't mean I want anyone to go away," I look down, shivering as I feel again as if someone was throwing snowballs at me.

"However… If you could save Maya, Shion and Mion… Would you fight with all you have?"

"Yeah! I don't want to see them hurt."

"Then, you should meditate on the words of the code. When you're serene, calm and in peace you will find your own answer to the struggles you will face. Only when you control your fears and emotions, only then you will truly be able call yourself a Royal Guard. Shion also suffers from this problem, even if your stance is far more rougher than hers."

"So… I need to be calm when we fight?"

"Yes, and you also must not lose heart on your studies. Letting seeds of anger sow in your heart will only hurt your performance."

I see… So it's like what Maya-nee said once, I can't keep getting angry at everything I don't understand. Dad… Dad could do it. And Mom asked me… to be good with others too.

Kazora-san… isn't so bad after all. He might be scary like how Maya-nee was during our first days, but he is trying to teach me this poem. Even if I still don't agree with it. Dying is… not nice. Nobody should tell you to not care about you, that's just horrible. Even if Dad kept fighting, there must have been a way to win without him having to die. And what about Takahisa-san? If he was also there, how did they lose?

"Kazora-san, was Takahisa-san also fighting with Dad?"

"… Yes, that is the case."

"Then, how did they lose? He was so strong and smart, Takahisa-san was so awesome I don't see him losing a fight."

Kazora-san stops walking and looks back at me, his brows almost touching as it looked like he was cutting onions, "One could say it's… a matter of numbers."

"Why does everything have to do with math?"

"No, it's not… Ahem, allow me to use this as an example. Let's say we are playing Shogi," I nod, "But then, instead of using the usual amount, I am allowed to use double the amount of pieces in the game."

"You can't do that, it's cheating."

"But I can. Then, you'd be at a disadvantage, wouldn't you?"

"Of course! How can I win if you have so many more pieces?"

"And that… is what might happen sometimes. The enemy won't hesitate to… cheat if it gives them victory."

"Then, why don't you call them out on it?"

"They won't listen, Shirogane. Did the bullies in your school listen when you told them to stop harassing you?"

"… No, I had to punch them to make them stop."

"And it is a similar state, this fight. They won't stop, so we cannot remain idle. And sometimes… people will have to die to give us victory, just like how you sometimes need to sacrifice a piece to win a round of Shogi. If you believe this to be cruel… then you should not become a Royal Guard," He then started walking again, faster than before.

… So the monsters are like bullies. And… And then people have to go away because of them. Maybe that's why they're being so harsh on me? To make the new samurais better than the older ones? Then… Then, if I get strong enough, I can fight without letting anyone getting hurt, right?

My hands shake a little, thinking on what Dad had to do. If even Takahisa-san lost… then, what can we do?

"Kazora-san, do you think we're safe from the monsters?"

"Yes, worry not Shirogane. Takahisa-sama made sure the Empire remains safe."

"T-Then… Nobody has to go and fight with them for now, right?"

He stops walking again, looking my way as his lips twist a bit, "Worry not. We are safe and sound, and no one will be called to battle for the foreseeable future. You can all train safely, so that we may one day protect our home together if the need calls," His eyes look still scary, but they have a small light, like Dad when he said his goodbyes, as he gave me a nod.

So… we can still train and get better. But if I don't become a samurai, I won't be able to be with them or even fight. I gulp as my neck feels all tight and cramped, I don't know how I can get better by just being calm but I have to try. And…

And I want to help out. If Dad helped Takahisa-san, then I can help out too. Maybe then nobody will have to give hugs to death anymore.

But what happens if I fail? I don't know, but I'll never be a samurai like Dad, and then I won't be able to stay with Maya-nee, Mion and Shion. I know I'm not that good…

But… But I have to keep trying. Even if Kazora-san is really scary, even if this new lessons are really hard… I can do it, right?

When we arrived at the dining room, the food was just about to be served. We gave them a bow, and Yohime-san welcomed us, telling us to sit down. Kazora-san sat near Maya-nee, while I sat on the other side of the table, between Mion and Yuuhi. As I did, the old woman that's always near her sent me another of those scary glares.

"Takeru, are you alright?" Mion said as I sat down.

"Yes… I'm fine."

"Father wasn't too harsh with you?" Shion pursed her lips as she leaned on the table, "Don't let his words get you down, Takeru. You had no chance against him, so it's obvious you were going to lose today."

"But if I don't get better in a month I'll never be a samurai."

"Hm? Why is that?" Mion tilted her head as she heard me.

"Kazora-san said I have one month until the adults decide to which school they'll send me after summer," I puff my cheeks as I look down.

"Children, please be silent on the table," The old woman that's always around Yohime-san said as she served our food, giving me a nasty look.

It smells really nice… How do they make the food like this? I grab my chopsticks and, after waiting for Yohime-san to start, we all began to eat.

Hmm… The rice is so nice! It's firm, but I can still taste the spices in it. Though… It does lack something. I dunno, but Maya-nee's rice still has something this one doesn't.

"Say Takeru," Shion smiled widely at me from my side as we ate, "what do you say of us helping you out during the weekends?"

"Helping me out?"

"Yeah, we can help you study and with your sword practice. Do you have your Sundays free?"

"Yeah, I think."

"Ahem…" Maya-nee tapped her glasses as she looked at us, "I suppose we could allow it, Father?"

"Well, they can spend their free time as they see fit," Kazora-san said, resting a glass on the table, "However, you two cannot fall behind in your own studies because of this. I'll be monitoring you three tomorrow, to make sure this session is a fruitful one," He then gave us another scary look, and we three nodded at him.

"Thanks a lot, Shion."

"Hehehe… Don't mention it. I am your older sister too so I have to look out for you," She then laughed quietly while doing a big, evil grin showing me her teeth.

"I can help out too," Mion puffed her cheeks a bit, "I know history is hard for you so I can aid you in your efforts if you like."

"Yeah, thanks a lot you two. Oh, can you be serious when we fight in the dojo from now on? I wanna fight with you to get as good as I can," Both of them shared a look before nodding.

As I began to eat again, I felt a poke on my arm. Looking towards it, I saw Yuuhi staring back at me, a pout on her face.

"… Good evening, Takeru."

"H-Hi, Yuuhi," Why does she look so upset? Her eyes are again full of that weird blue fire that appears when she gets angry, for some reason. But then, as she eyed me in silence, her lips shrugged as if worries.

"It would seem today has been a most toilsome day for you," Speaking weird with a serious gaze, her eyes stopped on a small bruise I had on my arm, "Your complexion does indeed look fatigued, are certain that you are feeling well?"

"Yeah, don't worry," Giving her a small smile, she seems to ease up a bit. Thanks for always worrying, "It was just a lot of stuff to read. But don't worry, it wasn't so bad," Except for math.

"I see," Seeming relieved, she smiles as she gets closer, "Takeru, I heard from Mother that you would be residing here alongside us from today onwards. Is that true?"

"… Yeah, it's true," After all… The orphanage was the other choice… Now that Dad's gone…

"Takeru? What is the matter?"

"Eh? Nothing… Well, some people told me it was because I'm fellow now… Do you think it's weird?"

She shook her head, placing one of her hands above one of mine, squeezing as she smiled, "Of course not, I'm truly happy to hear that. So… If you ever need to talk or have a question, please do come to me first."

"Thanks, Yuuhi. Really…" Returning her smile, she beamed back at me.

Even when she also lost her dad, she's still nice enough to worry. Sniff… Yeah, I gotta do my best for her too! Since now we're together, I gotta do my best for her and Yohime-san too, to not give them trouble.

We kept eating as she asked me about how I had been today, what games I was looking forward to play, and other small things to get my mind off things.l

"But the lessons were really harder than what I had back home," I pout, remembering what I saw of math today.

"I was told you would have to study much, I hope you can get acquainted with your new home soon," Still smiling, she nodded.

Uuh… You're so nice, as always, "So, uh, how have you been lately?"

"Oh… I've been well," Looking a bit down, losing her smile, it's clear she's lying, "I've accompanied Mother on some of her meetings, but I have not had the time to read many books as of late… or play Shogi…" Her voice fades to a whisper, but then she leans closer, trying to smile again, "So… since you'll be living here from now on, if you would agree and had some free time, perhaps… we could read something together tomorrow?" She tapped some of her fingers together as she looked at me, holding her breath.

"Maya-nee, can we?" She furrowed her brows, looking at Yohime-san.

"I am afraid you won't be able to," Yohime-san said, sounding a bit sad, "Takeru has to study much this coming month, Yuuhi. Sadly, he needs all the time he can afford to polish his skills."

We both look down, so I won't be able to play with the rest either? Looking at her, Yuuhi was sulking really, really hard, but no fire was coming out now. For the first time… she looked really sad.

"Now Yuuhi, dear, do not be so restless," She extended a hand to pat her head, trying to cheer both of us up, "Takeru isn't going anywhere, he will have a free day where you can play together to your leisure."

"Truly, Mother?" She bounced up, again smiling.

"Indeed, so do look forward to it," She nodded, and Yuuhi also did the same, then smiling my way with much, much sunshine, "Maya, which day does Takeru have free?"

"Sundays, milady. However, you cannot sleep in as you used to, Takeru," Maya-nee said as she looked at me, making me groan, which makes Yuuhi and the Pickles giggle, "This is something you need to do to get used to your new life. You will have your coming Sundays free, but you'll be best served using them to practice. Once you regain the rest your free time after this month you'll be able to play with the rest again."

"I see…"

"Well, could you tell me what you thought of your first day here, Takeru?" Yohime-san said, smiling as usual.

I told her about today's classes, Yuuhi laughed as I commented on how little I understood of what I saw of math today, while Maya-nee sighed as I told them about what the short teacher taught me.

Yuuhi and Yohime-san both lost her smile in a flash when I told her of how strict Kazora-san was with me, Yuuhi pouting a bit while Yohime-san sent him a really scary look when I told them I didn't like the end of that poem. The other old woman didn't even look at me as I was talking, though. I think she also doesn't like me much.

"Takeru, regardless of what Kazora-san says, you have the last say in the matter. And worry not, you won't be sent to the orphanage even if you don't perform well in this month," Yohime-san said as she smiled again.

"Indeed, you're part of the House now," Yuuhi said, making a point of placing her hand above mine again as she gave him a mean look.

Yohime-san then asked Maya-nee about what she did on her first day back here, and then the Pickles told us about how they fared in their classes. After we finished eating, we stood up and said our goodbyes to them.

"Thank you very much for the food," I give a bow to the old woman, who squints her eyes and looks away. Why did I do to her?

She ignored me and went to Yuuhi's side, "Yuuhi-sama, we should return to your room."

"Yes, we should," Yuuhi, however, turned around from her stood up, coming closer to me, "Takeru, I wish you good fortune on your studies," She grabbed my hands and smiled at me, as I did too, "You must not doubt when it is time to make an effort. I'm sure you'll do well if you keep your good spirits."

"Don't worry, I'll be fine. Thanks a lot Yuuhi. And, um, good luck in those meetings."

"Hehe, thanks. I hope we can read something together again soon. See you tomorrow, Takeru," She then gave me a nod and went with the old lady out of the room.

Yohime-san stood up and came closer. She petted my head, smiling faintly, as she sat down in Yuuhi's place.

"So, I suppose you must be tired after such a long day. Did you find your training too difficult perhaps, Takeru?"

"Well… It was hard at times," I rub my arms, Yohime-san sends a gaze towards Kazora-san as he finished his dinner.

"I see. Worry not, I shall make sure you are not pushed unnecessarily. Now then, I heard of Maya's proposal, of having you join the training program of the Tsukuyomi House. Are you in agreement with this, Takeru?"

"Yes. I can train with them if I become a samurai, right?"

"Of course. However, it will be a harsher regime than if you were to join as a simple commoner. It does make the paperwork easier… But even so, are you certain of this? You still desire to join the Royal Guard?"

"… Do you not want me here? Am I being a bother?"

"No, nothing of the sort, dear," Again, she patted my head, her hand than going down to my cheek and also rubbing it slowly, "Did anyone utter any such words towards you today?"

"Well, the second teacher seemed kinda upset at me, and Kazora-san was raising his voice as always during the training."

"I see… I will have a word with them tomorrow about this matter. However, you are no bother to us, Takeru."

"What about all the papers and stuff?"

"Haha… That is but a trivial matter," She smiled as sweetly as she usually did while stroking my cheek, "Even if you do not join the Royal Guard I shan't be sending you away, be sure of that."

"So, I'll still be with Maya-nee?"

"Well, not as usually as you do now, but you will still meet her," Giving me a nod, she rested her hands on her lap, "I know all of this must be very taxing on you, but you will be fine from now on. Do not let Kazora-san pressure you in any way,"

I nod, bringing my hands together, "And… I will see my friends again, right?"

"After this month, you'll regain some more free time, so I suppose you could. So, you merely focus on doing your best efforts in your classes for now," Patting my head again, she gave me a serious gaze as her voice lost the sweet tinge it had before, "Once you're given a role, everything will be dealt with, I assure you."

"So, we really are safe?"

"Indeed, why do you ask?"

"Well… The monsters… aren't coming here?"

Smiling again, petting my head slowly, she shook her head, "Worry not Takeru, we are safe and sound here."

"I see… And… Um, Yohime-san, how did Dad and Takahisa-san lose?"

Her smile vanished, her eyes got all sharp, "… Who told you about him?" Her voice turned really, really cold as she shot a look towards Kazora-san, who then quickly left the room.

"So, is he gone too?"

"… Yes, sadly," She closed her eye really tight, letting a sigh out slowly, "Please do not mention his name to Yuuhi, she was very afflicted by this loss."

I mean, of course she would be sad. I don't get how they can smile like that, it was really, really hard to stay calm today for me.

"I know, I won't do that. But I can still play with her sometimes?"

"Why, of course. Please do keep her company if you have the time," I nod quickly, and that makes her giggle, "I'd truly appreciate it if you could find some time to play with her. However, your studies come first, yes?" I nod and she smiles.

"So, um, are we really safe? If Takahisa-san lost, with how awesome he was, will we be able to win someday?"

"Worry not, that is why we are working today. This does mean your training will be a truly harsh one, for we need to surpass those who fell. If you ever have trouble, please do tell me. I do not wish to see you getting hurt," She placed a hand on my cheek again, slowly rubbing it.

"Yes, I'll be careful. Um, thanks a lot Yohime-san, for letting me stay here. I… I will do my best to become a good samurai and help you all."

"Haha, no thanks are needed, my dear," Again smiling as sweetly as always, going back to her warm and nice tone, "I know this must be a tall ordeal for you, however, there is nothing you should fear," Resting her hands near her belly, she gave me a wider, kinder smile, "You should reflect on why you so wish to be a Royal Guard, and you must not shy away from this new responsibilities and subjects you'll face from now on, even if some voice their opposition to your stay here."

She was still smiling, but something in her eyes was different. The small embers of fire that sometimes peek out of Yuuhi's eyes returned to hers as she tensed her brows.

"I hope your efforts can be fruitful, and I will be looking forward to hearing about your progress. And worry not, I won't allow no one to mistreat you from now on. So, please do rest easy and focus on your studies for the time being."

"Yes, Yohime-san. I'll really do my best from now on!" I nod at her with a smile, she giggles as she pats my head once more. Then, she calls for Maya-nee and we leave after giving her a bow.

But… for some reason… I feel like I'm forgetting something. It's not like they were different than how they usually are, Yohime-san does use weird words from time to time, but… but something felt weirder in her words this time.

"Takeru, let us go to your room," Maya-nee placed her hand on my shoulder as we left the dining room.

… That's right. I'm not going back home tonight. I'm staying here… Until when?

When will I be able to go home again? Will I see Sumika and the rest again someday? This kinda feels like when the guys threw too many snowballs at my chest, I don't like this feeling.

Mion and Shion made jokes with me along the way, trying to tell me some stuff that should help me in my studies until they had to take another hallway.

"Maya-nee, will I have more long classes tomorrow?"

"Yes. You have four hours of classes, your lunch break, and then another four hours of classes, another small break, and then two hours to do your homework before going to the dojo. This is why I told you it would be too much for you. If you wish, you should-"

"I'm not giving up."

"Sigh… If you ever feel it is too much, do tell me. You can't expect to surpass all your tests with passion alone."

"… I'll do my best. Why don't you believe in me?"

She furrowed her brows slightly, "I do have faith in you. However, it would be more productive for you to focus on your innate abilities instead of chasing a dream that might never come. You saw how Father was with you today, and the pacing of the lectures won't ease up after this month. You will need to prepare yourself for your new school, including polishing your manners," We took a turn and reached the hallway were my room is, "I do not wish to see you pushing yourself needlessly, Takeru. No one will treat you unfairly even if you cannot match Shion's and Mion's academic performance," She pet my head and opened the door.

"But I won't be able to stay with you, the Pickles, Yuuhi or Yohime-san if I fail to join the samurais."

"… That may be so, but I am confident you will be fine in whichever path you decide to walk. Your future won't disappear just because I am not by your side everyday. Also, do not be threatened by that… poem Father told you about. Simply focus on learning as much as you can this coming days."

Maya-nee stayed with me until I got into my futon, and told me to not stay awake. But I couldn't really fall asleep despite how tired I am.

All the teachers gave me a lot of hard stuff to do, I didn't understand most of it. And I only have a month to convince them to let me be a samurai. I again grip my sheets really tight, feeling the snowy hands on my back again. I shiver under the sheets, it's as if I had ants crawling on my sides.

What would happen if I fail? How can I get better? Dad, what did you do to become a samurai?

"What can I do? How can I learn all of this?"

…

I won't get all these new things if I don't keep reading. And there was a lot of stuff to read, I didn't get to finish reading in the two hours I got to make my homework.

I got out of the futon and went to pick up the books I had in my bag. I take a deep breath as I rub my shoulders. Let's keep reading for a while, I need to be better if I want to pass this dumb test! And I should also write down what I think of that poem before going to sleep.

After all, if I do well, then I'll have more time to play with Yuuhi. I'll do my best, both to be more like Dad and to be there for her.

Chapter 53: Guidance of the Claret Hollows

May 25 th . 07: 3 5 PM.

(Dojo. Koubuin House.)

[Native Takeru]

---

"Ugh!" I fall to the floor again, my sword goes flying towards the wall once more.

"You haven't improved your form at all… I told you that such aggressiveness shouldn't be present in your stride, Shirogane," Kazora-san shook his head again.

I slowly get up and go look for my sword. Gasping for air, dragging my feet as I go towards it, my teeth press onto my lips. It's always the same with him, I am getting better but you're just too good for me.

I won't cry, I won't cry in front of him again like when they gave me Dad's letter and told me to come here. Gritting my teeth, putting some tension in my arms as I take my pose, again I begin to attack.

But no matter what I try, how I attack, he always sends me to the floor in the end.

"If you still can't trade a few blows with me, this will be a pointless effort," He says, shaking his head, "Shirogane, you should stop trying to become a Royal Guard."

"… Why do you hate me that much? What did I do to you?!"

"Hate is a too strong word," He rested his sword under his arm, looking away, "I simply don't see how you could become a decent Imperial Guard with this meager skill."

"You aren't giving me any advice, you're just beating me up."

"Sigh… I have told you already, you should not be so aggressive in your stance."

"But if I don't attack I'll never win."

"And as I said before, you must not fall to emotion. It is clear you are not meditating on the code's teachings. It would be better for you to study for a different path, or to rest well from your efforts."

"… I don't wanna. I'm going to become a samurai."

He shakes his head again, taking his pose once more, "Can't you see you're only wasting your time? It would be better for you if you focused on studying more instead of being here."

"Well, Yohime-san said I could try. I won't give up until the end of the month!"

"Sigh… Whatever is to happen to you, you won't be able to surpass the expectations placed on a Royal Guard with your abilities and this attitude of yours. It is what it is," He then nodded and readied for another duel.

Again, I dash at him and try to break his guard, but after just a few seconds he starts pressuring me and I can barely keep up. Blocking his swings feels like trying to walk against a strong wind, like those times it rains so hard the umbrellas fly away even if you hold onto them hard. My feet hurting from trying to not fall back, elbows and wrists feel stiff and sore the more I parry, I again try to breath deeply to not end up slipping.

I was expecting him to knock my sword away or make me fall back, but he stops in the middle, breaking his pose. I remain quiet, sword in midair, as he furrows my brows and starts groaning.

"I'm sure you can see how fruitless this is for you, Shirogane."

"Huh?"

"You haven't improved at all, and you still can't determine how to approach me in our duels. Your inexperience is grand, your form is lacking, and you still do not have an ounce of poise in you. It would be a disgrace to the Imperial Royal Guard to let such a barbaric person join our ranks."

"Then, how can I get better?"

He sighs again and folds his sword under one of his arms as he crossed them, "I already told you what you should do, and yet you continue to fall prey to your anger. If my words and actions have not brought a change in you, however small, in this time, I can only deduce you simply won't improve."

"… You don't know that. And you always speak weird during the lessons."

"… Then, come at me and show me whether or not you have what it takes. Surprise me once, see if you can do that much at the least."

Again I took my pose and attacked him.

SWISH!

But I can't break his guard. What can I do? How can I win?

I try to go from his right, doing a rising slash towards his wrist. He blocks it, I keep going forward and do a downward slash. He parries it again and pushes me back. In a flash, my sword is sent flying again.

"… See? You are not improving in the least."

"I haven't lost yet. I'm not giving up," I slowly go for my sword, looking at the floor.

"It's pointless, in the end nothing will change. You can't expect to bridge this canyon in a mere month. I am telling you this for your own good, Shirogane. You should desist in your efforts to be a Royal Guard."

"… No," I sniff a bit, biting my lips to not start sobbing.

"Don't be this obstinate. You are staying overtime to train unlike Shion and Mion, and you still haven't improved. I do praise your dedication, but effort alone cannot bridge this gap. You should be using your time to hone your innate talents, wherever they lie."

"… I want to be a samurai. I… I am not giving up, Kazora-san," Maya-nee said we'd be like family. I won't… I won't let this stupid test take them away from me.

"It's Tsukuyomi-sensei," He grumbles for a while as he shakes his head, "I am only being honest. You have many expectations to meet if you desire to continue down this path, those are the rules we live by. And you… do not possess the abilities that are necessary to be chosen for this role. There are moments in life when you have to possess the courage to back down from a pointless fight. Your struggles will be pointless if you continue chasing this dream."

… I don't wanna give up.

If I do, Maya-nee and the rest will be gone. I'll be alone. I don't think I'll be able to make friends, the adults here all look at me with those same scary eyes Kazora-san sometimes has. If everybody else is like that, if I can't see the Pickles and Yuuhi, if I can't go back to see Sumika and the rest… Sniff…

I look down, trying to hide the few tears that come out. The hand that has my sword trembles a bit.

Stupid rules… It's not fair that I always have to fight against him. I am doing better than before. This isn't… This isn't…

Still crying, I frown and look up at him, taking my pose again. As he slowly takes a common pose instead of the one Maya-nee also uses, I could feel my head beating. It hurts… It feels as if I had water in my ears and someone was pressing my head from behind.

I take my first step and attack him, this time trying to do it faster than before.

"See? You're only using brute force. This is pointless, you should know better by now!" He pressures me, I take a step back and block him, "You should know how this will end. Stop chasing after impossible dreams, Shirogane."

"No! I won't… I will keep trying!"

He again makes me go back, unable to hold him off. I barely manage to meet his swings, almost losing hold of my sword for a moment. Gasping for air as he starts to move a bit faster, feeling as if my hands were hurt after carrying many heavy bags from the super, my heels dive onto the floor to not end up slipping up.

I won't give up… I won't lose anything else. I won't accept I lost yet. Raising my blade and returning the slash, gritting my teeth, my heels stomping hard as I hold my ground, as he keeps attacking, as my head began to hurt more. It felt as if I had dirt on my mouth, like when I get into a fight and my lips end up bleeding a bit, as if many mosquitoes were picking on my neck and arms all at the same time.

As Kazora-san rose his blade, I bent my knees and parried his swing and started pressuring him. The water left my ears, I inhaled through my nose and rose my sword above my shoulder as I kept going forward, enduring the itching on my neck.

He again blocked me as usual, but I aimed my sword a bit lower on the second slash, trying to hit his hands. He blocked me again, but when he went for his follow up, I took my step back and countered. And he parried again.

If I let him do his stuff he's going to tire me out again. I have to push forward and hit him once! So, breathing deeply with my nose, I stomped hard with my heels and moved forward, lowering my sword when Kazora-san had to take a step back.

SWISH!

THUD!

"Ugh*…"* I again was left on the floor. My back hurts a lot. I couldn't even see what happened just now.

I feel a hole in my stomach… I'm hungry… Also, my head hurts. How did he even block me and counter so quickly?!… Ugh, it's as if the floor was moving.

"… Shirogane, what was that?" Kazora-san moved closer, his voice slow and deep like those serious people that appear on the news at night.

"… What? I lost again," I got up slowly, avoiding his eyes. Oh, I didn't lose my sword this time.

"I am not speaking of that. When did you… When did you learn to move in such way?"

"What way? I just did what I always do."

"You weren't trying anything different?"

"… No, I was just trying to be faster. What is it?"

He remains standing there, saying nothing. Now what? Is he going to say I'm bad again?

"… This was enough for today. Go take your gear off."

"Yes," I give him a bow as he also does the same.

I go into the changing room and take off the gear. And then, I let the tears come out as I twist my lips shut. Burying my face in a towel as I cry, my arms hurt a lot… And I'm feeling kinda dizzy. I rub my forehead slowly, making circles as I try to calm myself down.

Sniff… I just have to try harder. Everything will be fine… Just remember Maya-nee's advice and you'll be fine… I'm sure…

---

Next Day. Near Noon.

(Dining Room.)

---

"But it's a lot, really," I complain, since I wasn't able to finish all my homework during the class.

"You shouldn't let this impair your efforts, regardless," Maya-nee said. It feels as if she were going back to using a lot of weird words again, "Have your tutors not given you any advice?"

"Well, yeah…" I sit down, she places my lunch in front of me, "Are you not eating, Maya-nee?"

"My food hasn't been brought yet, so I'll go to the kitchen now. You remain here, and remember not to-"

"Yeah, I know. I won't be rude if anyone else comes,"

Holding my gaze for a second, she then nods, "Very well. I'll return in a moment, so do start eating, Takeru," And so, she turns around and goes to the door.

Mmgh… I know already. Why is she back to the weird words, though? I didn't do anything to make her angry…

Eating my food, stealing glances at the door, I wonder what could I do to get better. The classes are really hard, I'm having a lot of trouble just to understand what the teachers explain to me. And it's not even what I'll have to see if I wanna be a samurai.

Even when I do my best… I'm not getting any better… Maybe that's why she's mad? Is she… disappointed?

Then, the door opens. But as I look towards it, Maya-nee doesn't come in. Instead, a short samurai in a red dress, that's stronger than the one Maya-nee uses now, with his hair combed backwards, in a softer shade of purple than Yuuhi's, and an odd horn coming forward on above his forehead, was the one who entered the dining room.

He looked at me and we remained staring at the other for a moment. Tilting my head, furrowing my brows a bit, I return his stare but he says nothing.

"… Who are you?"

Seeming to blink fast for a second, he coughs a bit, "That is my question. What would you be doing here, little one?" He also speaks weird.

"I'm eating lunch."

"Yes, that I can see. However… Why would you be here?"

"… Because I'm eating lunch?" Tilting my head again, I give him a confused gaze. Can't he see I'm eating?

"No, I… Ahem, this dining room is for members of the House. Who brought you here?" He asked in a soft, calm voice, not looking angry or anything.

"Maya-nee brought me here, like always."

"Oh, so…" Then, he suddenly stops and stares at me, really surprised for some reason, "A moment, who did… By 'Maya-nee', are you perhaps referring to Maya Tsukuyomi?"

"Yeah, who else?" Pouting at him for a moment, I go back to my rice when I see him keeping quiet again.

What a weird samurai, what other Maya could I be talking about. Often, the other samurai either give me a scary gaze or they just leave me alone. What is it with him now? Walking slowly to the other side of the table and sitting in front of me, looks like he was staring. What? Is he gonna be mean too?

"Excuse me, I didn't introduce myself," But then he smiled, sounding friendly, "My name is Masahide Amato. Who would you be?"

"I'm Takeru Shirogane," Hesitating for a moment, I offer him my hand. He takes it and gives me a slowl handshake.

"… Could you be Kageyuki Shirogane's son, perchance?"

… Huh?

Did… he…

"Did you know Dad?"

"Yes, I was one of his fellows in the Royal Guard," He says as he ends the handshake, leaning back into his chair.

"Um… Did… Did you fight against the monsters with him?" Unable to look down, I barely manage to whisper the question out.

"… Yes," Making a pained face, he also remains quiet.

"Um… Was Dad… a good samurai?" Picking at my food, I watch him as he seems to go back to normal.

"Yes, your Father was a fine Royal Guard, indeed," Making a small smile, he again looks my way, "If I might ask, why have you come to the House, Shirogane-kun?"

Can't help but to puff my cheeks at him, "My name is Takeru, don't call me Shirogane."

But he doesn't seem upset, instead he chuckles a bit, "Do forgive me. So Takeru-kun, why have you been brought here?"

He doesn't sound mean… and he did greet me back. But I can't tell him I'm part of Maya-nee's family.

"Hmm… Maya-nee told me I shouldn't tell other samurai, because they might get upset."

"Huh? How do you mean? Why would I be…" Then, he grabs his chin, groaning for a while, before looking at me again, "Could it be that you are not visiting, but are living in the House?"

"Eh?! How did you guess?!"

"Well, I heard once from your Father that you had no other relatives," He said, slowly nodding, "If you are eating here, brought by Maya-sama, and a 'samurai' might take offense in your presence… It is one of the possible deductions I can reach."

Looking into my dish, it feels as if ants were crawling all over me. What do I say now? He might get mad if I tell him the truth, like the rest have been until now. But he did knew Dad… But Dad never talked about his time in the samurais. He's still gazing at me, keeping quiet.

As I wondered what I should say to him, the door opened. Maya-nee entered the room, a few maids behind her carrying some food. They gave Masahide-san his plate as well as place Maya-nee's one by my side, and both of them thanked them as they left.

She then sat by my side, gazing at him, "Is something the matter, Masahide-san? Is the food not to your liking?"

"No, nothing of the sort," He replied, still calm, "Actually… If I may, might I ask why have you brought Takeru-kun here, Maya-sama?"

… So he does have a problem with me. Why are they all like that?

"I suggest you to not inquire into this matter. Yohime-sama was the one who allowed Takeru to reside in the House," She said in the scary tone.

"… Is that so?" He doesn't seem scared, though, "However, that is not what I wished to ask. Why did you bring the boy here? Leaving him alone, where others could come in and find him. Takeru-kun did say other nobles might take offense at him being here, you should be more careful Maya-sama."

Is he just worried then? I don't get it… Why are they arguing now?

"I would like to ask you to refrain from speaking of matters you know nothing about, Masahide-san," She narrowed her eyes, tapping her glasses. But he still keeps calm, returning her glare without flinching, "Whether you accept it or not, Takeru is now a fellow of us. I would mind my tongue if I were you."

"… A fellow? Is he not a vassal?"

Maya-sama scowled at him before calming down again, "Tell me Masahide-san, what do you know of Takeru?"

"Maya-nee, why are you angry?" Pulling the sleeve of her red dress, I ask. He seems surprised at this, for some reason.

"I am not angry, Takeru," She says, still sounding a bit upset, "It seems Masahide-san does not fully understand your position, therefore I suppose it falls to me to inform him of your situation."

"… Since you said he is a fellow and not a vassal, that means Takeru-kun is going to join the Royal Guard?" He asks, raising a brow in confusion.

"Indeed. He is currently being trained to determine his placement in our ranks, even if his induction's area has not been decided yet."

"I am going to join the samurai!" Puffing my cheeks, I glare at her. Why won't she trust in me?

She looks at me and sighs again, "As I was saying, due to his father's contributions and his personal situation, Yohime-sama extended a helping hand to Takeru. He is now one of us, and he's currently taking a test to determine which path he is to follow. Ergo, speaking against his stay here is tantamount to going against Yohime-sama's wishes," She finished tapping her glasses once more before starting to eat, sounding scary again.

"I never spoke against his situation, however," But he's still calm, drinking some water, "I was merely surprised to see a commoner being allowed to be here, of all places. I do recommend you to be more tactful with him, Takeru-kun did display clear worry about others' views of him. It would be harmful to him to be put in a delicate situation."

"Takeru, is this true? Did anything happen?"

"Well…" I slowly swayed from left to right, avoiding Maya-nee's stare. When she didn't stop staring, I nodded, barely lifting my voice, "Yesterday, a few samurai came here before you and left really fast saying I smelled bad."

They said that they didn't stand the 'reeking stench of a lowborn', whatever that means, and left as quickly as they entered. I dunno what they wanted to say, but they were obviously saying mean things about me, that same scary glare some give me in the hallways. And I don't even know what I did wrong to anger them like that…

Masahide-san sighs heavily, shaking his head as he places a hand on his wide forehead, Maya-nee's brows get all low and spiky.

"… Is that why you stayed more time in the bath last night?" She asks and I nod, lowering my head to the table, "Pay no heed to those foolish words. Remember my advice, do not flare up in vain. Serenity is a key virtue of a samurai, Takeru." She petted my head and I returned upwards, giving her a nod. "Ahem…" She then looked at Masahide-san again, a finger on the outer rim of her glasses, "As I was saying, he is now another fellow of ours. Therefore, I suggest you to not-"

"I have nothing against him. Do not forget I fought alongside his father, Maya-sama," He said, now sounding a bit upset, "I am merely at a loss of words towards these news. For a commoner to be admitted into our House, for you to show such concern over his situation, it is something I never expected to hear. Even less for the boy to be the son of one of my comrades in arms."

Hey, what did he mean about Maya-nee? He isn't being mean to her, is he? Looking at her, her brows lowered just a tiny bit… She's angry.

"I see… However, may I ask what do you mean regarding my… concern over Takeru's situation? Are you insinuating anything, perhaps?" And she's back to the scary voice, too.

"… Do you truly not remember the time we were tasked to patrol the city together during our training? What did a certain someone do when a pair of children started arguing about what sweets they wanted to buy?" He asks, giving her a dubious gaze.

"That's… That was only one time."

"And what of that time a little girl that was crossing the street didn't want to walk after the lights turned red?" He again asks.

"That girl and her mother were in serious danger. You should be well aware of that, Masahide-san. I only did what we obviously had to do."

"That may be so, but you could have grabbed her arm instead. I believe that girl's ear is still red to this day after such a strong pulling,"

Huh… I do see Maya-nee doing something like that, though. Giggling a bit, she then glared at me and I stopped short.

"And what of the times our civilians asked you for directions? If I recall correctly, you-"

"Masahide-san…" Maya-nee tapped her glasses, her lips twitching, "I suppose you are saying I am not the most tactful member of our ranks, am I correct?"

"Well… Takeru-kun, what do you think? Do you think Maya-sama is perhaps too strict?"

"Hmm… Sometimes," He chuckles, one of Maya-nee's hands seemed to tense for a second, "But she's really kind, you know. So stop saying bad things about Maya-nee," Pouting at him, I arch my brows while giving him a mean gaze.

But he chuckled again, making another small smile, "Do forgive me. However, if I may, why does he refer to you in such a personal manner?"

"Well… Takeru refuses to speak formally, no matter how much I tried to make him do so," She answered, going back to her food and a calm tone.

"But for what reason does he refer to you as a sister?" He insists.

Maya-nee's eyes lowered, her hands stopped and laid atop the table. She got all quiet… W-Why does she not want to answer?

"Maya-nee? What's wrong?" Couldn't help it so my voice creaked as I stared.

She looked at me, not seeming angry or anything, then closed her eyes for a moment. Grabbing her sleeve again, she tapped her glasses before opening her eyes once more. Going back to the old cold face she used to make, she waited to answer for a moment to look at me again.

"… I was tasked with the protection of Takeru for some time, Masahide-san," She began slowly, "During that time, he became attached to me and I allowed him to refer to me in such a way. And now, Takeru is aiming to join us in the Royal Guard. Therefore…" She narrowed her eyes at him, embers and sparks heating her tone, "I suppose that allowing him to continue to refer to me as his sister would do good to him, considering his circumstances. Again, I suggest you to not oppose his stay here, even if he should mend his manners."

"… Does that mean that you are acting against the code, Maya-sama?" He asks, now sounding serious. What's his problem?

"Whatever are you talking about?" And she sends a sharp slash at him with her glare.

Why is she so angry? Am I giving her trouble? And again with that sad code, too.

"You're acting on emotion," Keeping the serious eyes but without any fire in his voice, he leans on the table, "The you I knew would never allow a peasant to be here in such an arrangement, much less to display such closeness to your person so openly. A single generation of service should not bestow this privilege to anyone. And yet, here you are… Allowing a commoner to be trained as a fellow, allowing him to address you as family."

Couldn't help to look down, plucking my lips as I let go of Maya-nee's sleeve. So I am being a bother, then? Maya-nee left the silence hanging for a moment, when I looked up she was giving him a really nasty glare, as angry as I haven't seen her in a while. He didn't look away, or even seem scared.

"Masahide-san, must I remind you that Yohime-sama herself allowed Takeru to reside in the house? Are you speaking against her wishes, by any chance?"

"Do not dodge the question, please," Leaning forward, he insisted, "How do you explain, justify these actions? I wish to hear that answer, considering how you were before you left this is nothing short of a shock."

Mmgh… Feeling my fists beginning to tighten, my lips too, I wanna scream at him. Why is he being mean to her? What does he know? But if I do… I'll just give her more problems… But I don't like how he's talking about her now… Ugh…

"The code orders us to protect our fellows," She shoots out immediately, "Takeru, being the son of one of our men, has been taken under our care for this very reason."

"And yet, the code forbids us from acting on emotion, from showing favoritism to anyone," He replies, still calm as he meets her eyes, "All boons must be earned. His father being but an inductee, this would raise many questions. Even more towards your… relation with him. The little one seems to like you much, and I suppose you have been taking good care of him to earn such affection. Isn't that right, Takeru-kun?" Then, he looks at me, nodding with a smile.

"Yeah, Maya-nee is awesome. Why are you being mean to her?"

"I am not, I'm just surprised is all. Maya-sama used to be…" He runs a hand over his hair, giving her a look, "far more colder than how she has been today."

"Well… That's true, Maya-nee was kinda scary at first," I nod, and then hear her groan a bit.

"I see. Well, it is good to see you're comfortable with her now," Still smiling, he nods again. He doesn't seem to be mean, then, what's up with him? "So, Maya-sama, I don't ask for all the answers but, what caused this turn of events? Why go against the code so obviously? If this were noticed by anyone, I am sure many would be the troubles coming our way."

"… No one is acting against the code," Narrowing her eyes even more, she leaned back on the chair, "As a fellow of us, we shall be watching over Takeru from now on. He isn't merely staying here, as I said before he will either become a public servant or a Royal Guard. As a soon-to-be recruit, it is only natural for him to be around us, so that he becomes accustomed to his new life."

"I see… Perhaps we could continue this little matter at another time?" He asks, almost hesitating, and then she nods.

I don't get what just happened… Are they friends or not? How did he get along with Dad?

"Um… Masahide-san?"

"Hm? What is it?" Looking at me, he doesn't seem to mind I used his name.

"… Can you tell me how you worked with Dad?"

Giving a nod, he then answered my questions as he ate. At first I tried to be polite, but since he seemed nice I ended up talking as always. Chuckling when I did, saying I really resembled Dad, he kept telling me stories of how they patrolled around a Castle and made some reports or something.

"Well… It is time for you to return to your studies, Takeru," Maya-nee stood up, cleaning her mouth with a tissue and then grabbing my arm.

"Eh? But I wanna talk with Masahide-san a bit more."

"Takeru, do remember to be respectful," She then sighs when I pout at her.

"It is alright. He is but a child, I have not taken offense," He raises a hand, still smiling.

"I see. Then, we shall be on our way," Holding hands, we stand up and go to the door.

Masahide-san also stood up and exited the room, but as we did a samurai in a pale gray uniform was coming towards us. Standing tight and doing that hand thing to her forehead, the woman then looked at Maya-nee.

"Maya-sama, your Father is calling for you. Please follow me to the meeting room."

"… I see. However, I have to take Shirogane to his classroom, therefore-"

"Kazora-sama told me to bring you to him immediately," She replies, giving Maya-nee a small bow, "It seems he needs to relay an important message to you, Ma'am."

Maya-nee tried to stay cool, but still sent me a rather worried gaze for her. Mmgh… So she still doesn't think I know where the classroom is?

"Maya-sama, if duty calls for you, perhaps I could take the boy to this… classroom he has to go to?" Masahide-san suggests, kinda hesitating.

"As much as I'd like to accept your offer, I am the one tasked with watching over him," She said as firm as always.

"However, your Father is now calling for you. You've made his situation clear. I will merely accompany him to this room in your stead," And he insists.

She closes her eyes, thinking for a while, "Very well, I accept your offer. Remember that he is under our protection, Masahide-san," He nods, then she looks at me, "Do work hard on your afternoon classes, Takeru. I shall go for you at the usual time."

I nod, slowly, and she goes away I wave at her, but she doesn't even turn back. Pouting a bit, furrowing my brows, I just keep watching her back until she takes a turn.

"Well, shall we go to this classroom, Takeru-kun? Do you know where it is?" He asks, coming closer.

"Yeah…" Turning around, my feet drag themselves in the direction of the classroom, "Say Masahide-san, is it hard to be a samurai?"

"Huh? Well… It is not an easy job, that is true," He nods once, sounding serious, "Why do you wish to join the Royal Guard, Takeru-kun?"

"I want to be like Dad. And if I don't…" Looking down, I feel a cold shiver as I thought about what would happen then.

"What is it?"

"Well… I won't be able to be with Maya-nee anymore."

"You truly do like her much, it seems."

"Of course I do! Why are you so mean to Maya-nee?"

"Haha, forgive me. It is just that I am accustomed to how she used to be. It is a surprise to see her in this new light, that is all. By the way Takeru-kun, what are you going to be doing now?"

"I have physics and then… I think it was another history class?"

"So, you're being instructed. I assume you do know how harsh the training will be for you if you do join the Royal Guard's Training Program?"

"Yeah, Maya-nee has been telling me that I shouldn't worry and stuff. Masahide-san, how did Dad become a samurai?"

"… I don't really know. When I joined the Guard he was already a member of the squad I was assigned to."

"Uuh…" Just when I thought I could get a hint or something… "So, um, what do you do with the samurai?"

"Me? Well, I also am a pilot as your father was. However…" Looking kinda sad, he starts to slow down, "due to my station, I've quite the number of burdens on my shoulders."

"What does that mean? Are you in trouble?"

"No, nothing of the sort. What I meant to say is that, since I returned from the frontlines, and I'm the only son of the Head of my House, many people are expecting much from me now and… well, it is exhausting at times," He sighs, as heavy as Maya-nee has been doing lately, getting more and more sad as he rubs one of his arms.

"So you're like the Yuuhi of your house?"

"Eh…" Saying nothing, leaving his mouth open, looks like a cat after a thunder, "Takeru-kun, are you acquainted with Yuuhi-sama?"

"Well… Yes, we're friends," Looking down, then stealing a gaze at him, Masahide-san doesn't seem angry like the others. So he's just surprised?

"What in blazes… However, you truly are friends with her?"

"Yeah, we play together on the weekends. Why? Is it weird?"

"Shocking more than anything, to be honest," Crossing his arms, he sighs while arching a brow, "I suppose she must cherish you much for you to be allowed to use her name in such fashion. You're truly one surprise after another."

But I always called her like that… What's so weird about it? It's her name. Adults are so weird sometimes.

"But, in the end, are you something like her for your house?"

"Well yes, something of the sort," Smiling again, he chuckled a bit more, "Because of that, both my family and fellows are placing many expectations on me, so… I do understand how arduous your days must be, trying to appease such insurmountable exigencies," Clouding all over, he again rubbed his arm.

"Does your arm hurt?"

"Huh? Oh…" Chuckling as he saw his hand, again he smiled at me, "No, I'm merely bracing for the coming duels that will assuredly be requested of me."

"Why do you have to fight? Did someone sent you a challenge?"

"In a way, yes. You see, my older sister is very dedicated to her kendo lessons so…" Again looking a bit sad, and scared, a hand goes to scratch his ear, "I'm convinced she'll request many duels from me in these days."

"I see… So the samurais have to fight in many duels, huh."

"Well, while that isn't untrue, in my case it is more of a… family custom, to be honest."

As I asked him why, he told me that since he was part of the Shinpan, who are apparently the red samurais, the other samurais are expecting much from him. And because of that, it seems his sister is really motivated to be a good samurai and also pushes him to do his best too. Even if she seems kinda scary, considering how blue his face looks when speaking of her. I wonder if that's why Maya-nee is also tired, since she's also a red samurai.

But maybe… He hasn't gotten mad, and is talking to me without a problem. Maybe… Could he give me just a little help? "Um… Can I ask you something about my training?"

"Of course, what would it be?"

"Um, well, Kazora-san says that just making effort isn't enough, that I need to be calm and stuff to truly learn how to be a good samurai… But I don't really understand that well. How can I get better?"

"Hmm… So you're also familiar with Kazora-sama, huh?" He sounds calmly surprised, to call it something, as he stares at me.

"He doesn't really like me much," Can't help but to puff my cheeks, remembering the lessons at the dojo.

"I suppose you should start with the code. Also, managing your time is of essence."

"Managing… my time?" Tilting me head, I stare at him.

"I meant knowing how much time you dedicate to each subject. How are you studying as of now?"

We kept talking as we went to the classroom, as I told him of what I saw so far on my classes. He recommended me to not stay up until late, to properly use my time instead of exhausting myself, as well as other pointers about math. Despite how I'm talking normally, he doesn't seem offended or anything.

When we arrived at the room, no one was there. We kept talking as I showed Masahide-san my exercises and what I was reading now, but no one came to the room as the minutes passed.

"Perhaps something happened to your instructor?" He suggests, looking at the clock that's on the wall.

"It's weird. They're always here when I come back from lunch," I mean, twenty minutes passed since the hour when the classes usually start here.

What happened now? Maybe… they don't wanna teach me anymore? B-Because I'm bad?

Then, he patted the books, giving me a smile, "Well… I am no expert but I do know how this works. Until your teacher comes back, what do you say I aid you in your homework?"

"Really?!"

"I have not been called to a meeting yet, so I can assist you for a moment if you so wish."

"Thanks a lot, Masahide-san!" Getting closer, I shake his hands with much impulse, making him chuckle a bit.

Finally having someone to talk with, I quickly sit by his side and we begin to study. Masahide-san could give me new, more clear explanations on what I should try to do, even on those dumb subjects that I don't get well. As the minutes passed, he also gave me some advice on my writing, and how I approach my homework. Just as we finished part of what I had to see today, as I was getting a bit tired, he instead closed to books and began asking me questions.

"So, are you also being trained in the way of the sword, Takeru?"

"Oh, yeah. I go to the dojo after my classes are over. Kazora-san is the one who fights with me but…"

"But?"

"He always wins and doesn't give me any advice," Once more, can't help but to pout, "He keeps repeating that weird code, how I have to be calm and all to really learn, but he doesn't tell me what I'm doing wrong," Then, I bury my chin onto my arms.

"I see. What do you think of the code, Takeru?" He asks, curiously.

"Hmm… It's really weird. It says I can't be scared, angry or anything. That I have to stay calm and meditate. But it also says I have to hug death. I don't like that part."

"Well… Perhaps one could… understand the code in another way." Eyes closed, his tone changed a bit, getting slow and a bit hesitant, as he thought.

"Hm? How?"

"For example… Fear and passion are usually regarded as negative characteristics, however, it is due to them that one can surpass oneself. While remaining in control of one's feelings, by silencing all internal turmoil, would let you focus, it also… binds you, in a way."

"Um… What does turmoil means?"

"It means your mind becomes stirred, distraught. Let me give you an example. Normally, a pond looks to be calm, doesn't it?" I nod, "However, if the fish that live in it start to swim and try to eat each other, the water will be filled with ripples, would it not?"

"Being all messy on the inside… Is that what this internal turmoil means?"

He then nods, seeming happy, "Yes, that is precisely what it means. So… Ahem… What I'm trying to say is, you don't have to force yourself to always being calm and focused. While being aware of one's feelings is important, it is a hard state to reach and even more to remain in. But that doesn't mean you cannot be upset from time to time. If you never express your thoughts, in time that will cause grave harm to you. At least, that's what I believe."

"Ooh… So I have to try to be calm, but not all the time. Enough to not get angry, right?"

"Something of the sort, yes. And regarding the 'hug to death' part… It does not mean you should rejoice in death. Sometimes…"

"Sacrifices and stuff, I know," I again pout.

"Well… Precisely," And he again nods, sighing this time.

"Masahide-san, why is the last part of the poem so sad?"

"Sad? I do not think it is particularly saddening," He rose a brow as he looked my way.

Then I try to explain to him, with my words and gestures, what I think of these last lines. How they're telling me I'm weak because I get afraid and angry, that I can't have dreams because a samurai is but a servant, that I can't ever doubt, and that it's alright for people to 'go away' or die. Masahide-san folds his arms, his eyes almost closing, as he thinks on what I said. Seeming to be lost in thought for a moment, when he looks back at me he wasn't angry or anything. Narrowing his thick brows, he nodded before speaking up in a serious tone.

"Well… I think that feeling fear and being controlled by it are different states of mind. The second one is what the code tells you to beware, but it is only human to feel fear Takeru-kun. You shouldn't fear death, but that does not equal you not caring about yours or your fellows' lives."

"But Kazora-san says I can't be afraid or I'll end up failing."

"You shouldn't act on your fear, but it isn't a sin to be afraid," He says, smiling at me, "The same goes for passion and anger. You surely will become upset at times, but you shouldn't act on the impulse. At those times is when you should calm down, clear your mind."

"So… I'm not bad for being afraid or getting angry?"

"But of course not. Kazora-sama's words most probably mean that you need to be ready for when… it's time to part ways with someone, but it doesn't mean that life doesn't matter," Sighing a bit heavily, he leans back on the chair, "Perhaps he sees how easily you fall prey to emotion and is only enforcing this teaching to aid you solve this problem of yours."

Crossing my arms, I groan a bit, "Well, I know I shouldn't get so angry… But Kazora-san said that one servant's life is nothing compared to the Empire. I think that's really sad."

Seeming to agree with me while grimacing, he nods, "… He is right, however. One person is nothing compared to the Empire, but the Empire is made up of all those individual people. It is a complex matter to explain but… You shouldn't let selfishness bind you, everyone is as important as the rest."

"Hmm…" I rest my head on the table, groaning a bit, trying to understand, "So, the samurai have to protect everyone?"

"They try to. That line means that you need to be ready to sacrifice your own time to protect and serve everyone else. To fight to the last breath for those you love, those you wish to safeguard, that is the ultimate duty of a warrior."

"Um… Did Dad believe in that last line too?" I look at him, unable to stop my hands from shaking a bit. Did he really… think something so sad was right?

"… I suppose he did, because he fought to the end to make sure you would remain safe. However, you shouldn't overthink this. In time, you will reach your own answer, Takeru-kun."

"Really? But I don't have much time. If I don't convince them soon, I'll never be a samurai."

"Even so, you will remain here in the house. You do not have to force yourself to join the Royal Guard."

"Mmgh… But I wanna be a samurai. I won't be able to stay with Maya-nee if I'm not."

He then closed his eyes for a moment, arms crossed again. After a moment of silence, he looked at me, "Takeru-kun, what is the subject you're having the most trouble with?"

"Hm? Math and history. And I still haven't won a single duel in the dojo." Sulking a bit, can't help but to be sour as lemons.

"Well, let's review some of those lessons in the mean time."

"Eh?! But… But, what if the teachers come in the middle? Aren't you busy?"

Then, he smiles, "Let's make a deal, then. If you manage to surpass some of the exercises, I shall try to give you some pointers regarding your Kendo efforts. Does that seem like a fair deal to you?"

"Really?! Then, I'll do my best," Raising both of my fists, I nod fast twice. If he's willing to help me… then I just gotta do it!

"Then, let's begin. I might be called to a meeting, so let us not waste time," We nod at each other, opening the books again.

---

Around an hour later…

---

"Might I ask why you take such an aggressive form?"

"This is how Maya-nee fights so I wanna be like her," I answer, getting out of the stance.

"I see… Sadly, I am a user of our customary style so I do not know how Maya-sama's could be enhanced. Perhaps you could try different stances until you find one you are comfortable with? Is there any step in your stride that you have trouble with?"

"I can't even hit Kazora-san. I have to at least do that once, he said that only then he'll accept me to be a samurai."

Masahide-san groans, making a rather pained face, "Well, as I said before, managing your steps is crucial. Remember that the blade is meant to deal lethal damage regardless of the strength of your swings, so you do not need to put so much force into them. Your leg work is what you should focus on to ingrain the basics as good as you can."

"… Why do you all speak so weird?"

"What I meant to say is, focus on your steps and on how you move first. Your posture is what you should polish first," He remarks, and I smile back.

Then, the door opened and Maya-nee entered the room. She looks slightly troubled, her brows are a bit arched.

"… As I thought, you remained by his side. Masahide-san, has Takeru given you any troubles?"

"Why, of course not," He replies with another smile, "I merely remained by his side since I wasn't called back."

"Maya-nee, what happened to the teacher?" Once I get closer, she ruffles my hair.

Her eyes look at me for a second before answering, looking kinda tired, "Nothing you should concern yourself with. Your next class shall begin shortly, so prepare your textbooks," She then looks up towards him, tapping her glasses, "Masahide-san, Yohime-sama is calling for you. Please follow me."

"I see. Well, it is time for me to leave. This was a fun studying session. Goodbye, Takeru-kun," He came closer, offering me his hand.

"No, I don't like goodbyes," Pouting, I got closer, "Since we're gonna see each other again, it's 'See you later'." I then gave him a short, but firm, handshake, and he returned it.

"I see… See you later, then. Good luck in your training from now on. If I ever visit the house again, I'll come see how you're faring."

"Thanks for helping me today, Masahide-san. Good luck to you too!" Smiling widely at him, then he ended our handshake and went to the door.

Maya-nee told me to sit down and then the teacher entered the room, who then bowed down to both of them. Waving at them, Masahide-san waved back with another smile as he left, as Maya-nee also did before closing the door.

Stranger

A/N: And we've reached the end of this batch. Answering some of the last reviews, I know this is a great diversion from the plot but I feel like this has to be placed now.

Those who read it before should remember how sudden Takeru's paranoia was, how most of the stuff related to Native was kept behind bars, and, how a reader aptly put it, most of the cast was falling to the Awful Truth trope before. It ain't perfect, but I'm trying to fix that with the constant flashbacks.

Yes, I know many would rather have me jump into Sadogashima but I don't wanna have some sections come out of left field later. Also, fair warning, there's still two flashback chaps left, those who read D&R should know what's ahead and how it plays into the Paranoia arc.

Won't make any promises about lenght and pacing, one of the next chaps is gonna be huge again so it'll take time until I post again. Sorry if these chapters drag on.

As always, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

Chapter 54: Stranger

---

June 1 st . 06: 5 2 PM.

(Dojo. Koubuin House.)

[Native Takeru]

---

"Ugh!" I take a step back, avoiding Mion's attack.

"What is it, Takeru? You're not afraid now, are you?" She taunts me, smirking much.

"Of course not, you dumb pickle!" I raise my sword and go at her.

Mion starts pushing me back again, but I slowly stop attacking, watching her moves. When I think I see an opening, I take a sidestep and send a slash at her wrists. She blocks it and then does a follow up, hitting me in the chest.

"Another victory for Mion," Kazora-san says from the sides, "Shirogane, I believe I told you to stop doing those sidesteps. During a kendo match you must face your opponents frontally."

"I still do, I just dodge her attacks."

"No, you should not. What did I tell you before? Think as if you were fighting on a bridge, you cannot move to the sides in such a case."

"Mmgh…"

"Well, let us proceed. Shion, now you shall spar against Mion. Maya, I'll leave them in your care," Maya-nee nods as the pickles get in position, "Shirogane, come with me to the other end."

I follow him, sighing heavily. I'm totally spent today. My teachers said it was time to give me some tests to see how much I learned in this week. Back in school, I used to think that tests that have a lot of questions were super scary. But today I learned something real nasty. Exams that have only a few questions are way scarier.

They only had three or less questions, and most stuff wasn't like the exercises in the books. I think I didn't do very well in them. And I still can't do well enough in the dojo, Mion and Shion won super fast and move really well too.

Kazora-san stops walking, but doesn't get in the area where we usually practice.

"What is it, Kazora-san?"

"Tsukuyomi-sensei, Shirogane," Again with the narrowed brows, what's with him? "In any case, practice your swings and footwork here for the moment," He hasn't fought with me today yet. He's being kinda weird.

Oh well, whatever. I take a pose and start swinging the wooden sword. When Kazora-san claps, I do one more slash. When he whistles, I switch to another pose and do a different swing. Frontal downwards, frontal upwards, belly slashes, wide slashes.

"Haa… Haa… Sei!"

I inhale sharply with my nose as I keep practicing, trying to not break the flow. I can somehow taste my sweat in my mouth, my feet are as upset as a kitty falling into a pool full of water.

"Alright, that is enough."

"Haa… Phew… So how was today's training, Kazora-san?"

"… You simply refuse to refer to me as you should," He shakes his head, folding his arms, "Also, your footwork is still formless. Even when you reach a steady pace, your feet refuse to focus on a trail."

"… I don't get it. What's up with my feet?"

"As I said, you should try to fight as if you were fighting on a bridge, however your movements are… odd," Giving me a hard stare, he seems confused, "It's as if… you were wobbling. Instead of being quiet in position, why must you sway from left to right?"

"… What do you mean, why? I can't dodge if I don't move. How can I make good attacks if I only attack from the front?"

"Sigh… Shirogane, you should not take this approach. It is one thing to aim at your adversaries' sides, and another entirely to move sideways during a duel. Before advancing further, you have to master the basics."

"But in the mangas the samurais don't always have to face their enemies in a bridge. What if I have to fight in an open field one day?"

"While it is true that in a real fight you have to avoid your adversaries' attacks, you must first polish your form."

"But why can't I keep moving like this if in the end I'll have to do that?"

"Sigh… You should stop talking back, as well. This is the most proper way to learn, if you don't master the basics you will never progress further than that," He folds his arms, nodding to himself.

"… Fine, I'll try to stop moving like that."

"Now, do remember to keep your poise. It is understandable that you would be upset, however you must-"

"Not get angry. I know, Kazora-san."

He again shakes his head, "Then, let the teachings show in your actions Shirogane. Well then, let's see… It seems that duel is over with."

The Pickles had finished their duel, Mion was smiling while Shion puffed a cheek as they took off their headgear. So Mion won this time, huh?

"All right you three, that shall be all for today," Kazora-san said, "Us two shall remain here for some more moments," They then gave him a bow, Maya-nee looking straight at me.

"… Very well. Please do not be late for dinner, Father," Kazora-san groaned a bit, closing his eyes, "Shion, Mion, let us go to the changing room."

"Shirogane, we should also."

We all went to our changing rooms. Getting back into my comfy clothes, I joked with Mion once I got out, making Shion frown and say it was the last time she was gonna lose. I waved at the pickles as they left, Shion still pouting and marching away with loud steps as Mion giggled. Maya-nee nodded at me before closing the door.

"Shirogane, seiza," Kazora-san said, pointing in front of him as he sat down in the middle of the dojo. I sit in the way he taught me to, and look at him as he caresses the top of his head for a while, "Well… It has been a week since you started living here."

"Yeah… Are you going to give me a test too?"

"… One could call it that, yes," Hauu… Don't tell me it has just a few questions too. He then looked at me, resting his hands on his knees, "Shirogane, I am sure you already know what I am going to say."

"… That I'm not good enough," I puff a cheek and look away.

"Indeed. I know Yohime-sama would not agree with me, however I believe it would be better not only for you, but for the rest as well if you accepted your limitations," He insisted, twirling his beard.

"What do you mean, the rest? I'm not being bad, I'm not giving Maya-nee or the Pickles any trouble!"

"I know you have been behaving well these last days, but that is not what I am talking about. As a father and uncle, I simply cannot let this matter rest," He folded his arms, looking straight at me, "Allow me to cut to the chase. Shirogane, I suppose you are still determined to become a Royal Guard?"

"Yes."

He squinted his eyes really hard for a second before going back to normal, "Then, do you truly think yourself able to reach your goal with this lower than average performance?"

"… I am getting better."

"Indeed, but not fast enough. And if were you to fail, my daughters and Mion will be truly saddened, as well as Yuuhi-sama," He closes his eyes and breathes with his nose, then looks at me again without the scary eyes, "I do want you to know that I see what meager improvements you're making, however, they are in no way enough."

"But… I don't wanna give up."

"Have you thought about what I just said? How would the others take your failing?"

"Huh? I… I don't know…"

Stroking his beard, he looks up, "As much as I denied it, I can only admit your presence did help Shion and Mion to stop clashing with each other as they did before, as both Maya and Mana said."

"… They're still bickering all the time, though. Especially over the sweets."

"Well, yes, that is true," He then smiled and chuckled for a little while, "However, they're no longer as cold as they were when you first met them, are they?" Hmm… I nod as I fold my arms. They were kinda mean back then, "And precisely because of that, you need to give up on this dream of yours."

"Huh?! What has that to do with anything?"

"… More than you think. Simply put, if you were to be put in another role, you wouldn't be able to meet them as often as you do now. And I believe… they will suffer your absence much," He winced, his voice getting a bit harsh, "The same goes for Maya, of course. I believe it best for you to slowly take some distance from them and-"

"No!"

"Shirogane, it is rude to-"

"No! I'm not… I'm not going away. They… They said we would be like family if I pass these tests. Why do you want me to go away if you don't hate me?"

"… Do you truly love them as if they were your family?"

"Yeah! Maya-nee has been with me for a really long time, and the Pickles are also really good friends. Why do you want me to go away? Are you going to start screaming at me like when you came to my house?" I gulp as I wait for him to answer, feeling my breaths rush in and out and my heart beating really fast.

He sighs heavily, ruffling his hair, "If you truly do care about them, then think of how they will take your absence or your failure. I know you are but a child, but try to see the impact your words and actions have on others."

"Eh?"

The impact… on others… For some reason, my neck got all tight and I could feel a lot of ants walking on my back again.… I don't like that phrase.

"Shirogane?"

"I… don't like that word."

"Hm? It is the truth, however," He points a finger upwards, his tone getting slow but still serious, "They will be truly saddened to part ways with you, as you will be too, no doubt. And that will affect their daily performance, I am sure. However, before you retort as you always do, it is not only a matter of results."

"What do you mean? I've been doing my best, now what do I have to do?"

"… You still do not follow our rules as you should," He folded his arms again, "You do not refer to me as you should, do not speak as you should, and do not conduct yourself as you should during dinner, to give you some examples. It's as if you were an outsider instead of the fellow you should be."

… So he does think I'm a stranger. Am I that… different? I can't… do anything about that?

"That is why you should turn back before you and the rest end up suffering unnecessarily."

"Why… Why don't you believe in me? I can… I can be polite when I have to!"

"It is not about 'when' but about 'always' being polite. Maya has been sighing much lately, ever since you were made to live here. Care to guess why that happens?"

"Is it… my fault?" He nods slowly, "But I've… I've been good! I didn't fight or break anything!"

"That is a very low standard, if we can even call it that," He ruffled his hair and shook his head as Maya-nee sometimes does, "If you wish to be one of us, you should have been acting in image of our own ways. And it is clear that… you truly favor a more relaxed way of being. A Royal Guard must be polite and proper, and since you seem to not be able to even show some manners in your usual stance, people will continue to see you as an outsider."

"Really? But… But I've been trying to be good…"

"Frankly, I do not comprehend why Maya hasn't taught you formal speech after all these years," Shaking his head, again he sighs, "You need to always be polite, otherwise we must always be on the lookout to see whether you are getting yourself into trouble. Surely you do not wish to burden Maya or Yohime-sama any more, do you?" I nod, looking down, feeling a faint shiver in my neck, "If you truly dislike being forced to use such manners, if you are beginning to feel overwhelmed in the dojo or in your tests… Perhaps it would be for the best for you to be given a common role, where you won't need to shoulder as many burdens as you're asked to as of now."

"But I won't be able to stay with Maya-nee."

"… And if you keep clinging to them, you will only make the separation all the harder on all of you," He nods, looking straight into my eyes.

"Why do you keep saying that? Why don't you want me here, Kazora-san?"

"I said so already, you are not scoring good results, you are not acting as you should. This is nothing but a waste of time."

That's not true… I'm not a waste of time… I'm getting better…

"It is clear you are not adapting, and a mere month will do nothing to reeducate you. Setting such expectations on your shoulders is truly iniquitous, in my opinion."

"But I… I've been doing my best…" Looking down, a few tears come down to my hands as I clawed at my pants.

"Well, you are indeed making a commendable effort, but it is clearly not enough," He says, as cold as when we first met, as when he went to my house, "I highly doubt you'd change overnight. Therefore, I suggest you to evaluate if this is truly for the best. Not only for you, but for the others as well."

"Are you saying I'm… a bother to them?" Looking at him, another cold shudder came up my back when he nodded.

"Another plate of food on the table, all the teachers required to instruct you, but above all, the constant worry that you might say something out of place, all of it is clearly beginning to show."

"But I've been-"

"You need to show results, Shirogane," He harshly said, giving me another scary glare, "Waiting until the last day isn't an option, the choice will be sealed by then. If you cannot adapt soon, then you should stop chasing this futile dream of yours. That is all," He then stood up, and started to go to the door.

Following behind, not looking up from the ground, I couldn't even muster an answer. Feeling all cold, barely answering with hums on the table at Yuuhi's questions, she had to step on my feet to get an answer.

She and Yohime-san don't seem bothered now… But if I need to take part in those meetings… then one day, someone is gonna get angry at me, like the other samurais that still give me a nasty stare when I come and go on the hallways.

But what can I do? I can't speak as weird as them, I've been doing my best so far…

"Hey, Yuuhi?"

"Yes?"

"Um… How could I start talking better?"

"How? Well, by practicing, of course," She says, a wide smile in her, "If you don't employ what lessons you apprehend, you'd assuredly find yourself in a harsh plight indeed."

But that's what I've been doing, I've been studying and practicing a lot… And it's not enough…

"Is something the matter?" She tilts her head, a bit worried.

"No… It's nothing."

For her it's just obvious, talking like that. But for me… Since I'm different… I can't do it fast enough.

She kept asking me about some shows on TV, on the mangas I was reading back home, I answered as usual, trying to smile. But she isn't talking like when around Arisa, or even how the Pickles talk to her.

Maybe… I need to really work harder than my best… before it's too late…

June 3rd. Near Noon.

(Koubuin House. Takeru's classroom.)

---

Gripping the pencil really tightly, I return the evil stare of the problem as I pluck my lips. Mulling over what I could have done wrong, I retry the math.

But it still isn't giving me an answer. Both X and Y can't be negative in this case, right? Or was it the other way around? Stupid math, why does it has to be so complicated… Give me back my numbers, these letters are so dumb. Why do I gotta use letters in math?!

I groan a bit, deciding to leave that problem and start focusing on another.

"Uuh…" This isn't going like in the books. Then, what do I do?

Alright, let's try something else. If I can't reach the answer from this part, maybe I can reach it by backtracking from the last number that's in the question.

So, if this has to be more than that, and this one has to be positive…

… I wanna scream.

---

Around half an hour later…

---

"Well, the class is over. Shirogane, your test please."

"Uuh… Here," Sensei takes the papers and, without looking at them, she puts them in one of those brown folder things.

"I was expecting you to have some difficulty, however seeing you struggle this much is concerning," She says as she looks at me, arching her brows.

"… Is it really that bad?"

"If you're having this much trouble adapting, then your options look very bleak. Math is a key component in many of the possible roads you could be bestowed, so failing to meet this level of aptitude will assuredly close those doors."

"Eh?! T-Then… Um…"

"Worry not, we still have this month to prepare you. So, do reread what you found most complicated."

… That means I have to read everything again.

"Okay. I'll try… harder from now on," I give Sensei a bow and she smiles, playing with her hair as she grabs her purse and leaves the room.

I have been studying better, but these things are too hard. Dad… Mom… How did you pass these questions?

I thought I would have many small exercises like before, but there were only three. And they were more complicated than all the ones in the books so far. It's not fair, I didn't have anything like those to practice. How could I have known that they were going to have many different stuff on the same question?

Wait, maybe I could try to solve exercises in pairs? Like, having to get a right answer for both questions instead of solving them one by one? Oh! That might work! Hehehe, next time you won't win, you dumb test.

But writing why stuff happened is kinda hard. Sensei said I had to use 'proper' words when he read over my test, and I think I forgot some stuff.

I slowly rub my arms, Shion hit me so hard yesterday she gave me a bruise. She did apologize, but… I couldn't do anything. When they started using the Mugen whatever-it's-called I couldn't even parry. My swings simply didn't connect, it was like when I first met them.

All this time… I thought I was getting better…

"Takeru?"

"Oh, hi Maya-nee," I stand up, putting my case inside my bag, "You took some time to come here, did something happen?"

"… No, nothing of the sort," She taps her glasses, closing her eyes really slow, "Follow me, it is time for lunch."

As I put my bag on my back and got to her side, she swiftly closed the door and, without wasting a second, marched off to the dining room, without holding my hand as always, without looking at me, storming off so fast I had to speed up to not lose her.

"Takeru, I've something important to tell you," She said, barely gazing at me.

"Hm? What's up?"

"Today I shall be busy, so you should prepare to leave the classroom as soon as you finish your next classes."

"Oh… Okay," Nodding, I finally get to her side. But just when I was about to grasp her hand, she sped up again.

She does look kinda tired now compared to how she was back home. Maybe something's wrong today?

"Maya-nee, did you get in trouble?"

"Huh? Why would I be in any trouble?"

"Yesterday at dinner, Yohime-san was kinda weird, didn't talk much after all. And you spent a lot of time talking with her after dinner was over. You never leave me waiting alone in the hallway for that long."

"Sigh…"

"See? You're sighing a lot these days, too. Is it because of this thing you're busy with today?"

"It is nothing you should worry about, Takeru."

"… Am I giving you trouble?"

"What? Why would you think so?"

"I mean…"

"Takeru…" Maya-nee stops, crouches and places a hand on my cheek, "You are no trouble. There are some sudden matters I needed a detailed briefing on, nothing else."

"Really?"

"Yes, worry not," She ruffles my hair and then stands up, grabbing my hand again, "So, how did you fare in your tests?"

"… Not good, I think," I say as we begin to walk again, still not holding hands.

"I see. What did you find to be the most troublesome subject?"

I explained to her what I found weird about the exercises on the way. She remained looking forward in silence as I talked, until we reached my room. Leaving the bag near a wall, I walk up to my closet.

"And also, there were very few questions," I say as I take off my 'school' shirt, putting a more comfy one on, "The problems had me doing a lot of stuff so I got stuck many times."

"I see. And what of your history test?" She softly says, still seeming tired.

"Sensei said I did some things right, but that my writing wasn't proper enough," I puff a cheek, getting out of the room.

"I did tell you to beware of that habit of yours. Have you been practicing your writing?"

"Yeah, I did try harder than before… But I don't have time for everything."

Thanks to Masahide-san's advice, I can now study well without having to stay up late. Instead of just memorizing where stuff goes into a chart or in the questions, I talk with myself to see whether I can answer my own questions.

Sometimes, my Senseis here says I speak weird even when I'm right but I am getting the right answers so I don't care. It's still a lot of stuff, and I do miss some questions sometimes. But it's not as scary as I thought it would be.

Because there is an answer. I just have to find my way to explain what I read. But… But on the dojo is not the same.

And even with Masahide-san's advice, I can only do some things everyday. Tackling everything the adults tell me I need to is impossible. But… they said I'm not even close to what I should know to be a samurai… I'm sure Maya-nee and Yohime-san will be angry if I don't get better soon…

"Sigh… Well, you should focus on polishing your weaknesses," She isn't even looking at me, staring forward as she picks up her pace again, soundind tired and a little bored, "So, do you feel ready for the tests of this afternoon?"

"… No, but I'll do my best,"

We kept talking until we made it to the usual room. No one was there so we had lunch just the two of us, with her giving me more advice on how to study from now on before taking me back to the classroom.

---

Same Day. 05:52 PM.

(Classroom.)

---

"Ugh…" I can't think anymore… I'm at my limit.

"Hmm… Your writing seems to have improved ever so slightly, color me surprised," My linguistic teacher said as she looked over my test, "Well, you did manage to at least address all questions in detail, it seems."

"Yes… I did my best today."

"Good. Do remember to reread some exercises for next Friday. Until then," I stand up and give her a bow, she nods and, grabbing her purse and not even giving me another look or a goodbye, she leaves.

Crashing onto my chair and slumping into the table, feeling a pencil under my chin, I let out a long groan. This was nuts too. I think I was proper enough this time… My stomach grumbling, opening my mouth wide as I yawn, and my back turning into a race track for a cold shiver, I close my eyes for a little while as I stretch my arms.

"Takeru? Are you asleep?"

"Oh, Maya-nee."

She comes closer, but looks a bit upset, "I believe I had told you to quickly prepare to leave today, did I not?" She says as she grabs my notebook and puts in my bag, kinda too fast.

Oh, right. I forgot she told me she was busy.

I nod as I put my pencil case back in, and once I had everything in my bag Maya-nee quickly grabs my hand and leads me out of the room. It… kinda hurts.

"Maya-nee? What's wrong?" She looks weird. Her eyes are really sharp, and her steps are kinda fast too.

"Nothing, let us go to the dining room. By the way, today you won't be able to go to the dojo."

"Eh?! Why?"

"There is another important meeting arranged in the house for tonight, so Father, Shion and Mion, as well as me, are busy for this evening. And before you ask, you cannot be part of it."

"Why?" I pout at her, she sigh again while tapping her glasses.

"Because it is restricted only to those who are already members of the Royal Guards."

"The Pickles aren't samurais yet."

"But they belong to my family, so they have to be present. Sorry, but this time you truly cannot come with us," She remarked, sounding firm and serious this time.

… Just like Kazora-san said, since I'm not from a samurai family… I'm like a stranger here.

"… Is it because I'm bad?"

"Of course not. This is a more formal meeting for a very important fellow of us, so you simply cannot join, as many others in the house also won't."

"Okay… Then, I'm going to have dinner with the rest later?"

"No, as I said, we will be busy for today. You'll have your dinner delivered to your room later at night," She then picked up her pace, seeing that there was no one around, no longer looking at me.

"Then, what will I do until night?"

"You shall stay in your room. Use this free time to study well for the coming tests."

"… Yes."

We didn't talk any more on the way to the dining room. After she left me there, I ate alone, watched by a guard dressed in black, since Maya-nee was busy and couldn't stay. Once I finished, he took me back to my room. Then he told me, in a harsh tone and with an evil glare, that he would bring me my dinner and take me to the bath later tonight, and that I should remain in my room, that I shouldn't wander around or go to the inner gardens.

Left with nothing else to do, I started studying again, trying to solve the exercises how I thought to do before, but I stopped after a while.

They had an important meeting but Maya-nee still had to come pick me up. And she left so fast too. This time they didn't let me go with them. Am I really not a bother to them? Why did she seem so angry, then?

I look outside the window, to the darkening sky. Gazing at the sky in silence, feeling like crying or screaming but not finding any strength to, my legs buckle like paper under rain, I end up sitting on the floor as I look outside.

Did I do something bad? Or… I rest my hands on the glass, looking at the clouds. Maybe I am a stranger here, and Kazora-san was right? How did Dad manage to be accepted as a samurai by the rest?

"Sigh…" I look at the clock that I had brought from home. 07:33 PM, huh?

I open the window and go outside, as I usually do when I can't sleep since it's right by the side of the gardens in the back. Tiptoeing as slow as a turtle, to not make a sound, I peek around the corner of the wall. There's no one here, so I should be able to stay as always, right? They told me to not go to the central gardens, they said nothing about the one in the back.

I walk to it, drop myself on the grass, and then the smell of the garden reaches me while I'm looking up. Relaxing under the flowers' perfume, the clear sky looks so nice today… And, unlike from the window at home, I can see a lot of stars now.

My tests didn't go that well, Yohime-san is acting weird, Maya-nee seems angry again, and now they leave me here as if I had done something bad. Am I… really that much of a problem? What happened with the papers Koume-san had to present?

Kazora-san said I have to adapt quickly, that I won't be like them if I don't. What if… everybody in my class is like that? At least I had Sumika and the rest back home, but what if I can't make new friends? What if everyone thinks I'm strange?

I wanna do my best, I wanna be like Dad. But… I hug my sides, sniffing a bit. Feeling the cold wind of night rustling around, I again look at the sky and clouds.

"Dad, Mom, everything gonna be fine, r-right?"

Chapter 55: Lupine Seed

June 3rd. Near 9 PM.

(Koubuin House. Rear Gardens.)

[Native Takeru]

---

"Takeru-kun… Takeru-kun, wake up."

A faint voice whispers, something shakes my back a bit. Rustling my shoulders, my arms close up on me yet I don't find my sheets.

"Mmgh…" A cold wind blows, did I leave the window open?

"Takeru-kun, you have to wake up. Can you hear me?" The voice gets a bit louder, it feels as if it were lifting me off my bed.

"Ugh… Mmgh…" Five more minutes, Maya-nee… Why did she took my sheets off anyways?

A few fingers reach my cheek, pinching it softly. They're not cold, they don't stop pulling. Blinking a few times, yawning hard, my blurry gaze falls towards the person that was near.

"Good night, Takeru-kun," Masahide-san says with a smile.

"Masa… hide-san?" Huh… So he came to wake me up today… Wait, what? "… EH?! What are you doing here, Masahide-san?" And why is he wearing one of those old styled dresses, too? It's all in a strong red and white, unlike his samurai dress.

"That's my question. What were you doing sleeping on the garden?" Giving me a worried gaze, he helps me sit down.

"Sleeping?" I then look around, at the garden in the back, "Oh… Ahaha… I… came to watch the stars and then… I just closed my eyes for a second," Scratching my head slowly, looking down, I avoid his gaze. I don't even remember when I fell asleep.

"Sigh… You should be more careful. Had I not found you, it is quite probable that you would have fallen sick," He stood up slowly, offering me a hand, "So, where is your room?"

But then, I remained on the ground. Even if I go back there… it's all the same. I rather watch the stars for a while longer.

"… Is everything okay, Takeru-kun?" He asks, again with a worried gaze.

"… I don't wanna go back yet."

"What are you saying? Are you not feeling well?"

"No, but…"

"… Did something happen?" He sits back by my side, looking up to the stars.

Rubbing my eyes as I try not to yawn, bringing my legs closer, hugging my knees, a cold shiver goes down my back, and not because of the wind, "Well… I don't know."

"How do you mean? Did Maya-sama get upset at you?"

"I don't know," Couldn't help it and my voice creaked a bit.

"… Can you tell me what happened?" He looks at me for a moment, but I look down.

… Because he might say the same as the rest, since he's a red samurai. Again with the screams, with the mean gazes, saying I'm…

"Masahide-san, do you… think I'm a stranger?"

"Huh? Why would I?" Sounding surprised, he was raising a brow, "I know who you are, and you are the son of a fellow. You're no stranger, Takeru-kun."

"… Really?"

"Indeed. What has caused you to ask such a thing?"

"Well… Kazora-san says I'm like a stranger here, since I don't come from a samurai family and I'm too rude."

"Oh, I see…" Closing his eyes as he nods, seeming to understand why, I couldn't help but to feel a needle on my heart, "Then, are you still wishing to remain here?" Giving me a through gaze, he seemed a bit worried again.

"Yeah… I wanna be a samurai, I don't wanna give up yet. Masahide-san, was Dad also a stranger when he came here?"

He then grimaces, looking up, "… I believe he was treated as one, at first. Some of his fellows weren't… very welcoming towards 1st Lt. Shirogane," Sounding really sad, but then his gaze shone again as usual, "However, your father remained undaunted at the challenge. Never returned the words of those who saw him as a stranger, never did that affect his performance in the slightest. Your father… truly was a most amicable fellow," Slowly, a smile appeared in his face.

We both looked up at the stars in silence for a moment. But if Dad could do that… "Then… D-Do you think I could be like that too?"

"Why would you not?" He answers immediately, giving me a puzzled stare, "I was under the impression Yohime-sama allowed you to stay here, and you are being instructed under Maya-sama's care."

"Yeah… But… I think that I'm giving them trouble," My gaze falls to the ground, my fingers drawing circles on the grass.

"Have you argued with someone lately?"

"No, it's not that…"

"Then, whatever could be troubling you?"

"… You won't get mad?"

Raising a brow at first, he then nods, "I give you my word, I shan't become upset."

"You promise?" I stare, hugging my elbows really tight, but he nods with another smile.

Then, while still drawing circles on the grass, stealing glances at him, I tell Masahide-san of how my scores in the last tests weren't good at all, of how Maya-nee and Yohime-san seem to be more distant and in a bad mood lately, and of how today they left me in my room as if I were being scolded.

Sinking my chin onto my knees, another cold shiver runs down, "That's why… maybe I'm giving them trouble now, and… since I'm a stranger they might want me to go away soon."

"… I see, so that's what made you worry so," He didn't get upset, he made a rather sad face instead.

"Yeah… They're being weird. So, I came to see the stars for a while, to think on what I could do," Furrows my brows, puffing a single cheek, I give one punch to the grass, "But I couldn't find an answer… And then I fell asleep."

"… Then, does that mean that you would like to return to your prior house?"

"No!" Giving him a nasty stare, he flinches back a bit, "I don't wanna leave… but I don't wanna give Maya-nee and Yohime-san trouble."

Nodding as he coughed, he spoke up slowly again, "In that case, you'll have to redouble your efforts. Sadly, that is all you can do as of now. It would be truly a shame if you didn't reach your goals after all 1st Lt. Shirogane did for you."

"… Did Dad talk about me when he worked?"

"Hm? Well, not with everyone, but he did mention you much in his free time," Smiling again, relaxing onto the grass, he again looks to the stars, "He truly did his utmost effort to be better, thinking on your wellbeing. Which is why this conundrum is truly saddening, since there is no simple answer to your plight."

"… What does conun… what does that mean?"

"Oh, it is another word for situation in this case," Scratching a cheek, he gives me a nod, "Sadly, just as he did, you can only buckle down and push forward if you truly wish to become a model Royal Guard."

"I see…" Sigh… So there are no secrets or anything, it's all in how hard I try. But I've trying really hard all these days, "Masahide-san, how could I stop being a stranger?"

"Hm? Well… I suppose you should try to employ our words first. If you mend your manners, people will have less motives to seclude you."

"… I don't think I can talk as weird as that."

"Haha, it is a matter of creating a habit. Your father managed to be proper enough, despite never employing a speech as formal as mine," Giving me another small smile, he starts ruffling my hair, "If he could do so, I am sure you'll be able to as well."

"Really? You really believe that?"

"Yes, it might take some time but you will surely be able to improve so long as your efforts do not wane," He leaves his hand on my head for a moment, making a serious face as his tone also did, "Even if it might seem impossible as of now, you'll assuredly be able to grow more comfortable with our way of speech in time."

"But what if people still say I'm bad?" I know Kazora-san is kinda right, since I do tend to talk back without realizing, and my words aren't like theirs either, but… but I've been trying. He did say he knew I was trying, and he did give me some advice but…

"However, no one has been unnecessarily harsh towards you, right?"

"… But they're mean. I'm doing my best, and all they say is that I'm bad," Can't help but to pout, remembering how much Kazora-san goes in circles every time he lectures me.

Again ruffling my hair, his voice softens up, "I'm certain people here are only wishing for you to adapt faster, which is why they reiterate their lessons and double down on your sore points. Even I had to go through this at one point."

"Really?"

Chuckling, he moves his hand in circles, "Indeed. My initial kendo lessons were truly arduous for me, and I was also made to learn Keigo to its perfection," Still smiling, his eyes remain on me for a second, "Do not be discouraged, you're certainly on the right path."

"… Thank you, Masahide-san. But… Do you think I can be a samurai?"

"Why wouldn't you be able to? Are you still having trouble studying?"

"Well, that too… But I still haven't won at the dojo, and Mion and Shion seem so strong… I don't know what else to do."

"Have you been minding your steps as I recommended?"

"Yeah, but I can't win. If I stay defending, they start attacking me really fast and I lose. If I attack, they always take that step back and try to knock my sword away. And Kazora-san said I have to start dueling with them seriously… But I don't know what to do." Can't help but to puff my cheeks, hugging my knees really tight again.

Masahide-san then closes his eyes, beginning to groan really hard. Lost in thought for a long while, his arms crossing a bit, a lone finger went up and down that weird spike he has on his hair. Then, he suddenly smiled.

"… Takeru-kun, you liked folktales, if I recall correctly?"

"Oh, yeah. But they're all very weird."

"Haha, is that so? So, do you know of the tale of the duel between Masamune and Muramasa?"

"Hmm… Oh! Those were the names of some legendary swords, right?"

"Of the forgers of said swords. Do you know the tale of their duel?"

"No, I didn't knew they dueled. So, which one won?"

"Well… It depends on your point of view."

"Huh? What does that mean?"

"Well, allow me to tell you the story of how Masamune and Muramasa had a duel to see which one's sword was the finer one. The tale goes as such," And so, he begins to narrate the story

" They both went to a river, and prepared themselves to slash its surface with one of the swords they themselves had forged. Muramasa's blade cleaved through the riverbed, slicing water, boulder, and fish alike in one fell swing, sending them crashing to each side. It is said the mountain from where said river had been born was also made to suffer the brunt of the attack. A testament of the blade's sharp edge and violent prowess.

Yet, when it was time for Masamune to attack, his slash did a much calmer slice. The water parted calmly to each side and the boulders were also splintered. However, the fish within the stream were left unharmed in their stride. That was not only due to Masamune's self control, but due to the nature of his blade. For it was not meant to be a destructive weapon, but one made to protect others. Only destroying its target and harming nothing else, with clear precision."

Coughing once, he leaves the silence hanging for a second, "… So, which one do you think won the duel, Takeru-kun?"

"Hmm… I mean, Muramasa's blade is the more powerful one, right?"

"Indeed, that would be the case."

"Hmm… But, Kazora-san says the samurais have to protect the people. Then, that means they need a sword that doesn't harm everyone, right?"

"Well, that could also be the case. So, which one do you think is the victor?"

"… I don't know," He starts chuckling, I pout back, "Don't laugh! Which one did win?"

"Well, it depends on who you ask. Different sources cite different outcomes to the duel. However, the worth of the tale isn't in it's resolution," Covering his mouth as he coughed again, no longer smiling, he got all serious and I gulped nervously as he stared, "Look Takeru-kun, there will be times where you will have to be like the Muramasa. Cleaving through everything in your way, no matter what stands before you. At other times, you will need to employ the moderation of the Masamune and remain serene and at peace."

"This is just like what Kazora-san tells me. I already know that," Sourly pouting, I look away.

"Yes, I remember. However, there will also be times where you will have to be both at the same time."

"Huh? Both?"

"Indeed. There will be times where… people won't listen to you, no matter what words you employ," Looking down, this time he grimaced really, really hard, his voice crumbling for a second, "At some point, you will be faced with a dilemma that cannot be solved by serenity nor aggressiveness on their own. Then, when faced with such a situation, you will have to be as fierce as the Muramasa but as calm as the Masamune,"

"… I don't get it," Why do they always have to speak in riddles? How could I be both calm and angry at the same time?

"In your case, you need to learn to be polite and proper, but without losing heart at the adversity," Patting my head, he comes back to a calmer tone, "Even if you are a 'stranger' for many as of now, you should remain as determined as you were, but ignoring their words. You need to tackle what is giving you the most trouble with all your might, without letting it ruin what's around you.

"So… I need to slash the mountain in half without harming the fish on the river?"

"Pfft… Ahaha! Yes, indeed. That is precisely it," Still chuckling, he nods, "Keep doing your best, but without falling to anger. Keep being as you are, but using more polite words every day. When you feel exhaustion setting on, don't push yourself and rest well. In the dojo, try to remain on the offensive but without compromising your steps, without giving anyone an opening to strike your blade away. I believe Maya-sama's style was based on such a principle. The best defense is a great offense."

"Oh, she did say that once."

I think she did, with that weird poem she once told to Shion. How was it? Uh… The advice to move better… It was… Striking like a waterfall or something, right? Um… Yeah, it was 'attack like an unending waterfall', I think.

"So, I have to attack without lowering my defense, right?" He smiles, nodding a few times. Seems like I got it right.

"Indeed. However, the road that awaits you is truly a perilous one," Staring at me, he remarked in a scary tone, "If you wish to become a Royal Guard, you will need to learn to not react to the mean words many will say, and you will need to get used to such level of study. And that will take time."

"But I don't have time."

"That is not true. You still have a month at your disposal, do you not?"

"Well… Yeah. But Kazora-san said I need to show results now, that I can't wait until the end of the month."

Sighing really hard, he pats my shoulder, "Then, focus on what you can do now. If you begin to think that you're going to fail, all you'll achieve is decrease your morale."

"But I don't know how to get better. I'm trying hard to learn more… but everything is still so complicated."

"Hmm… Oh, I know. I will have to stay in the House for the time being so, would you like me to aid you in your studies during my free time?"

"Eh? Really? I won't be bothering you?"

"Of course not, it could also be a way to relax for me. Perhaps, we could read some books together after we are done with this studying sessions?"

"Really? Thanks a lot, Masahide-san! But… Are you sure? I'm not bothering you?"

Then, he again pets my head, "You're no bother, Takeru-kun. I'm the one offering so, would you welcome my help?"

"Yeah! Thanks a lot, Masahide-san!" Then I leap forward, giving him a hug.

"C-Come on, you do not need to shout."

"Oh, sorry. But thank you very much, really," Slowly letting him go, I give him a bow and a bright smile, "Your explanations were more clear than Maya-nee's, so please come study with me if you can."

"Is that so? Are Maya-sama's methods hard for you?"

"No, it's not that…" Crossing my arms, I furrow my brows, "Maya-nee speaks really weird sometimes, and always tells me to do things in one way. Your advice was easier to understand, and you tried to explain things in different ways when I didn't get something."

"I see… Didn't you ask Maya-sama to do that for you?"

"Yeah, I tried… but then she got mad, saying her teaching wasn't… flawed?" I tilt my head as I look at him. He nods at me, and I nod back, "So, she got really mad that I wanted to do something in a different way. I don't really get why, though."

"Sigh… I suppose she must want you to learn her way," Placing a hand on his head, he makes a troubled face for a moment, "Well, worry not for I shall come to aid you in the weekends. So, please do not lose heart from now on."

"Yeah, I'll keep doing my best! But, why are you coming here? Will you help Maya-nee with her work?"

"Something of the sort, yes. Now that some time has passed since my return from the frontlines, it is time for me to resume my duties… Sigh."

"Why are you sighing, too? By the way, why are you in this dress?"

"Well… I had an important meeting here tonight," He barely whispers out, sounding tired all of a sudden.

"Oh, is it that thing that got Maya-nee all nervous? Is that why you're dressed like the old people?"

"Yes, that would be it. However, was Maya-sama truly anxious today?"

"Yeah, she was in a rush since morning. Why?"

"No, it is merely surprising to hear. I believe I told you we both were trained together before, right?" I nod, he continues, "So, I'm not accustomed to seeing her troubled by any task."

"She never had bad grades?"

"By goodness, no. Maya-sama was one of the best of our generation. To think she would be troubled…"

"I see," Well, Maya-nee is awesome, "But, what kind of meeting did you have? Is it your birthday?"

"Oh… No, it isn't something as cheerful as that," Looking down, clouded by sadness, he sighs again, "You see, today a celebration was held to announce my proper return to my duties after having gone to fight."

"I see… So it was a party for important samurai?"

"Yes, indeed. It was like a welcome party, I suppose."

"And did it went well? Did you have fun?"

But then, grimacing again and really hard, he hunches over, "I do not truly know…

"… Why? Did you fight with someone?"

"Eh? Well… You truly are good at guessing, huh," Then, he chuckles a bit.

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, your father once mentioned that despite your unassuming character you tend to be rather sharp when least expected."

"… I'm always doing my best, that's mean," Pouting, I give him a mean stare, which only makes him chuckle more.

"I'm certain that's the case. So, well… You see, I had a slight disagreement with someone, so I came here to clear my head for a moment."

"What happened?" To make him look so worried, for his voice to creak like a log throw in a fire…

"Sigh… Worry not, it is mine own problem."

"Why? You helped me out, why can't I lend you a hand?" Getting closer, I hold his stare, firmly as when I argue with Maya-nee over my homework.

Smiling a bit, moving slowly and with his eyes still clouded, he gave me a nod, "Thanks for caring. Well, do you know what the Head of a House is?"

"Um… Those were the leaders, right? Like Takahisa-san."

"Huh… So you also knew him."

"Yeah, he was really awesome. Did you fight with him against the monsters?"

Smiling brightly for a second, he nodded firmly, "Indeed, it was an honor to me," Serious, firm and… wistful, he looked up, "Well, the matter is, my parents are wishing for me to become the Head of my House."

"Eh?! But… Aren't you really young? Don't you have to be older and have a mustache to be a leader?"

"… Why a mustache in particular?"

"I mean, Kazora-san and Bazora-san sometimes cut their beards but never their mustaches. Aren't they kind of important?"

"… Ahaha, I suppose that for the elders they are, indeed," He keeps chuckling, ending in another sigh, "However, regardless of my age, it is a family custom. A new Head has to be appointed soon, and… well, many are wishing me to be the one to take the role."

"And why are you troubled about it? Aren't you a good samurai?"

"I'd like to believe I am… But, to become a Head, it is recommended to take a wife beforehand."

"So you have to form a family first?"

Eyes almost closing, very slowly he shakes his head, "It isn't like that in the slightest. I'm merely required to find a partner, nothing else."

"But… But you have to like the person you're with, right?"

"That… is it precisely, the core of this conundrum," Eyes closed for a moment, his voice froze all over, "You see, my parents are wishing for me to take someone in particular as my lady wife, and I'm, well, not entirely in agreement with them, is all."

"Do you hate that person?"

"No, nothing of the sort!" He says, a bit agitated, "It is nothing like that… I… do find that person most charming, truth be told."

"So you love her, then?"

His brows furrow a bit as he groans, "I cannot ascertain that, not entirely. While I am attracted to Kaori-sama… and I do admire some traits in her, the manner in which I'm being told to proceed is troubling me."

"… I don't get it. If you like her, what's the problem?"

"Hmm… How could I explain this to you?" Again groaning for a while, he fumes a bit, "Well, one could say that it isn't as if I'm choosing her, but as if the choice was being forced on me. Since I need a partner to be eligible for the position of Head of my House, I'm being somewhat pushed into taking Kaori-sama as my lady wife."

"But why do you not want to be with her?"

"That's not it. You see… Since many are being sort of mean towards her, she can't truly refuse," Sighing again, this time deeply and hunching over, his saddened eyes cannot look up, "Due to her being scared of the whispers of the rest, she didn't listen at all to my words when I tried to deflect the conversation or give her some reassurance. She firmly insisted on politely extending an invitation towards me as if I were her superior, and I could barely muster enough willpower to say I'd think about it," Sighing again, wincing as if he had a knife stuck on his chest as he ran a hand over his face, he finally looked up, "Which is why, if I go down this path as she is now, Kaori-sama… won't truly love me, she'd be choosing me out of fear, she'd remain docile to not upset me regardless of what I say. Oh, sorry. This must have gone over your head."

"So… Uh… The other samurais are being mean to her, and since she's scared that they'd get mad if she says no, you think she doesn't like you?"

He stares at me wide eyed for a second, "Well, precisely. However, there is little I can do to aid her. Furthermore, it is in my best interest to become engaged," Tugging at his dress, arms crosses tightly, he sighs once more, "Finding someone else with boons to rival hers will be impossible, and I do not wish to cause any further divisions in the Guard. So, well, I'm conflicted on the matter. Perhaps my parents are in the right and I should heed their advice, and merely accept this is what would be better for my future…"

"But… But that's horrible!" He twitches, seeming shocked, "She's gonna be sad if you act like the others, and then she'll really think you're like the bullies."

"Eh? Ah… I suppose…"

"You like her, right? Why don't you help her?"

"… I do admit I find her charming," His cheeks get a bit red as he looks away, running a hand over his hair, "However, it is also true I need to look over my House. And while I'd be elated to have a fine a woman as Kaori-sama as my lady, there is little I can do as of now for her. She didn't move from her stance when we talked moments before, after all."

"But you're helping me out. If she's a samurai, why can't you lend her a hand too?"

"… It isn't as if I didn't want to… However, what could I do? I'm still young, and have little to no influence here," Hunching over again, his whisper almost fades out, "How could I possibly aid Kaori-sama in her woes as I am without upsetting my parents?"

"What is Kaori-san having trouble with? Is she also bad at manners?"

"Haha… No, she's actually older than myself, and more talented than me in all honesty."

"Huh?! But… If she's so good, why do the others treat her badly?"

"Well… You could say her job is the simplest of them all. Kaori-sama is merely a patrol guard on the Castle your father and I worked at before, and take into account that both of us had more responsibilities at the time than those she has as of now," Getting all serious, and quite a bit angry, he fumes while nodding, "This makes others look down on her, and she has other…" He frowns for a second, seeming really angry, "troubling circumstances that make many speak grave unpleasantries behind her back."

Huh… So she's older but has a worse job than Masahide-san, and many speak badly of her… Oh, I know! This is like how some people are mean to Haruna-san back home, saying she has a bad job despite being older, how those bullies say mean things about me and Sumika in whispers, or how some teachers think they're better because they teach harder classes. I still remember how the history and chemistry teachers began fighting during the last cultural festival, one saying 'hard science' was better for our class theme than… philosophy, was it?

Hmm… So the samurais have mean bullies too, huh. Since Kaori-san has a job they think sucks, they are being mean to her. And since she's scared people will treat her worse, just like Sumika was when we met, she simply nods and says yes, afraid to make Masahide-san angry. Which is why Masahide-san is worried, he doesn't know if she really likes him because she's always saying yes. Just like how Sumika was when we met, she's too scared to be his friend openly.

But that means there's an easy solution to this problem!

"Then, all you have to do is being by her side. If she isn't alone anymore, the bullies won't be mean to her, right?"

"It isn't so simple. I'm in no position to aid her since I'll be staying here and she'd be in the Castle," Barely speaking again, his eyes again cloud over.

"But why can't she work with you here? Maya-nee seems really tired, so I'm sure she could use some more help."

"No, it isn't- A moment, working with me?"

"Yeah, why can't she work here? If she's really good, and Maya-nee or you need a hand, she could help you out. And you'd be helping her out that way too!" Just like how me and Sumika do when we help each other in the classes we have trouble with, and the same goes for when we work with Jouji and the others.

Looking up, mouth half open, he remains quiet for a while. Blinking really fast, his eyes widen like Mion's when she sees cake, "That… could actually work… However, I doubt my parents would agree… They already reprimanded me quite harshly for not gaining an affirmation, and in no way do I have the power to request her transfer on a whim…" And he deflates again.

"Why don't you ask Yohime-san, then? If she takes your side, everything will be fine, right?"

"However, were I to request such a thing out of her… I fear my parents won't take kindly to it, and there's the chance that she'd disagree too. I'd be out of place for me, to have the gall to make such a request."

"But… But Yohime-san really kind… And you would be asking this to help Kaori-san. If you do nothing, then what will happen to her?"

Eyes close up, as his heart seems to do too, "… I do not know. Perhaps I should merely accept my shortcomings and bring her under my wings. That may be the only choice I have left."

"But if you do that, everybody will still be mean to her!" Pulling his arm, he again seems shocked at my sudden yelling, "If you don't help her out, won't she think you see her like the rest? Won't she believe you're just another bully?!"

His face twists in fear, quickly looking away, "H-However, there isn't much I can do. Even if I try to speak with Yohime-sama…"

"But then she's gonna be really sad… Did you not say she couldn't refuse?"

"… Yes," Whispering it out, he weakly nods, "She has many reasons to accept and few to refuse."

"And if she says yes, she'd think you're like a bully, right?" He nods, eyes focused on the grass, "Then, what happens if a mean samurai talks with her?

His hands freeze, seems like he stopped breathing for a moment, "You mean… if someone else invites her to a meeting?"

"Well… You said she can't refuse, right? Can't the bullies force her to go along with them?" Just like those dumb kids tried to do with Sumika when I had just transferred, until I kicked them.

"Ah… I suppose…" Biting his lips, one of his hands shakes a bit as it rests on his stomach, "I suppose she'd have no choice but to agree… if they threaten her with spreading further unpleasantries were she to refuse."

"But you don't want that, right?" After a while, he nodded, "So, if you help each other out, then the mean samurais won't treat her badly again. She'd have a nice job and you'd have another friend! Then, you could ask her if she really wants to be with you."

"… Yes, I suppose you're right," He looks up, his voice regaining some impulse, the fog clearing away from his eyes once he nods, "If I could gain Yohime-sama's support, then this would be easy enough to deal with. Sigh…" But then, gloom blooms in his face again, "I wonder if I could have milady agree to this so suddenly, however…"

"Don't get all down, you won't make Kaori-san smile if you give up so easily!"

"Eh? Making her… smile?"

"Yeah, Dad told me that I had to try hard to make the people I like smile, to not give them trouble. You wanna make Kaori-san smile, right? Wasn't she gonna be your wife?"

"W-Well, that isn't set in stone yet… However, I do wish to aid her… and she is most charming whenever she smiles… Yet, to spawn even more discord within us…"

"You're already a samurai and a fellow, right? And… and… you fought the m-monsters and survived, right? So… So you can do this, I'm sure. Yohime-san wouldn't let people be mean to someone if she knew about it."

"Yes… I do think she'd agree, if I manage to present the matter tactfully enough. I suppose that, if I wish to bring a change to our fellowship, my veneer must remain strong. Sigh… I wonder if I can do this…"

"Come on!" Again pulling his arm really hard, I pout at him, "Dad told me that you gotta try hard for the people you care about the first time he was in the black dress. You're already a samurai, so people will hear you out. And you can actually help out… unlike me…" Letting go of his arm, I scratch my head for a second, "So you have to try at least. She must be feeling cold and lonely… You can't leave your wife all alone like that, Masahide-san!"

Then, he gags on air, seeming to stammer as his face gets more crimson than his dress, "T-That has not been decided yet."

"But you love her, right?"

"Well… I shan't deny that I do find her most attractive… yet I don't know if I can call this love," He folds his arms, looking away.

"You adults are so weird and complicated… You like her and want to help, right?"

"… I do admire her, besides my views of her figure. And yes, it doesn't sit right with me to remain idling, to simply prey upon her vulnerability… I suppose I do wish to bequeath a smile to her future if I could, regardless of how this affair of my House is resolved," Breathing in deeply, sighing really hard again, this time he smiles again, "Thanks, Takeru-kun. For reminding me what your father had taught me."

"Huh? What did Dad tell you?"

"About how he wished to keep you safe, to bestow a smile to your future," Ruffling my hair again, slower than before, a small ember was now in his eyes, "You're absolutely right. I may not hoist love towards her, but aiding Kaori-sama is something I desire to do, to bring forth a change in our fellowship. And I was allowing my insecurities to blind me once more… Thank you kindly, for reminding me of my own resolve."

"What is this about a change? Is this your new mission?"

"No, it is a personal goal of mine. Hmm… In your terms, I'd like to have the 'mean samurais' stop acting so harshly towards the rest. However, it is most disheartening to see many do not hear 'my' words and merely nod along to not upset me."

"And what about all that of being firm? On the weird code to not falter and all that?"

"Ahahaha… I suppose you've won this round," And again, he pats my head, "Indeed… I should act on mine own words as well. Little might be my power, yet I cannot surrender without struggling first."

"Yeah, do your best! I'm not giving up either, so you can't quit."

"Ahaha… Indeed, we cannot falter so easily. Well, I suppose I should be going to Yohime-sama posthaste. So, might I ask how did you come here on your own?"

"Eh…" Crap, he might get mad… And if he tells Yohime-san, she might instead. Scratching the back of my head, I look up to the stars, "W-Well… I opened the window and got out of my room, since I couldn't see the stars well from there."

"Sigh…" Smiling again, he slowly shakes his head, "You should return before Maya-sama notices you're gone."

"Yeah… It is getting cold, too."

He smiles as he offers me a hand to stand up, and once I do I dust my pants off as he does to his dress. Then, I heard some footsteps getting closer. Looking at the wooden steps and hallway that were close by, I saw a rather tall woman coming closer.

She descended the wooden steps into the garden, and her eyes widened as she us. Dressed in a cerulean kimono, with lily hair like Yohime-san's but with sharp spikes on the sides like Masahide-san's one, her purple eyes worriedly scanned him up and down as she hurried closer, shrugging her lips really tight.

"… Masahide? Whatever are you doing there?" She says, sounding both angry and worried.

"Sigh… I am merely resting," His voice lost all energy, now he was rubbing his forehead as he placed himself between me and the woman.

"Masahide-san, who is she?" I peek at her from behind him, waving a hand towards her when our eyes met.

"What on the Heavens is a peasant doing in the gardens?" She frowned really hard, giving me the evil eye, her tone cold and harsh like the other mean samurais I sometimes see in the hallways. I see… So she thinks I'm a stranger…

"Sister, I suppose you were sent to take me back to the hall? Let us go," He says, now sounding a bit upset, as he took a step forward.

"Eh? Ah, indeed," And she immediately agreed, nodding. But then, she gave me another mean glare, that I returned this time, "Allow me to tell you Kaori was looking for you, I believe it is imperative you gain confirmation for a meeting," She said, imposingly and firm, as she gave him a stare.

"Look Sister… I'd be wishing to deal with this matter on my own terms," He affirmed, holding his ground. She arched her brows, looking upset.

"What nonsense are you saying? Her eyes were clearly stuck to your back as you left the hall, and she even came to inquire with me about your whereabouts as I was on my way. Waste no more time, the chance you were awaiting is right in-"

"Don't be mean to Masahide-san! He just wants to help Kaori-san," I yell, giving her a mean look. He seems to twitch, she again frowns.

"… The gall… How dare you raise your voice at me…"

"Sister, please let it go. I am in a hurry as it is," He then grabbed my hand, a bit too tightly.

"Masahide-san, are you in trouble?" He said sister, so she's his family. But she's being really mean… Maybe she's one of the mean samurais.

"No, nothing of the sort. Now, we should return to your room," He then took some steps towards the small wooden stairs.

But she placed herself in front of him, locking her fire-filled eyes on me, "Wait a moment. You, child. Do you not know how to address your elders? Apologize this instant, or else."

W-What's with her? She was the one who started it… Seeing I was keeping quiet, she let out some air, her frown blooming into a scowl, the small embers turning into wildfire. Hiding behind Masahide-san, I looked down. Why? I just defended him…

"Sister, please. He's but a child."

"Nonsense. Why should you tolerate such disrespect?" Even her voice is a flamethrower, "No, why is a peasant even allowed to be in the gardens of the Koubuin House in the first place? We should report this to the patrols at once."

"… You will not do anything of the sort," His voice sounding really cold, her eyes seemed to widen for a moment, "The child was merely stargazing with me. That is all."

"Still… This should not go unpunished. To let their children roam freely on the Main House…" Her hands were sinking into her arms with too much force, once more she gave me another nasty glare, "It would set quite a foul precedent. The child has to be admonished for his mistake."

"I did nothing wrong. I just came to see the sky," I quickly retorted, and she again frowned.

"You shan't speak to me in such a way. Such disrespect… How dare you talk back to someone of my station… This shall be reported to-"

"Sister, that's quite enough. Move aside, I'll take him to his room."

"What? Are you suggesting to let this baseborn's defiance go unpunished? I am merely-"

"Sister…" Again, his voice got all cold, she seemed to flinch. For some reason, despite being taller than him, his sister doesn't want to make Masahide-san angry, "He is only a child. Please, do not let your temper flare up so," He pats my head, ruffling it again.

She then sighs, her gaze drifts away as she loses her tension, and the fire goes out, "… You're right, I shouldn't pay any mind to a baseborn's prattling," She nodded, he grimaced.

"I'm not a baseborn… whatever that means. My name is Takeru!"

"Takeru-kun, you shouldn't speak up in such a way," He asked, looking tense and worried, face full of wrinkles.

"But she's being mean. I didn't do anything to her," Puffing my cheeks, I give her another glare. I'm just trying to help you, but she hasn't stopped to talk badly to both of us.

"That might be so, but remember that you must not let words spur a reaction from you."

"Mmgh… But she started it," Sighing, he pets my head slowly.

"Hmph… How was this child raised to have such lacking manners?" The woman folded her arms, looking very angry, "This is why we shouldn't let the inductees bring their families to the Main House, they're nothing short of a hindrance, an unnecessary burden on our shoulders."

… Huh? A burden… I'm… a burden to the rest? But… But I've been trying…

"I'm not a burden! I'm doing my best to be good!"

"Pah! You're not even worth the air you breathe," Scowling, another fire blast roared in her eyes, "Someone like you has no place in this house."

"But… But…"

"Sister, that's quite enough. I'll return to the hall after taking him to his room, so let this matter rest." He firmly said, taking another step forward.

However, she rose her chin as she stared right at me with those eyes full of fire, exploding into a voice filled with smoke and embers, as if something were burning the inner parts of my ear, "What madness are you saying? It is clear that this is nothing short of a burden on our shoulders, to have to withstand the rudeness of the baseborns in our own houses. Such disrespect should not be tolerated, this coarse peasant has no place in the Koubuin Main House!"

I've no place here? But… But I've been trying… Yohime-san said I wasn't going to leave…

"Sister, you shall-

"Sniff… Hic… I… I'm not a burden…" Shaking as tears ran down my cheeks, my throat felt like it was closing and I began to choke.

"Takeru-kun, it's alright. Don't cry…" Masahide-san crouches by my side, wiping my tears and running a hand over my cheek.

"Oh, and now he begins to cry…" She said, in that same angry tone, "Sigh… This is why commoners shouldn't be here, he's nothing but an eyesore to us."

Ugh… That's not true… I've been… trying… Hic…

"Sister, that's enough!"

"W-What… Why are you this adusted towards me? The boy is just a peasant's child, I only reprimanded him as anyone would. He should not be here, that is all."

"Why are you so mean with me?! I didn't do anything bad to you!" I wail amidst my tears, only to see another frown, only to hear another harsh shout from her.

"You are a commoner, someone like you has nothing to offer to our fellowship. I believe you should be leaving this house as soon as you're able."

"Sister!" He shouted, sounding really, really angry, she just folded her arms, seeming puzzled.

"What? He's inconveniencing both of us, and I highly doubt such a coarse baseborn is actually part of our fellowship. He has nothing to bestow the Koubuin House, therefore he should be taking his leave posthaste," And again, she gave me a nasty glare.

"I… I don't wanna go away…" Crying again, I hugged my sides.

"Takeru-kun, it's alright. Don't cry anymore, please," He ruffled my hair, and I hugged his arm, fleeing from her mean gaze as I cried.

"… Why are you looking at me in such a way?" She asked, as if puzzled, "What are you upset about, Masahide?"

"That's enough. I'll go to the hall later. Leave."

"What are you saying? Father sent me to-"

"Sister, could you kindly leave? You've done enough already."

But… But now they're arguing… because I was here. If I hadn't… then this wouldn't have happened…

She remained firmly in place as they argued, and Masahide-san kept ruffling my hair as I calmed down, but then another set of footsteps seemed to be coming closer. Looking at the hallway, my heart froze when I saw Maya-nee approaching us.

She's gonna scold me… She told me I couldn't get out of my room… She's… gonna scream again… Ugh… Hic…

As she got closer, I hid behind Masahide-san while he stopped arguing with his sister.

"Oh, so you already found… What is going here?" She asked, seeming to be looking at both of them.

Masahide-san's sister then sighs and sends a hand to one of her spikes, looking towards Maya-nee, "A coarse peasant boy was in the gardens, and I admonished him when he disrespected me. Then, he began to cry… And Masahide is trying to calm the boy down."

"A… peasant, you say?"

She sounds… upset. Masahide-san moved away so that she could see me, and then… She frowned for a brief instant, returning to that cold glare she always used to have during our first days together. She's mad… She's mad at me…

"I see… Forgive the inconvenience, I shall be taking the boy to his room," She… didn't even call me by my surname…

"If I may Tsukuyomi, why is it allowed for inductees to bring their children to the Main House?" Masahide-san's sister asked, quite angrily, as she was folding her arms.

"… They are not. It was only due to the preparations needed for the meeting, since they would not have been able to pick them up from school otherwise," Maya-nee said as she tapped her glasses, not even looking at the woman.

"Takeru-kun, come on," Masahide-san released his arm from my hold, patting my back towards Maya-nee.

… I can't look up… She's gonna scream again… She must be so mad… I trembled and looked down, not wishing to move. I wanna dig a hole and hide, she's gonna tell Kazora-san and Yohime-san I was bad… T-They're gonna… Ugh… Sniff…

"The boy did nothing wrong, Maya-sama. Please, do not scold him," Masahide-san said as she got closer.

"Well, let's return to your room," She quickly and firmly grabbed my hand, keeping it in place. Twitching at the strength of her hold, she forced my feet to move as she stormed off.

Masahide-san waved at me when I looked back, giving me a smile, so I waved back softly with my free hand, only to have his sister scowl again as she sent me another glare.

"I apologize again for the inconvenience, Raiko-sama," Maya-nee gave her a small bow, "Please do not mention this to anyone, it was merely an oversight on our part. My sincerest apologies, the child meant no disrespect I am sure," The hold on my hand tightened.

So… She's taking her side… She's apologizing even when I didn't do anything wrong… So she thinks… the same…

"Sigh… Understood," The woman… Raiko-san calmed down and nodded, "The meeting was splendid, so I won't let a baseborn's misconduct ruin this night you prepared for Masahide. I shan't say a word," Maya-nee's lips seemed to twitch, but then she bowed in thankfulness.

Sniff… So that's what… she really thinks… She also thinks I'm a stranger…

She lied to me.

"Thank you kindly, Raiko-sama. I assure you, this shall not happen twice."

"So I expect. Had the Amato House remained as the retainers of the Koubuins, such a blunder would never have occurred," Raiko-san smiled for some reason, making Maya-nee's hand tighten again, "However, my lips are sealed. I shan't taint the splendid night you prepared for my lord, this baseborn won't ruin his celebration," And again, her words burned my ears, "However, why would such a lackluster peasant be allowed to mingle in the house? Who allowed this, if I might ask?"

"Please, it was only an oversight. I shall take responsibility for this, if it would appease you," Why is Maya-nee… speaking so humbly?

Wait… Is this what Kazora-san meant when he said they had to be on the lookout in case I made trouble? But… I didn't do anything… She was the one who started it, why do we have to apologize?

Then, Maya-nee looked at me, sharply, "Apologize to Raiko-sama for your rudeness."

"B-But… But she started-"

"Apologize, this instant," Her grip on my hand tightened, hurting my wrist.

"I-It hurts!"

"Maya-sama, please," Masahide-san comes closer, speaking slowly, "We both were merely stargazing, and Sister did lose her temper first."

"Pah! Anyone would have in front of such disrespect," She fires off, giving me another nasty glare.

"I see… However, apologies are in order," Tapping her glasses, she held my gaze.

Gulp… If I don't, then she's gonna get more pissed… but I didn't do anything wrong… Sniff… This isn't fair… But… But Raiko-san would be my fellow too, right? Mmgh… I can't make more trouble.

"… I'm sorry, Raiko-san."

"It is Amato-sama to you, baseborn. I do not recall allowing you to refer to me by name."

"W-Why are you so mean to me? I'm apologizing and all… Aren't we all fellows?" For some reason, Maya-nee again tightened her grip, her lips were twisting in as if she were biting them.

"You, my fellow?" Raiko-san grimaced as if she were smelling something rotten, then shook her head quite strongly, "You cannot possibly hoist our values with these dull manners, and in no way do I see someone of your kind to be able to bestow anything to our fellowship. You're not even worth the breath of my retort."

"Sister! That was uncalled for!" He yelled, fire finally coming to his eyes.

"What are you saying? What can he possibly do for our fellowship? Why is this baseborn child even here? If he cannot offer anything of worth with his service, then he has no place here, plain and simple."

"But… Hic… I've been trying my best to be a samurai…" Clawing at my palms, I tried to hold her gaze.

"That is a noble goal to aim for, for you to revere the Royal Guard since such an early age," She nodded, folding her arms, dulling the fire, "However, you clearly do not possess the minimal required manners to be a fellow, much less the intelligence to even be considered in the first place, going by your lexicon. This might sound harsh to your young ears, but mediocrity has no place in the Royal Guard. Regardless of your efforts, something that anyone can accomplish holds no value, and you do not seem particularly gifted at first glance. That would mean that you are only a burden on our shoulders. On that regard, milord, we should return to the hall posthaste. Let us waste no more time with this baseborn," She then gave Masahide-san a deep bow, remaining still as she waited his word.

"Sigh…" Frowning much, he looked away from her, bitterly biting his lips, "Takeru-kun, please do not take this to heart. Sister has no idea about how hard you're trying," He patted my shoulder, smiling my way, "You cannot give up before struggling to the end, right?"

"… Y-Yes… I'll do… my best… Sniff…" Rubbing the tears off my eyes, I manage to nod back, and he pats my head.

"Sigh… Why even give him false hopes?" Raiko-san shook her head, Masahide-san frowned at her, "However, I shall accept the apology, if only to not waste more time. Worry not Tsukuyomi, I shan't mention this little incident to anyone."

"… Thanks for understanding, Raiko-sama," She said, coldly and sharp, "The same for you, Masahide-san. Do forgive the inconvenience, and thank you kindly for understanding."

"There is no need, it is alright. Please, take him to his room. He surely wants to rest," He smiled back, and I waved back as Maya-nee took me away from the garden.

"And do make sure he doesn't inconvenience anyone for the night," Raiko-san added, to Masahide-san's anger.

However, Maya-nee bowed down to her and forced me to do the same before we took our leave. Raiko-san sighed hard and looked away, again trying to get Masahide-san to go with her, and they seemed to start arguing again as we left. Maya-nee pulled me harder, so I couldn't hear or see what was going on. Her steps got faster as we went into the house, and even more when she saw that nobody was nearby, yet her vice grip on my hand didn't ease up.

Storming away towards my room, the moonlight peers through the windows into the hallway. She wasn't even looking at me. Only our footsteps could be heard, and yet she didn't slow down, even when I almost tripped.

"… I'm sorry."

"I told you to stay in your room tonight, didn't I?" Sharp and dry, still not looking back.

Looking down, a few tears fall down and crash on the floor. It feels as if spikes were sticking to my feet with every step I take.

"… Are you mad?"

She then stops walking, and gives me a look, "Why did you not do as I told you?"

"I… I just wanted to go see the stars…"

"You were told you could not leave your room today. Why did you do that?"

"I just… Sorry."

"Sigh… Takeru, you cannot keep acting to your leisure. Do you even know how much trouble would have your argument with Raiko-sama caused us?"

"… But she started it. She got angry first…"

"That matters not, you kept arguing instead of apologizing," Frowning really hard, she sighs again, "You were lucky that she didn't wish to push for answers, however, you better not repeat this ever again. Are we clear?"

"… Am I… such a bother?"

"… When you don't listen, yes, you are."

"… Eh?… Really?"

She nods, her serious gaze peering into me, "You were told to not leave your room, and yet you did. It was obvious nothing good would have happened had someone found you. You still do not have a role, which is why other Royal Guards cannot learn of your situation. I've told you this many times already, haven't I?"

"But Yohime-san said I was a fellow…"

"Sigh… That might be in theory, but until you're given a role, the rest cannot interact with you. And Raiko-sama speaks the truth, even if she was unnecessarily harsh to you. If your manners do not improve, you won't become a Royal Guard. I've been telling you that since the start, right?"

"… But you said… Sniff… we would be like family…"

"Sigh… Please Takeru, do not start," Dragging me again, she stormed off towards my room, "I've would have been put in quite a precarious position should Raiko-sama have chosen to speak with her lord father. Surely you can start to do as you're told, can you not?" Sounding tired, she scolded me, her grip tight and her steps super fast, making me almost trip.

"… I'm sorry."

"If you're truly sorry, then do not ever do anything like this again. By the Holy Emperor… during such a crucial meeting as well…"

She kept grumbling, sighing, and groaning on the way, not even looking back, not even slowing down. We quickly arrived at my room, she opened the door in a flash and got me in there as she watched left and right to see if anyone was around. As if… I were some sort of unwanted guest…

"Well, I shall be returning to my duties. Do not leave this room again, are we clear?" Again giving me a firm, scary gaze, I could only nod.

"Um… Can't you stay for a while? I wanted to ask you something about-"

"I cannot. I told you I am busy already," Rubbing her forehead, she shook her head as another heavy sigh left her lips, "This meeting is not yet over, and I already lost enough time as it is. Stay put and do not give me more problems, Takeru."

"… Okay. But, um, about my dinne-"

Not even hearing me, she stepped outside and prepared to close the door, "I shall come for you at morning as always. Rest well so that you can perform up to par tomorrow, you have to make up for your prior results after all. And do not dwell on Raiko-sama's words, you will be given a role regardless of this month's endeavors. Sleep well, good night," And without waiting for my reply, without looking at me, she closed the door with a loud noise. Then, I could hear her storming off in a hurry.

And again, I'm all alone in my room.

Alone with the moonlight in these four walls.

I don't see any plate with food, so my dinner isn't here. If the other samurai had come, he would have noticed I was gone. So I'm gonna get my dinner later… right?

Sniff… Why was she so mad? Raiko-san started it… But… Maya-nee said… I give her problems… She's gonna tell Yohime-san… But more importantly…

"… She didn't even call me Shirogane in front of them… She didn't defend me… And just now… she said I would be given any role… So that m-means… Sniff… that she doesn't… believe in me…"

Burden. Trouble. Eyesore. Bother.

I get under my sheets, hugging my sides as a cold shiver cloaks over me.

Can't get good grades, can't speak well, can't give anything to whatever the fellowship is.

Tears fall down again, my chest hurts as if something was piking at my lungs.

And in the end… not even Maya-nee believes in me. She's going back to how she was when we first met… because the samurais are her real family. Raiko-san said I was a bother to Masahide-san, so my advice… was bad then. Since Maya-nee was so polite, does she agree with what Raiko-san said?

A mediocre baseborn… Is that what I am? Then… Why was Dad a samurai? Wait… Masahide-san said… he was treated badly… Is this how they were with him? Then… Then… Why were they nice until today?

Because… Dad paid them… because he hired Maya-nee to look after me… but being a fellow isn't the same… if I'm not good enough…

They're gonna make me go away, or send me to a distant role or something.

Rubbing my arms to counter the frozen feeling, as those mean words repeated over and over in my ears, I cried in silence as I waited for my dinner.

But it never came.

Maya-nee also didn't come with it, either.

Eventually, even the moonlight left the room.

And as I cried, I realized… that I was really left alone.

Dad and Mom are gone… Uncle Koetsu already said his goodbyes… First Kazora-san, and now even Maya-nee say I'm a bother…

"Ugh… Uuh…" The cold drills itself into my sides, my socks could be made out of ice and I wouldn't feel a difference.

No matter how much I hug my sheets, it doesn't go away.

No matter how much I try, those mean words keep repeating over and over.

I try to cry, but my throat hurts, feels dry and hoarse, and not a single sound comes out.

So I dug my face into my pillow and cried. Remembering Mom's dishes, her smile, her scoldings. Remembering Dad's tales of his work, the times when he read a lot of books with me, when we could get to play during the weekends.

… Remembering I'll never see them again, that I'm not a fellow here, that I'll be sent away any time, I cried myself to sleep, enduring the cold within the dark room.

Shirogane (I)

Chapter 56: Shirogane - Starting Point

---

June 4th. 06:13 AM.

(Koubuin House. Near Takeru's Room.)

---

The sun peered into the massive building with gusto, birds chirped to life, and a docile wind accompanied today's dawnbreak. Such weather was welcomed by those who had already risen and were preparing for their coming duties.

As the Koubuin House bustled to life for another day, the young lady of the Tsukuyomi tapped her glasses as she strode in long, fast steps towards little Takeru's room.

" It truly was a stroke of luck for Masahide-san to have been the one to find him," she mused, picking up her pace, "Had it been anyone else, the event wouldn't have gone unnoticed."

Maya had taken the time to survey what had both Amato siblings done after returning to the hall, yet not a word was spoken about the small incident on the gardens. However, even if that was a relief, her other incessant duties kept piling up, and even when she was dismissed from watching over the Main Hall new orders arrived for her.

As she recalled, a small frown made its way to her face, "Honestly, by the Holy Emperor, what a foolhardy way of being," Repining much, her steps grew stronger.

As it were, the guard that was tasked with delivering dinner to Takeru had, quite conveniently, forgotten about it. The man said he was overburdened during the meeting, despite the fact that he was reminded in advance of this task. I suppose that to say the man would suffer most horrendous nightmares from now on about Maya's barely restrained outburst would be a severe understatement.

Her stride dulling as she approached his room, admiring the ground through almost closed eyelids upon recalling how undeservedly harsh she had been to him, Maya took a moment to shake her head, take in a sharp breath, and refocus on the moment.

Shortly after, she arrived at his room. And upon opening the sliding door, Maya was greeted with a sight she had never seen before, not on the two years she had already been looking after him.

Takeru was sitting on the floor, already dressed for the day. His futon tidied up, his bag also ready by his side. Maya blinked for a moment, befuddlement setting in, as he returned her gaze.

Looking away, nervous at her silence, he gave her a bow as he stood up, "… G-Good morning, Maya-nee."

"Good morning, Takeru. Did you… wake up on your own?"

"… Yes," Still looking down, he slowly, hesitantly, and dragging his feet, went to Maya's side, bag on his arm, "So… Um… Let's go?" He asked upon her silence.

Which elicited both a cough and a nod afterwards, "Yes, let us go."

Maya closed the door once both left the room, and as had become routine for her she reached out for his hand.

But he moved away, walking close to a wall, hands on his pockets. Without waiting for her, Takeru started walking, still looking down, remaining quiet, oddly so.

Quickly reaching his side, she looked straight at him as she offered her hand, "Takeru?"

"What?"

"Come, breakfast should already be on… the way…" Blinking in quick succession once again, only empty air returned her grasp, only his hair did to her gaze, "What is it? Are you feeling unwell?"

"No."

"Then, did you not get enough sleep, perhaps?"

"… I'm fine," Puffing a cheek, he picked up his pace.

One of her brows twitched, sensing something odd in his tone, "Are you upset at my scolding yesterday?" His silence made her sigh, "Please Takeru, you were at fault. We would have been placed in a very precarious position should Raiko-sama had inquired into your situation."

Nothing was said, he still kept his distance from her. Maya had a light meal, a mere snack, after she had woken up, yet her stomach turned and ached at the rift between their hands.

"Takeru, lift your face. Do not let yesterday's miss hamper your efforts today. You cannot show such an expression at the table," She slowly said, again getting closer, again trying to reach for his hand.

And again, he avoided her.

"I know that," Shrugging his lips, Takeru stalwartly refused to return her gaze.

"Come on, now. Use this as a learning experience instead of getting angry. Now stop pouting, we're close to the dining room," Taking another step, she swiftly reached for his hand, grasping it this time.

Only for Takeru to, quite violently, and unexpectedly for Maya, shake her off, returning a very sharp frown. The very first show of anger, of true ire, that he had ever done to her.

"Don't touch me!"

Momentarily stunned, hand frozen in mid-air, what toxins were brewing on her stomach flared up to life.

"What is wrong with you today?! After what happened, this is how you behave?" Returning the frown, she found herself at a loss when he didn't recede.

This wasn't a temper tantrum. Tight lips, accusing glare, and the mindful step back when she approached. Only then she realized, Takeru was truly angry at her.

So, cooling down her tone while tapping her glasses, she softly spoke up, "Takeru, cease this foolishness at once. You cannot act in such way at the table, and such anger won't aid you in your classes. Come on, leave that frown behind, else your food will grow cold."

"… I hate you."

She blinked once, then twice.

All that was clogging her insides suddenly vanished, except for the dart that had been thrown at her heart.

"… What did you just say?"

"I hate you. Don't talk to me," Without wait, he then turned around and kept walking, gaze on the floor.

Again stunned for a second, Maya chased after the boy, that still was making his way to the dining room, placing perhaps too much force on his shoulder once she got to his side.

"Takeru, what's going on with you?" He remained silent with his eyes on the ground, she sighed heavily at that, "I was merely trying to protect you yesterday. You should know that if other samurais learn of your position here as of now, they would-"

"You lied."

"Huh?" She looked at him, only to find, as he would say, an expansive wildfire staring back.

"You lied," Then, releasing his anger, hands shaking and eyes watering, Takeru's voice quivered slightly as it rose in intensity, "You didn't defend me, you think I'm a stranger, you don't even believe I can become a samurai. You think I'm a bother like Kazora-san and Raiko-san do, don't you? I hate you!"

"W-Wha… Do not speak nonsense! In no way do I see you as-"

"You said I was a bother yesterday."

"That's only when you do not listen, like you're doing right now. I do believe in you, all I did was make sure Raiko-sama didn't-"

"Lies! You treated me horribly, and I didn't do anything bad. She was the one being mean."

"Sigh… Enough. You should not have been there, and should not have incited a fight. That's why I scolded you, because you didn't listen to what I told you to do."

"But you didn't defend me, not even when she said mean things about me… Sniff…"

"I… I had to make sure she didn't ask any questions about you, that is all. The meeting was still underway, I didn't have any time to lose."

"… You wouldn't have done the same if she had said those things about the Pickles," She flinched at his doubtful stare, it only invigorated his suspicions, "… See? I thought… Sniff… we were like family…"

Void of air for a moment, her hand couldn't reach for his head, "T-Takeru, I was merely… You should know I do care about you. All I did was to protect you from her inquiries, that's all."

"… You're lying."

Looking into his eyes, she couldn't help but to frown as his glare clashed into her as well, "Sigh… Come on, apologize for shouting to your sister now and we shall leave this behind."

"… No. You just see me as a stranger too."

"Takeru… Do not start. How can you cast doubts on me after all these years?" Taking a step closer, feeling as if she were walking atop iron spikes, Maya placed a hand on his shoulder.

"… Then, where was my dinner yesterday?"

"Eh?"

"I tried to tell you and you didn't listen. Why did no one bring me dinner yesterday if I'm not a bother?" He inquired, almost stuttering, lips quivering as he looked up.

When she didn't answer, when her hand left his shoulder, he took it as a confirmation of his fears. And so, again he looked down, the ground acting as a magnet to a few tears.

Maya, on her end, was at a loss. The realization hit her with another wave of emptiness, to see that she had, after all, neglected to give him dinner after confirming the guard appointed to do so had 'forgotten' about the task. Prey to stress and exhaustion, she simply chose to return to her chamber after reporting the matter and reprimanding the man.

Pierced by a scorching feeling against which even the finest blade does bend, Maya tried to explain, to reach out to him. However, upon seeing his watering eyes, filled with distrust, she couldn't bring forth any meaningful words. Guilt made nest within, her throat suddenly shutting down, hampering any attempts at communication for she had never seen him angry in this manner.

"… You should know that… I was tired… I… made a miss, I accept it. Forgive me," He looked away, she found herself having to take a deep breath, "However, no one sees you as a bother. Let's… leave this behind us. You must be truly hungry, and you cannot perform at your best if you have to rush your first meal. Come on Takeru, let's-" However, he started walking on his own, and all she could do was follow.

Perhaps the physical distance wasn't grand at all, but from Maya's perspective the gesture, the reluctance, the doubt in itself was just as harsh as her training in the Daizaburou Dojo had been. As cold and solitary as she was under the waterfall by dusk, seeing this as a large a rift as how she once saw herself failing when thinking to have been kicked out of the Royal Guard, that is how she saw the distance that had been placed between her and Takeru.

And while on the outside she kept a poker face as they walked, the dart had undergone a metamorphosis, turning into a rusted, jagged lump of iron that lurched forward every time she took a glance at him, at his refusal to come closer, to speak up, to forgive her carelessness.

Nothing else was said on the way to the dining room.

Knocking the door to notify their presence once they arrived, Yohime spoke to allow them entry. Both bowed down to her once inside, saying their greetings.

"Rise, you two. Good morning, Maya, Takeru," She so says as they rose back, smiling as per usual, "Do sit down, breakfast shall be arriving shortly."

"Yes, Yohime-sama," Maya promptly answered, then went to take her seat besides her father, who nodded in salutation once she did.

Takeru slowly went to his usual seat, in between the young Yuuhi and Shion, as the three little girls greeted him in the usual cheer. He merely nodded at them, avoiding their eyes, saying nothing.

Kazora was giving Yohime an overview of her schedule, alongside informing Maya of some early developments for her own duties, but was forced to stop short once he noticed his Lady was no longer focused on him. Yohime was instead staring, rather worriedly, at Takeru.

"Takeru, what is it?" She inquired, a hand going to her chin.

He ever so slightly trembled when he realized she was staring, "Nothing, Yohime-san."

Replying fast, the small frame was as tense, as worried as if he were bracing for further scolding. Thinking that, perhaps, Yohime would admonish him as Maya had done before. Perhaps, even send him away on the spot.

For but a second a brow arched in concern, quickly dispelled into her charming smile, "I see… Do let me tell you we shall be having mackerel today."

Nodding once in glee, for she knew the boy favored that particular fish above all, she was certain this would raise his spirits. Yohime assumed correctly that he was afflicted after his encounter with Raiko, so she had ensured today's breakfast would be fitting to the boy's palate.

However, contrary to her expectations, Takeru merely nodded back. Eyes fixated, bolted to the table, lips clamped, forged shut, afraid of making another mistake, afraid of confirming his fears. Said disposition of his only made Yohime's smile wane in a flash, she sent a most adusted, narrowed gaze towards the eldest Tsukuyomis, who stiffened up at it.

Noticing Maya's complexion to be odd and Kazora to also be surprised by the boy's reaction, only doubt and worry festered within Yohime as her daughter and both cousins tried to no avail to integrate the boy into their idle chat.

"Say Takeru, you won't guess how boring was yesterday's meeting," Shion said, leaning closer.

"Really?" With an almost inaudible answer, he stole a glance at her before looking down once more.

"Indeed it was," Mion agreed with a nod, "We had to spend much time talking with other heirs, or simply sitting as the adults talked," She then lets out a small sigh.

"I see…" He replies, eyes unmoving from the table as Maya's from him.

"Most merely boasted of their academic performance, and all seem to be reading the same novels as of late," Yuuhi commented, a bit sourly at that, trying to look into Takeru's eyes, "It is rather tiring, to always reiterate such vain topics."

"Yes, I don't understand why everybody reads the same book or try to constantly edge the rest with their boons," Shion complained, truly bothered by the constant 'My House is bigger than yours' arguments that ensue whenever scores and feats are brought up by anyone during either school breaks or meetings.

"I believe it is precisely to talk of it with the rest," Maya repines, tapping her glasses and sharing her sister's feelings on the matter, "It is crucial to have a topic of conversation to chat with your fellows, is it not? And what better topic than one's House's achievements of late?" The girls nod, agreeing to some degree, Takeru remains simply looking down, not wishing to speak up. An edge of Maya's lips twisted inwards at his silence, seeing not even the cousins could have him leave the stiffness behind.

"I can agree with that," Yuuhi sighed, all too aware as of late of such endeavors, all too exhausted of the unavoidable socialization topics, "So Takeru, how was your evening yesterday?" She inquired with such a bright smile, eager to finally have some time to speak with him after being denied of it yesterday, edging a bit closer to the boy.

"… It was fine, thanks for asking."

"I see…" Her brows arched for a moment at his curt reply, as did her mother's, "By the way, it is already Thursday. Have you thought on what you would like to read on the weekend?"

"No, not really."

Her lips now became a small circle, "Then… Is there anything you would be preferring to read, Takeru?" Again trying to look into his gaze, she anxiously awaited his reply. Yohime was firmly watching their exchange as well, a hand on her chin.

Takeru shook his head, his gaze darting away from hers, "No, there isn't. Don't mind me, Yuuhi… -san."

Maya's and Yohime's mouth remained gaping for a moment, Shion and Mion both also were beyond shock at hearing such words.

"… Eh?" Yuuhi's eyes slowly widened, she remained as such staring at him.

For him to use an honorific, for Takeru that equals speaking to an adult, someone he should respect. All those present knew that very well.

Maya now openly bit her lips, "Why is he putting such distance between… He isn't comfortable here any longer, perhaps? After what happened, and how he was this morning… It's clear he's forcing himself. Perhaps…" Unable to bear the thought that sprouted forth, she looked down, tightening both hands, "… Perhaps Father was right. Perhaps he would be happier… back in Hiiragi…"

Kazora himself was merely limiting himself to watch, a perfect stoic expression in his face. While he was rather worried for the boy after hearing from Maya what Raiko had said to him, the man saw this as what would show the rest that he was indeed right. That Takeru would live a more bountiful life as a peasant.

" After all Shirogane did for our fellowship, to have his son endure such unjust words on a daily basis… would be a dishonor to me as both his superior and a retainer handpicked by Takahisa-sama," He concluded within, deciding to let things play out.

Before Yohime could speak up her worry, the doors opened with the Chamberlain bringing the food into the room alongside the attendants. As it was normal by now, they served Takeru last and in slightly lesser quantity. Both the Chamberlain and the attendants didn't waste a gaze on him, keeping a firm poker face when they had to serve his breakfast.

After all, it is such a dishonor for those of higher station to have to lower themselves to serve a mere peasant, isn't it?

Unable to rein in her worsening mood, Yohime squinted her eyes at the attendants, who then hastened their pace when they left. The Chamberlain sat to the left of the manor's lady by Kazora's side, awaiting for Yohime to begin to eat as it was customary.

Those sharpened amethyst eyes laid onto the old woman, deciding to remain silent for the moment, before starting the morning's meal. This time, unlike every other breakfast since little Takeru had arrived, there was no idle chatter coming from the kids.

Maya slowly poked her food, unable to bring more than a small bite at a time, as both cousins did as well. The young Yuuhi, however, was plucking her lips without even touching her plate, stealing glances at Takeru who was slowly eating his share despite the insistence from his stomach to just gobble up both food and plate in one gulp.

"Yuuhi-sama, is the food not to your liking?" The Chamberlain asks, worry placed on her words.

"Of course not, it looks as delicious as always," She smiled briefly, before returning to a more neutral expression as she began to eat.

"Then, what is the cause of such restlessness?"

"Chamberlain, Yuuhi is merely exhausted after yesterday's meeting," Yohime dryly and promptly answered, sending a gaze to her left.

"Oh, is that so?" She then looks at little Yuuhi, a concerned tint in her face as she brought a hand to her cheek.

Yuuhi nodded, lifting another grin, "Yes, I am merely…" Her eyes took a brief rest towards Takeru, "… tired," Thus, the tone she now made would truly make anyone think so.

The woman's brows narrow, "… I see," Then her eyes do the same towards little Takeru, who lowered his gaze further when he noticed, "Yohime-sama, I suggest you to remove the peasant from the table. It is clear his presence is detrimental to Yuuhi-sama."

Maya's throat suddenly felt sore, making her drop the piece of mackerel she had just picked. Kazora said nothing, remaining as stoic as usual. While the cousins were openly angry, Takeru had stopped eating, his eyes now were barely open.

"Why do you say such a thing?!" Shion frowned, her tone very much filled to the brim with frost.

"Shion, you shall not raise your voice at your elders!" Kazora admonished, yet Shion didn't recoil.

"Kazora-sama, why would she want to have Takeru leave the table?" Mion inquired in a calm tone, yet also endowed with ailing ice.

"You are to stay quiet on the table," He gave them a firm gaze, slightly raising his voice, and they both trembled upon the scolding.

"Kazora-san, there is no need for such actions," Yohime dryly repined, shaking her head, "Chamberlain, this is not the time nor the place to speak of such matters. Please do not disturb our breakfast."

"… As you wish, milady," She gave a small bow in apology, returning to eat.

Thus, nothing else was said.

Yohime also slowly returned to her plate, opting to remain silent to rein in her mood. Shion and Mion were also looking down as Takeru was, he hadn't resumed eating. Now, a slight shaking could be seen on his hands if you looked at them carefully.

And while Maya understood Yohime did not wish to spark a fight in front of Takeru, after what he had said earlier she could only try to restrain the stinger, the thoughts that assured her the boy would take the silence as a confirmation of his earlier doubts of being a bother, a stranger for the rest.

" Yet… I cannot speak up. If I do, I would be going against Yohime-sama's words. She ordered to let the matter rest for now. But…" A look towards him only made her food feel all the more heavy, "He isn't even eating, his plate isn't even half-empty. Takeru doesn't deserve this. Perhaps… it would be for the best if he…"

And as Maya was about to simply admit defeat, as no other sound could be heard in the dining room other than those of chopsticks fulfilling their purpose, as all gazes were focused on their own plates…

"… Take those words back, please."

Everyone on the table stopped eating upon hearing the adusted, most combusting, yet still soft voice.

Yuuhi was, oh so intensely, frowning. Wrinkles tainting her forehead, a stalwart blaze in her gaze which sent everyone recoiling back. The contrast with her more frequent sweet demeanor was so strong that Yohime dropped her chopsticks.

After a second to register what had happened, she asked, "… Yuuhi, dear, what did you just say?"

"I asked the Chamberlain to take her words back. Kindly retract your words, or else," She intensified her glare, now a scowl surging forth as if a geyser it were.

Which made the old woman freeze up, void of answers for a second, "… Yuuhi-sama, why would you-"

"Take your words back, please," She fired off unrelenting, her blazing complexion unchanged.

Yohime leaned forward, towards the young girl, a soothing tone to mitigate the fire, "Yuuhi, dear, this is no way to-"

"She insulted Takeru," Yuuhi hissed back, despite now being looking at her mother, "He's one of us, so I shan't forgive anyone who speaks ill of him," She so said, placing a hand above one of his. Which made him look up, shocked at her unwavering words.

The Chamberlain, however, was perplexed, confused at the young lady's demand, "Yuuhi-sama, I said no insult. I merely believe that the peasant has no place by your si-"

"Takeru's station matters not," The blaze scowled back, "You are using it as an insult to indicate that, for some reason, you believe he should not be here," Her words spoken rapidly, her stare unchanged in its wrathful stance.

"Um… You shouldn't get so upset at an adult, Yuuhi… -san," Speaking up only gained Takeru a stare from her.

However, she immediately dulled her frown, now more of a sour gaze instead, "Why do you add an honorific to my name, Takeru?"

"Eh… W-Well, it's… rude. I can't call you like that."

"Why?"

"I mean… I'm… I shouldn't… be rude. I have to behave well and all that… Right?"

"Takeru," She gradually leaned closer and closer, looking at him squarely in the eye, "You're living with us now. So, stop using an honorific. I am Yuuhi to you," Now her tone was clearly a complain as her brows arched downwards, groaning softly as a kitty would when awaiting its meal.

"B-But…" He looked away, her own gaze crumbled down as well as the edges of her lips did.

"Takeru, why won't you call me by my name?"

"Yuuhi-sama, you should not ask such from a peasant!" The Chamberlain couldn't endure the sight anymore, for the coming Regent to mingle with a baseborn in such way.

"… You will not insult Takeru again," Thus, Yuuhi once more forwarded a fiery frown her way.

Yohime coughed loudly, leveling a stare at her daughter, "Yuuhi, dear, please. This is no way to conduct yourself on the table."

"And badmouthing a fellow is, Mother?"

It would be an understatement as large as an XG to say the rest were flabbergasted or befuddled, for Yuuhi never retorts when her mother speaks. This was, to their knowledge, the first time it happened. When in truth was the second, and it's what made Yohime not admonish her further, instead sending a hand to her hair, her breathing calming down, pondering what to do.

"Um… Please don't fight," Takeru spoke up, still looking down. Blaming himself for the argument, certain that blames would be placed on him like last night,"I-If… If I'm being a bother, I can leave," He slowly stood up, not lifting his gaze from the floor as he went his way.

A vile taste filled Maya's mouth, who then breathed in through clenched teeth. Seeing the cousins stare at her pleadingly, she tried to stood up only for Kazora to firmly hold her wrist in place, preventing any further movements. As the three younger Tsukuyomis frowned at the oldest, he then pointed with his jaw towards the edge of the table.

A second later, the rough sound of a chair being thrust back resonated as it almost fell towards the floor. In one fluid and swift motion, Yuuhi had stood up and got to Takeru's side.

"You will sit down, Takeru," She declared, promptly grabbing his hand, dragging him to the table, and making the stunned Takeru sit down again, startling both him and the rest equally.

"Um… Yuuhi-san, I'm-"

"Takeru, my name is Yuuhi," She pouted at him when she sat down, almost puffing a cheek, "And you shall remain here, by my side."

Wasting not a second, she then linked her arm around his, locking Takeru closer to herself to prevent him from leaving. She didn't even flinch at his stuttering, instead choosing to enforce her hold. Much like a hunter who cornered prey or an intellectual gripping onto sudden inspiration for a thesis, so was Yuuhi's lock onto little Takeru's arm, to his and the rest's utter shock.

"Yuuhi-sama, that is unproper for a lady!" The Chamberlain was almost shrieking in horror, one could say she had seen a BETA by the expression she was making.

Yuuhi, however, returned another frown, "I wish Takeru to remain by my side, therefore I see no issue with this. I believe I had asked you to take your words back?"

For a moment no one said anything.

Yuuhi held the Chamberlain's gaze as tightly and firmly as she was holding onto Takeru's arm.

Both the cousins and Maya could only stare at her, and at Takeru as he nervously stole glances at both Yuuhi and Yohime, the latter who was wearing a poker face while grasping her chin as she observed the situation.

Kazora was the only one who, somehow, was calm enough to continue eating. Deciding that, if Yuuhi wished for the boy to stay, and he was in agreement, all he could do was to support both of them as he had done with their fathers.

"… My apologies, Yuuhi-sama," She finally said, relenting a bow.

"I believe you are apologizing to the wrong person, however," She furrowed her brows, looking at the one she held tightly onto.

Takeru's lips were quivering like butterfly's wings, unable to hold the gaze of the Chamberlain, almost repulsed as if smelling the stench of bodily decay.

"Would you have me apologize to a peas-" Yuuhi frowned once more, she drowned her complains.

"Y-Yuuhi-san… You don't have to fight. It's fine, it's always like this," His voice crumbling, Takeru was sure he was going to get scolded for making trouble once more.

The rusted iron then decided to thrust through Maya's lungs, ruining her breathing. The cousins also seem to share the feeling, while Mion's face fell further down in concern Shion was still glaring at the Chamberlain.

However, Yuuhi's brows twitched much at his words, and, as he would say, blue fire was flooding, "No, it isn't fine at all, Takeru. You are one of us and are deserving of respect. Also…" She tightened her grasp, bringing her face closer to his, their noses almost touching, "I am Yuuhi, no honorifics."

"I-I get it… Sorry."

"Don't apologize, you are most certainly not at fault," She beamed at him, returning to her usual demeanor. However, it lasted but a moment as she again faced the Chamberlain, "I believe you were apologizing."

The woman closed her eyes and took a deep breath, a hand near her chest. Part of her lips receded inwards for a moment, but then looked at Takeru and gave him a minuscule nod.

"My apologies, Shirogane," Short and dry, perhaps also deceptive.

"… No, it's fine," He looked down again.

"Ahem… Shall we resume eating?" Yohime ordered, sternly gazing at the Chamberlain.

No one protested, no one said a word.

Yet, Yuuhi didn't let go of Takeru's arm. She then began to quietly speak with him and the cousins about the meeting. Takeru remained quiet at first, but Yuuhi insisted much in hearing his opinion, getting too close and personal perhaps.

A bit overwhelmed, he then looked away, and his eyes met Maya's. His gaze fleeting and hesitant as a dragonfly looking for a source of water amidst a heatwave, fearful of seeing the same anger as during the prior dusk, he only found a small smile and a nod, and then he seemed to relax. Maya did as well once she saw the four little ones begin to speak as they always used to do, sighing the rusted metal sensation out of her system.

For the remainder of the breakfast, the children spoke between themselves as they usually did even if Takeru's voice was lower in intensity and open glee.

Once the meal was finished, everyone prepared to depart for their duties. However, Yohime called both Yuuhi and Takeru to her side, telling the rest to leave. While Maya was hesitant at first, all she could do was accompany Mion and Shion to prepare to leave for school and return posthaste to take Takeru to his classes.

And so, once the Tsukuyomis and the Chamberlain left, the other three remained alone in the dining room, Yuuhi still holding Takeru's hand.

"Um… Sorry for making trouble, Yohime-san," He gives her a bow, but then a hand was delicately placed on top of his head, softly ruffling his hair.

As he looked up, he saw a most concerned expression permeating Yohime's face, "No… I am the one that has to apologize. Forgive me, Takeru."

"Huh? Why? I was the one who made them fight…" Again, he looked down, "If I hadn't been here, nothing would have happened. Just like yesterday, Masahide-san wouldn't have fought with Raiko-san if I hadn't been there," Once more, a cold blanket threatened to envelop his back.

If not for the tightening grip on his arm, "Takeru, you are most assuredly not at fault," Yuuhi thus insisted, again getting closer.

"But-"

"You. Were not. At fault," She repeated, puffing a cheek, shrugging her lips, "Isn't that right, Mother?"

Yohime could barely restrain the giggling she was wishing to do, seeing his shock at her daughter's forwardness, "Sigh… That is true, if blames must be placed I am the one at fault."

"That's not true, Yohime-san! Why would this be your fault?" He asked, not understanding, not wishing to blame her.

Which only made her inner affliction all the worse, seeing his honest concern, "As the acting Regent I am, I should have been clearer with the rest as I was with Kazora-san regarding your situation."

She then sighed once more, he thought she was about to cry, whereas Yuuhi was also at a loss for she had never seen Yohime displaying such clear sadness.

However, she smiled their way again, "Takeru, Yuuhi, come here," She patted the chairs by her side, both slowly sat down. Yohime then started ruffling his hair softly, never losing sight of his eyes, "Takeru, you are no stranger and I do not wish you to go away. I promised your father that I would look after you, and you should know that the samurai never go back on their word."

"But… aren't I being a bother?" He hesitantly asked, feeling heavy all of a sudden.

"You are nothing of the sort, as Yuuhi said," Her eyes sharpened, tone sobering as well, "You shall be one of us from now on, even if it takes time for you to become acquainted to your new life. Please, worry no longer," She smiled, as sweetly as usual, "As for you Yuuhi, please be mindful of when and how you tackle this kind of discussions. You cannot clash so frontally with others from now on."

"… I understand, Mother. My sincerest apologies," She bowed down, yet didn't dull the pout when she rose back, "However, defending a fellow is an obligation for me, as the next heir. Remaining silent was something we could not allow ourselves to do," Firmly holding her ground, she stated.

"Um… Don't fight, please," Pulling the hand Yuuhi was still holding, her glare receded slightly upon his worry.

"I do admit you have a point, dear," Yohime nodded, which made her daughter dispel the tension of her complexion, "However, you should have considered how Takeru would have seen said argument. In the end, this was an issue I allowed to occur, so I shan't admonish you further, but do keep this in mind for any future altercations," She firmly looked into the blazes, which were subdued then after a nod, "In any case, Takeru, please do forgive my carelessness. I should have known the Chamberlain would have reacted in this way at some point."

"… So I did give you trouble," He barely whispered out, slumping down.

She then caressed his hair once more, dropping her fingers to lift his chin, "Nothing of the sort. I said you were one of us just now. This was an oversight on my end, nothing more."

"But, why is everyone so mean? I'm… doing what I can to be good," Shrugging his lips again, he sourly said.

Yohime sighed, imitating his prior whisper, "Sometimes, people will simply not favor you. That's how it is, even for us adults."

"So, uh…" Hesitating a bit, finally managing to ask the question as Yuuhi tightened her grip, "… I can stay here?" Yohime then nods, again ruffling his hair as another smile brightly flourished forth.

"I was not thinking on sending you away. So, do not worry about this anymore and, more importantly, do not try to leave the table again. Your seat is right there, by Yuuhi's side." Her voice sounding slightly upset but at the same time sweet, she slowly placed a hand on his cheek.

Shivering a bit, barely biting back the tears, Takeru nodded twice in quick succession, a smile finally appearing on him.

"Now, might I ask why you used an honorific with Yuuhi?" She lowered her brows, tilting her head.

"… Yes, why did you do such a thing, Takeru?" The young Yuuhi grew closer, he twitched. Yohime couldn't help it and chuckled at their expressions.

He looks upwards, scratching the back of his head, "I mean… Masahide-san told me I should try to speak like you all do, and everyone is really polite with you… so I thought that I had to do that too," To not be a stranger, he finished within.

"I see… You were merely trying to appease us, then?" Yohime asked, he nodded.

"I just wanted to not make trouble, to try to be better. Maya-nee is always telling me to be more respectful, and everyone is like that with Yuuhi… So I thought I should use a -san with her."

"You do not need to do such," She insisted, resting her frame on his arm, "You're my friend, Takeru. No more honorifics between us."

"O-Okay, I get it already…" He gave in, rather fearful of the embers that still lurked within her eyes.

Chuckling once more at the exchange, Yohime petted both kids' heads, "It is good to see you try, but please don't treat Yuuhi or the cousins in a different manner. They like you for who you are, Takeru."

"So… You won't get mad because I'm rude with them?" He braved the fear of hearing a yes.

And was welcomed by the shaking of her head and another smile, "They welcome your usual way of being, so there is no reason for me to be upset at you. It is different when it comes to others, then you should be polite," She admitted, then she looked up, "I know you must be disheartened after your last tests' results, however no one shall send you away for such a thing. I have been busy these last few days, and sadly I haven't been in the right mind to speak with you. But it was not because I was upset, I was merely tired."

"Are you in trouble, Yohime-san?" He got a bit closer, worried about how her eyes dropped now. Even Yuuhi was now concerned yet again at the display.

"I am fine… However… Sigh…"

"See? You and Maya-nee are sighing a lot these days. Are you sick?" He rubs Yohime's arm in circles, she giggles.

"I am fine, thank you. It's merely that…" She again looks away, her smile vanishing. Taking a moment to gaze at Yuuhi, leaving a hand atop the girl's head, she once more sighed, "… There are those who simply refuse to let the night come to this House, and that is not letting me sleep well."

"… Mother, what does that mean?" She inquired, displeased with the wordplay.

"You can't sleep at night? Are you staying awake doing work?" Takeru, however, took that literally as he always did.

Slowly patting the heads of both of them, slower this time, Yohime's eyes almost closed, lost in what ailed within. Like a boat drifting away into the sea without a compass, right into storm clouds.

"Yes… You could say so. However, it is because of said setbacks that I…" She stops, takes a breath, and then a serious, stoic expression surges forth, "That I will make sure you remain well under my care," Making a point to look into Yuuhi's eyes, the young girl's worries evaporated away.

"Why? Do I have something to do with that work?" He asked, still worried about Yohime.

"No… I merely wish to… fulfill the promises I made some time ago," Voice creaking, gaze crumbling, all of it made both little ones all the more concerned, "Taking care of you is one of such promises. There is nothing you should worry about, for your situation shall resolve itself in a month's time."

"I see… So… So I can… I can become a samurai, right?"

"Of course, provided that you attain satisfactory scores on your efforts."

"And I'm not giving you trouble?"

She then smiled as she patted his head once more before Yuuhi could repine at him, "On the contrary, knowing you are here to keep Yuuhi company now that I am busy is a great reassurance to me. Therefore, there is no reason for you to be scared, Takeru. I have been made aware that… a mean lady was undeservedly harsh to you yesterday, however you are certainly not to blame for said discussion. Your only miss was to leave your room. Are we clear?" He nods, she smiles again, "Furthermore, I shall strive to ensure you are not placed in such a precarious situation ever again," She looks into his eyes for a moment, he nods back, "Then, can I trust you'll remain being friendly with Yuuhi?"

"Yeah… Yes, I will. Don't worry, I won't use a -san with her anymore."

"However, when there are other adults nearby, please do be mindful of your manners," Yohime reminded, he nodded, and Yuuhi slightly pouted.

"… Takeru may call me by name if he so wishes," So she then complained much, another small blaze in her gaze.

"Hehehe… Please do take into account his situation, Yuuhi, dear," The young girl's groaning only made Yohime chuckle once more, "Takeru, allow me to tell you I have never seen Yuuhi as upset as I did today," She brings a hand to her cheek, smiling from ear to ear.

"Huh?! Really?"

"… That is not true," She once more repined with shrugged lips, moderately flaring back up.

"I suppose, you do become far more adusted whenever strawberry cream is involved," Yohime teased back, to her increasingly puffing cheeks and groans, "You will continue to call her by her name, will you Takeru?" She asked as she caressed her hair.

"Yeah… She looks really scary right now," He admitted as the grip on his hand was reinforced.

"I am not scary. Furthermore, I was only defending you," Still pouting, she once more drew closer to him.

"I-I know! Come on, don't be so angry…"

"Hehehe… Indeed, you should remain composed, Yuuhi," Yohime triumphantly smiled, seeing her misdirection had managed to make both of them relax, even if only a little.

"So… Um…" Takeru then took one deep breath, hesitating to continue, to look at Yohime for a moment, "I… I promise I'll try to be more polite, and I'll get better in my studies. And one day… one day I'll be good enough to make you and Yuuhi smile. So, um, p-please be patient until I get better," And then, he gave her a bow.

"I see… I shall be looking forward to that day," Nodding as he rose back, she leaned back onto her seat, finally relaxing, "However, please do remember to smile yourself. Takeru, if anyone says anything harmful, you shall tell me of it as soon as you can."

"And you can come to me as well," Yuuhi said, a bit too strongly.

"Y-Yes, I get it," Thus, he stood upright, a bit fearful at being the targeted by both of their stares.

Yohime couldn't help but to smile and giggle once more, "Hehe… Worry not, you simply need to exercise caution from today onwards,"

He nodded back, a smile of true delight decorating his face, which only further bolstered Yohime's one, "Now, there is something that I need to warn you about. Takeru, you shouldn't go wandering off by yourself anymore."

"I know… I was just…"

"I am not scolding you, I am only saying you should be careful."

"Yeah, I have to follow the rules, right?" She nods slowly, placing one hand on top of the other.

"Precisely. As your guardian, I should have warned you of this before. Forgive me," Giving him a small bow, the tint of sadness, of regret permeated her voice once more.

"No, don't apologize Yohime-san. I'll try to not give you more problems," He insisted, not liking her expression one bit, "Um… What's a guardian?" He then asked, almost certain that she wasn't talking about the knights with shields from the mangas he sometimes read.

Yuuhi then pulled his arm, gaining his attention, "Takeru, every child needs to be taken care of by an adult until they are old enough. What Mother said means that she is now the adult responsible for your safety."

"Huh… I don't get it," He admitted, not seeing the difference between this and how Maya was taking care of him before.

Yohime then ran a few fingers over her hair, taking a moment to ponder how to explain this to him, "Basically… Even if the papers will have to be presented in a certain way, I shall be your legal tutor as the current leader of this house. To put it simply, I am your adoptive mother."

Takeru slowly tilted his head, the words not sinking in entirely.

" Huh… So Yohime-san is… my mom now? … EH?! WHAT?! " The ensuing shock left him speechless, slack-jawed for a moment.

"Takeru, are you… displeased?" Yuuhi hesitantly asked, unsure on what to make of his reaction.

"I… I mean…" He looks down, tapping some fingers together while wondering how to ask his newfound fear, "You're a samurai family, and I'm not… I mean, people might get mad with you if… I join your family." And that was one thing he did not want to happen.

"However…" Yuuhi wished to press forward, yet a gaze from her mother told her to desist.

"Takeru?" Yohime asked, he looked up.

"Yes?"

She then leaned forward, slowly patting his head as her face filled his entire view, "It doesn't matter that you're not a samurai yet, because you will become a Royal Guard. Isn't that right?" Such a sweet whisper, yet carrying the strong force, the much needed water of relief he was in dire need of. Hope and encouragement.

Yet, once more, his gaze sinks, "B-But… I don't know if…"

Thus, she lifted his chin with a finger, smiling once more, "Are you still wishing to become one?" He nods, she again pets his head, "Then, said problem will be no more once you reach your goal. Could it be that you are… inconvenienced by becoming one of us?" She asked the sole doubt that still laid within, that the boy himself was wishing to return to his old lifestyle after these days he had spent here.

"No, that's not it!" Yet, he denied the possibility, even if once more doubt took his gaze captive to the depths the floor, "But… well…"

Then, he remained silent, mulling over what to do or say now, "Most people don't like me here. If Yohime-san becomes my… m-my mom then people will be mean to her too, and to Yuuhi as well," For as elated as he was to be told such a thing, equal was the concern that now festered within at the thought of anyone treating either of them as Raiko had been to him last night.

However, Yohime then poked one of his cheeks, startling Takeru a bit, "You said you wished to make me and Yuuhi smile, did you not?"

"… Yeah."

"So, since we also wish for you to remain smiling, isn't that enough for you to welcome being one of us?" She proposed, Yuuhi giving her agreement as she once more grasped his arm.

And despite his uneasiness, he managed to whisper out, "I… I do want to stay here… But… Won't people get mad at you again if you… if you tell them you're my… m-mom?"

"… While it is true that we won't be able to say it openly, that does not mean your position in the house will change," Yohime simply answered.

"Indeed," Yuuhi agreed, "Even if you do not have a role as of now, you're still a fellow. This is exactly the same, albeit we can't tell others about it."

"… So I have to keep it a secret?" He didn't understand the motive behind this, but then again, there were so many things he did not understand about the way they operated.

Yohime nodded, "Well, something of the sort. You will keep your surname after all, but you are one of us from now on regardless. Unless… you would prefer to be with someone else?" She looked away, playing with her hair. Yuuhi stared at him, awaiting his reply, grasping his arm a bit tighter with every passing second.

He looked down, pursing his lips, a tickling sensation on his sides.

Breathing in, he started remembering all the times he visited before. Now, the tickling surfaced on his neck.

Scratching his head, thinking on how she had been these last days, he swayed a bit, letting some air out.

After a moment of silence, his eyes braved their way to hers, "… Yohime-san?"

"Yes?"

"You will… really be my family? What about that thing of the Tsukuyomi family?"

"Well… In this way, you shall be family to me, Yuuhi, Maya and the rest. That is, if you so desire. You can remain solely with the Tsukuyomi House, if you still are wishing to stay here that is," She stated, reminding him of all the options, giving him the freedom to choose despite Yuuhi's glare.

Takeru, however, kept stammering, hesitating, stealing glances at her, "But… But you don't mind me… being… w-well…"

"… My son?" She inquires softly, almost in a whisper.

He nods, unable to look up now. Thousands of ants could have been marching on his back, or perhaps he could have been under a harsh downpour amidst winter, for his knees shivered, trembled non-stop.

"Takeru?" When he looked back up, Yohime had her arms open, "Come here."

"… Huh?"

"What is it? Come Takeru, give me a hug."

"… Can I?"

She nods and slowly, hesitantly he got closer, only for her to pull him in, wrapping an arm around his back.

Despite his usual way of being, Takeru had never given Yohime a hug until today. As she rubbed his back and shoulders, her perfume filled his world. Its lavender fragrance eased his worries in mere seconds, clearing any and all ill feelings he was harboring.

Running her free hand on his hair, she thus whispered on his ear, "I know you won't be able to adapt in the short term, however please be aware that I earnestly desire for you to stay living with us, if you desire so as well," Finally wrapping both of his hands around her neck, he barely managed not to cry, giving her a nod, "So please rest assured, you are no burden, and I shan't sent you away. To me you're someone important, Takeru."

"Um… Why am I important, Yohime-san?"

"Well… Thanks to you, Yuuhi has found a truly good friend, isn't that right dear?" She asked Yuuhi, who was sulking a bit.

"But of course, Mother," She then drew closer, also joining in the hug, "Takeru is an invaluable friend to me."

Yohime kept rubbing his back as he shivered again, this time in relief, seeing his fears were unfounded, "And let's not forget that you also have helped both Mion and Shion. I believe my house needs honest, kindhearted people like you and your father. And…" She stopped all of a sudden, enforcing her embrace momentarily, "And I must thank you as well."

"Why? Did I do something good?" She once more massaged his hair as she pulls him back, allowing Yuuhi to again latch onto his arm, allowing him to see the weariness setting in those amethysts.

"Yes… Remember what I said about the night?" Both of them nod, Yuuhi sobering up, "Well… That was also, in part, thanks to you and our father. You've done much for me and my House, so I shall take good care of you."

"Which means you're part of our family from now on," Yuuhi happily declared, beaming at him.

"R-Really? You're… my family now?" Not believing his ears, especially after how Maya had been yesterday, he gave both of them a good look. Only bright smiles did he find in them.

"As I said before, you should keep this a secret so that no one gets upset. Do you promise me you'll keep it a secret, Takeru?" Yohime asked.

"Y-Yes! I won't tell anyone," She giggles at the immediateness of his reply.

"That is good to hear. Hehe… I didn't expect to be bestowed a boy in this manner."

"Hm? What do you mean?" He asks, then looks at Yuuhi.

"Mother, did you wish for me to have a brother?" She inquires, as she had always been rather curious about the fact that she had no siblings whatsoever while all other Houses would always have at the least two children.

Yohime sighs, keeping her smile bolted in place, recalling the ordeals that ensued when the news of that she would give birth to both Yuuhi and Meiya traveled to the wrong ears in the fellowship…. And the impossibility that was placed onto her afterwards.

Thus, she merely patted their heads, "Well, it matters not. Takeru, from now on please keep your high spirits. I shall make an effort to save some time for you and Yuuhi after dinner. And Yuuhi, do remember to keep your poise should someone hurl unpleasantries at him," Both of them nodded, he barely restraining a smile, she with the onset of another pout looming in.

"Okay… S-So… From now on I'm your…" He hesitated, wanting to hear it from her.

So, she obliged, "My son, yes."

Again, he shivered as he heard her words, tightening his hands to not cry.

"And my brother," Yuuhi said as she again linked her arm with his, still beaming as brightly as a Laser upon artillery suppression.

" Sniff… Thanks… Really, I'll do my best from now on… So-" His worried spiel was cut short as Yohime once more poked his cheek.

"I know this might come as a shock for you as of now, however I believe it is for the best that you know that we are here for you not as acquaintances as before," He nods quickly, she and Yuuhi giggle once more, "So, please rest assured. I shall be taking good care of you as your guar-"

"M-Mom," He barely whispered it out, biting his tongue in the process.

"… Huh?" Both Yohime and Yuuhi remained silent, awaiting his next words.

Taking one sharp breath, rubbing his arms, Takeru finally looked at her in the eye, "C-Can I call you… mom when we're alone, please?"

She closes her eyes, resting her hands on her lap, "Do you want me to… be your Mother, Takeru?" She returned his stare, he gulped hard and nodded. Then, slowly placing her hands on his shoulders, once more she drew him in towards her, planting a kiss on his cheek before wrapping him in an embrace again, "Then, we're in agreement that we are family from now on, Takeru."

"R-Really?"

"Indeed. I'm sure you are also in agreement, Yuuhi?"

She hadn't finished the query that Yuuhi was already hugging him as well, "Of course. I'm truly elated to welcome Takeru as my brother," She affirmed, truly happy that she now had complete confirmation that he would stay, to now have a certainty that he would always be there.

Since, due to the pressure now on her shoulders to take on the mantle of the Koubuin House's regency, to become the Head they required before her relatives outside of the succession branch grew… inpatient, let's call it, more and more duties have been placed on her so small shoulders when she should have been grieving Takahisa's death.

And unlike Takeru, Yuuhi did not allow herself to so easily shed tears. The dam of her emotions was, most certainly, threatening with overflowing or spawning cracks. Which is why for her, being herself around the young boy was the only outlet that she had, the only moment in her routine where she wouldn't be reminded of either her duties or her father's passing. A much needed fresh gale of respite for a wounded bird that was made to trudge on in the muddy soil.

Which is why, seeing her earnest joy for the first time since the news of her lord husband's passing had arrived, Yohime could do nothing but embrace both of them tightly, as she perhaps had never done to her daughter before.

"It seems we are all in agreement, then. Could you… call me like that again, Takeru?" She asked, now being the one wishing to hear it from his lips.

Thus, he more than happily obliged, "… Mom."

Then his arms enforced their hold over her neck, the fragrance of her perfume lulling him to relaxation, which caused her to giggled for a moment, then beginning to hum a melody as she played with his hair.

"… Don't worry. This is your home from now on," She whispered on his ear again.

"Yes… Yes! I'll be good from now on, I promise. I'll do my best to make you and Yuuhi smile… M-Mom," He declared with a smile, and as they broke the hug, he thought, "I know I had my own mom. But… Yohime-san has always been so nice. It isn't wrong, right? I still love my own mom, but… I can like Yohime-san as my mom too, right?" His doubts were quickly dispelled as Yuuhi and Yohime kept smiling, the former still intent on remaining close to him.

"Hehe… That is truly good to hear. So, I suppose this makes Yuuhi your older sister now as well?"

"Huh? Why is she the older one?"

She giggles as she caresses his hair, "Well, she is around three hours older than you."

"Mmgh… I don't mind then."

"Hehe, worry not, Takeru," Yuuhi said with a confident puff of her chest, "I shall be a good older sister for you, so do not hesitate to come to me for anything you might require."

"So… I'm really…"

"Part of our family," Yohime thus said, erasing any and all lingering doubts he could have left, "From now on, even if you shall keep your surname as far as the rest are concerned, I want you to consider yourself as Takeru Koubuin, dear. I shall ensure nobody will treat you unfairly again, so do remain doing your best efforts."

"T-Thank you… Um…" He drew closer to her once more, Yohime leaned in and, to her surprise, Takeru grasped her face and gave her a strong kiss on her cheek, then hugged her again, this time far tighter than before, "I love you, Mom. I'll do my best from now on to make you smile," Feeling as if he were sinking in warm water, relaxing as her perfume again enveloped him, Yohime also returned the hug, kissing the top of his head once she recovered from the surprise, since no one other than Takahisa had ever laid such a kiss on her person.

"… I love you too, dear. Also, don't forget to thank your sister as well," She ended the hug, turning him to face a, now slightly sulking, Yuuhi.

"Ah, yes. Thanks a lot, Yuuhi. I'll do my best to be a good brother here," He gave her a brightest smile, which would normally spur one in her as well, however…

She took a singular step closer, arching her brows, "So, there isn't a hug for me?" She demanded, lips plucked.

Blinking for a second, Takeru was so happy that he didn't even register why she was mad nor made any effort to think about it. Thus, pulling her into the tightest hug he had ever given her thus far, quite happily he then proceeded to give a strong smooch to one of her cheeks before rubbing one of his against it.

"Thanks a lot, Yuuhi. I love you a lot, too," He earnestly said, unable to hide his joy.

Which froze the young Yuuhi for a moment, since she was decidedly not expecting a kiss nor such an intense show of affection from Takeru. However, what inner worries plagued her mind vanishing away, her arms ducked under his as she returned the hug, the pressure on his cheek with hers.

"No thanks are required… I lo… I love you too, Takeru."

Yohime merely basked into the sheer sunshine they exuded as if she were a sunflower, then deciding to stop them after a while.

Reminding Takeru that he had to keep this as a secret, she only could giggle as he once more answered instantly that he would never tell anyone of it.

Thus, making sure both of them were tidied up and ready to leave, and that this discussion was settled, she then called for Maya to enter once more.

Takeru knew that he couldn't hug her again, so he simply got a bit closer to whisper a "Have a good day, Mom," to Yohime, which she answered with another radiant smile as she patted his head one last time. The same with Yuuhi, though she did not care for formalities in front of Maya and hugged him anyways, to his and Yohime's shock.

All three of them with their spirits invigorated, they then parted ways to their respective duties. Yuuhi to her limo to attend her institute, since they would have to hustle to arrive on time after the talk, Yohime to oversee the House as a whole, and Takeru to his classes.

Silently walking along Maya to his classroom, neither said a word though he remained smiling.

Unable to endure further silence, she drew closer to him, "Takeru?"

"… What?" He replied, still a bit upset at her.

"Forgive me. I shouldn't have reacted so harshly towards you yesterday after we left the gardens… I did not meant to neglect your dinner, and I assuredly do not think the same as the Chamberlain in the least," She insisted, highlighting the last words, awaiting a nod, a smile, or his usual cheer towards her.

"… I see," But he just looked away, unsure of how to answer on his end, since he wasn't in a foul mood now. And despite everything she said the prior night, he still wanted to believe in Maya.

However, she could very well have swallowed a gallon of ice, "Uh, Takeru… I… Ahem, we should make haste," She decided to not push further, instead to try to reach out for his hand.

He still was looking away, yet he didn't pull away. Neither a tight hold nor the usual steadfast lock, just a soft link between their fingertips.

Enough to tell him she was truly sorry. Enough to tell her she had been forgiven.

Same day. Near 8 PM.

(Inside the dojo.)

---

The day went by uneventfully, classes being tackled, reports being made, the outcome of the prior meeting the center of whispers and debates within the corridors.

However, unlike every other day, both Yohime and Yuuhi had made some time to watch Takeru's training on the dojo. On the latter's case, to see for herself Kazora wasn't being unnecessarily harsh to little Takeru, on the former, because she wanted to cheer him on as he always had done for her thus far.

" Yohime-san might be my mom and Yuuhi my sister now, but until I get good results… I'm going to be a stranger for the rest here," He pondered as he put his arm guards in place, "So, I have to do my bestest best of an effort today. Just like Masahide-san said, I gotta slash the mountain in half without harming the fish," Nodding strongly, determined to do well today, Takeru froze up when seeing both Yohime and Yuuhi awaiting his exit.

Waving at them as the echoing sounds of the cousins' duel began to reverberate more and more, Takeru made his way to Kazora's side.

The old Tsukuyomi was truly in shock at the morning's event, far more to see little Takeru still firmly standing in front of him now, far more stoic and driven than he had ever seemed to be up until now.

However, he could ascertain the depths of his determination, to see whether the boy's vigor would diminish or not after the expected failings of his first week in the house.

"Well Shirogane, let us begin." He somberly says, getting into his pose.

"Yes!" Takeru also began taking his pose as well.

Tightening his grip on his blade, he observed Kazora's stance while thinking on what he could do.

" If I want to not give my new family trouble and one day be able to help them, I have to find my own way to become a samurai in this month. The Muramasa or the Masamune… Which one should I be now, Masahide-san?"

Choosing to fight first on the defensive, Takeru allowed Kazora to start the duel. Planting his heels hard on the ground, he kept firmly parrying the swings yet still found himself going backwards. Mere moments had passed, yet his heartbeat was already present on his neck, sweat trickling down his face and back.

He then prepares a feint, that the boy couldn't see through, and once more he breaks Takeru's defense. Landing a quick and decisive attack upon his chest, the ground once more meets up with the little rear end.

" He's too fast! That's cheating!" He complained within as he stood up, ready for another duel.

Kazora walks back to his prior position, taking the same pose as before, "Ready, Shirogane?"

"Yes!"

This time, however, Takeru employed an offensive approach, in an attempt to 'slash the mountain really, really hard', as he put it himself.

Yet, Kazora kept effortlessly parrying the attacks, while he failed to react fast enough to properly block his slashes.

His feet alert to not slip, yet the patterns he followed were not yielding results. Yohime was pleasantly surprised at his skill, she had never seen him fight and assumed Takeru was far rougher. Yuuhi on the other hand was clutching her hands, tightly suppressing her breath within.

Takeru himself was growing anxious at his reiterated failed attacks, "No matter whether I attack or defend… I always lose in the end. What can I do? Could I… do both at the same time? Being the Masamune and the Muramasa at the same time… Slashing the mountain without harming the fish… Moving fast like in Iaido but while also doing Kendo…"

As Kazora gave him a short breathing room, Yuuhi and Yohime appeared on the corner of his sight, watching him fight. It reminded him of the scarce times his father had done the same. Repeating his vow to be better, sighing as his grip on his wooden blade shifted, Takeru then took a different pose, which shook all those watching.

The blade above his shoulder, the edge facing outwards, his knees bent barely behind the tail-end of his feet. Without losing a second, he began pushing forward once more.

" Keep the feet on the ground, take firmer steps forward. If I don't, I'll lose my balance," He kept reminding himself, to not fall prey to any more feints.

The session drone on, Takeru began gasping for air during the duels, feeling emptiness setting on his stomach. Shoulders and legs growing stiff, nevertheless he kept pushing.

"… What can I do? How do I attack? Remember the advice… There has to be something I can do…" He worriedly thought, doing his best to return the parry.

Stagnating into another lock, Takeru realized Kazora was pressuring his middle exclusively, to take a step back if he were to attempt a sideways counter.

Recalling his parents, one of his feet moved forward, the parry deflected, never breaking down under the avalanche of slashes.

" I don't know what I can do, but I wanna make them proud."

Reading the step back, he prepared a sideways slash as a feint. Changing his swing with one firm step, he deflected the attack without losing his blade as always, surprising Kazora as he had to now switch to defense under Takeru's offensive momentum.

" Yohime-san and Yuuhi were so kind, I wanna return their love. I'm gonna give their futures a smile, no matter what!"

Enduring the following slashes, parrying them off, Kazora was bound to take a step back soon.

And when he finally did, Takeru lurched forward. Feeling a tingly shiver on his head, a twinge of pain under his ears, focused only on wanting to make his new family proud, on how to break Kazora's defense…

" Wait, wasn't there… something Maya-nee said about fighting? Yeah… about the waterfall… "

Breathing in, seeing an opening, he swung his sword with eyes blazing while repeating the advice that surged within.

" Like a petal that dances upon the winds, your attacks must be.

Graceful, precise, but deadly as well.

Unpredictable as the changing form of a cloud…

With the serenity of a leaf moving along a river…

And the violence of the rapids as they charge downstream…

Swiftly. Firmly. Fiercely. Calmly.

Let your strikes flow upon your enemy, like an unending waterfall!"

Managing to force Kazora to a hurried slash, deflecting it in a swift parry, Takeru kept his breath within, pushing forward hard with his heels, and went for one final slash, "Like a petal… move in the river… and attack like a waterfall!"

SWISH!

SLASH!

BAM!

"U-Ugh…" The boy now found himself laid on the floor, everything in sight spinning.

Yohime and Maya sprung forward, ready to admonish Kazora for retaliating seriously, yet the man's gaze remained shocked, firmly planted on the boy.

" H-How did he even counter at that distance… That's cheating… Everything is spinning… I feel as if I were floating," Yet, he didn't even have the strength to get up or groan.

"Takeru!" He hear someone calling out his name as his head was lifted up, "Takeru, are you alright?"

Blinking a few times, his vision comes back to normal, Maya was right above him with a dead serious, worry-stricken gaze.

"Ugh… Yeah."

"Are you feeling well, Takeru?" Mion asked from somewhere, he groaned a bit.

"Does anything hurt?" Yuuhi asked, worriedly scanning him top to bottom.

"Y-Yeah… I'm okay."

"… Kazora-san, could you kindly explain what compelled you to do such a thing?" Yohime inquired, barely restraining her ire.

"… I merely was caught off guard," He said with a sigh.

"You certainly do not expect such an answer to appease me, do you?" Her glare intensified onto him, he shook his head.

"No, yet there is something that will explain it," He said, walking towards the wobbly shape that was trying to stand back up, "Shirogane."

"W-What?"

"… Congratulations."

"For what?"

"You managed to strike my hands with your last slash," He says as he folds his arms, placing his sword under one, "I was not expecting such speed from you, I reacted instinctively and countered seriously after you did. Forgive me."

"So… So… So I…" He stutters, staring at him.

Kazora then nods, "Yes, you've passed my preliminary test. However, there is something I wish to ask you regarding your sta-"

" HELL YEAH! I DID IT! " Taking a high jump, the boy proceeded to swing his blade up and down unhinged, "I hit him! I did it! Take that, you mean old people! I did it! WRYYYYYYYYYY! "

"Takeru, calm down," Maya puts a hand on his shoulder, halting his reckless celebration. But then she smiles, patting his head, "Congratulations. I certainly did not expect you to reach such a performance today."

Smiling much, he nods towards both Koubuins, "Well… I had to try harder for Mo… for Yohime-san."

Maya curves a brow for a second, but then merely nods back.

"Hehe, you truly did fight spectacularly," Yohime then also nodded his way, making his chest swell with warmth.

"Congratulations, Takeru!" Mion comes closer, both of them beam back at the other.

"But, are you really fine?" Shion asks, plucking her lips, "Your back doesn't hurt, right?"

"No, I'm fine," He says, barely managing to not do a small jump.

"I see… So, you're feeling well?" She insisted.

"Yeah… Why?"

"Well, after this morning…" Mion scratches one of her cheeks with a lone finger, "We were worried about how you would perform in the dojo. You truly surprised us with these duels, Takeru."

"Hehe, are you sure you didn't cheat?" Shion rises a finger at him, smirking while letting her teeth be seen.

"What?! You dumb pickle… I didn't cheat! I fought fair and square!" So then he folds his arms, pouting. She and Yuuhi giggle at him while Mion gives both a nasty stare along him.

"And you should be proud of this, Takeru," Maya says, nodding his way. Which makes him look down in embarrassment, that only makes Shion chuckle and he pouts at her again, "However, Father, I believe your retaliation was too severe."

"I will have to agree," Yohime said, leveling a stare towards the man, "Merely being hit does not warrant such aggression."

"Yohime-sama, did you see how he was moving?" He says, a hand on his chin as he looks at Takeru, who stares back without a clue.

"Was there anything unusual with his footwork?" She inquires, lost upon his query.

"What of you, Maya?" He then asked.

And she shook her head, "Well, no, I was focusing on the cousins' bout."

"I see… Mion, Shion, return to your positions. I have to ask something to Maya."

The cousins furrow their brows, but then nod. They again smile at Takeru before going to their end of the dojo, starting another duel.

Noticing Kazora's seriousness, Yohime patted her daughter's shoulder, "Yuuhi, dear, please go watch the cousins' bout."

While she was wishing to retort, Yohime's firm stare made Yuuhi relent. Again smiling at Takeru, she slowly moved closer to the cousins despite her eyes never leaving his back.

"Shirogane, come here," Kazora asked and he approached, Maya and Yohime doing the same. Coughing once, he began, "So Shirogane, did you do anything differently this time?"

"Yeah, I tried to slash the mountain in half without harming the fish," He honestly replied, to their surprise.

"… Excuse me?" Kazora tilts his head, narrowing his brows. Maya does the same, whereas Yohime had to cover her mouth to drown a chuckle.

She then thus asked, "Takeru, what do you mean by that?"

"Masahide-san told me about it. So, it's like…"

He then tells them of the tale he was told yesterday, of how he tried to take one step more whenever he couldn't counter fast enough, of how he tried to imitate Maya's style.

"I see… So you were trying to apply my advice," She says as she taps her glasses.

"It is surprising to see you adapt so fast to the methodology Maya employs, most prefer to remain in the traditional Kendo stance," Kazora admits with a nod, rubbing his beard.

"However, I assume this performance was far better than any of the prior days?" Yohime asks, and as Kazora nods she could only smile, "Impressive. Well done, Takeru. Quite an interesting approach, to draw inspiration from folk tales," She was aware he favored them, yet such a development was unexpected considering how technical Takahisa was whenever he spoke to her about kendo.

"I just tried my best," To not give you trouble, and make you smile instead, he finished within. Suddenly embarrassed, he looks up while scratching his head, "I had to attack without losing my defense, like that petal that's on a river towards the unending waterfall."

Yet, those words shook both Tsukuyomis all over again, what but a sudden thunderbolt in the middle of the night.

"W-What…" Maya twitched, unsure of what to ask first, "Takeru… Where did you hear those words?"

But he just tilts his head, raises a brow in puzzlement, "Where? Didn't you tell me about that once?"

"… Maya, I believed you were not teaching him anything beyond the basics?" Kazora narrowed his eyes at her.

"Kazora-san, whatever is the matter?" Yohime asks.

"Those are the words of Maya's own spin on the Mugen Kidou. So if he was told of them beforehand, I'm sure you know what problems that would entail," He solemnly answered.

Yohime nodded, gaze sharpening towards the young woman, "Maya, what do you have to say for yourself?"

"I did not teach him my poem, milady. I swear it on my honor," Her honesty made both recede, now staring at the worried, little shape nearby, "Takeru, when did you learn of those words?"

"Um… Why are you angry? I… did something bad?" He asked, scared of having made more trouble for Yohime.

"… No, nothing of the sort," She then patted his head, easing his worries, "We are merely wishing to know when did you hear Maya's poem, for it is important for our samurai."

"Well… Isn't that weird poem what she tells to Shion sometimes?"

"… I see, so you overhead me giving her advice," Maya heavily sighs, running a hand over her forehead, "Such blunder on my part… My apologies, Yohime-sama."

She waves a hand, also sighing, "No, there is no need. Now then, Takeru, did you felt comfortable following the poem?"

He nods, arms folded, "Yeah, but it's kinda hard to do what it says. My feet hurt after stepping so hard," Shrugging his lips, Yohime allowed herself to giggle.

"Well… I suppose you would get used to it the more you practice," Maya affirmed, tapping her glasses, "Yohime-sama, Father, would you… allow Takeru to be trained under my style?"

Kazora looks at Yohime, who nods after a moment of pondering. Thus, arms folded, he nods, "If this is how he reached a decent level of aptitude, so be it. However, Shirogane you will have to redouble your efforts if you wish to be trained under the Tsukuyomi House itself instead of just joining the Royal Guard. Are you certain you-"

"Yes! I wanna train with Maya-nee!" His fervent, instant reply caught Kazora and Maya off guard again, while Yohime simply chuckled once more.

"I-I see… Then, I'll allow it," Twirling his beard, he firmly stared back, "Remember to never stop training, Shirogane. Your real training begins from now on."

"Yay! Thanks a lot, Kazora-san!" Dropping his sword, Takeru leapt forward to hug him.

"W-What are you doing? Shirogane, release me this instant."

"Why? Don't you like hugs?"

"I… I need no such gestures," He frowns, closes his eyes, and looks away, "If you wish to thank me, then show me today's performance wasn't a coincidence and keep improving your skill until it becomes normal for you."

"… I got it," Takeru pulls away, puffing a cheek, "But thanks a lot for letting me train with all of you, Kazora-san!"

"… It is good to see you're thankful, despite what occurred this morning. Now, do you feel well enough to spar with the cousins?"

"Yeah, I'll do my best!" He immediately answered.

"I see. Maya, if you would," So Kazora prepared to continue.

"Yes, Father," Maya then walks towards the cousins, her father following behind.

However, Takeru took a moment before going with them, tenderly grasping Yohime's sleeve.

"So, did you think I did well, Yohime-san?"

"Indeed. Not many can fight as Maya does as far as I've heard."

"You're not mad about the poem, right?" He hesitantly asked.

Yet she shook her head, patting his, "Of course not, dear. If this is how you can improve, keep training as such."

"Okay. So, um," He took a step closer, whispering now, "Please look well, Mom. I'll do my best now against the Pickles."

She smiled widely, caressing his cheek for a short second, whispering back what she knew would aid him the most, "So I shall. Best of luck, dear son."

His spirit reinvigorated, as well as his smile, Takeru went his way towards the cousins, completely forgetting about what darkest thoughts had made nest within at morning.

Thus, from then on, little Takeru had chosen to follow the path of the samurai, driven by the affection he was bequeathed with when he himself was thinking on giving up. Unaware of what trials awaited, of the deepest recesses he would find himself in, never did he waver again on his decision to remain in the Koubuin House. And so… such was the dawn of his new beginning, the first major alteration.

… However, perhaps what truly started today was a more subtle, more important change on Takeru's end.

A/N: So with this chapter this flashback arc has been finished.

On the last days I came to the realization that it's been more or less a year since the fic had started to dwindle, since my first idea to integrate the past directly instead of just mentioning it. As one reviewer aptly put it, it's been a year since I've been 'spinning my wheels' with the past events. So I understand the frustration some may have, I never intended to tilt for a whole year.

How did this flashback arc felt? If past memories were to be present, would you rather it be in a long chapter like this one, as a small segment or a smaller chapter, or you're just about done with the flashbacks?

That's all for now. No idea when the next chapter will come out, still juggling on how to redo the following arc to not have it overflowing with angst as it did before, what will all the paranoia. Anyways, thanks for reading. Stay safe.

4th Arc: Paranoia

Chapter 57: My Beloved Brother

---

1999. On a stormy night of January.

(Tokyo. Imperial Palace. Audience Room.)

[Yuuhi]

---

Incessant rain comes down harshly onto our windows, which waver and quiver, rattle and shiver. From beyond their frames, lighting dances under the hailing skies, its bright rebellion seeping into the large room through the curtains, through the drenched glass.

When so happens, the shadows of the pillars enlarge, the farther end of this place becomes visible for a speck of a second, before all falls into the quiet lukewarm yellow lights that illuminate this audience room, surrounded by a soft veil of incense.

As one such thunder reverberated outside, as I had to restrain an urge to shiver or betray my posture as the temperature decidedly began to descend, the guest that had come to my presence shook his head, looking towards me and Mana, who stood nearby in protection as always.

"I am loath to admit, yet you are asking the impossible out of us, Your Highness," 2nd Lt. Sukerokuro Makabe thus tells, kneeling on the floor as a coiled fist rests on it as well, keeping a most cool tone in contrast to the weather, "We certainly cannot share any further supplies with the MDF, and to subtract any more troops from our front would place the defense lines in jeopardy. Please, I beg you to reconsider," Then, he bows down deeply.

"Is that so… Be as it may, the 24th Regiment is in dire need of reinforcements," Enduring the dryness in my throat, mustering an amicable tone, a small smile is all I can spare for him, "Is there truly no way in which Ikaruga-dono could relinquish at least an artillery battalion?"

"My apologies, Your Highness," He shakes his head, gaze unmoving from the ground, "As I said, we cannot spare any more troops. On the contrary, I would suggest you to reinforce our Horn battalion. Were the BETA begin to push forward from Yokohama-"

"Silence!" Mana so shouts, far more adusted than she should be, "The measures taken by Her Highness are crafted by Great General Daizaburou himself. What manner of complains would you raise against them, Makabe?"

Lifting his face, a somber, most inquisitive grin greets us, "Do I have to remind you I am speaking in the name of the Head of the Ikaruga House, Takatsugu-sama himself? Furthermore, Maya has also signed her agreement to any and all petitions I forward, as the document I gave you a moment ago tells, Mana," Still smiling upon her groans, he once more gazes my way, a subtle bow afterwards, "I was under the impression our Houses had agreed to work in unison since a few months back, however, I apologize if my words were inappropriate to your ears Your Highness, milady."

Mana's face contorted, crackled as the windows under the night's gale upon hearing his last word, a gaze from me subdued her impulse on time. Taking a step back, she limits herself to listen for the moment.

"I have not taken offense. I relinquished authority in the field to Ikaruga-dono after all, due to his exploits in Kyoto's last moments. And it is because of such reasons that I desire his aid to reinforce our defense lines."

Never losing the smile, he again looks up my way, "However, were we to relocate our men as you command, more supply routes would need to be procured, devised, and defended. If you allowed Takatsugu-sama to manage the food distribution in our area of operations, as well as partial command over the 24th regiment, I could try to make a convincing enough appeal to grant your wishes."

"What insolence!" Mana once more steps forward, this time truly angered, "Her Highness has already given ample freedom to all other Regent Houses, yet you dare demand further dominion over the chain of command?!"

Yet, he then brandished a solemn expression, glaring at Mana, "Would you rather have the Empire's resources be managed by the feeble Diet government? Those who continue to parley with the UN after how they abandoned Yokohama? As a fellow Shinpan, I was under the impression you also favored Her Highness taking command of her rightful forces, as Maya does too."

"Allow me to remind you, Her Highness has given her blessing to Sakaki's cabinet. You'd be well served in remembering that while in her presence," Their stares clash in imitation of today's tempest, yet again my throat dries up as Mana refuses to ease her stance, "So, what you're getting at is, your faction refuses to comply with the directives issued by Her Highness?"

His brows narrow, quietly replying, "Nonsense. I am merely forwarding an alternative to the plan that has been given to us. Her Highness has the final say in the matter after all, regardless of who crafts the documents she is presented with. You certainly wouldn't be saying that the dim ink on such frail papers holds more weight than the word of our Lady Shogun?"

"Speak no further balderdash, Makabe!" Mana takes yet another step forward, further animosity welling up, "Her Highness has already expressed her wishes, to collaborate with both the UN and the Diet on this darkest hour that befell us. Therefore, your answer to our request…"

"… I already expressed it. Your Highness, could you kindly consider bestowing us full control over the food distribution?"

"How dare-"

"Mana," A glance her way elicited a bow, she once more returned to my side. Taking a second, I look back at him, forcing a tender tone, "2nd Lt. Makabe, while I would be willing to negotiate such terms with the Regency Council, I believe that having you forward the proposal on your own is rather precarious. For the sake of conversation, if I were to give my agreement, what would be of the civilian camps under your care?"

"If you'd allow us, we propose to halve their current supplies," He so says, immutable over what he just uttered.

Momentarily licking my lips, I slowly shake my head, "That is unacceptable. Our people cannot shoulder the burden of this war any further."

"Yet, to force our warriors to endure the strain of the war overlong while receiving mild C Rank rations shan't allow us to maintain our performance," Again bowing his head, his tone never is compromised in its stillness, "I was made aware there are certain… negotiations with the authorities of the prior Hakuryo Base going on behind curtains. In which case, it is imperative we bolster the supplies of the Royal Guard for the day when the… ahem…

proposition to strike back arrives to your presence. Please, I beg you to reconsider my proposal, Your Highness, milady."

Feeling my neck stiffening further, the smallest movement spawning a searing pain from my middle back and rising to my nape, while closing my eyes for a moment I ponder his suggestion. And yet, our civilians are already enduring undeserved living conditions as it is. The thought of halving their supplies… Yet, were the defense lines to crumble, nothing would stand between them and the BETA. Were we to lose any further terrain, our negotiations with both the US and the UN will assuredly grow ever arduous. Without even considering the risk of Tokyo falling as well, that is.

I could use my acceptance towards this proposal of Makabe as a pathway to parley with Ikaruga-dono in exchange for his support, as this feeble voice is all I have now. As the Shogun, as the beacon I must be… I cannot sow further unrest. I must be a guiding light… I must remain attentive. Such is my duty… my own morals notwithstanding, I must act to safeguard my people's future, especially after all the blood that has been spilled. Then… Then I should-

" Heh… I wonder, what happened to the delivery that was made by the 20th Squadron to your forces a few days ago?" A forceful inquiry, mired by static, reverberates all over the room. His voice, coming through some distortion device.

Makabe turns around hastily, readiness in his posture. Yet, his eyes are met with emptiness. Shock widening, his sight slowly scanning the surrounding area, nothing appears out of sorts as another thunder illuminates the room, as the echoes of hail threaten to blast the windows open. Mana also begins to scan the room, softly biting her lips as she presses the comms she has on her neck to alert him, to order him to stop.

Shaking my head, sighing and seeing my breath, I also cannot ascertain where he might be. I told you to remain quiet during this meeting… Whatever are you trying to accomplish?

" Well, Makabe? Your answer is?" He thus demanded, from beyond the veil.

I look around, from the outstretched shadows of the pillars, to the tempestuous storm that's hitting the windows to the balcony, to the further depths of this audience room where no light reaches. From the furniture, to the tapestry, and our immediate surroundings. His voice doesn't come from any of such places, and yet, it feels as if it did at the same time.

Briefly glancing upwards, towards the lone chandelier, I also cannot distinguish anything odd in the ceiling's shadows. Makabe seems to be holding his breath while looking for the source of the voice, the composure he was showing moments ago wavering upon the void shadows.

"… Makabe, what of this delivery?" I ask, eyeing my surroundings with an obvious gesture, hoping he'll desist from intruding any further.

"Ah… Ahem… There is nothing to report, Your Highness. It arrived as it should have, and we are more than thankful for your support," He bows down, yet his eyes remain open and alert, a hand rested on his blade.

"I see… Then, are those supplies not sufficient to delay this talk of restructuring the food distribution for even just a month?" I ask, smiling his way in hopes of gaining an affirmation.

"Well… However, the delivery was mostly for the maintenance of our machinery. The food within was of low quality, and not as plentiful as we had hoped, which is why I-"

" An entire Type-89 Cargo Vehicle worth of synth food, courtesy of the Amato House," He interrupts again, forcing me to not display any signs in my face as my fingers ingrain into my palms, making Makabe's gaze again scour the room pointlessly.

… I wonder, just how does he remain hidden at times like this. Mana and Maya do the same from time to time, yet I can tell where they are. Was it because they allowed me to notice, then? I should never have allowed Tsuhi to train you to conceal your presence…

"Your Highness… If I may, what in blazes is going on here?" Makabe asks, quite understandably alarmed as his eyes failed to locate anything amidst the pillars and furniture further in, not even when a faint lightning shed some light into the room.

"Sigh… One retainer of mine simply does not like to appear in front of others as of late. No offense is meant, Makabe," Giving him a small smile, his tension seems to ease slightly.

" So, regarding the cargo…" He once more demands, this time endowing a more toxic tone.

"Ahem…" Makabe eyes the surrounding area again, his gaze squinting ever more as he was unable to track Takeru's whereabouts, "As I was saying, the delivery was not sufficient for our battalion and its adjacent infantry and artillery regiments. Which is why I am presenting this alternative to you, Your Highness."

As I was about to reply, Mana took a step forward, slowly, delayed, and oddly composed without raising her voice, a hand planted on the edge of her dress' neck, "Tell me, Makabe. The delivery of this cargo did reach your battalion?"

"… Yes, of course."

"You had said that… you were left fending with C Rank synth food, if I recall. However, double checking my PDA, the report here says-"

" The food delivered to the Horn battalion was of A Rank," Once more adusted, just as a bolting blasted the skies outside and violently vandalized the shadows of the pillars, the frames of the windows, he thus insisted, making Mana groan at the interruption,

"Care to explain what this means, 2nd Lieutenant, sir?" Mockingly so, he finishes.

Frowning much, Makabe stands up, surveying the seemingly empty darkened area once more, "First, what we were given were C Rank supplies. Secondly, what manner of Imperial Guard are you? Show yourself!"

"Makabe, remain kneeling!" Mana demanded, "You are in the presence of Her Highness the Shogun!"

"Do not mock me, Mana. It is one thing to conceal one's presence, I could understand such reticence from a guardian of our Lady Shogun. However, to raise such accusations towards my House?" Smiling once more, looking my way, he bowed down, a hand on his chest, "I am certain Your Highness is also most aggravated by this buffoon's conduct."

Sigh… This is why I told you to not speak up during this meeting… If I press forward, our bilateral collaborations with House Ikaruga might crumble. Yet, Takeru wouldn't lie just to gain pointless animosity, much less while knowing I stand much to lose… Mana also confirmed the delivery had other contents, going by her gaze she is certain of it. And despite our disagreements of late, Raiko-san is truly loyal to me. She wouldn't send anything short of the best if I expressly requested her direct involvement.

However, where I to delve more, Makabe might blame the MDF or the inductees for this error in the delivery. After all, such tasks are left to the fresh members inducted after Kyoto fell and we had quite more defectors and traitors in our ranks than I'd like to have known since the Capital fell, even more after both hives were made.

People just looking to smuggle food for their families and friends, to steal pieces of technology and drugs to sell on the black market… With the state of our surveillance systems after the continuous attacks we suffered, there are many black spots in our security that we are still trying to mend.

Softly sighing, seeing once more my breath, my ruminating accompanied by the echoes of falling rain, my shoulders sink and sink as if I myself were under the weather's relentless downpour.

Be as it may, this state of affairs is only further proof of my failings to provide adequate shelters and supplies for our people in their time of need. As the Head I am, even if I hadn't endowed the mantle of the Shogun, I cannot truly condemn my people for being forced to fend for themselves to provide for their beloved ones due to my lacking foresight, my inadequate response to this threat.

… And as much as I abhor to consider the possibility, I am aware Ikaruga-dono might have already used this state of affairs for his convenience. However, to claim such without proof, or even with it, would be political suicide as it is. Without his support, and the Takatsukasa House that is seemingly under his wing as well, there is little the IRG will be able to do on the frontlines. To say he is lauded as a hero within our ranks and by the people is an understatement. If I take him away from the frontlines, many will raise their voices against such a decision.

… If only you had stayed quiet. What are you even trying to accomplish, Takeru?

Inhaling slowly into the smell of the incense, joining my hands, I level a stare at the one in front of me, "No one is raising accusations, Makabe. I suppose, my retainer is merely concerned at the news of these missing supplies. Can you confirm that you did not receive the A Rank synth food I had commanded to be sent towards Ikaruga-dono's forces?"

Yet, he immediately shakes his head, kneeling once more, "But of course not, Your Highness. Had that delivery arrived, we would have no issues with your current directives. But as things stand now…" Smiling once more, gazing up, "Perhaps, if it would please you, we could investigate this matter and punish the inductees that were involved in this ploy to astray your helping hand from your loyal soldiers."

Mana sighs, folding her arms, "If you were unable to detect an entire cargo having its contents swapped, how could you possibly take responsibility for this issue?"

Yet, he returns another somber smile at her, "First, it is unjust to blame the Ikaruga House for the dastardly deeds of the defectors. Our forces are as hard pressed as yours, and isn't that why our Regents are working shoulder by shoulder each day, as Maya does alongside me?"

Mana groans, perhaps not due to her own reservations towards Maya's conduct as of late… but more out of concern towards Takeru's reaction to such words. I still cannot sense anything, the shadows further in remain quiet, the quiver of the windows along the rain being the only source of sound for the moment.

Makabe continues unabated, still grinning, "Furthermore, now that I have been made aware that we were unable to detect this missing cargo, I must once more insist on the countermeasure I proposed a moment before," Once more bowing, neither this sudden questioning nor the thunders could breach his facade, it seems, "Grant my lord command over all inductees and commoners entering our area of operations, allow our trusted men to be the ones who deliver the supplies, and no such incidents will occur again. In these times, we cannot rely on commoners without a history of devoted service to the Shogunate. We of the nobility must stand united, only we truly know the horror the Empire is being made to carry after the defection of both the US and the UN."

Unable to rein myself in, before Mana could, admonishment came forth from my lips, "2nd Lt Makabe, please do mind your words. The US troops had no choice but to comply with their Congress' orders, despite the desire many harbored to remain behind. And the UN has not abandoned our nation. I believe I made my wishes quite clear to Ikaruga-dono."

Yet, he is still smiling, "Yes, milady. However, look at what sorrowful state of affairs we are in, due to believing their support to be unconditional. I am merely wishing for the IRG to be able to fulfill your every command, and is why I am insisting on these propositions. All the more now that this matter of the cargo has been brought to light," Undaunted and calm, never losing the smile.

… In the end, I have no leads to push further. It was foolish to think Makabe would slip up, and all this discussion managed to accomplish was to have him request further concessions from me.

… I suppose, I should learn to delegate what I have to. I cannot lose their support, even if I harbor doubts towards them. For the moment, keeping up appearances is of utmost importance, until an exhaustive investigation can be made and-

" By the by, 2nd Lieutenant…" Slow tone, almost as if drowning a chuckle. A shadow flickered further into the room, "My sources have told me Cpt. Shinohara was the man who received the delivery of the cargo we speak of."

One of his brows twitched, he again looked around. Upon finding nothing, his very face distressed further, "Yes, I can confirm that. As the leader of the second squadron of the battalion, he does take care of matters on the field for our Lord. What of it?"

"… Well, are you aware then that he was seen near what we've heard is a black market location as of yesterday noon?" Barely restraining a cackle, he so asked.

Along such words, a firm footstep echoed about within the stretched shadows, drowning the incessant downpour on purpose. Forceful lightning illuminates the storm, the room. Its white spectrum contrasting with the mild yellow of our inner lamps, with the placid shadows further in, another footstep echoed once more over the rain. However, his figure remains unseen by all three of us.

And yet, his voice feels closer, edging closer, "Considering the importance of the man in your ranks… Is there any intel you could share with us on this matter?"

Makabe remained looking about, before turning around and bowing to me once more, "I am afraid I know not of what this person speaks, Your Highness. I can only apologize in my lord's stead, if this intel is factually correct."

"Then, do you harbor suspicions towards this Captain as well?" I inquire, sensing a crack.

Makabe releases some air, then smiles once more, "I'd be foolish to dismiss such words coming from one of your retainers. At the very least, as the one who received the delivery, I concur he should be questioned now that the matter came to light. Please, allow us to mend our own mistakes, Your Highness," Swiftly bowing again, he remains in position.

Unbreakable defenses. Nothing we say will work, I suppose. Even if I ask Maya to be present in the questioning, nothing might turn out of it… In any case, it is foolish to press more without evidence. We should-

" Seijurou," He uttered, far closer than before.

And this time, I could barely make out the edges of his hair right behind one of the pillars as he moved through the shadows.

Makabe's eyes widened far, far beyond what should be possible. Prey to the shadows his grin vanished momentarily, as sudden as a thunder the shaking of his frame. For Makabe to waver so… What is this about, Takeru?

" We heard the young boy was seen loitering near our supply depots here, along other young heirs," He insisted, his voice drowning even how another thunder echoed in the distance, how the windows wept in supplication for the tempest to stop.

One of Makabe's hands clenched, his facade holding firmly despite the now obvious wish to turn around into a frown, to look for the source of the voice.

Mana was pressing her dress' neck, triggering her comms, to tell him to back down. Another footstep echoed, her fingers seemed to be pressing the button repeatedly in quick succession.

And yet, I know. He won't let this rest. Is it… because he noticed I was about to concede on Makabe's proposition? Do you truly have evidence, or are just letting your prejudices blind you now?

" And that is not all," Another shift in tone, turning as aggressive, as fast and oppressive as the incessant hail, more than willing to eradicate our gardens, or in his case, Makabe's facade, "The current caretaker of your youngest brother, Touko Suzumi, seems to be… working directly under Shinohara's orders as of late."

"Your Highness, could you kindly ask your retainer to show him or herself before us?" Makabe requested, barely keeping the bindings of his ire still.

"Sadly, such cannot happen," Mana countered, "For Her Highness' own security, some of us in her service must remain unseen. However… 1st Lt.! Make it short, and concise. Do remember that 2nd Lt. Makabe is our guest, and that we all are in Her Highness' presence!" She so declared, more as an act for Makabe to see.

Takeru doesn't truly care, after all. We might be in the presence of the Regency Council or the UN's HC, and he would do the same. It makes predicting his actions easier, only if his temper didn't flare up as much. Whereas I would have admonished him to desist in his pressure…

… I truly would rather not bring his silence upon my person ever again.

" Very well. My apologies if I offended you, Makabe," A neutral tone, amicable yet fake.

However, Makabe nodded to the ground, knowing better than to argue with my retainers. At the least, what soft power I hold still binds his moves were he wishing to actually scour the room for Takeru, as pointless as that would be.

Makabe's eyes close, breathing deeply, "Apology accepted. I can confirm the woman is appointed as the caretaker of my youngest brother. What of it?"

" I also was informed you were the one who appointed her to the position."

One of his brows twitches once more, "Yes, that is true. She was recommended by a good fellow, after all."

" Well then… Were you aware that… it seems she has ties to Kannagi, the former XO of the now defunct Mogami Base?"

…

"… 2nd Lt. Makabe, is this true?" Unable to rein in a searing frown, I lean forward along my inquiry.

Frozen, petrified in place, it would seem Makabe was truly flabbergasted at the words. For a moment, nothing was said. The thunders roared every now and then, giving further lightning to the room, shining upon his darkening expression which now seemed to be synchronized with our wailing windows.

"… No, I was… I was not aware… the woman was in any way tied to that base," Sober, no longer grinning, he then lowered his head further and further.

"I suppose, you have been notified of the reasons behind the… cease of operations of said base?" Caressing my hair, stroking and choking strands, it does not assuage my ire.

Makabe's silence also doesn't do me any favors, the tip of my tongue pressed in between my teeth. Never lifting my eyes off him, Makabe, very hesitantly when compared to his prior demeanor, raised his face to give a nod in affirmation.

"Yes, I was told the bare minimum. I… truly did not know Suzumi had such ties with the suspect, yet, what does this have to-"

And once more, fire over the rain, "Surely you can make an educated guess on what this entails. The woman was seen near the depots when the cargo vehicles were departing, supposedly because she allowed the trainees in her care to, oh so conveniently, volunteer to aid in the duty of loading the supplies," He then allowed the rain to resonate in the room, silence as a few footsteps echoed every so and so.

As he spoke it felt as if he were breathing down my nape, I might as well be one of our windows at the moment. And yet, I can only share his voice's hailing anger, barely restraining a frown as I continue to stare at Makabe's composed countenance.

As our guest chose to remain silent for too many seconds, another forceful footstep echoed, "I suppose I do not need to say where my suspicions are headed, do I now 2nd Lt. Makabe, sir?"

Mana once more stepped forward, displeased much, "1st Lieutenant, mind your conduct! Your actions reflect the will of Her Highness, after all."

" Then, would you rather have me not warn our fellow Makabe? Surely, he must not have been aware of such events, and it is why he remains silent. I'd be shocked myself to learn such things," Then, as he tends to do as of late, a soft, almost drowned cackling echoed for a few seconds, "It would be truly a disaster if anything were to happen to his youngest brother, for the young boy to meet an end similar to the one that sorrowfully befell Seiichiro-sama. Isn't that right, 2nd Lieutenant, sir?"

Makabe's expression darkens further, despite the shine from a thunderbolt seeping into his complexion. Jaws tightening as if under fire, a slight and almost imperceptible shivering on his hands, all traces of his rather cheery demeanor crumbled to ashes.

Sigh… Vindictive and inflexible as Takeru's been as of late, nothing we might say would assuage his anger at this point. If the woman looking after Makabe's youngest brother could be connected in any way or form to the affairs that took place in Mogami, even if she is free of guilt, few are the words that could dissuade him from chasing after her.

Considering all I know, it is best to fold this discussion for the day. Otherwise, if he dislikes Makabe's response… I'd wish to be as naive to think Takeru wouldn't be as foolish as to also chase after them, yet, he is being most inflexible regarding who he believes was behind Seiichiro-dono's passing.

Thus, breathing a slow sigh, shivering slightly, into the shadows around us I peer, "1st Lt., do recall that speaking of such personal affairs is certain to elicit a negative reaction from our guest," He doesn't say anything, even if I wait for a small moment. Sigh… "2nd Lt. Makabe, while the wording might have not been as amicable as I would have desired, my retainer brought up quite some fair points," He looks at me, regaining his prior composure, "If these matters are indeed connected, then a thorough investigation is in order. Both to determine what happened to the missing supplies as well as safeguarding your brother. Could I ask of you to stay the night in the palace, so that you can accompany some of my fellows to meet this woman tomorrow?"

"… While I would wish to lend a hand, my orders are to return posthaste to my lord's side," He bows down, a frozen neutrality hewn into his voice.

" With the raging storm as it is? Please 2nd Lieutenant, you'd be well served in accepting our hospitality," Sigh… Yet again, faking amicability which only makes Makabe's complexion tighten further, "Then, you could join our fellows at dawn to investigate this matter, before you depart."

"I also must insist, Makabe," I smile towards him, countering Takeru's obstinate aggression, "Your presence would be of paramount importance to dispel our suspicions on this caretaker."

Waiting a moment in silence, he then bows down, "If you so require, so I shall do. So… I suppose we should leave the matter of the arrangement of supplies for… another date," I nod, forging my lips shut to prevent a smile, "Then, will this retainer of yours accompany me to pay a visit to my brother?" He inquires, again looking at the rows of pillars, at the outstretched shadows.

Mana shakes her head, stepping forward, "Sadly, both of us are required to remain by Her Highness at all times. I propose that we should continue this talk tomorrow after breakfast, however. We shall ready a detailed report on these leads, that I'd welcome your eyes go through tomorrow," She asks, or rather demands, as Makabe nods with another somber smile, their stares once more clashing as the hail and thunders do outside.

"… Very well, I agree to those plans," Looking my way once more, he stood up and bowed deeply, again smiling, "I thank you for your hospitality, Your Highness. As well as for the consideration you had to allow me to learn of these developments."

"No, it is nothing. Let us hope this is nothing more than an unfortunate coincidence. It is quite late, so please do retire to one of our spare rooms. Mana, if you would."

He nods one last time, giving me another short bow, before following behind Mana as both leave the room. As expected, no one enters afterwards, signaling an end to the meetings of this day.

Sighing, looking at the clock whose sounds are drowned by the downpour, midnight is almost upon us. As if I had endowed an armor, my arms cannot stretch, my neck cannot fully rotate. Once the tension leaves me, my back cannot returns itself upright. Pressuring pain comes surging from its middle.

Ugh… I should have heeded Mana's advice, I truly needed a small rest.

Standing up in slow motion, dragging my feet to the closed doors that lead to the balcony, the coldness seeping in makes me shiver, my breath becomes visible. Resting a hand against the glass, peering into the storm, into the swirling and most dark clouds, perhaps this reflection of mine face is resembling our defenseless gardens below.

Bringing a hand to my neck, the minute touch once more sends a shiver of pain down my back. Merely moving my neck is enough for my muscles to ache, to freeze in position, to send a jolt of tension all over my back and shoulders.

But then, footsteps echoed closer, "Your Highness, you should retire to your chamber for the night," He said, finally coming out of hiding, standing near a pillar a few steps away from me.

However… I couldn't help but to frown as I looked back at him, who was dressed in the black dress for some reason, "Takeru, could you kindly explain why would you choose to confront Makabe as you did?"

"… You could not accept his terms, not considering the intel we received," Immutable as the dark clouds, frosting as the glass to the touch.

"Why did you not notify me of it, then?"

"Because you had to be in the dark, so that you could shine brighter."

"… Whatever does that mean?"

"You needed to be honestly surprised, you could not show any signs of hostility during the talk about supplies, for you to act as the beacon you are required to be," A minute frown surges on him when

I narrowed my eyes, he then looks away, "Having you display such unawareness and sudden wrath was what we needed to sail the talk to our port."

"Sigh… You could at least have told Mana of these matters. Furthermore, you are my shinobi. I cannot say I welcome such manner of plotting from you," Leaving the window, getting closer to him, mine own complexion and tone growing scolding.

Yet, he merely raises a brow, "If you must know, this was Raiko-san's idea. I simply thought it was better than to frontally clash with the dog of Ikaruga, as you expressly told me to stop doing."

"… You shall not refer to 2nd Lt. Makabe in such way."

"… Should I rather call him 'puppet', then?"

"Takeru, cease this foolishness at once!" Despite my shout, his expression doesn't change. Sigh… "Regardless, I cannot have you clashing against our allies any longer. Should you not correct your manners, I shan't allow you to be present in any further meetings," I frown his way.

And he takes a step closer.

And another. And another.

Until we're face to face, almost no distance between us.

In image of how a thunder once more illuminated the night, that searing wrath once more scorched his prior composure, "Should I take such words as you saying you are removing me from your side?"

"… I said no such thing. If you do not obey my commands, I shall-"

"So you would rather have relinquished further powers to the Ikarugas, Your Highness?"

"You will not interrupt me again. We must be mindful of our steps, you should know that well enough already."

"And yet, had I told you of this beforehand, I assume you would have said it was not enough to demand answers. Without clear evidence, you wouldn't have driven Makabe into a corned as I did just now. You would assuredly never have used his brother to incite an agreement."

"… And that came at the expense of him growing suspicious of you, of revealing to the Ikaruga House I possess a retainer who is in hiding," And quite possibly, this also quite certainly will erode our rather peaceful cooperation efforts of late.

Yet, he smirks, "And that's for the better, in my opinion. So that they know that, if they keep trying to take advantage of your bountiful generosity, there will be consequences. You surely don't believe the Head of the Ikaruga House to be a brave, selfless hero as the rumors say?" Thus now, blazes make way to his gaze, as he would say happens to me from time to time.

"Sigh… While I shan't deny I am harboring some doubts towards his person, we cannot act without clear leads. Are you certain this affair will be beneficial to us? Do you have evidence the woman is both connected to the missing supplies and to… Mogami?" A minute quiver of my lips, his nod only made it clearly visible.

"Indeed. We have visuals on the caretaker acting rather suspiciously at late hours when meeting with a cloaked figure near her resting place. Furthermore, we have ample proof that the place Shinohara was sighted at is indeed one filled with illegal businesses. Raiko-san is very displeased at this turn of events, so she has personally lead this investigation. The intel's veracity has been thoroughly verified, Your Highness," Then, he gives a small bow my way.

"So… What is your opinion on her investigations' result? Do you support it?"

"Well, I…" He finally eases up, looking down, "I do not know whether the woman is an accomplice or another victim, however, we have both visual and audio recordings on her escapades of some weeks ago, which coincide with the date when the cargo was swapped."

"… So, considering you spoke of it in the meeting, will the Swordbreakers leave this matter in Mana's hands?" Inquiring into his eyes, he nods quickly.

"Unless you expressly order us to, I believe it's for the best to keep Raiko-san away from this case. Regardless of her own issues with this particular affair, her presence could forward questions towards her current activities from Makabe," He tells, rather wearily, then nods my way, "Were you wishing for us to take matters into our own hands?"

"No… You all may remain investigating this for the time being, I do not require you to take to the field for the moment. Is a report ready for Mana?" He immediately nods, "Good enough. So… You truly believe the caretaker has ties to…" My throat constricts on itself, little could I do but to close my eyes.

"… Our findings are detailed in the report 1st Lt. Mana shall receive shortly. Do not burden yourself anymore for tonight."

"No, I must know. This is a grave issue, and you should know that well."

"… It is quite late, and there is little you can do at the moment with the intel."

"However, depending on what you all have discovered, my commands might be required to- Mm-Mmghh!"

Before I could finish, Takeru breached my personal space, lunging for my face. My voice muffled as he covered my mouth, his face grew closer, darker, sharper. By his grip my chin was lifted, leaving almost no distance between our eyes as I pointlessly brought a hand to his arm, groaning against his glove.

"I said, you will not overburden yourself anymore tonight, Your Highness," Unblinking, he stares into me, "Did you understand?"

Heartbeats clashing on my neck, air barely filtering through my nose, I could not release myself from his eyes, much less from his hand. A cold shiver enveloped my whole body, yet not because of my closeness to the windows.

But because a thunder once more surged in the skies, casting such a vile shadow onto his face. Leaving only his eyes visible for a moment, a moment where I forgot to breathe.

After that second of pause, I barely manage to nod. His hand releases me, then carefully begins coupling a cheek now as I gasp for air.

"You did more than enough today, retire to your room for the night."

"… I'm still not done with the questioning, and do not be thinking on deflecting what you just did," Grabbing his hand, he remains still as I remove it from my face, "Takeru, I cannot have you clashing against every person you believe is against us. If you do not promise me to conduct yourself appropriately-"

"I will do what's in Yuuhi's best interests, as always," Squinting his eyes, he so whispers.

Mine own gaze imitates his, aware of the implication, "Then, do not try to instigate another argument as you did. And… you should know there is no need to lay your hands on me in such way. You are my protector, whatever were you trying to accomplish threatening me in such fashion?"

Slowly shaking his head, he sighs, "I was merely keeping you safe from your own impulses. It is already late, and you should be retiring to bed. Learning of the reports shan't let you enjoy a good night's rest. And since I know you will not heed anyone's words when you grow incisive," Bowing down shortly, releasing his hand from my grasp as forcefully as when he drowned my voice, then he remains in position, "I took the liberty of forcing you to desist, for your own sake."

As I was about to admonish him, as my lips moved, no sounds came from my throat. Because, in my deepest reaches, I know he tells the truth. I wouldn't have desisted until he told me about the report, and that would certainly not do me any good at this late hour.

"Sigh… If you were concerned, all you had to do was remind me of the hour," I would have welcomed your prior warmth towards me, a hand atop my head in kindness, compared to this forceful approach. However… Perhaps, I merely am reaping what I myself sowed into your heart… "Fine, I shan't insist on that matter. However, do you believe Makabe's brother to be in any danger?" Caressing my head, I inquire.

He shakes his head, back to a neutral, cold expression as he comes back up, "He isn't, for now. As I said before, we are not certain whether the caretaker is truly part of these machinations or is merely being forced to cooperate," Frowning much, he sighs, "Don't worry, we've got them under watch. If anything happens, our Reaction Team will handle it."

"I see… Then, the supplies… Where are they? Were they athwarted on the way to Ikaruga-dono's battalion?"

Yet, he suddenly begins scouring the ceiling, scratching his head, "You truly should rest for the night."

"… What happened to the supplies?"

"It is late. I must again insist that you retire to your chamber."

"Takeru, as my shinobi and brother, I order you to speak," Taking a step towards him, I thus demand while squinting my eyes.

Returning the expression, he nods while never letting my sight leave his, "The missing supplies are not related to the caretaker, she is merely siphoning out meds from our depots."

"… Huh? Then…" My lips sink, the sound of the rain becomes distant as I focus on him, "You wouldn't be saying Ikaruga-dono tried to deceive us, giving C Rank rations to his men while keeping the A Rank ones we sent hidden?"

"… And if I did, what would you say? That it's preposterous for a self-proclaimed hero to do such a thing?" He raises a brow, a scowl, I couldn't help but to groan, "Do recall that Raiko-san arranged the delivery herself. The transporters wouldn't have betrayed us, and they returned safely from the trip as well. The rations arrived safely to Ikaruga's hands, of that we have confirmation, our inductees did not betray us. So, if they claim said supplies never arrived…" Halting his speech suddenly, he slowly shakes his head while going back to his cold and calm demeanor, "Well, anything else would be mere speculation on my part, and you certainly do not need to hear it this late into the night. Raiko-san's report should contain all you need to be aware of, so please do read it thoroughly tomorrow."

… I'd like to know why is it that you so blindly believe in her words. I certainly do not recall you two to ever have been in such synchrony. Yet, he is absolutely correct. If our fellows had betrayed us, Takeru would have already crushed their fangs after all.

"Sigh… Then, you merely used this intel you received to threaten Makabe into silence?"

Finally smiling, he nods, "Indeed. Considering what we learned of the woman, if I had to pressure Makabe to ascertain his position on this matter while also halting his preposterous claims to have you lose more power, I do not see why you'd oppose my actions, since they gave you a most positive outcome," Just as viciously as the hail falls onto our gardens, such are his glare and tone now.

"… Fine, I shall accept you have a point," And once more, his gaze recedes into his usual composed, and oddly cold, gaze of late, "However, do try to avoid such confrontations if at all possible, they might backfire at one point. And do notify Mana ahead of time if such a pressing matter reaches your ears ever again."

"As you will, Your Highness," Such firm formality forces a frown from me as he swiftly bows down. As another thunder echoed about, he offered me a hand once he returned himself upright, "So, will you retire to your chamber for the day?"

"… I suppose, there are no other matters to tend to. Sigh…" Accepting his hand, his pull spurs my feet to action towards the doors, "However, I'd still be wishing to have a talk with you in my chamber," Tightening my hold on his hand, he gives a nod.

Once I release it, once I blinked as we reached the doors towards the hallways, Takeru was once more out of sight.

"… I shall be awaiting your call, Your Highness," He thus whispers from beyond the shadows, "Please do relax in your chamber for a moment."

"… I know. You also should take some minutes for yourself," I look back, pointlessly trying to find him.

Sighing at his lack of an answer, I thus depart from the audience room. The guards posted outside of it once more act as my guide to my private chamber, due to Mana's absence.

However, as we traversed the long, narrow hallways, no more sounds of rain seeping into my ears, an ever present and subtle echo followed me. Turning on the corners, not drowned by the soft velvet carpet on the inner corridors nor the stairs, his footsteps accompanied me until he ascertained I had been led to my chamber.

---

Around an hour later.

(Shogun's Private Chamber.)

---

"Phew…" Slowly rotating my neck, still with some soreness within, I exit the bathroom, steam still rising through my robe and limbs.

Running a hand over my softened, dampened hair strands, allowing it to fall freely unto my back, only the overall shapes of the furniture is visible now through what little light peers through the windows, a sudden thunder aiding me as I took slow steps in. Pressing the switch of a lamp resting on a small cabinet, its soft yellow light illuminates my resting place.

The window is thankfully not quivering under the downpour, yet I could hear the rain even under the caress of the shower. As I sit on my bed, sinking into the most pleasantly cushioning sheets, the ravaging storm remains raging outside, thunders echoing every now and then.

… At least the palace is well guarded against such tempests, yet I cannot help but to wonder, to worry, how are the shelters faring? It is also rather precarious to refer to them as shelters, when in reality they're merely repurposed schools and other facilities whose operations have been halted due to the war.

Certainly, there will be zones in the cities where the streets will end up submerged. As if our daily lives were not arduous enough already, even Mother Nature seems intent on opposing us. It is just as that damned typhoon, striking our coastal forces in the middle of the BETA advance to the Capital, denying us the option to employ naval bombardments. As if that wasn't enough, the Treaty was about to come undone.

"Sigh… Such ruminating will do me no good…" Stroking my shoulders over my robe, my fingertips dwelling in them with unrequired force, nothing but send a prayer over the storm I can do as of now.

Allowing my hands to then sink into my bed, drawing circles on it, while my gaze wanders to the swirling gray visage outside the window, I merely admire the rain, lost in the sounds it makes, in the lightning that comes into view for merely a second before it melts away.

I truly hope this storm doesn't last any longer… It is quite late into the night, after all. Surely when morning comes, it will have subsided.

… Which reminds me, I require to do something before allowing myself to wallow in the comfort of the sheets.

Glancing about my dimly lit privacy, only the spectrum of shadows of the furniture, the outstretched frame of the windows reflected on the floor upon a blooming bolt, I am loath to admit I cannot determine whether he is nearby or not.

Thus, I call upon the veil, "Takeru, come to me."

Breathing in, hearing only the rain, veiling my sight momentarily, once I looked upon my room once again, he was nowhere to be found and no other sounds can be heard as of now.

How peculiar… He always answers my calls, perhaps he already retired for the night? No… He said he'd be waiting, and I didn't take much in the shower. Then, should I wait for a moment? He wouldn't have deceived me to have me retire to my room for the day, would he? However, all things considered, I cannot deny that-

"Were you calling, Yuuhi?"

"Eh?!" The sudden intrusion, feeling far closer than expected, elicited a flinch from me. Yet, as I looked around, he still wasn't in sight, "Takeru, where are you?"

"Outside the room."

"… And why would you not be coming to my presence as I requested?"

"I wouldn't mind to comply with your order, however, I believe you should place some modesty on your person first, Yuuhi," He so declared.

Which made my look down at myself, realizing I was still in my bath robe, which indeed did a rather poor job at granting much cover to my shape. Suddenly feeling my heartbeat on my neck, barely managing to stutter an order for him to wait outside, I approach my wardrobe and blast it open with a single hand, swiftly reaching in to procure one of my night attires from it.

Allowing the robe to fall to the floor, donning my sleeping clothes as I shivered under the unexpected coldness upon me in the meantime, after placing the robe where my attendants would take care of it tomorrow, my legs once more softly sink into my bed. Double checking my appearance, I finally sigh and dull the quiver on my sides.

Thus, while caressing my hair slowly, I call out to him, "You may enter now," And as I blinked, without even hearing the door opening or any footsteps, Takeru was already standing in attention before me, still dressed in the black dress, "Ahem… Thank you kindly for your sensitivity, Takeru. I hadn't… realized I was still in such simple clothing."

"It is nothing," He simply says, expression sober as he gives me a short bow, "Now then, what did you require of me?"

"… First, how are the shelters? With the storm raging for over two days now, I imagine the situation on the street is not improving at all."

"Don't worry. While there are some streets that are flooded, the shelters and food distribution centers have remained in good care," He affirms, placing both hands behind his back, "Our fellows have confirmed everything is still under control, and there is no risks of further floods occurring. The relief forces are also at the ready should a landslide occur."

"Is that truly so? What about those on the outskirts of the city?"

"… While the deliveries to those shelters will take some more time, our insistence to relocate the people to the shelters as opposed to leaving them in the parks will assuredly ensure they remain in good health during this storm," Once more giving me a nod in confirmation, my hands relax further unto the bed.

"I see… That is a relief. Have we heard word on the situation of the other Regents?"

Almost closing his eyes, Takeru slowly shakes his head, barely restraining a frown, "No. At the least, we believe both the Kujo and Takatsukasa Houses have followed your suggestion to house our common fellows in proper buildings instead of leaving them in the parks, however, as you know, the Ikaruga House decided to repurpose most free buildings for the war efforts, so the peasants under their care are either still in the parks, or in the smallest, oldest buildings available."

"… Did our negotiations truly broke down with their representatives?"

"It isn't as if they broke down entirely," Sighing too adustedly, as if a bull he were, his sight veers to the windows, "Some of our fellows have been convinced of his stance's effectiveness, how using the available infrastructure to bolster the IRG's capabilities is the better option we possess."

… However, even if we triumph over the BETA, what will be of our people? I am well aware we are being driven against the wall, that perhaps all we can do is offer some respite to our peasants while demanding they endure such atrocious living conditions, yet… yet for us to deny them a rooftop under this raging storm?

"If Her Highness allowed it, we could take to the field and-"

"You shall not," I frown, he remains as calm as he was, "Leave the negotiations to me, clashing with the Guard is not what we should be doing as of now."

"… Understood," Eyes closed, his voice but a whisper almost drowned by the rain, he bows down.

Biting my lips softly upon his formal answer, entwining my fingers I lean forward slightly, "In any case… I assume everything we could do was already done?"

"Or the measures are ready to be applied shortly," Still calm and cold, he returns himself upright.

"I see… Have we heard from the plans the government in Sendai is preparing?"

"… The reports are being arranged for tomorrow. All I was told is they requested Her Highness to make a public appearance once the storm passes, to survey the city's state to give some relief to the people," He informs.

Which brings a smile to my face, despite my image being used as a tool to placate the people. I truly welcome this opportunity to see how they are faring with my own eyes. While I had forwarded such a request before, most advisors recommended me to remain doing press conferences or radio broadcasts. I should thank Kurechika-dono for this, I am sure he was the one who insisted for this chance to come my way, for me to see the truth myself instead of through the advisors' reports.

"Which is why," Takeru continues, narrowing his eyes ever so slightly upon my figure, "you should rest for the night, Yuuhi."

"I know, remaining awake all night again was not in my plans," He nods, his shoulders easing up, his chest lowering slightly, as if he had released quite some stagnant air in him just now, "So, is the castle in proper form as of now?"

"Save for the gardens, yes."

"Then, that is good. Did Makabe forward any further inquiries in the end?"

He shakes his head, "All he did was converse with 1st Lt. Mana about the caretaker, and how his youngest brother was always quite insistent on aiding anyone whenever he could."

"Sigh… That is good to hear. I only hope your intrusion doesn't cause us any inconveniences," And again, he narrows his eyes slightly, "Now, that reminds me… Takeru, why would you be wearing the black dress?"

"Because it is easier for me to conceal my presence by wearing black clothing, of course," Nodding once, folding his arms, "Furthermore, this is the color I should wear."

"What… That is not true," Grasping the sheets, I frown at him, "You are a legitimate member of the Koubuin House, and have been given the blessing of the Tsukuyomi House as well," In addition to the Amato House's, twice at that, "Therefore, you have earned the right to endow the crimson attire befitting of the honors you've accomplished."

Closing his eyes, he says nothing. Neither the dim yellow nor the sparking white can seep into his facade. Once he opens his eyes once more, he sighs with furrowed brows.

And thus, he whispers, "While all of that was true once, it all has been void of meaning when you removed your emblem from my person," Lips quivering, my hands cannot help but to clutch the sheets in fear of his next words, calm words, "I am merely Takeru Shirogane, and a commoner must wear black in the Imperial Guard."

"Utter no further balderdash. You are my brother. Even if we… had a disagreement, I restored your rightful title to you."

Yet, he again shakes his head, "You cannot possibly have a brother who doesn't exist, Yuuhi. You erased me so that I could be your shadow, there is no point in clinging to what once was," Such a calm voice, as if merely stating my schedule. Such a calm expression, as if uncaring towards what he had affirmed.

Gritting my teeth, gripping my sheets, by pressing my ankles together I managed not to spur my feet to action as I desired to, "How many times must I tell you this arrangement does not undo your prior achievements? While the rest may need to remain in the dark, your position by my side hasn't-"

"And that is the meaning of me having this, isn't it?" He taps his blade, still oddly composed, "This is all I need to prove the status you've bequeathed me with. Also, it is easier for me to move around in the black dress," He then raises a finger upwards, nodding once, "No one would pay much mind to an inductee with such a low rank, yet if I walked around in the red dress, I'd be showered in millions of gazes without even doing anything suspicious. Frankly, it always got on my nerves," And for the first time in months, a speck of sulking on his cheeks.

"Mmgh… I know you speak the truth, however…" Releasing the sheets, I remain quiet, pondering what to say next. I doubt I could convince him to cease this foolishness… "Sigh… While I agree your mission takes priority, do remember I still see you as part of my family, Takeru."

He says nothing, closing his eyes once more. Thus, I stand up, walking over to the window, again gazing at the storm. At least knowing my directives were enforced on time is enough to assuage some of my concerns. However, there is one last matter I must inquire into.

Looking back, seeing he had accompanied my short stride as always, while staring into his eyes I ask, "Takeru, has anything else of importance come to your ears through these investigations of late?"

One of his brows twitches, "… You should be preparing to rest, Yuuhi."

"However, if any other pressing matters such as the situation with Makabe's brother would have been discovered, I must know of them."

"You shouldn't be mulling over such matters this late into the night."

"I must know ahead of time. While I concede your plan for this meeting was successful, I cannot remain in the dark for such vital developments."

"… 1st Lt. Mana's fellows are already on the move, and ours as well. Furthermore, a report is already prepared for your eyes to go over tomorrow."

"Takeru, cease this obstinacy at once."

"However, you will have to be awoken at 400 hours," He states, furrowing his brows, "I must insist that you desist in this inquiry, and that you at least consider resting until 500 hours instead. Do not overburden yourself."

I take a step forward, peering into his eyes, "1st Lt. Takeru Koubuin, as your Shogun, Regent, and older sister, I demand you relinquish any and all intel you may possess. Let me remind you, I have the final say, the last sign of authorization in the IRG. My voice is what gives legitimacy to my vassals' actions, they require my agreement to proceed through more forceful methods should they encounter unexpected setbacks. Therefore, I must learn of what is transpiring behind curtains."

Closing his eyes, breathing in deeply for a moment, his gaze sharpens upon me, "Your Highness, I must ask you to kindly allow Yuuhi to rest. Your duties are over for the night, and you cannot hope to lead us if you become sleep deprived," Faking a short bow, never breaking the connection between our eyes, his voice also grew sharp, hoarse, "You should rest for today, you need to sleep."

"… This is my duty. My responsibility. This is…"

This voice is all I have now… I cannot clash against the other Regents, I instead must request my retainers and vassals do that in my stead. My agreement is all that veils them from the constant tensions in the IRG as of late. Many doubt my capabilities, being so young, being a woman, my fellowship having failed to halt the BETA from decimating the Capital. I cannot remain idle… I must, and I will, do all I can for those who remain loyal to me.

"Some meager exhaustion is nothing compared to what our fellows are going through as of now. Therefore, I order you to speak of-"

In a matter of seconds, my back was pressed against the window's cold glass. Alongside it, his hands firmly planted themselves around my neck. Not pressuring nor wishing to let go, merely covering my throat, forcing me to look into his eyes.

"Takeru, release me at once!" Yet, he didn't even waver as I began to pull at his wrists, his grip also didn't become any stronger.

A thunder echoes about, again his face is covered by the light. Allowing me to see how his right eye remained twitching non-stop.

"Your Highness… I told you to rest for the day, didn't I?" Softly delving his fingers onto the base of my neck, his thumb lodged into the triangle below, his face then comes closer.

"Stop this… Takeru…" Suddenly out of wording, I cannot continue to speak as he grew closer.

Letting me see his gritting teeth, pressing me further against the frosting window, his hands move up and down, as if tenderly molding the sides of my chin. Heartbeats pressed against my chest, completely aware of my breathing, yet I cannot take his hands off me, yet he still isn't even pressuring my neck.

"I told you to rest, didn't I?" He asks, his fingertips sinking with a bit of force onto my nape in circles.

"Yes… However, I must- Guh!" What knot remained on my nape coming undone under his fingers, a jolt ran down my spine.

Tenderly stroking up to my chin, relocating the pressure to his fingertips as they mold my sides, ending on a firm yet soft hold over the base of my neck. Up and down, my breathing accustomed on its own to his soft stroking, Takeru kept me in place, never allowing my eyes any respite from his, never compromising my breathing in the slightest.

"Your Highness, Yuuhi needs to rest. You've done an outstanding job today as well, you also deserve a break," Despite his whisper, he still did not let me go.

Firm and steadfast, yet never hurting, only halting my voice and keeping my in place as he stared into me. His rhythm eased up, again merely grasping me, merely resting his palms on my skin.

"Takeru, I have to… protect our fellows…"

"Leave that for tomorrow."

"I must at least give them my approval…"

"I said, leave that for tomorrow. You need to rest."

"However, they require- Ugh! G-Guh… S-Stop it…"

This time, up and down, his fingers dove into my still stiff sides. A bit of pressure from his palms, circular patters as if kneading me, ending on singular sinking points with two fingers at once. The rainfall echoed about, the cold kept seeping into my back, as he slowly moved me, force me to move, rotating my neck, hearing it crack, the jolts shocking and covering me the more he massaged my neck.

Soft, yet firm. Slow, yet precise. Locking, yet not oppressive. One or two deep breaths, my eyelids almost close, simply basking into the evaporating tension of my upper body. Yet… I cannot… I cannot merely allow Takeru's massage to lull me to sleep…

As I again tried to repel his hands from me, he grew closer. And closer. Slowly, eerily so, his sight became odd-eyed. My fingers stopped thrashing against his wrists, yet his grip never bound my neck tightly. Growing ever closer, he rested his forehead against mine, leaving me with no escape from his wrathful stare.

And then, silence. Save for the eventual thunders, save for the incessant rain, save for our breathing.

He said nothing, I couldn't utter anything despite his hold not restricting me.

His head shivering, eyes still crossed, he held my gaze with his blaze.

And I could do nothing but wait.

"… Your Highness?"

"Y-Yes?" Upon my rather meek answer, his hold eases up further, now just barely resting on my skin, barely holding me in place.

"Yuuhi needs to rest, she is exhausted from the constant setbacks we're suffering. Both physically and mentally," He states through gritted teeth.

"I… I know… I am-"

"So, if you keep interfering with her lone moment of respite… Your Highness, I will have to ensure you do not ever do such a thing again."

"W-What… are you…"

"I am merely asking you to uphold our pact, nothing else," Finally, his eyes return to normal, his hands begin to slowly, meticulously stroke my neck, "Yuuhi needs to sleep, and your shift has ended for the day."

"However… if there are matters I can aid with-" A finger shuts my lips, he shakes his head.

"After all you sacrificed to get here, you cannot fall for such a simple thing, for a moment of shuteye."

"I… It is my duty-"

"To protect the Empire, and your fellowship. To ensure all that was sacrificed isn't in vain by the end. And to do that…" He leaned back, his hands now clasped my shoulders, "Yuuhi needs to rest."

"However… However, it is because of my own ineptitude that-"

"Then, don't try to bite more than you can chew. I am sure I was a very good example of what you shouldn't do," Frowning, again odd-eyed.

"That is…" My lips shake, "However, my duty as a Regent…" Then, it is my knees, "I have an obligation to my people-"

His grip on my shoulders tightened, eliciting a groan, sending my eyes to his, "Your Highness, the pact we established was clear. Me and my fellows shall ensure your wishes are upheld, or attain enough time for you to meditate on a solution should you so require. Please, trust in my words. You can rest for the day, everything is fine for now."

"… Is it really? You are not deceiving me?" Holding my breath, I stare into his eyes.

Which narrow a bit, yet return back to normal, "I cannot do that. As we agreed before, my soul belongs to you. And on that oath, I guarantee you have more than enough time to rest as of now."

"Wouldn't it be for the better if I tackled these matters now? I cannot take to the field anymore, this is all I…" My head sinks, enveloped by the coldness seeping into my back.

A finger placed on my chin, he lifts me back into his eyes, "You cannot shoulder everything on your own. Furthermore, even if you could, our pact had another condition," His eyes narrow, his forehead again comes into contact with mine.

"T-That's…" Lips quivering, and not because of the cold, I became aware of my breathing as I gulped, as his hands began to slightly move back and forth on my shoulders, his fingertips pressing and sinking just every so slightly with each repetition.

"Surely you remember, do you not?"

As my legs quiver, as my hands again reached for his, what but a warm reminder enveloped me, drowning the rain and the cold, drowned by his sight and his oath. All tension in me evaporated, relaxing onto his hold, seeing into his serious stare, requesting me to voice our pact.

And thus, I obliged upon his demand, "I… gave you my soul in return. In exchange for erasing your existence, for you to relinquish your individuality to the service of the Shogun… My soul became yours."

"Yes, that's right," What I feared was another binding hold became soft, as if massaging me instead, "Your soul belongs to me, Yuuhi. Just like how I belong to you, right?"

I merely nod along, slowly his fingers pull me away from the window, slowly keep massaging.

"So, just as you look out for me, I must look after you," I nod again, "Therefore, I cannot have Her Highness treat you unfairly. After all, your soul belongs to me."

"That's wrong…"

"Hm? How so?"

I lean onto him, my arms ducking under his, basking into his perfume, releasing my breath onto his neck, "Not just my soul… my body… my heart… The entirety of me is yours, Takeru," Yet, even when I'm tightly embracing him, he does not return it. Instead, he merely keeps massaging my shoulders.

"Then Yuuhi, what are you going to do now?"

"… Go to sleep."

"Good. Then, let's go," Grabbing one of my hands, he slowly pulls me towards my bed, and I slowly follow.

Sitting down, sinking down, shutting down, Takeru takes a moment to take out my music box from one of my drawers. The last present… he had given me as his sister.

As the melody starts, those days return to me. Our games, our arguments, our joys. Appeased by the music, I do not resist his tender grasp at all. His hands weave my hair, his fingers rest on the back of my head. They then draw circles, infinities, and ovals, before lowering to my shoulders and restarting the process.

There are no more words between us, no reason to utter further sounds, no tensions nor duties, no expectations nor formalities. But the melody keeps playing. I can merely close my eyes, rest my stomach onto the sheets when he so demanded, and leave my mouth open to breathe away, gasp in, and exhale when needed. Basking into this moment of calm, willingly admitting defeat to the charm of this homemade balm.

Up and down, first with his fingers then his palms. From the center to my sides, then gradually going down, only to then return to my shoulders. The downpour became a tender noise, soon it simply faded.

At some point, in between my blinking, the lamp was also turned off. But the melody keeps playing, so I don't mind it much.

His hands do not stop, not for a second. From my neck to my rear, pressuring just under my arms, the middle of my back, eroding the binds, eroding my mind.

Soon afterwards, I found my mouth stretching to yawn. So I ducked a hand under my chin, rubbed my cheeks against my pillow, as he kept going for a while longer. Closing my eyes, rubbing my feet together, this relaxation would leave the pleasant shower feeling paling in comparison.

At some point, however, his hands stopped. Shortly after, something else covered me whole. Something soft and warm, that my hands identified as my sheets.

Then, a hand caressed my head, "Are you feeling better now?"

"Yes… Thanks…"

"I see…" At that point, something pressed itself against my cheek. Something moist and warm, which remained there for a moment. As the sensation left, his voice then felt closer, "Sweet dreams, Yuuhi."

Stirring under the sheets, something or the other left my lips.

The soft hand remained on my head for a moment, or a long while maybe… It feels good… Grazing my hair, then caressing my cheek oh so softly, oh so slowly…

Yet, it also left me after a moment, and I simply remained hugging the sheets to replace his warmth.

… But the melody was still playing, the melody he gifted to me.

What hour is it? For how much longer will I be made to remain sitting in this room?

As if my vision were growing narrow, I cannot distinguish my surroundings. The audience room is eerily quiet, silent, absent of any and all sounds. Barely no light is peeking in, no lamps are turned on for some reason… Yet, I cannot seem to find the strength to move…

… I'm exhausted of sitting here for hours on end. Perhaps, I should-

" Your Highness must remain in the palace," The silhouettes all around me said in unison.

"What? I am the Shogun, I am free to see the state of the castle grounds with mine own eyes."

" Your Highness must remain in the palace," They repeat, immutable.

"Nonsense. There is much I am able to do besides sitting here…" Counter to my expectations, a great effort costs me to rise up.

However, I did not manage to even take a step for the audience room to… begin to distort.

Its walls towered over me, stretching further up until they pierced the firmament. Left trapped under the towering shadows, those voices kept repeating the same over and over again.

Feeling as if my feet were bound to each other, almost stumbling I reached the door. Yet, no matter how much I pull, how much I thrash, it does not budge.

" Your Highness, you should become the beacon the people require…" One of the voices thus said, a twinge of pain surged forth on my left arm.

Looking at it… a string had splurged from it, as if connected to my very veins. And then, it began to pull me away.

"Mmgh… Stop this…" The more I struggled, the more it hurt. Soon after, I could no longer feel my arm.

" Your Highness, allow me to shoulder the pen. Relinquish it to me, it is in your best interests," Another voice whispered, as if doing so from right behind me.

Immediately afterwards, another string surged from my right arm, making me gasp in pain. Both arms no longer obeying me, they pulled me back to my prior position.

"No… I… I can do much more… I am not an icon, I was trained to lead…"

Firmly planting my feet on the wood, holding my ground, a slight shiver reached my legs. And once more, those voices echoed about.

" Your Highness, your image will be spared by giving us complete liberties. Please, think of the populace. You must remain as an untarnished symbol for them," Those three voices repeated in unison, the unbearable tearing of my legs drowned by them.

No longer able to resist, brought down to the ground, slowly, slowly, as the room returns to normal, I'm dragged back to the same sitting position I was in before.

My back hurting at the forced posture, strings coming down from somewhere and keeping my eyes open, tearing into my eyelids, forcing me to keep smiling, I can only quiver as those echoes repeat themselves over and over, as my resistance seems futile against these bindings.

" Your Highness…"

"Oh… Maya, Mana… Please, tear these accursed bindings from me… I don't know what's happening here…"

" That we cannot do," Both say in unison, "Your Highness, such is your duty as the Shogun."

"What… What are you…"

And then, they too… "Your Highness, you must remain in the palace."

The strings come down, as if searching for my heart. I try to scream, to rebel, yet their hold keeps me in place.

" Your Highness, you must remain in the palace."

My vision grows more and more narrow, my body is going numb… Or am I being crushed by the walls? I cannot tell anymore…

Unable to utter any sounds… my voice unheard, my will disregarded, prey to the whims of the strings the room remains the same, yet I'm not allowed to move or rest. All of these voices… all without exception… see the Shogun before anything… as I myself do…

Remembering something, something old and dear, I look back. And there, he was there.

Standing right behind me, there was Takeru. As he always had been.

"Takeru… Takeru, come cut these wires off me."

" I can't."

"Huh? What… Why?!"

He then took a step closer, becoming fully visible despite the tunnel my sight seemed to be trapped in. And in doing so, he allowed me to see…

… that part of his chest was missing. As if he had a beam of steel encrusted on him, the middle of his torso was simply gone, there was a gaping hole tearing his dress, flesh, and bones. A most riveting sight, tearing my own insides asunder, not even a scream or a tear could I spare for him.

" I'm no longer there, I can't help you anymore," He wailed, dropping his face.

"N-No… What are you-" I couldn't even finish that Takeru was slowly engulfed by a darkened, cold flare.

As if it were a shadow manifested, as if it truly was erasing him, it didn't even leave ashes behind.

Gritting my teeth, my feet spur to action, enduring the tearing of the wires. Extending my hands towards him, they go right through the blaze, the shadow.

And I fall, and fall. Met with emptiness, nothing to cling onto, nothing that clings onto me. Absolute absence… is all that's left in this room…

" Your Highness must remain in the palace."

Something drags me back to my prior position, bolts me in place, molds me into the frame.

My ankles begin to hurt, bent after sitting for so long.

I cannot even muster enough strength to properly speak…

The strings begin to delve further, the voices resonate louder, making my ears begin to ring much.

It hurts… Let me go… Release me… This isn't how… it should have been…

Ugh… If only… I could have been heard… but no one… one other than him… If only he hadn't…

…

However… Didn't he…

Yes… Maya had… said he was… and Mana also insisted much about…

… Huh?

Blinking for a moment, light seeps into my eyes. Shivering slightly as I rise up, a strand of hair falling into my chest, my private chamber greets me like every morning.

With the sole difference being the sheets drenched in sweat, and this mossy, heavy sensation left on my back.

"… A nightmare, huh?" For a moment, I rest on my bed once more, merely looking upwards.

Running a hand over my shoulders, yawning as I then stretch my arms, my sight growing distorted for but a moment, I slowly leave my bed.

After taking a moment of privacy in the bathroom, I return inside and sway the curtains away. Shimmering sunshine showers upon my silhouette, signaling the start of a new day. Looking at the calendar, it already the second day of December. Just when did this year pass by?

"And yet, these last few days… have been far more eventful than all the others in this year," Looking at the sunrise, growing closer to the windows, the early morning's warmth showers over me.

And yet, it does little compared to what I recalled amidst my dreams. Just one of many nights, I do not recall the specifics, yet it was one where he had once more taken initiative to keep me safe from my own instincts. And now… seeing my reflection, recalling what I had just dreamed about…

"Am I… fearful, perhaps?" Of what he'd think of me now? Of what he'd do to aid me return to my prior powers? Of… receiving confirmation he is truly gone forever?

… Frustrating as it might be, I must mind my moves. Losing the favor of the other Regents would spell certain doom for me. And yet, if he does return, he won't be pleased in the slightest with my current standing. Perhaps, would he chose… to refuse my call as he did back then, when he remained with the Chains?… Would he choose to remain in the UN?

… Or demand for the Swordbreakers to be reinstated?

"… It is unfair."

Choking a strand of hair, shrugging my lips, I rest my forehead against the glass, the cold glass, left staring at my own reflection.

… I want him back. Yet, I cannot clash against Kouzuki. A hand sinks into my neck, the glass becomes blurred as my breath blows out. However, if he returns, he will certainly insist on me regaining my entitlements. I cannot force such a discussion now of all times.

… And yet, running a hand over my stomach's side, for every pledge I made, for every duty in my shoulders, for all I stand for… there is a reason within that eclipses them all.

"… I miss you, Takeru…"

Sigh…

Then, all of a sudden, an echo intrudes on my privacy. The sound of doors opening, the following footsteps. As I turn around, the door to my privacy was opened and in stormed Maya, at the ready to awake me as habitually, only to halt all movement in surprise as she seems I am already up.

However, it lasts but a second, as she proceeds to bow down, "Good morning, Your Highness."

"Good morning to you as well, Maya. Is breakfast ready?"

"No, I assumed you'd still be resting. Would you wish to change into your clothes now?" She inquires, returning upwards.

"… I'd like to take a moment, if it's possible," Thus, I look out the window once more.

"As you will. Then, about today's schedule, there are a few short meetings throughout the afternoon once the meeting to authorize the transfer of the Type-1C to… Your Highness?"

"Hm? Yes?"

"… Is there anything worrying you?" She takes a step closer, a brow lowering in concern.

"Sigh… Was I being too obvious?"

"Well, you rarely, if ever, remain staring out the window in such fashion, as if dismissing my presence."

"I was not doing such. There's something… I should have asked of you before."

"And that would be?"

I then look back at her, right into her eyes, sending a hand to my still loose hair, "When is Takeru coming back?"

"Huh?"

"I said, when is Takeru coming back? It has been quite some time since the CCSE, and you all have been quite insistent on how he… truly is…" Filling myself with air, I look out the window, "… alive. Thus, when is he returning?"

Maya was left bereft of any and all words for but a second, "Your Highness, we still haven't ascertained the state of his-"

"So are you now affirming the man is not Takeru?"

"No, I am merely saying it will take more time to-"

"How much longer?" I take a step towards her, eyes narrowing.

Which makes her bow down, "We do not yet know. After all, we haven't had a conversation with the man regarding his memories."

"And, when will you gain such an opportunity?"

Closing her eyes for a moment, she then taps her glasses, "Mana reported yesterday night that they'd be allowed to speak with the man during today's afternoon, they have Kouzuki's word on it. We shall gain their confirmation before dusk falls."

"Is that so?" Drowning a sigh, forcing the air to leave through my nose, my countenance does not soften, "Then, I suppose waiting is all we can do for the moment."

Soon, soon enough this disquiet will vanish. And when his answers reach me…

"Maya, how do you suppose we could bring him back?"

"If you'd wish for him to remain as your shadow, some cover will need to be procured since many are those who have grown interested in his exploits after the CCSE," She stops, breathing deeply, lips shivering for an instant, "However, if yoi desired to reinstate him as who he was before, well, many explanations and concessions will be expected of us."

"Huh, is that so? Do the other Regents believe they can threaten me so?"

"Your Highness?"

"Pah, how boorish. Maya, please do prepare the required documentation to ensure Takeru's return is resolved swiftly."

However, she seems to hesitate for a moment, "Your Highness, forgive my rudeness, yet you cannot clash with-"

"The pacts with Kouzuki, and Alt. IV's success more importantly, shall grant us ample influence. I shall use said tailwind to have Takeru return to my side. Perhaps, are you having some reservations towards my wishes?" Tilting my head, choking a strand of hair, I peer into her eyes.

That widen slightly, before shaking her head hastily, "Of course not, milady! I am merely suggesting to exercise caution."

"Then, let's have breakfast. Please do tackle these required arrangements posthaste," I order, she nods.

"By your will. However, why the sudden irritable impatienve, Yuuhi-sama?"

Sighing, I finally relinquish the imposing mask, "I merely wish to resolve this matter quickly. I… want a resolution. And…" I want him back, to finally follow through with our pact to its ultimate consequence. If Takeru yet lives, then he belongs to me, "Certainly, he would have scolded me much from indulging in such passivity. Furthermore, I shan't allow other Regents to delve into my House's affairs. Thus, please do ensure those documents are prepared for when Mana reports back today."

She nods, opening her mouth yet saying nothing for a moment, eyes darting down, "Then… You will… welcome him back into our fellowship, as himself and not a shadow?"

"… Did I stutter, perchance?"

"No, milady!" Standing in attention, she gives a salute, clamping down her lips to not smile. Oh, Maya… "Well then, let me assist you in getting dressed."

Relenting both a nod and a smile, I allow her to begin our usual procedure while I got lost in thought.

… Just a few more hours.

Please Takeru… tell me it's truly you, that such a miracle truly occurred. Tell me you haven't forgotten… tell me you didn't forget about me… about us.

Chapter 58: Shadows of the Silver Blossom

---

December 2nd, 2001. Near 2 PM.

(Imperial Palace, Tokyo. Meeting Room.)

[ Yuuhi ]

---

An overhead chandelier illuminates the narrow space of this meeting room where we five Regents have once more gathered. And as all times before, the regal, opulent ornaments and furniture reflecting a halo of radiant light, the fragrance of relaxing incense, and the sublime delicacies that were laid atop the table, covered by a tender lily mantle that has my House's emblem on it, none of such things could sow any measure of fellowship into this room or our gazes.

"… Regarding your decision to bequeath Yokohama Base with ten Takemikazuchi Type-C units," Takatsukasa-dono inquires, a scythe roving within his lips, "What compelled such hastiness, Your Highness? Why would you not consult with the Regency Council for such a vital negotiation?"

"… Those units were mine to command. As the acting Regent I am, I decided to seize the opportunity presented to me," Meeting his cerulean eyes without hostility yet freezing my tone, I thus continued, "All other Type-00 units available to the Guard are required elsewhere, and had I involved the Regency Council in the transfer, the possibility that some of our more fervent fellows would decry our decision was too large to ignore. Which is why the Koubuin House shouldered this deal on its own, so that if blames must be placed at a latter date, the Shogunate doesn't find itself suffering from an erroneous decision I made."

The young and newly appointed Head of the Saionji House coughed, halting the displeased stride of Takatsukasa-dono, "However, even if each Regent House can act independently, as the current Shogun, you should heed the interests of the Empire first, Your Highness. The Takemikazuchi does not belong solely to the Koubuin House, an ill-spirited fellow could claim you're abusing the powers of the mantle of the Shogun," He declared, much pride permeating his tone, "Having you carry out such selfish, individualistic actions will quite certainly not be welcomed by-"

"With all due respect, Saionji-dono," Ailing blazes surging forth, I make no attempt at dulling my animosity, "the Empire and the IRG both will gain much from the deal I secured, more than if the Regency Council had been involved. Are you implying you do not believe the Type-C to be a tempting offer for our allies?"

All three of them silenced for a moment, I could practically hear Maya groaning in disagreement right behind me while Kujo-sama gave a silent nod in agreement and support to my words. Despite how later he sent me a subtle gaze, concern and surprise in equal measure within his expression. I cannot blame either Maya or Kujo-sama for their reactions, after all it has been a long time since I ever retorted with such impulse hewn into my complexion.

… Since you haven't guarded my back from the shadows, pierced my nape with your glare, I haven't found the bravery to push aside the concerns about safeguarding our current fleeting peace out of my mind. Yet… I believe you'd have agreed with this course of action to guard the peace of tomorrow instead, Takeru.

"Ahem…" The young man's light orange eyes shuffled through wonderment, shock, and finally a tense nervousness in mere moments, shifting in his seat uncomfortably as he slowly traced his equally orange hair in an attempt to regain his poise, "That is not the issue at hand, Your Highness. While I admit that perhaps your decision was indeed correct, we cannot hand over the Takemikazuchi to foreigners no matter the reason. It is, after all, the fruit of arduous years of research. The pinnacle of Imperial technology, a symbol of our military might."

"Then, pray tell, if you stalwartly refuse to sell any of our technological advancements, how are you proposing that we acquire the necessary funds this Empire requires to finally begin to thrive once again, Saionji-dono? I'm certain that none of us Regents is wishing to request more tribute from our common fellows, after all," Narrowing my eyes, not relenting the pressure on this occasion, the young Head can only groan as an answer.

Of course, no one of their faction would admit that they wish to yet again raise the taxes or yet again lower the allotted budgets if it meant keeping all the spoils of our R&D sector for themselves. At the same time, they would be the firsts to push for a contract if they had been forwarded such a proposition or saw the chance for their House alone to gain profit from the deal. Just as Ikaruga-dono did with the Shiranui-1C units under his command, now on their way to the Fuji Corps.

Kujo-sama coughs, his dark, long hair moving minutely as our gazes cross for a second, while he leans on the table for a moment, "In that regard, I believe Her Highness only attempted to build more bridges to safeguard our current peace. And such endeavors should be supported by the Regency Council and the Guard, more so in light of… the status of the Project," He states, voice low. All of us nod, the younger Head slower than the rest. Kujo-sama then smiles faintly, "After all, Her Highness' initiative to search for a market for the Takemikazuchi Type-C is equal to that of Ikaruga-dono's efforts to find one such market for the Shiranui-1C and the XFJ Project," Ikaruga-dono and his retainer seemed to flinch for a moment, the Regent quickly returning to his frozen complexion, "And I must admit, I am in agreement with such propositions."

Before anyone else could interject, I rested my hands on the table as I spoke up, "So as you can see, three members of the Council are in agreement to these affairs. Are you perhaps saying you're opposing our decisions, Takatsukasa-dono, Saionji-dono?"

Both of them shift unpleasantly under my glare, the older folding his arms and drawing his breath in, the younger unwilling to sheathe the embers of his mood, much to his young retainer's dismay.

"… Please, Your Highness," Ikaruga-dono smiles once more as he softly speaks, waving a hand on the air as calmly as his tone echoes, "There is no need for such hostilities. Also… while it is comforting to know my actions have received your blessing, handing over the Takemikazuchi without consulting the Council is not a wise move."

"Yet, time is a luxury we do not enjoy. If we ask our people to compromise their daily lives, we of the Regent Houses must lead by example and find a solution to our current woes. If we who stand above them in leadership wane and waver when having to employ our own assets, how could we ask our people to keep enduring such harsh living conditions?" I ask and glare, releasing the bindings of my inner, most truthful concerns.

After all, if my hunch is correct on who directed Takamura to Yokohama and meddled with the Minister of Defense, I cannot simply remain idly by. Tying your, quite sudden might I say, proposal to send those Shiranui 1C units to the Fuji Corps with my own plans will force your hand into agreement, Ikaruga-dono. And if that were to fail, citing our duty as rulers is certain to bring forth my desired outcome.

Of course, such a forward approach has inherent risks to it… Yet, I force myself to remain still as an obelisk. Gulping forcefully once more, knees shivering and my nape growing stiff, cold sweat slowly trickled, descended down my back. Resisting the impulse to back down from the other Regent's gazes, to further release the bindings of my inner mood, or the urge, the craving to look back at who I know is not there, my fingers again clasp each other tightly, all of my breathing held hostage in my stomach.

"Hmm… I do agree that us five must take the lead and be a beacon for our people," Ikaruga-dono finally nods, a hand on his chin, "Yet, the Takemikazuchi is the sole armament of our research for procuring domestic weaponry for all of our forces that was safely completed during the invasion. It is our pride and soul, the phoenix's light that shone above our old Capital's ashes, and what gives us of the Imperial Guard a most needed tailwind to negotiate with the UN for any future missions they might require our presence in."

Kujo-sama slowly leans into the table, voice once again low, "The same could be said of the Shiranui-1C, as the standard our MDF should have adopted, and all here present know that you were the one who proposed to hand it over to the UN for the XFJ Project."

… And that's saying nothing on all the setbacks the 1C received from his House in particular when it should have become the standard of the IJA, citing the adaption time to the new OS as a deterrent. Merely thinking about it, recalling all those arguments is enough to incite a slow scorching on my throat, my interlocked fingers to clasp each other tighter. Freeing my breath, I lean back in an attempt to assuage my currents of thought, limiting myself to watch the exchange for the moment.

A slow gesture towards Makabe as the retainer was about to move, Ikaruga-dono's stare clashes with Kujo-sama's unblinking, frosting over his tone, "Indeed I did, yet you cannot compare the worth of the unstable nature of the 1C to that of the Takemikazuchi, a machine that saved our Kyoto's first perilous night of battle on its very first sortie as an untested craft."

My fingers tighten further, air seeping slowly through my nose, an acidic taste raising through my throat. Kujo-sama leans back onto his seat, yet his expressions shows the desire to do the opposite. The other two Heads hastily nod in agreement, allowing a smile to rise to the surface.

Ikaruga-dono continues, unabated yet still calm, "Also, I did request for approval of the Council and the daughter of the past leader of the 1C's development when forwarding the creation of the XFJ Project. And had that incident not occurred, the Shiranui Second would be a reality by now, alongside the EML-Railgun," A small sigh afterwards, an avalanche of honest dejection for a second coming to his face, he leans back and smiles once more, "Furthermore, I did not say I am opposed to the arrangement procured by Her Highness. I am only inquiring on what compelled the decision to happen now of all times, and in such a hasty manner."

Takatsukasa-dono raises a brow in puzzlement, as much as me and Kujo-sama do as well, "Ikaruga-dono, are you truly in agreement with this loan?" He inquires.

Resting a hand on his cheek, the ever present court smile never wanes, "I am not opposed to the export of the Type-C, no. Also, Her Highness and Kujo-dono have raised a valid point. We are obligated to lead, to stand above the Heavens as a guiding light for our people, and we cannot remain idling in these trying times we're facing," Straightening his posture, his stare towers onto those who had smiled moments before, "And had the Shogunate been the one to forward the proposition instead of the Koubuin House on its own, I believe we can all agree that Kouzuki would not have received the proposal in good faith," He chuckles, the others seem to nod, resigned, "In any case, bequeathing the Type-C units to Yokohama was indeed a fine move, if only a bit rushed."

Saionji-dono winced momentarily, "However… our domestic industries' trade secrets would…"

"I would not worry so, Saionji-dono," I say, forcing a smile, "While it is true there is an inherent risk with this affair, there are also many boons we could all earn. After all, why would the UN try to replicate our own domestic advancements when it would be far more convenient for them to outsource the manufacturing of any specific parts to our industries?"

Shocked for a moment, the young man wavers, "Yet… there is no guarantee that such a thing would occur. And the Guard is in dire need of any and all Takemikazuchi units we manage to produce. We possess no luxury to hand over any Type-00 units when some of us are still using Zuikakus."

"Please, Saionji-dono," Ikaruga-dono follows, again waving a hand, "Her Highness speaks the truth. While in the short term our procurement rate of Type-00 units would fall, the funds such sales would earn the Empire could allow us to finally begin the plans of restoration we had arranged after Lucifer."

Takatsukasa-dono nods, sighing, "It has been a long time already, it's true. If the situation does not improve quickly, we could be risking incurring a riot sometime next year. And seeing our domestic industries have not managed to thrive just yet, I suppose compromising the Type-C variant to the UN is the preferred alternative," He states, and all of us nod in agreement.

Despite the boons it would present us, despite the promised aftercare, no one in this Empire desires for the Treaty to be reinstated. And if such a thing were to happen… I sincerely doubt you'd ever forgive me.

Gulping suddenly, his hold over my neck, his cold gaze squarely on me returned for a speck of a second. Choosing to release what air I still held through my nose, my fingers searched for my cup of tea as Saionji-dono was assuaged by the others.

"And as I am certain we all are in agreement…" Looking up once more, I saw a clear smirk rising into Ikaruga-dono's complexion, "it is in the Empire's best interests to support the Alternative Program, come what may. And there is no greater show of power, of support to a scientist of the Imperial Research Institute than to bless her with our very best blade. Having Alternative IV's vanguard triumph by using our Takemikazuchi would truly be the most appropriate way to convey its might to the international community, while also safeguarding the Empire's future. Thus, the Ikaruga House is in agreement with Her Highness' plan, and as its Head I give my blessings to this arrangement."

I nod, lowering the cup slowly, regaining an amicable complexion, "And I do towards your petition to send those 1Cs units to the Fuji Corps, as well," He smiles, I thus look towards the other Regents, banished are my smile and warmth the more I lean forward, "Thus, Takatsukasa-dono, Saionji-dono, your position on this regarding my proposal is…"

Rather hastily, both nod after momentary and unexpected shock. A small touch on my shoulder, Maya's face was mired by concern as our eyes met. Not understanding for her worry, as I looked back into the table I caught my reflection on what little tea was left within the coup. Once more, fire was pouring as you used to say. Sighing softly, inhaling sharply, I try to return a smile to my face. I was merely trying to sound resolute, yet it seems today's dreams have caused me more distress than I previously thought, for me to fail so in restraining my emotions.

"… Now then, are there any other matters that require discussion?" I ask as I finish my tea, hoping it'll help me calm down again.

Saionji-dono straightens his posture, "Ahem… My fellows have received word from the Diet, just before we arrived to the Castle. It seems a request for a press conference will be arriving shortly, due to what they believe is an increase in volcanic activity near the Niigata frontline."

All of us paled, sobering up and vanquishing the reticence, the intrigue between our gazes at the threat this supposed.

Kujo-sama leaned forward again, "Are they certain of these news? What of our outposts?"

"At the very least, the men from the Diet affirmed the claim. My fellows have not noticed anything as of yet. However, I am of the opinion that we should preemptively act on this warning, regardless of the veracity of the intel," Saionji-sama states, "Considering the few reports we've received, one cannot deny that an eruption would eventually occur. I suggest that we order a compulsory evacuation, before such a natural disaster happens," He firmly says, Kujo-sama nodding in agreement.

Takatsukasa-dono shakes his head, a hand sinking into his cascading hair, "Yet, those who still remain beyond the second defense line do so on their own wishes. I do not think it wise to forcefully remove them from their homes. The impact such a course of action would have on the media, the IJA's chain of command, and the shelters is certainly a threat to our stability."

"Yet… we cannot simply turn a blind eye to this threat. And that is without considering the possibility of the eruption occurring during a BETA incursion," I sigh as the others grimace and look down, all present knowing there is no easy solution.

We do not even have the required hands to send on an evacuation mission, not when the BETA continue to relentlessly assault our shores at least once every two weeks. Neither the MDF nor the IRG possess the manpower to spare for covering such a wide area, if they must scour all the small settlements near the mountains with potential volcanic activity, when they're already hustling daily to confirm that dreadful report that Chief Yoroi and Hikami-san confirmed a few days ago, that horrible incident after the last defense operation in Niigata.

"While all of the points raised are true…" Ikaruga-dono yet again smiles, "If I may be so bold, why not request aid to the UN for these relief efforts?"

"Huh?! To request UN aid? T-That would be a show of weakness on our part, I believe," Saionji-dono declares, face paling by the second, "To leave the duty of guarding our peasants to them would-"

"Yet, we do not possess the hands required to order such an expansive evacuation," I state, leveling a stare at the young Head,

"And I believe we could ask for support in the operation, not for them to perform it in our stead."

"Certainly, that would be a fine solution," Kujo-sama says with a nod, "After all, we have given them ample shows of goodwill with both the railgun and the Type-C sent to Yokohama. Perhaps, we could ask the crew of Yokota to aid our scouts in their search for those stragglers?"

"Indeed, that would be a wise move," Takatsukasa-dono relents, sighing once more, "If only, to truly test the UN's position after these arrangements of late. Your Highness, would you be in agreement to this course of action?"

"… I suppose there is little choice," Even more considering the request that came from Undersecretary Tamase for a meeting with Kouzuki herself. Furthermore… in this way, I have attained an excuse for Maya to contact Hikami-san, "My own fellows shall contact Yokota Base if the proposal is accepted. Takatsukasa-dono, may I leave the talks with the UN's HC Council in your hands?"

He quickly bows down, voice firm and resolute, "But of course, Your Highness! I shall attain an answer as soon as possible."

"On that note…" Ikaruga-dono again speaks up, "I believe the press conference should be arranged shortly. Both to assuage the peasantry's opposition to the evacuation as well as quell the… disquiet within the MDF."

"Worry not, I shall endeavor to find an appropriate time for it," I affirm, perhaps colder than intended, when returning his gaze, "So then, was there anything else?"

"Ahem…" Takatsukasa-dono interlocks his fingers, delaying his inquiry for a second, "There is one last matter I wished to ask. I suppose a maintenance crew was sent alongside the Type-C units to Yokohama. Which members were chosen for this task?" His gaze growing piercing when leaning forward, Saionji-dono mimicking the gesture while Ikaruga-dono merely gazed at me, with a neutral and cold expression this time.

A single step forward, Maya bowed down before answering as diligently and cold as habitually, machine-like almost, "Her Highness chose the second maintenance crew belonging to our fellowship, commanded by Master Sergeant Kazama. They have yet to send a formal report, but they contacted us with news that the first mock battle of the A-01 STF with their new units was soon to happen. I believe it won't be long before they grace us with a report," Standing in attention, she then steps back behind me.

"I do not know if that was a wise move…" Ikaruga-dono counters, toxic displeasure cradling his face and stiffening posture, "Your fellowship's units in protection of this Castle are already short-staffed, to say nothing of those in Camp Kitanomaru. Perhaps calling for another team that's stationed further in the back would be in order?" He inquires, sounding closer to a firm statement. Saionji-dono quickly nods to the notion.

"I… am not certain that is necessary," Takatsukasa-dono relents, "There are few of our fellows as skilled as the Mst Sergeant, I must admit. I am in agreement with the arrangement," He states with a nod my way, Kujo-sama doing the same.

"Well, I suppose that is three to two. Would you be wishing to further debate on this matter, Ikaruga-dono?" Tilting my head, resting my hands near my cup, I try to smile.

Veiling his sight for a moment, he eventually relents a sigh, "No… Let us not waste time on this. So, I suppose we shall be meeting back for the requested audience with Professor Kouzuki?" He inquires, all four of us nod, "Very well, I've no further inquiries to raise," Thus, he leans back into his seat.

I gazed at the other Regents, who remained silent as they finished their tea. Gazing back at Maya, she also shook her head. Then, one of the other retainers stepped forward.

"Would… you kindly allow a question, Your Highness?" The fudai behind Saionji-dono inquired, tone creaking as her quivering shape when deeply bowing down.

"Yes. What would you be wishing to ask?" Smiling earnestly, I nod at her to raise back.

Joining both hands by her waist, she stood as still as an obelisk, her voice barely enough to traverse into my ears, "Erm… I have heard 1st Lt. Takamura was sent to Yokohama as the representative of the XFJ Project. Thus, considering how little personnel said project must have, I… was wishing to know if there were plans to bolster it with some of our fellows."

"Hmm… While that would be in our best interests, I do not believe it wise. It could both give a wrong impression to some of our fellows as well as the UN," Also, I sincerely doubt Kouzuki would allow such a proposal. It would only serve to damage the still cordial relation we share with the scientist.

Kujo-sama and Takatsukasa-dono silently nod in agreement, disdain and regret stream forth within Saionji-dono's eyes as he grew ever stiff, subtly glaring back at his retainer.

The fudai woman looked most positively dejected, her already minute voice crumbling further along her gaze, "H-However… to yet again leave her as the sole representative of the IRG…"

"I suppose we could inquire on the matter during the coming audience, Your Highness?" Ikaruga-dono suggests, giving the retainer a sympathetic nod.

"… If the opportunity arises, and the situation would welcome it. However, Saionji-dono, did you have anyone in mind to send to 1st Lt. Takamura's aid?"

Clearly startled, his sight craved the ceiling for a moment, "No… Ahem… This is more of a personal request coming from my retainer, as a past fellow of the Lieutenant. If the agreement is given, I shall shoulder the responsibility of this request and send 2nd Lt. Amamiya herself to Yokohama," Giving me a short bow, he states.

… I suppose, that to suggest to send his own retainer for this matter, he is both trying to shield himself from the unexpected proposal of the woman and clearing a way to get rid of her. Saionji-dono wouldn't simply let one of his retainers leave to the UN if he valued their services, considering his attitude. Either that, or he's testing the woman's loyalty.

Takamura is a member of the Takatsukasa fellowship after all, and someone who possesses Regent blood in her veins as well. Despite the good relation my House has with Lt. Col. Iwaya, I also harbored doubts towards the young woman, cousin of those in the succession branch of her own fellowship, at one point even if I now believe her worthy of the praise her 'Uncle' sang in her name.

"… Very well. Then, are there any other inquiries?" This time no one spoke up, thus I stood from my seat, "Well, this shall mark an end to this meeting. As always, it has been a pleasure. Let us hope the coming audience can find us in such an amicable atmosphere once more," All present now in agreement, the Regents also standing up, "Now, if you'd excuse me," Giving a nod to them which they return, I turn around and exit the room followed by Maya.

Slow steps, long steps into the hallways towards my audience room, where perhaps more meetings await for the remainder of the day. A small break for lunch is all I'll have to spend some time on myself, to try and rein in these embers that have refused to be doused since I've awoken today.

… Still, to have a busy timetable is of great aid today. Had I not be required for anything, left to my own devices… the wait for Mana's report would have been insufferable. I wonder, are they already talking with him? What answers will Takeru give them now?

Feeling my feet start to slow down and drag themselves on the floor, as if sinking on wet mud, I sigh and shake my head, looking up and outside from myself once more.

"Is anything the matter, Your Highness?" Maya asks, coming to my side.

"No, it is nothing."

"Please, you've not been your usual self all day long," Growing closer, inching closer, she whispered, "Do not be so distraught, the report shall come in due time."

"Sigh… Was it that obvious?"

"Yuuhi-sama, there are few other matters that could send your ire unfettered in such fashion," She ascertains with a nod.

"I suppose…" Unable to hold another sigh in, my stride again slows down. I am loath to admit she is most right, and that I've not yet tamed the remnants today's dreams reignited in me, "What other duties require my attention after lunch?"

"Meetings regarding the Castle guard's schedules and the arrangement for the meeting with Vice Commander Kouzuki. Gekka-sama and other fellows should be arriving in an hour, approximately, with the formal request from the Undersecretary as well as what little Yokohama revealed on this meeting's contents," She states, tapping her glasses.

"I see. Let us rest for a spell during lunch, then."

---

Same Day. Around half an hour ago.

(In a meeting room, Yokohama Base.)

---

A clock's tickling shaves the seconds away, the fluorescent cold white light showering from above atop the lone, long rectangular marble blue table and the standard issue charcoal black chairs to the sides. And with a slow gesture, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi locked her gaze onto the clock nearby.

"… It has been already ten minutes since the agreed time for the start of this meeting passed," By a soft sigh she hanged her head, " To think we arrived five minutes earlier than the appointed time to now be left in wait like this… I could understand a few minutes of tardiness, but ten minutes and counting? How much longer are they planning to make us wait?" She repined while resting both hands on the cold surface of the table.

Her gaze veering left towards the windows, the filtering rays of sunshine amidst the clouds covering the skies, the cold breeze seeping through the small opening, all of such did little to assuage the rising displeasure the retainer felt within.

General Daizaburou groaned to himself as he shivered slightly upon the cold wind, readjusting his position on the chair by the 1st Lt's side. Expression also growing slightly bothered by the wait, he began rechecking the few documents the guards had prepared for the umpteenth time, while sending a few gazes to the item that laid hidden under the table.

Yet, as the clock kept tickling, as the papers were rustled and rechecked, as the breeze swirled in and out of the meeting room, no one came to their presence.

1st Lt Tsukuyomi began stretching her legs momentarily, hitting a chair in the process, to dispel the stiffness in her posture. And she once more gazed at the doorway, pondering whether or not to call for the trio that stood guard outside. Yet the door then parts open, allowing the Vice Commander and… him to swiftly enter the meeting room followed by a small complain from the aforementioned trio. Kamiyo tried to follow into the room, frown intensifying, in her quest to demand punctuality, yet was sent recoiling away from the room by Tsukuyomi's siege of a glare.

Straightening her posture, the retainer breathed in as the UN's duo sat down, the General rearranging the papers into a straight formation. Despite their attempt at retaining a neutral facade, the edge of their lips, the forefront of their fingers, and part of their insides gradually began to be piked by small thorns.

Professor Kouzuki remained immutable, cold and imposing as an ice wall just like every time the guards had been face to face with her. Small but sharp steps towards a chair, a relaxed yet firm complexion she reflected when sitting in front of Daizaburou.

On the other hand… the cadet's eyes hadn't even graced the guards with a fleeting gaze. Tight expression hewn into his face, feet unwilling to lift from the floor as he strode towards the seat in front of Tsukuyomi, delayed gestures as he eventually sat with his gaze lost on the table. Resigned as a cloth left to the wind's whims and far more apathetic than the scientist on her worst days, such a grim expression forebode ill matters and retold a story both Tsukuyomi and Daizaburou would wish had already reached its final act.

Almost like a mirror into the past, back two years in time. You'd understand if they immediately grew dejected at seeing such an attitude in Takeru's face.

Sharing a look with the General, Tsukuyomi tried to assuage her own disquiet but only found Daizaburou merely shaking his head subtly in dejection. So alone she was with those thoughts, what crawled, clawed from within when recalling the time when such an expression was commonplace in his daily attitude. When she had to deal with the piling pressure of the daredevil that always lurked in the Shogun's shadow.

The XO coughed, interlocking her fingers as she looked right ahead into the guard, "Forgive the wait. I had some urgent matters to attend. Now then, let us begin. I believe you had some inquiries for my protegee regarding the… katana he brought with him from America?" Undaunted and firm, Yuuko leaned on the table. Takeru still hadn't even looked up.

General Daizaburou nods, gazing the cadet's way as he reached for the item they had brought, "Indeed. Let us dispense with the intrigue, since you've given word that this room is free of bugs. As the General of the Imperial Guard and an advisor of Her Highness the Shogun, I am wishing to know how did you came into possession of this Minaru Kamui during your stay in Yukon Base, Cadet Shirogane," Resting the clothed blade atop the table, both guards stared straight into his face, as the scientist also did.

Leaving the entire room in silence for a moment while he took a deep breath, as slowly as his arms were laid on the table Takeru's eyes grew narrow, reigniting the cold embrace of an old glare in Tsukuyomi's nape.

"I think I've already told you all I could," Even his voice was now as ailing as winter's coldest night. The small pause that followed as his hands shifted in their lock and the aversion in his stiff posture only served to further distress both guards, you'd understand, "… Someone who was close to me before I came here, someone who's already dead, was the one who gave me the blade," He finished, even confiscating the neutral coldness from before when recalling those days.

"That much you've told us, yes," Tsukuyomi softly nodded while trying to look into his eyes, "However, we'd be wishing to learn the name of the person who had the Minaru Kamui then," She slowly affirmed.

Yet was met with a frontal, furrowed gaze from Takeru, "… What for? That person is dead, and if the blades are as important as Cadet Mitsurugi made them out to be, the Shogunate should have a database of who has them. It wouldn't be too hard for you to cross out from where I got this one."

"… Perhaps there is an oddity in our records," Daizaburou notes, low and composed, "And since we've confirmed this Minaru Kamui to be a genuine one, I must learn how it fell in your hands. Vice Commander, have you found anything regarding this?"

She shakes her head, a few fingers slowly brushing her chin, "No, at all. The data banks of Yukon have all been wiped after the incident, even to this day they're counting casualties and soldiers that went MIA the more they investigate, it seems. In that regard, I'd suggest you look into the Imperial officers stationed there… Yet, I suppose you'd have already done such."

The retainer nods, gulping slowly as the cadet does not change his expression at all, "Indeed. Which is why we are wishing to know who gave Cadet Shirogane the Minaru Kamui, to investigate said fellow."

"It's pointless," He shoots out, as if aiming for BETA.

"… Excuse me?" Unable not to frown, emptiness craved Tsukuyomi's insides under his harsh stare.

"Cadet Shirogane, please do mind your wording," Yuuko admonishes quickly yet calmly, and they stare at each other for a moment. Neither relenting in their position, as if two opposite currents collided against each other in open waters into a twister.

"… My apologies, Vice Commander," Giving a short, brief and small nod, releasing air from his nose as a bull, Takeru then looked away to which Yuuko shook her head.

The exchange had left the Imperial Guards perplexed, confused. As the scientist detailed how it was that she came to know of the Minaru Kamui's presence in her base, from that small altercation Takeru had with Mitsurugi after the Defense of Niigata, and how most of her probing for intel had met in dead ends, Yuuko ascertained to General Daizaburou that she could not find anyone willing to disclose any intel regarding the affairs of these blue blades.

And the minute displeasure within her voice, the pointed frustration in her eyes convinced both guards that she was, in fact, telling the truth. Which indeed she was, Yuuko was beyond herself in annoyance that she had found no one willing to speak on the little sword's secret on this Empire.

However, Tsukuyomi couldn't help but to wonder, seeing the small rift between the scientist and her supposed 'protegee', the subtle gazes she sent towards his still apathetic shape when speaking of the blade's affairs*, " … I had believed they were in good terms, however… it seems I was mistaken. Well… Takeru was never too fond of the UN, or the Vice Commander."*

As the scientist was finishing her side of the story with what Takeru had told her of the blade on his report after the argument with Mitsurugi, as Daizaburou wrote down it all on a paper, as Tsukuyomi corroborated the facts Yuuko stated, the retainer's eyes were again drifting towards Takeru, who had remained oddly, eerily silent thus far.

" He would seem to be calm at the moment, yet Takeru' s complexion is far, far rougher, rugged than when we spoke in the track field as of now," She noted, tracing some hair as she swiftly switched her sight between him and the XO, "At the time, a small shine, a lingering cheer was still in him. Now on the other hand… no remnant of the bright flowers, of that kind glow of his younger self … yet, the clear fire is also not in Takeru's eyes or gestures… They're not as sharp and averse as when he came back from Mogami, and he's keeping quiet instead of bombarding us with words. Is this Kouzuki's doing? Perhaps, did he… recall anything about those days?" Not a second after the thought festered, worry began to tint, swirl and mix within her.

"That was a much welcomed report, XO," Daizaburou rests an elbow on the table, rubbing his temple as he nods towards Yuuko. A second to replenish his breathing, the General looks towards Takeru, "Then, now that this has been clarified, what did your prior words mean, Cadet? Why would it be pointless to ask for who gave you the Minaru Kamui?"

"Sigh… The one who gave me my blade… isn't from here," He slowly, dejectedly says, lips twisting in as he stole a gaze towards the sword.

And again, shadows screamed beyond the mirror's reflection. And again, both guards felt their breath caught in the base of their throat.

"That the same hollowness in his eyes… hunching over as slowly if an entire monument had been placed atop his shoulders… as when we spoke on the hill nearby… the day we left Hakuryo Base, and Yuuhi-sama left to become the Shogun. When she removed the Koubuin emblem from his person," Tsukuyomi notes as her hands subtly, minimally shake.

" Much akin to that expression he endowed after his return from Mogami, when he decried we had forced his hand into turning into that ruthless soldier," Daizaburou pondered, inhaling slowly until he couldn't do so anymore, " Yet, that adusted wrath is nowhere to be found as of now. As opposed to those days, Takeru… this cadet appears to not yet have endowed such emotions."

Both guards share a gaze in concern, in silence. Daizaburou noting Tsukuyomi did recognize the gestures, which meant the Takeru they had known had gone through such a stage at one point, and the retainer finding no comfort in the equally distressed tension in the General's posture.

Releasing a sigh, Tsukuyomi's heartbeats slow down. Yet, something starts banging, blasting the back of her head, by that heaviness her gaze cascades downwards. Retreating both feet closer to the seat, entangling them together, the retainer licked the inner side of her teeth. To clean the pungency of her own words back then, and the putrid, rotting wound Takeru's ones had left in her ears.

" I've nothing to apologize for. You and your holier-than-thou act of superiority can go fuck themselves for all I care! Go and leave if you want, I'll cleave a path forward by myself if I have to!"

Tsukuyomi gulped down just as she was about to inhale, then dryly coughing to hide reaction, the reminiscence, the last words they shared before their Takeru became that shadow of his former self. When those same hollow eyes were left on the young guard as Tsukuyomi turned her back, leaving him alone at the hilltop.

Inhaling slowly again, she tried to look and hold his sight, "Cadet, does that mean the person who gave you the Minaru Kamui was not Japanese?"

"They're not from here," He repeats, eyes closing. Yuuko shakes her head subtly at his unchanged demeanor while Tsukuyomi again, quite futilely in my opinion, hid her disquiet behind a stoic and imposing mask.

Daizaburou slowly nods while noting the response down, his fingers stopping cold before also writing about his rejecting attitude thus far, "Then, might we ask the motives behind said person bestowing upon you the blade?"

"I already told 1st Lt Tsukuyomi of it. It was a memento, to remember that someone after… they perished," Arms compacted on his sides, sitting uptight and stiff, Takeru still refused to hold their gazes for more than a brief moment.

"So, that person perished during the Yukon Incident?" Tsukuyomi asks, leaning forward.

"Yes."

"So, somebody else gave you the Minaru Kamui in their stead, I presume? Who was the one who did so? And, did they tell you anything regarding the katana's connection to the nobility?"

"… I wasn't told anything about the Minaru Kamui's royal purpose."

"Then, who handed the blade to you?"

"I'd appreciate that you stopped on this line of questioning," Yuuko requested, demanded in all honesty, with a brief yet intense glare. She then continued as calm as before, fingers on her chin, "I believe it is obvious whoever gave the blade to Shirogane either did not know of its royal symbolism or kept it secret to prevent the blade from being taken by the authorities. Looking for whoever that was would only serve to gain Yukon's new authorities' interest on this affair."

Licking her lips, placing a leg over the other, Tsukuyomi returned the stare head on, "Then, does that mean you do know who said person is, XO?"

And was met with an impregnable wall of dry ice, "No, I do not. Shirogane refuses to speak of them, saying he won't place them in danger. And I believe he's making the right call, please do think on why they said nothing about the blade to him despite, certainly, being aware of its connection to the royalty," Her interlocked fingers tighten, her glare cascades onto both guards unabated, "So… in the name of my research… I'd appreciate you let this matter rest. Both me and my protegee have told you all we can," She requested, threatened in a slow tone.

Which then sent both guards into a moment of pondering, whispering to each other.

"Mana, I am of the opinion that, in a certain way, the XO speaks the truth," Daizaburou relented, "I do not believe the traditions of our swords are an absolute secret anymore. Had someone taken notice a Minaru Kamui was left vulnerable in Yukon, I believe they'd had paid good money to acquire it."

Tsukuyomi nods, "I suppose. Certain American factions have gone far for lesser gold, so an item that would bestow them a title of nobility or an audience with Her Highness should not have gone unnoticed for over two years."

"Thus, perhaps it would be wise to let this trail end here," He stated, yet awaited the retainer's agreement.

Which came shortly after, a dejected sigh alongside it, " I suppose, the fox is right. Inquiring on those who gave Takeru his Minaru Kamui back would only serve to repay their consideration with unwanted attention from the wrong people," She pondered within, "Perhaps, they were those who found him, those who somehow saved his life and took him to Alaska. If so, I could understand why foreigners would protect the Minaru Kamui in such way. Maybe… he and the Swordbreakers had saved them or their comrades during Lucifer, before those accursed bombs fell."

Yet, the cadet had not moved an inch from his initial position of subdued aversion, rejection. Not even as Yuuko was now mentioning something to him, which only caused Takeru to slightly frown and shake his head, to then make the scientist sigh once more. From Tsukuyomi's eyes neither were being hostile to the other, which she found most curious considering what she knew of the XO, of Takeru's own character when upset.

So a small breath in was required as she ran a hand into her hair, then over her nose and lips, "However… I cannot deny it is distressing to see he refuses to even mention the gender of said people, for it means he does not trust us in the slightest. Yet, Takeru rarely remains so silent when growing upset . That barely restrained ire in his posture… is equal to that of his erupting blast in his stride whenever he had to defend a fellow before, even when he was little. J ust that he's keeping calm now for whatever reason."

Sighing, part of the tension, the knot tying, tearing her throat leaves. Tsukuyomi finally readjusts her posture on the seat, nodding in clear agreement to the General's proposal.

Daizaburou nods, taking a deep breath and loosening his overall posture while writing down some final words onto the papers, "Fair enough. Cadet, if you ever have the chance, do thank whoever allowed the blade to return to us," His voice still remained as loud as ever, however. Takeru returns the nod, crossing his arms as he sighs. The General rests both hands on the table, joining them as he coughs once, "Now, allow me to delve into the… core reason behind this meeting. You see, due to the… unfortunate events that transpired during the CCSE, we had to look into your profiles, Cadet Shirogane."

Rolling his eyes, Takeru dismissively shakes his head, "Lemme guess, you're gonna start insisting about how I should fix them somehow again?" Dry and rough, desolate as the wasteland that remains after the BETA dominate an area.

"Cadet Shirogane, mind your manners," So Yuuko again admonished him, hitting the table softly with a folder, "My apologies, General."

"… No, it is fine. However, I suppose this would mean that you both are aware of the lacking state of his profile. I propose that you travel to the Capital, to try and mend this vacuum in the data banks," He stated, firm.

Short of relenting, Takeru glared back into the guard's gaze, "Why? I already presented all papers I had on me. And as I said, I don't recall much about my life in the Empire."

Coughing, slowing down her tone and the acid that his reaction, rejection spurred within, Tsukuyomi held the cadet's gaze calmly, or tried to at least, "It is a simple matter. Due to the error found in the database, it is possible someone might claim you're stealing someone else's identity," Yuuko grew stiff, holding her breath. Takeru sighed, hanging his head, shutting his sight away, "Of course, we are not claiming that to be the truth. We're advising you to try and find some time to properly sort whatever has-"

"Why should I?"

"Pardon?"

Slowly, his eyes opened. Entwining his fingers, resting his elbows on the table, once more, as he himself would say, fire came out pouring abundantly, "If the errors occurred in my absence, then the fault lies with the Empire. What can I do to fix the data, if people will immediately assume I'm stealing someone else's name?"

"Cadet, calm down. They are not accusing you of anything, I'm sure," Yuuko leveled a stare his way, Takeru leaned back and looked up, once more closing his eyes, "In that regard, as Shirogane's tutor, I'd like to know what compels such an inquiry. Surely you'd understand one could confuse it with a threat," She forewarned.

"There is no threat," Daizaburou says with a shake of his head, "Yet, one cannot deny that it is suspicious and odd, this state of affairs. As public servants, and more so for me as an advisor of Her Highness, we cannot ignore such an irregularity in our databases. Thus, if you presented what documentation you possess regarding Shirogane's circumstances to the right authorities, any inquiries and suspicions regarding his identity would be cleared. And it would be of much aid for us as well, to pinpoint what caused such an error in our servers."

The woman hummed, a hand on her chin, leaving silence in the air as the ice wall held off their gazes, "And I assume, the outcome of this visit has not been decided already?"

Inhaling slowly to bind a frown, Tsukuyomi slowly leans onto the table, "There is no need for such provocations. We're merely giving you a forewarning due to the Cadet's honesty regarding the situation with the blade. This hole in the databases should be mended, otherwise I can guarantee that this could be used against the cadet at some point."

Yuuko's eyes narrowed, tone lowering, "Huh, is that so? Yet, I am sure you cannot turn a blind eye to how our Empire acts on these matters. If anyone pressed charges against Shirogane, he'll have to stay near a month in prison until we prove his innocence. And I hold no intention to recommend my protegee to yield under the pressure and plead guilty to hasten the process. Another stain on his records would certainly ruin his chances to become commissioned."

Gulping hard, all Tsukuyomi can do is tighten both hands, "I know she speaks the truth, if Takeru is detained the officers won't stop pressuring him until he admits his 'guilt'. There are enough leads to make a case for identity theft, that much is true, and if that comes to pass whoever it is that leads the case won't stop until they convict Takeru, lest they suffer the disgrace of having pressed charges on an innocent suspect."

Extending her legs, a mere sliver of air squeezing its way into her, just thinking of that outcome was plentiful enough to make the retainer sick to her stomach, it would seem.

"For if that happens, not even our fellows will be able to shield him without others noticing the moves. On that note, the fox's concerns are understandable, and I share them to some degree."

And looking at Takeru, at how he's still hunched over, crushed over without even lifting his gaze while still remaining as stiff as before, a cold sweat begins to cover Tsukuyomi's back, to crave an answer as her lips wished to part and interject.

"… Yet, s he would not be putting up with such a dangerous asset if it didn't bring her much benefits. And that certainty is something we cannot ignore ," Suspicion then began piking at the stoic mask. As you'd understand, the guards had their fair reservations towards the scientist. And after spending near a year in Yokohama Base, Tsukuyomi's concerns took root deep for she knew Yuuko had rarely, if ever, refused an inquiry from the IRG so directly nor taken the time to shield someone, anyone, herself.

The scientist brushed some hair, readjusting her posture on her seat, "Furthermore, I cannot say I'd place my trust in the system as of now. If the databases have lost Shirogane's data, then, how could we prove his innocence? Without anyone left alive who knew him, who could possibly vouch for our claim? Surely you know that, being a Japanese that lived abroad and is now serving the UN, those in charge of the interrogation won't take kindly to him," She stated firmly.

Which made the roots stir to life, Tsukuyomi now displeased with the words, "She should possess a clear lead to aid him, the papers on his induction into the UN. If Takeru was rescued and taken to Alaska, there must be records left of that, of how he was found and taken away from us . Furthermore… if she isn't willing to use her influence to solve this matter… Could this mean that the man is a faker? Or… Is she planning to keep Takeru away from returning? Just what compels her moves? "

A hand rested on the retainer's arm as she was about to speak up, flare up, and Daizaburou shook his head, drilled an order to desist into her eyes. Biting the inner side of her lips as she inhaled sharply, Tsukuyomi leaned back onto her chair.

Coughing once, Daizaburou slowly inquired, serene as the clear skies, "Vice Commander, Cadet Shirogane, while your concerns are valid, there is one matter that could easily dispel any claims against you. If you presented the papers on Shirogane's stay in Alaska, if you could explain how he left the Empire then-"

"Sadly, that option is not available to us," Yuuko swiftly rejects, toxins enveloping every word, "Because that intel has been presented once before to the Empire, before Shirogane arrived at this base, and it was rejected."

"W-What did you say!?" Tsukuyomi glared, "Rejected, she says? The intel on his departure, the report of Takeru's survival… was once sent to the Empire?" Unable to rein in both the curiosity and the indignation, she grew closer to the table, "XO, are you telling the truth?"

"Are you casting doubts on my words, 1st Lt?" She gives a side glance.

Thus, the retainer's glare further raises in animosity, "I am asking you to confirm the statement. You claim that… the report on Shirogane's departure from the Empire was rejected, somehow? If so then, why does the Cadet not know of those circumstances?" Stealing a glance towards him, Takeru had just sighed and remained staring at the table.

"Because, as his legal tutor, I have not deemed it correct to press the matter. And Shirogane does know of the results of the inquiries, no one could find any relatives of his left alive, after all," Yuuko ascertains, slowly interlocking her fingers, merely stating the words calmly. Takeru's own gaze crumbles down further, his entire complexion ashen and about to fall prey to the winds.

Which sent a dart straight into Tsukuyomi's heart, "Yet, why did you not notify the authorities of this when-"

"Mana, let it go," Daizaburou orders, voice lowering. Lips quivering for a moment, the retainer bows in apology, "XO, if your words are indeed true, then I advise you try to present said report once more."

"However, the answer won't change. There isn't even a single person alive related to Shirogane, and I won't allow my protegee to be accused of something he is not guilty of," She once more threatens, every words as acid as a Fort's stinger, "Unless, of course, you were to possess intel on who Shirogane was before he left the Empire and lost his memories, and said reason is what's fueling this questioning."

Knowing they could not disclose such details, Tsukuyomi chose to remain silent as Daizaburou continues to parley with Yuuko, insisting that it's also in her best interests to resolve this situation, yet the scientist counters that it also could be used against her if the Empire decides to convict her protegee under charges of identity theft.

The composed wording of the XO only caused more doubts to fester within Tsukuyomi, "Perhaps that's the only reason she cares, to prevent her standing be compromised by a claim of identity theft," Stealing a glance towards Takeru, she couldn't help but to allow her gaze to lower as his was, "Yet… we also cannot allow the Alt. Project to be jeopardized by any such claims. However, as much as I wish to simply reach out for those tightened hands of his, there is no clear, definitive proof just yet of his identity. While everything would point in that direction… it is all based on an emotional outlook, and while I'd like to deny it, I cannot say that I am not being deceived by a faker. The ESPer might have drawn intel on him from us somehow, for whatever reason Kouzuki has to do this. To force Her Highness to support her research, perhaps?"

Shifting in her seat, stealing glances at the cadet, licking her lips over and over, not even a faint trail of assurance was left in Tsukuyomi's pondering mind. As if covered by fog, she could not settle for what the best road forward would be.

"We cannot give an opening for anyone to strike at Alt. IV. There is no way in which we could truly allow the cadet, faker or not, to be taken to court. Takeru's identity must remain a secret. Yet, we cannot press further or we risk revealing Takeru's relation with Yuuhi-sama and why we're delving into his affairs."

The discussion between the General and the scientist seemed to have reached a stalemate, not even as Daizaburou raised concerns on the motives behind the lock on Takeru's UN profile did Yuuko's stalwart facade wane.

Thus, Tsukuyomi interlocked her hands, slowly breathing in, "However, the fox has the report in her hands… the intel on how he was taken to Alaska, at the least. If those papers were presented before, it is possible someone dismissed the call after Yuuhi-sama erased his profile after his 'death'. On the other hand, we're now alert and at the ready to intercept said intel. If only we could convince the woman or him to try to mend the profiles… if only we could get our hands on that report, we could ascertain whether he truly is or not our Takeru…"

Kouzuki shakes her head, sighing, and her voice raises in now clear aggression, "As I've been saying, I will not authorize Shirogane to be interrogated. Do not forget that this base and its perimeter are international soil, therefore Shirogane is safe from any claims so long as he is here, under my care," One of Tsukuyomi's hands began to shake, it felt as if something were slowly burning Daizaburou's sides, "If you do not possess any intel on who my protegee was, then I'll have to ask you to let this matter rest. I shall handle this situation as I deem fit."

Unable to rein it in any longer, Tsukuyomi leans forward once again, "Yet, you possess the intel on his departure. That could be enough to assuage any claims against the cadet."

"Or do the complete opposite," She states, returning the crossfire in between their gazes, "If I may, I find it quite peculiar that you'd be this interested in the personal affairs of the cadet. I understand the concern on both finding an error in the databases and over his possession of that katana, and how the affair of the blade could end up entangled with the issues of Shirogane's profiles, yet I cannot deny it is odd you'd try to delve so thoroughly."

"What would you be implying?" Tsukuyomi asked, low.

Yuuko merely brushed her hair, as if bored, "Nothing. I'm just stating the obvious. Simply put, if this is distressing the IRG's General to such extent… I am willing to deport the cadet back to America ASAP."

"… Excuse me, what?" Tsukuyomi blinked many times in quick succession, mouth slightly gaping.

Yet, Yuuko returned a small smile, "Just as I said. We cannot risk the error in the databases be used to either hamper my research or reveal the presence of this blade. If the concerns over Shirogane's past are dire enough to warrant such insistence from the General of the IRG, then I believe the best solution available to all present is to send Shirogane back where he came from, since as I've been saying I won't let him be pressured into pleading a conviction," She finished with another glare, vanishing the smile, as quiet as the slithering of a snake her threatening tone.

Daizaburou's eyes widened momentarily, hastily leaning forward, his entire posture compacting as if bracing within a cockpit, "Wait a moment, XO. There is no need for such drastic measures. We are not claiming to desire to exile the cadet."

She then gave the General a side glance, "Yet, all you've said points to that outcome. The very head of the IRG delving into the affairs of a cadet wouldn't be taken this lightly by the UN. If I weren't his tutor, Shirogane would be already on his way to the gallows," Yuuko firmly states, frowning as she looks away.

Air slowly seeping in, Tsukuyomi gulps before speaking up, unable to calm the prickling and peeling, the agitation surging forth within her throat, "While that might be true, if you present the papers about his departure, I believe a case can be made. Cadet Shirogane, certainly, you'd rather remain in the Empire as a Japanese instead of being an outsider?" She once again stared at him, hearing the groans of disapproval from the scientist.

Barely lifting his sight, not meeting Tsukuyomi's, Takeru sighs, "I don't really care…"

"Cadet, please take this seriously," The retainer couldn't help but to raise her voice in scolding, trying to break into his sight, "This is not the time to be refusing such aid. We could lend your claim credibility if we can confirm your identity, you may not have another chance to reclaim your prior standing," Folding his arms, he remains silent. Which spurs more pressure on her chest. Please… Takeru, don't close your eyes… "Surely you do not wish to remain as a burden to the XO, do you? As it is, your mere presence in this place could incite a chain reaction that would quite certainly put her in a compromising position. If nothing is done, you truly might lose your place here and end up exiled as was stated before, cadet," She stated, despite knowing it could be taken as a threat.

And seeing the tightening, the minute shaking on the hand she hid under the table, the unmoving, unblinking intensity of her stare towards Takeru, it is clear why she chose such an approach, in my opinion.

As his expression tightened, both his gaze and what light remained within crashing further down, Yuuko shook her head, "1st Lt, could you stop pressuring my protegee? He has been under much stress as of late, and I'd welcome you cease on this insistence," Firmly, she returned the threatening.

Daizaburou nodded, running a hand from his face into the hair on the side of his head, voice low and dejected, "Mana, I believe we perhaps could take a step back on our inquiries. The cadet might have remem-"

"With all due respect General, this is something the cadet himself should decide," She refused, "To simply leave him in Kouzuki's hands? To not ascertain his identity when he's right in front of me? We won't have another chance such as this," Tsukuyomi then tapped her chin, pointing to the blade under the table, "Otherwise, the wishes of the one who gave him the Minaru Kamui will end up being pointless when he's branded as a traitor if they remain in such obstinacy. Wouldn't you agree, Cadet Shirogane?"

Yuuko again slowly shook her head, inhaling as she reshuffled her wording. Daizaburou's lips twisted and turned, as did his breathing as shifting as the skies during a thunderstorm. Tsukuyomi's stare and overall stance did not thaw, thus Yuuko slowly leaned forward, meeting the retainer's gaze in frozen displeasure. Returning the pleasantry, Tsukuyomi entwined her fingers and took a deep breath as she pondered from which angle to approach the situation.

Yet, the table was hit by a tight fist.

And a twister of air was released through clenched teeth.

And quickly dispelling the anguish of the wince, once more… the rugged tone of the soldier left Takeru's lips, along with a frontal glare towards the guards, "Why don't you shut the fuck up about shit you know nothing about?"

… And then, silence.

Understandably, Tsukuyomi's mouth gaped upon his frown, upon those embers resurfacing in his eyes.

General Daizaburou was in equal shock, and even Yuuko was bereft of all words and reactions, even her hand froze up in midair. After all, she had not seen such open anger in the cadet, she had never seen the soldier.

The open displeasure was quite different to that which Takeru displayed during their argument when she had put him under her gun's barrel. As opposed to the hurtful screams that reproached her for not understanding, now clear indignation overflowed his complexion.

Inhaling sharply, never releasing the guards from his glare, Takeru's tone slowed down, mowing down the fuse of his temper, "That I'm a burden? That her death was pointless? Don't fuck with me… That's rich coming from the sister of someone who tried to gut me during the CCSE."

"E-Excuse me? What has that to-"

"Everything. Don't talk as if you knew everything about my life. Me merely existing is a crime, but you Guards trying to murder a cadet while on a loan to the UN is just an afterthought? With what authority are you demanding answers from me when your databases are what's screwed?" He retaliated, frowning.

Yuuko then tapped his arm with the folder again, yet her expression tightened, far more fierce than she had been thus far, "Shirogane, calm down. Do not insult the Lieutenant," She warned, reminded him so that he did not stray from the plan they had for the meeting, "Let's keep this civil and-"

"Shut it, Sensei," Glaring back, he demanded.

Staring at each other, both frowning, the scientist gulped at his sudden outburst. Unaware of what compelled such a reaction, Yuuko held Takeru's gaze in an attempt to rein in the sudden emotional spark. However, she found herself at a loss when he did not recede nor did he try to continue arguing. I believe, she then understood Takeru was trying to play his role in his own way.

However, the silence left as they stared into each other only foisted further doubts into Tsukuyomi, " … Did he refer to the fox as 'Sensei'? Yet, she doesn't seem particularly angered with the wording or his opposition," However, she could not help but to once more feel as if glancing into a mirror, "But that ashen gaze, the embers in his voice, the stiff posture, defensive as if cornered… It's just… like back then…"

Daizaburou's hands were subtly shaking, he leaned back and inhaled slowly to erase the fissures that tried to spawn in his face. Looking at Mana, she nodded in confirmation of the unspoken query.

Which caused her to sigh, "The doubting gaze of that moment by the hill, the dismissive and oddly calm way of carrying himself of the days after Mogami…"

The sight of his current expression, that shiver down her spine at the reminiscence of the shadow, and the sorrow of that talk by the hill, it all left a void in Tsukuyomi's breathing when contrasting it to the small cheer Takeru had shown towards her in their last talk on the track field, when he had graced the retainer with a 'See you later' despite the circumstances.

As she looked back up, the soldier's glare was squarely on the retainer. And it forced Tsukuyomi to gulp down both acid and ashes in a rush, "Cadet Shirogane… I apologize if my choice of words was inappropriate. I meant no-"

"Don't think you can backpedal now," Quietly, he leashed out, "I'm not some useless thing, and those who supported me before… I won't let their wishes become pointless. So what you're getting at now is, I'll have no place here once you Guards raise claims after my identity? That's clearly a threat where I come from."

"I never said that-"

"If there was an error in the databases, it's on the Empire. So if anyone should be raising claims, that's me."

"… What are you trying to say?" She recoiled under the assault, "What spawned the fire back in him so suddenly? Was it something I said? Or, was Kouzuki trying to rein Takeru in by taking charge of the negotiations?"

Upon Tsukuyomi's observation, Yuuko herself looked distressed to no end, eyes sharpened and squarely on Takeru, not even sparing a second for the guards, a grim expression hewn in her face.

"Shirogane, apologize this instant," She coldly advised, fearful of him getting carried away, recalling his prior warning of how he could grow emotional under pressure, "What are you even doing, picking a fight with the Guard?"

"… Sensei, could you please stay quiet?" Holding her gaze, his lips shook for a moment. Both seemed to ease up for a moment, Yuuko then rolled her eyes and shrugged, giving a nod. As Takeru turned to face the guards, once more he grew stiff and defensive, "1st Lt, you said there's little to be done if I don't prove my innocence to the Empire, correct?"

Tracing some strands of hair, she shook her head, "Innocence is taking it too far. No one is accusing you of anything, cadet."

He narrows his eyes, "Yet."

More needles and darts tear into her heart, more of those memories clawed at the back of her head, "Ugh… Why must you once more be like this? Or, is this all an act?" Resting one hand atop another, Tsukuyomi tried to mold the calm mask in place, "… Regardless, if nothing is done, many might reach a wrong assumption. And considering the lacking data of your profile, coupled with the sorrowful incidents of the CCSE, it'd be foolish not to warn you. And as a public servant, it is my duty to at the least try to resolve this irregularity."

"So, someone out there wants to come at me, saying I'm not who I say I am?"

"… That might be so, yes," She admits with a nod, "I doubt Yuuhi-sama will remain quiet for much longer, even less after we notify her of this meeting."

"Is that how it is, then? So, tell me… What happens if I'm the one who sues you?" And then, Takeru tapped his brows as he frowned, staring straight into Tsukuyomi's core.

"… Huh?" Mouth gaping, neither the retainer nor the General were able to find words for a moment.

Blinking fast, even Yuuko stalls a reaction, "Shirogane, you're taking this too-"

"No, I'm not. Because we have proof of who I am."

"W-Wait a moment, cadet," Daizaburou interjects, shocked much, "If you had such proof, why did you remain quiet until now?"

Grimacing, he looked down, "It ain't a nice thing to remember, that's why. And I didn't want to force an argument right off the bat, wanted to see if we could solve this peacefully," Sighing in clear dejection, Yuuko seems to share the feeling, allowing him to take the lead with a nod, seeing Takeru was indeed following the plan, on his own terms as you'd understand, "So, let me cut to the chase. Do either of you know who Kageyuki Shirogane was?" He inquired, once more observing the guards' reaction closely.

Tsukuyomi felt a shiver down and up her spine, her inner bindings scattering like a row of ants after being on the receiving end of a bucket of boiling water. Some of them coming undone, others simply running away in confusion, not only did the retainer visibly twitch but also allowed part of the stoic mask to fall down.

"But that's… if he remembered Kageyuki-san then…" And the small boy's smile came back, his aid towards her younger sister and cousin, the struggles to adapt to his new life… and all that he had done for both her and the fellowship, by virtue of simply being an overworrying and caring person despite the oblivious density he sometimes portrayed.

And as it was clear she was about to ask something she should not, Daizaburou hit her feet with enough strength to emit noise, narrowing his eyes in silence for a moment. Tsukuyomi nodded and tightened her hands, wishing to but restraining her eyes from seeking Takeru's, palpitations beating on the base of her neck.

Exhaling and regaining some poise, the General inquired while returning the soldier's stare, "Who might that person be?"

"My father," Takeru says, hunching over again, "What of a woman named Miho Shirogane?"

Gulping yet again, Tsukuyomi runs a hand on my hair for a moment, stealing a glance at him, "I suppose that might be your mother?"

Takeru nods and sighs, dulling, dousing the aggression, "Yes, that's the case. You see, on these last few days, I've been recalling bits and pieces of my time with them when I was little," His hands lose their oppressive tension, coming together as if he were holding an injured pigeon in between them, "It wasn't all nice stuff, mind you. It was still… better than not knowing anything. But, wanna hear something crazy?" He then chuckles dryly.

Puzzled by how the use of those eccentric words and speech mannerisms again in his wording, both Tsukuyomi and Daizaburou can't help but to raise a brow at the mixed signs in his complexion.

Softly sighing, licking her lips afterwards, the retainer brings herself closer to the table, "What would that be?"

"Apparently, going by the databases… my parents never got married."

With those simple words, both guards could understand, or at least so they thought, what compelled Takeru's suspicions and aggression.

Tsukuyomi looked down, clamping her lips as she once more reached for her hair, "That's… true. By erasing all intel regarding him when becoming Yuuhi-sama's shadow… his parents' profiles were bereft of all traces of their relation, so that no link could be traced back to the Koubuin House should the shadow ever be captured, " Acids and toxins crawled up her throat once more, all she could do was swallow them down.

Frowning once more, Takeru's voice again grew low and cold, "Ain't that odd. If it were just my profile, it's just an error. It can happen, more so after the supposed digitalization of all archives during the invasion."

"H-However, a similar error might have-" His frontal glare shuts down Tsukuyomi's attempt at a diversion.

"For real? My intel being missing from my parent's profiles is just another error? For them to not even be marked as having married, too? For Mom to be registered under her own family's surname? Are you fucking kidding me now?!" Unable to hold it, Takeru force palmed the table. Yuuko again hits his arm with the folder, drilling a warning into his sight. Sighing once, the soldier nods and leans back onto his chair, and with a deep breath the embers are sheathed, "I think you'd understand our reluctance to trust in your words, your obstinacy to have me visit the Capital. It's clear somebody didn't want to leave any trace I ever existed, to truly… make me go away."

As if a knife were twisted straight into her heart, Tsukuyomi couldn't help but to lurch forward, raise her voice, "D-Do not be ridiculous, cadet. Such a thing cannot-"

"But it did happen," Coughing, Yuuko states while ruffling her hair, "This odd gap in the profiles was quite the surprise to find, when Shirogane recalled who his parents were a few days ago. So, please forgive the reticence. We're merely being overly cautious due to these findings. And before anything, allow me to clarify that we are not blaming you or your fellowship for this unfortunate turn of events," Slow yet not cold, honest and frontal, she stated with a nod.

Daizaburou places a hand on the retainer's shoulder, she noticed to the touch that it was shaking. Thus, she sighed and relented a nod.

"I may, though," Takeru said, gaining a stare in disapproval from the XO, thrusting yet another knife into both guards.

"Anyways…" The scientist continues, resting an arm on the table, gesturing towards her soldier, "As you can see, my protegee's situation is more complicated than expected. A mere report on his departure won't solve this matter, nor the claims over his identity, if his parent's profiles have no records left of him anymore. His words will be dismissed as another lie. Thus, now that we've clarified this point, I'll have to ask you stop delving into the cadet's affairs," Yuuko then remained staring, not aggressively in the slightest, merely holding their gazes with a poker face amidst the silence.

Takeru, on the other hand, had again lost his gaze in a downwards spiral. Gloom blooming and setting root in his face, one could clearly notice the same bitter anxiety of those days after the power plant exploded palpable on the minute shifting of his fingers in that tender hold. Yet, as you'd have guessed, both guards saw something else in that reaction, in the reflection of the mirror that his expression was.

Taking a deep breath, sharing a look with Daizaburou, Tsukuyomi rested her back onto the chair, allowing the General to take charge, "Because if it were up to me, I'd be taking him back home this instant. But to force his return in this state won't truly be beneficial to him. No… we have not yet… Yes, we don't have… undeniable proof… The fox might have found some leftover data in his parents' profiles, some missing hint that allowed her to… " Lost in her inner justifications, petrified when looking at his now crumbling expression, she tightly folded her arms as she sorted out herself out.

"Before anything," Daizaburou began slowly, a hand on his chin, "might I inquire into what you recalled of your parents, Cadet Shirogane?"

"… Why?" Once more defensive, he glared.

"To see if there's anything that might prove who you are through your memories. If you can remember things only you would know, then that should be enough to ascertain your identity."

Yuuko shakes her head, frustration evident in those entwined fingers, "If there's no one alive who knew either of his parents personally, it's all moot. The officers will claim we're lying, and I doubt this large error in the databases would be acknowledged, either," She states, venom pouring forth.

Resting both hands atop the table, the retainer stole a glance at him, "True that might be, yet someone who knew the cadet may yet live. And if he can recall information not present in the public databases, that would grant credibility to his words."

"And while that's true, I'm not sure I wanna share that with a member of the Guard," Takeru harshly admits, glaring at the guards again.

Grimacing, Daizaburou inquires, "May I ask why, cadet?"

"Because you see… My dad was a Royal Guard, actually," He says, never breaking eye contact, to their utter surprise.

Tsukuyomi's mouth dries at the words yet her heart shrinks as his disposition remains unchanged, the hope of Takeru recalling crushed. Daizaburou himself felt again something burning, peeling the skin off his sides and back, at the aversion Takeru openly displayed, at what it reminded him of.

And again tapping his brows, eyes widening and almost becoming odd-eyed, Takeru breathed raw fire, "And he didn't seem too happy about it on the memories I've seen in my dreams. I also don't think… many nobles saw a baseborn like me with good eyes," The wording made Tsukuyomi twitch, while the General harshly grimaced, "And going by how I've been treated by all members of the Guard and the nobility I met since my return, I think I don't wanna place my trust in the people who might be behind my 'disappearance' from the databases."

Yuuko hit his shoulder with the folder, again glaring at Takeru, "My apologies, he's merely speaking on emotion. Shirogane, remain quiet." She threatened, he returned her glare with a subdued, almost pained, stare.

"As if his heart were slit open, as he was right after Yuuhi-sama removed the emblem from him in an outrage," Tsukuyomi couldn't stop herself from making the comparison. And for some reason, she could not release herself from the ashes within his eyes, "Wait a moment… We hold no ill will towards you, cadet. If your father was truly a fellow, then we have a way to grant credibility to your claims. Should you share what you've recalled of your past with us, then-"

"I'm afraid I'll have to stop you," Yuuko states, raising a hand while her eyes narrow, her tone frosts over.

"Why would you?" Daizaburou inquires, the calm facade dropping as he frowns for the first time in honest displeasure, "1st Lt Tsukuyomi speaks the truth. If Shirogane's father was part of our ranks, confirming his profile in our data banks would be of much help for the cadet's struggles. And doubly so to you, XO," He affirms, gesturing towards her with a nod.

Yet, she looks away as she fiddles with her hair, "Because, despite the fair points you raise, I agree with Shirogane in his stance to not divulge further intel. Not because I harbor any reservations towards your organization, but to avoid any possible entanglements. The IRG is not the government, and to have any of you meddling in this matter would only serve to instigate further tensions with the other powers. I've received bountiful favors from Her Highness already, I do not wish this to be misunderstood."

Daizaburou nods, lips twisting in, a slight hesitation. Tsukuyomi's hands tighten, clasp, fold onto her palms until it begins to hurt, as she couldn't look, didn't dare to look at Takeru, whose his own gaze again cascades away.

Leaning back, the scientist allows herself to sighs, "We've told you all we can, to prove Shirogane is not a dangerous element. I've allowed this meeting so that you could see for yourselves that Mitsurugi is not near a threat, yet I will not let those not related to Shirogane delve into his affairs any more than this. If you wish to share any intel with us, it'll be on your own accord. There's also the fact that, as much as you'd have to forgive my words, it is entirely possible Shirogane's concerns are valid. It is dubious this missing data was caused by an error, and someone might have wished to remove him from the Empire. Furthermore, my protegee does not wish to rely on the those of the IRG, so I shall not object his wishes," She admits, a slight frown in her tone as she looked at him for confirmation. Takeru merely grimaced and looked away.

Again, emptiness filled the retainer's stomach. Once more, agitation and hoarseness crawled up her throat, as if a stream of ants they were, and she barely managed to keep her tone composed, "However… Cadet Shirogane, with our aid you could reclaim your past with much ease. If only as a show of gratitude for… your actions towards Meiya-sama during the CCSE, would you not consider welcoming our help in this affair? XO, if he agrees, you'd welcome our support?"

Yuuko nods, returning their gazes clearly and frontally, "If he agrees, I do welcome the support. I'd like to be sure Shirogane won't be detained every time he leaves the base's perimeter for a mission in the future," She repines, eyeing Takeru sideways.

Daizaburou coughs, then clasps his hands together, "Then cadet, would you consider accepting our aid? It wouldn't take more than a day to locate your father's profile, I believe."

Slowly, he opened his eyes.

His right eye twitched for a moment.

His lips cascading downwards into a sorrowful expression.

Again, his fingers came together, oh, so slowly.

Taking a sharp breath, he gradually lifted his face to return our gazes.

And once he did, the wrathful fire was about to resurface in that tightened expression.

"I have… one question I'd like you to answer," Quietly, as calm as when he was a shadow.

"What would it be?" Daizaburou-sama nods, focusing.

"… You see, when I was… ten, I believe, my father died."

Such words appalled both guards, but more so Tsukuyomi. Knowing they had met by then, a small glimmer of hope rose to the surface.

Only to be scorched by the quiver, the crack on Takeru's voice as it struggled to squeeze out of his lips, "And my mom was dead by that point, I think. I didn't have… any relatives left at that point. I was all alone."

"Cadet… W-What do you…" Tsukuyomi also struggled to find words as the pained wince of his filled her sight, "There might have been someone close to you, someone who took care of you at the time."

"… And that's the problem," He took a pause, fingers piercing his palms. Yuuko closed her eyes and sighed, looking away, "Apparently, I wasn't sent to an orphanage. Otherwise, I'd have been forced to enlist into the IJA during the invasion, and there are no records left of that happening."

Daizaburou nodded, voice slow, "I see… I suppose you double checked such records, XO?" Yuuko nods, arms folded. Both guards understood the concern, as it was the obvious outcome for all those who had lost their families and were of proper age to be sent to fight, "Then, would you wish to ask for our help to find who had taken you in?"

And looking straight into their eyes, Takeru frowned and let them both see his gritting teeth. Frozen was their breathing, halted were their thoughts. And while his voice remained low and composed, ever quivering in its struggle not to falter, the intent in his eyes was the same as before for them, as that anger he displayed when a shadow he was.

"… Not quite. What I'd like to know is, how likely is it that a noble was involved in my erasure?"

As if drowning on cold water, neither could not respond. Pierced by hooks, both couldn't move away from his eyes. Assaulted by memories against which they had no defense, their heartbeats slowly began to delay themselves.

Coughing, Daizaburou tries to subdue the shock Tsukuyomi still couldn't, "Why would you… ask such a question? There was no 'erasure', cadet. The databases merely suffered an error."

"Are you sure about that?" The soldier presses, entwining his fingers and leaning forward, lunging forward.

"Would you enlighten me on what compels such… aggression towards us, Cadet Shirogane?" Tsukuyomi asked, voice low to mask her disquiet once again.

"Well, it's easy. I remembered where it was that I lived with my parents, a house near this base," He tells, proceeding to describe the place in utmost detail, even mentioning the jet poster he had on his room, the orange sheets her mother favored, her favorite room deodorizer, and other small tidbits about the place.

And such words, the non-existent hesitation in the stride, and the honest grief Takeru expressed when talking of his home, when recalling those last days in his world, tore a deep wound in both guards. The ants overflowed their throats, the palpitations returned in full force along a quake in their knees.

For this was proof, undeniable proof that the man was, in fact, not a faker.

Halting their realization, Yuuko coughed and leveled a stare at them, voice still calm, eyes sharp and ready to slay, "And when Shirogane told me of it, I pulled some strings and looked into his house's situation. It would seem the ownership of that lot hadn't changed during the following years, remaining under the Shirogane's name until the…" She gulps, the hold of her hands shift momentarily, "evacuation of this area. And even to this day, it is registered as such for the eventual relocation."

Folding his arms, Takeru forwards a fiery frown their way, "So I'm sure you can guess where I'm going, right? Had I been adopted, the ownership of my house would have changed. And it wasn't sold nor rented in all the following years. Hell, despite the ruined state of the city, my room still has part of the jet poster in it, and those dumb orange sheets Mom loved so much are still in their room…" He hangs his head, taking a pause, long pause, only to sigh heavily, "But that couldn't be. If I wasn't adopted, if I wasn't sent to an orphanage… then, what the hell happened to me?" Voice and hands, knees and back quivering, he looked straight into the distressed gazes of the guards, "What little remains of my profile in the databases has me registered as 'Takeru Shirogane', which means that I wasn't adopted since my surname didn't change."

"That could be due to the error that occurred," Tsukuyomi countered.

"Yet, that can't be the case," Yuuko parried, "If only his profile was affected, then that should be the end of it. Perhaps, one could make a case that his entire family's profiles suffered an error as they were uploaded one after the other. But that doesn't apply for the rest of his life," Voice lowering, a few fingers played on her chin as she closed her eyes, "His education, his medical records, his place of residence, and above all, who was the adult responsible of Shirogane after his parents' passing, all of that is missing. And while I did not delve too deeply into the public data banks, it is odd that there were no records or mentions to be found about my protegee's school life anywhere, since those papers should be in their respective databases."

"For so much intel to be missing, from so many different sources, it really looks like I was erased, for some reason," He winced, biting his lips, "Almost as if my existence was a bother, an unwanted burden on whoever had to take care of me," Takeru again sighed, "After all, Maya-san's dad had no qualms in wanting to dispose of little me when Dad died… so once they saw he had nothing to offer to the fellowship…"

A cold embrace fell on the soldier's back, he choked on air.

" Burden. Trouble. Eyesore. Bother," His little counterpart's crushed inner voice echoes deeply.

Rubbing his eyes, pinching the bridge of his nose, the soldier inhales sharply through clenched teeth.

" Can't get good grades, can't speak well, can't give anything to whatever the fellowship is," The echo continued, further spawning a vast emptiness on Takeru's stomach.

Wincing as if the freezing sensation peeled off his skin, leaving raw flesh vulnerable to further assault, he couldn't help but to glare at the table, at his coiled hands, "They threw him away, they send him away like the stranger he was. That's the root of the sadness I've been feeling… it has to be. That's why there's no intel, too much of a bother to cover up a failure. What did I even expect of the nobility, more so in this world?"

Wanting to spit out the poison, recalling bits and pieces of his struggles to reach the Yuuko that had failed, of the coming troubles the soldier faced on the world where he convinced the scientist to leave Sendai and accept his pass for the migrant fleet. Takeru knew how cold and uncaring those with noble blood could be towards the 'lesser people', the 'baseborns' after his countless arguments with the members of the Guard that kept watch over the scientist of his first loops on the world where he had tried to support her. Yet, all he could do now was bite his lips and wring his hands as the echoes of that little boy returned to his ears, as the conclusion he reached had to be spoken.

"… And the only way so much intel could be gone, from so many sources, is if someone with much power ordered it," He then glared at the paling complexion of the guards, the anger in it betraying the shaking of his knees, the sorrow rotting his heart and ears,"… like whoever it was that wanted to have me executed for what I did on the CCSE."

"That… could be the case, perhaps," Daizaburou relented, if only to not clash frontally, "Yet, this is nothing but a suspicion."

Takeru shakes his head slowly, deciding not to hold it in, to let go of the venom, "It isn't, actually. I think… that whoever took me in ended up regretting it, that they wanted to make me go way as the stranger I was, and that's why they erased everything about me." He finished, feeling as if swallowing thickening gunk. " After all, they did say he would keep his surname, that he'd be sent to some distant role fitting for a commoner… His mere presence was a risk for the House, and they only took him in due to some agreement they had with Dad in this world. They… never cared, he was just a jester for Yuuhi to fool around with…"

"W-What… That's preposterous!" Tsukuyomi could not rein in herself anymore, seeing the clear anguish now festering in his expression, and hastily hit the table, frowning in indignation, pained deeply at the words he uttered, "Not only such a thing could not feasibly happen but, what reason would compel anyone of high station to act on such a way towards a child?!"

"… Then, why is every little detail on my identity gone?" Takeru presses, stare unchanged.

"We do not know why this-"

"Why is my house still on my dad's name? Why did my surname not change when I lost my parents?"

"As we said, we… we do not know why. Yet, I can guarantee that your suspicions are unfunded."

"May I ask why are you so certain, 1st Lieutenant?" Yuuko inquires, not lifting her gaze from Tsukuyomi, "My protegee raises valid points. I was also shocked when I found the lacking state of his profile, and at how few pieces of data yet remain of him. I was…" Closing her eyes, she takes a short breath, "quite alarmed when learning of this.

So, while I am not accusing you of anything, the way in which you pry and delve into his affairs is most curious."

"… What are you implying, XO?" Daizaburou asks, displeased with the way the talks were going.

"… Well, it's simple to explain. There is no feasible way in which the lacking data was caused by an error, considering the facts that lay before us. Thus, I again ask you what Shirogane did moments ago. What are the chances someone requested Shirogane's intel to be thoroughly erased?"

"And what compels such an accusation?" The General flared up, leaning forward.

"No one is accusing you, however," Yuuko said, a small grin on her, "Considering how much you pry and delve into my protegee's affairs, how much you're insisting on having him go to the Capital or have him rely on your aid, one could begin to suspect you have some ulterior motives. I believe your fellows could tackle the 'error' with what intel we've disclosed so far. Yet, you keep pressing," Entwining her fingers, the huntress leans forward, "Why would the General of the IRG, advisor and right hand of Her Highness the Shogun, be this concerned about the life of a meager cadet of the UN? If this were noticed, many inquiries would fall on your person. And while I comprehend you may have felt insulted by my protegee's emotional outburst, his concerns are valid. Either when he was a toddler or near the time when he left the Empire, someone erased Shirogane's data. And I don't know which one would be the better option here."

Seething over the rim, not relenting as Daizaburou again hit her feet, Tsukuyomi reignited the blazes of menace required of her duties, "Your words can, and will, be taken as an insult to our faction. We're merely showing gratitude towards someone who, as you should be aware, shielded Meiya-sama from the chaser's assault. I highly doubt his intel was erased, much less when he was but a child."

"… Is that so?" Yuuko eyed her sideways, only bolstering the fire, "Yet, that's the board we're facing. No data points to Shirogane being officially adopted, and we have no idea what befell him afterwards. If he was taken in by someone who did so out of a false sense of responsibility, it is probable that caused the erasure of his intel. That's all we know as of now on our end. Thus, considering the risks of the same people that erased him wanting to raise claims of identity theft, I do not believe it wise to rely on your aid. Both in case said someone is from the Guard, and to prevent your faction to be involved in this mess. I've received much gestures of goodwill from Her Highness, and I shall not place her fellowship in a compromising position considering what I know as of now."

Tsukuyomi saw red, everything other than the face of the scientist blurring for a second, "However, even if you're his legal tutor as of now, the cadet should have the final say on-"

"I was the one who requested her not to ask for help," Takeru states, and the floor might as well have given up and opened an abyss under the retainer.

"… What? H-However, we could-"

"No," He frowned, "You clearly denied the possibility of anyone erasing me, despite everything pointing to that. And until we're one thousand percent sure we have a solid defense, I won't be going to the Capital."

Coughing, trying to mend the splattering carnage that the impact of cannon ball-like words did on him, Daizaburou looked at him, both voice and gaze lowering, "And what if someone raises a claim against you, cadet? Are you certain you do not wish our aid?"

"No, because that'll only backfire on us."

"How do you mean?" The General rose a brow, puzzled by the negative, as a knot choked his throat, eyes strained as if walking against the wind.

Takeru leaned back, raising a finger to again tap his brows, "Simple. If you bring us the data, people can claim I'm merely faking what I know, that I'm repeating what the data you gave us says. But if I can recall stuff on my own and then have someone check the databases, that'll be proof enough," He nodded, Yuuko smiled.

"Indeed. Just as my protegee says, it is better for him to be allowed to recall his memories at his own pace. And it works in your favor, to not be entangled in this any further," Giving them a nod, voice composed now, she affirmed.

Yet, both guards could only swallow more acid, seeing Takeru did not trust them in the slightest.

"Furthermore, I cannot allow you to shoulder the burden of this task. I am Shirogane's tutor, and as such, I shall be the one taking care of this affair. We both thank your honesty and support, but all things considered, we have deemed it unwise to rely on your aid, if no clear data on my protegee's life turns up."

"I see… That's understandable. Forgive the pressure, XO, cadet," Daizaburou relents, sighing the acid out, deciding it was time to stop. Time to notify Yuuhi of the developments.

"Daizaburou-sama, this is no pressure," Unlike Tsukuyomi, who did not wish to lose the chance, "Merely sharing Shirogane's father profile with them would not bring about any such outcomes."

"Yet, it is their decision," He quietly tells, shaking his head, "We shall accept their wishes, and only delve into this again if we manage to discover anything while investigating the error," Tsukuyomi coils her hands, as Takeru and Yuuko narrow their eyes at the insistence of calling the situation an 'error'.

"However… If I may, cadet?" The retainer stared, almost pleading inside, at the soldier, "I can understand your fears, however, what has you this convinced someone powerful is against you? Why would someone who welcomed you into their family do something as cruel as erasing you? Is this related in any way to the report on his departure, XO?"

"… I won't disclose that data," Yuuko dryly said.

"Is that so," Tsukuyomi held her gaze for a moment, looking at Takeru one more time, "Then cadet, why do you suspect such a thing?"

"… And why do you care so much?" Looking away, barely audible, he asked.

"I believe you had told me that you were hoping this situation to be salvageable. And I am merely repaying your actions towards Meiya-sama," She then remains staring at him unblinking, as Daizaburou also did. Yuuko held her breath, switching glances from the guards to the soldier.

Looking up, Takeru yet again sighs. His brows almost coming together, stomach growing upset,"For some reason, you see…" Veiling his sight as if walking against the wind, that same defensive aura in his posture, "I've been having some odd nightmares lately," The mention made Tsukuyomi flinch, "It's nothing clear, but there's this…" He grimaces, "sadness, this dejection I feel. And when I try to remember what was of me after Dad died…" Voice quivering again, hands again tenderly coming together, the injured pigeon's echoes again resonating in his ears, Takeru felt a cold blanket fall upon his whole being, "I can't stop thinking that I ended up all alone, that even if someone had taken me in they ended up seeing me as a bother, an eyesore, an unwanted burden. That they ended up wanting to make the stranger go away, for good," And then, the glare full of disdain. The silent judgment, the disappointment, and the distrust that mired his eyes was as intense as the metal clouds that fall over the battlefield.

Out of air as if she was hurrying to the water's surface only to then be harshly pushed down, Tsukuyomi couldn't release herself from his eyes, "However, that is merely a suspicion. While… everything won't be cleared solely with your father's profile, there might be a hint in the papers. I can… comprehend your fears, I truly do, yet reaching out to the authorities in the Capital with all the knowledge you now possess would facilitate a thorough search. And… well, I cannot ascertain it, yet it is highly possible someone that knew you still lives."

"… Then, what happened to my profiles?"

"… I do not know. But coupled with the report of your departure, you could already have a way to mend your data. You won't need to fear any charges falling on you."

"Don't worry, I'll be fine. And if anyone tries to screw me over and ruin all the efforts I've done so far, I'll just crush their fangs and be done with it," Sighing, closing his eyes and looking away, Takeru ruffled his hair and tried to stop the echoes, before his eyes began watering again as they did after the recovery session.

Yet due to this, he missed the moment when Tsukuyomi's face twitched in absolute shock, teeth gritting each other as she herself relieved echoes of the days before, their talk by the hill, their discussions on the following months, and their dissidence when he was a shadow. But more than anything, what stirred the bindings into release…

"Those words… those damned words that woman taught him… Why now, of all times? What accursed timing… No, there must be something I can do to convince him. Even if there are lakes in his memories, if Takeru allows us to aid him then-"

"I suppose we should end this here," Yuuko hastily said, wary of Tsukuyomi's expression, standing up as the retainer was recoiling from Takeru's last words.

"A moment, Vice Commander," Daizaburou asks, softly standing up as well, "I understand the cadet's distrust, yet-"

"Shirogane was clear enough, and I won't risk him growing emotional again," She then, quickly and harshly, hit his shoulder with the back of her hand, "I ask you to understand his position, otherwise we'd be going in circles if you keep insisting. This affair will be handled by me, personally, so please desist. While he might not have been as polite as he should have throughout the meeting, we truly did not meant any offense. Shirogane?" She asks, demands, as she looks into him when he stands up.

"Sigh… Whatever," Shaking his head a bit, he grimaces. Then, Takeru gives both guards a slow, deep bow while avoiding their eyes, "… My apologies."

Throat still sore, Tsukuyomi can only nod back, "No… It is nothing."

Yuuko nods, crossing her arms, "I know his situation is quite suspicious, yet I guarantee Shirogane is no threat to Mitsurugi. And do not misunderstand his words, he's still conflicted after seeing what was of his parents' profiles, you'd understand."

"Yes, we assumed as much," The General relents, gulping down an iceberg when exchanging a fleeting gaze with the soldier, "Yet, regarding his father-"

"If you wish to aid us, do keep in mind how it could be taken if this ends up in court," Yuuko reminds, Takeru had already turned away and was going towards the door, "That shall be all on this matter. I shan't keep you any longer, I believe you should be checking up on your Gekishins for the coming mock battle," She then gives them a nod, briskly turning around, opening the door and walking out of the room.

For a moment, a void sensation struck at Tsukuyomi's stomach.

Again short of breath, she could only watch as Takeru walked to the door.

And inhaling sharply, she took some steps towards him.

"Cadet Shirogane," She calls out just as he was about to leave, only for no further sounds to follow afterwards from her lips.

"… What?" Barely a whisper, none of the prior wrath is left in him.

"… Best of luck in tomorrow's battle. I hope… we can bring some light into your situation before misguided charges are pressed," Licking her lips in an effort to cleanse them from the poison, she barely managed to brave the last words out, "See you later, during the mock battle."

Without even turning back, without even nodding, "Goodbye, 1st Lieutenant, General," Then, he hastily leaves the room.

And the retainer and General both hanged their heads, she biting her lips while he sighed heavily as a hand ran over his face.

By the pressure of the ensuing grip, Tsukuyomi felt her gloves twisting and tearing. The retainer then chose to release the tension, the frustration as she delivered a strong punch to the table.

"Those damned words… If he hadn't recalled that-"

"Mana, not now," Daizaburou taps her shoulder, shaking his head in dejection as deep as hers, "We have a report to give."

"Yes, sir. However… Now that we confirmed he truly is Takeru… And for him to ask such a thing…"

"We shall follow the Sun's guidance, as always," He declares, sighing deeply and finally hunching over. After a deep breath, he returns himself upwards, ready to leave, "Let us be on our way, your underlings must be anxious in wait outside."

"Indeed… Let's just go… Sigh…"

Walking out of the room, refusing to answer the inquiries of the trio, they then began walking towards Tsukuyomi's personal room in the base. Yet, as you'd expect, the retainer wasn't even paying attention to her surroundings. While a stoic expression remained outside, while strong and firm her steps were, the feelings she had endured throughout the meeting did not give her any reprieve.

"I can understand the fear, if he recalled his mother's passing, and the early struggles of Kageyuki-san in the Guard."

Slowly, she began to bite her lips. Again feeling her nape pierced by a cold knife, shaving away the skin, the retainer had to make a conscious effort not to display anything.

" I can comprehend the reluctance, to rely on the organization that took his father away from him, that might have had a hand in this 'error' in the profiles. And it is certain that, under the current circumstances, Kouzuki's concern s over a claim of identity theft are perfectly justified."

However, it all came crumbling down as she went over those words, the last honest words he said. When Takeru was clearly pained to speak of these nightmares and whatever it was that he recalled.

" Why, Takeru? What has made you think you were left alone? Why are you mixing the pain of the war with the joy we shared on the days before it? Why can't you recall what Yohime-sama and Yuuhi-sama, what Mion and Shion, what me, Maya, and all your other fellows meant for you?"

She couldn't help but to sigh, faking a cough to rub her nose. To later dispel the dampness that covered the rim of her eyes.

"… And why did you… why did you instead recall those accursed word… Why, Takeru?"

She pondered, worried, and mulled over the matter, a pressure left ingrained on the base of her throat, on her hands and neck.

And of course, she couldn't know of it. For her cousin was the one who looked after the boy back then, and no one had ever told the retainer of the altercation little Takeru had with Raiko or about the discussion that occurred on the following breakfast.

And even if the 1st Lieutenant knew of part of it… as you'd know, there was no way for her to understand the root of Takeru's animosity, of the lingering distrust he once harbored as the soldier who shielded the scientist before everything was over, before light's out.

… And this is really ironic in a way, since the soldier himself does not yet recall the origin of it all. For he does not yet remember clearly what befell him after his very first survival from Iceberg, after the dance of carnage, after light's out.

Burdens of the Setting Sun

Chapter 59: Burdens of the Setting Sun

December 2nd, a few minutes off 3 PM.

(Audience Chamber, Imperial Palace.)

[Yuuhi]

---

Tapping her glasses, Maya leans to whisper on my ear, "The following discussion shall focus on the procurement of new recruits."

Nodding subtly, I thank her attentiveness before refocusing once again on the advisors, who now were finished with what papers they wished to present next.

"Regarding the induction of new members, I'm loath to notify you that the amount of registered candidates is again lower than the available quota," Kisaragi-san softly states, unable to mask the disappointment, the distress in his expression, "The Director of Kyoritsu University has expressed his deep concern about the situation, as the available spots for next year's training course have not been taken. Despite the delivery of the simulator units you requested of my House, the Director envisages that the majority will remain unused due to a shortage of commoner recruits."

"Has the selection process been revised as I requested?" I inquire, giving him my full attention.

He nods yet breaks eye contact, lips folding in, the report pressuring his hand as it lowered, as it bent outwards as if holding bare metal instead of papers, "Partially, at least. The other Regent Houses refused the proposal to train both male and female cadet trainees together, which caused the Director much distress. Also, those of common descent or the Tozamas who have not yet inherited their birthright are to remain in different, less extensive regimes," Taking a moment to, very slowly, turn a page, a faint yet firm luster returns to his eyes, "However, despite these setbacks, all cadets are to share simulation runs as you requested and mock battles shall be arranged between the male and female courses."

Envying his conformism, to find solace with such a meager change, I hold my breath, joining my hands. It is obvious Kyoritsu's authorities will raise their fair concerns, despite the imposition for they to remain training solely female cadets and students they shall possess empty seats in their courses. In an effort to bestow more knowledge to our cadets I suggested to breach this unspoken rule, yet our scarce male students, both pilots and for other careers, will have to remain separated from their female fellows. Such displeasure is bountiful enough to force a frown into my face, I cannot even find the energy to move my neck, to shake my head as if I was molded within a pillar.

Kisaragi-san coughs and continues, stealing glances at me, what little there is of wind pressure under the incoming breeze enough to almost drown his words, "The expected numbers have us fielding more recruits than our losses thus far in this year, and we've heard from the Makabe House that the delivery of refurbished Zuikakus will arrive before the end of the year, a whole month earlier than expected," However, growing still as a pillar, my Shinpan advisor hesitates, doubts on whether to meet my gaze as he rummages through the pages, "… If I may, however, could we gain your approval to once more request our trainees to begin using the Type-97 instead, Your Highness?" He then bows, deeply.

"Hmm… While phasing out the Zuikaku is something we'll have to do eventually, I do not believe it is yet time," Entwining my fingers, I thus stare into his eyes, commanding, "However, that being said, do ensure you remain in contact with the MDF and the UN, so that we can negotiate for their own data on the Fubuki when the time is right. For the moment, let the others assume we've relented on this trail."

"As you will, Your Highness!" He affirms, a step back later he once more bows down for a moment. And despite such, the pressure that keeps the papers firmly stuck onto his red dress, how his brown eyes did not meet my gaze, these signs are ample proof that Kisaragi-san is, understandably, dejected at my answer.

Sigh… Believe me, I'd support the adoption of the Fubuki as the sole training craft for all of our forces if I had the power to enforce such an order. However, doing so would go counter to the Makabe House's own businesses in their duties to lead the refurbishment of the Type-82. And of course, that would also require many negotiations with our industries, since the Zuikaku is not exported to simply cease its production would leave them with quite the amount of worthless parts and components. Yet, if the Fubuki were to become our sole training craft as of now, that would also spawn further divisions with the IJA. The IRG would ask, or rather demand, priority to the available units of Type-97, which would certainly make those who do not favor the nobility grow far more adusted at the situation. It would be yet another confirmation of the privileged status we enjoy to their eyes.

For now, such a segregation in our training crafts is required, the Zuikaku for the Guard and the Fubuki for the IJA. Slowly, the Type-82 will be phased out or left as aggressor units to teach our recruits not to underestimate older models, to showcase how one's overconfidence can lead to an early grave. After all, perhaps Kouzuki's developments could bestow upon the Zuikaku quite a few more moons of reliable usage. That should grant me enough time to negotiate a gradual adoption of the Fubuki for the Guard, without gaining the animosity of the Makabe House and our industries nor festering unwanted disdain in the IJA. So please Kisaragi-san, do remain strong for the time being.

Easing my breathing, taking a brief glance towards the balcony, the skies bright yet cloudy, a smile I raise as my tone returns to normal, "Now, if our supply of Zuikakus is in fine order and this year's cadets are ready to be formally appointed as Imperial Guards, what other concerns were raised?"

With a step forward and a bow, his long amber hair falling from his shoulders, Hifukai-san proceeds to report, "There are also concerns raising on the state of our defenses. Some of the crew from those stationed at Kitanomaru have been rather insistent on their petitions to further bolster the patrols and allotted members to standby sentry duties."

Tapping her glasses, she takes a step forward, "I had believed the respective orders had already been issued, however."

"Indeed, 1st Lt Tsukuyomi. General Guren's designs have already been delivered to all outposts nearby," He affirms with a nod, his fair features growing rough, "Yet, after the recent Defense of Niigata as well as… the report that has not yet been confirmed, some are wishing to leave enough units at the ready should the situation require an immediate deployment."

"Sorrowfully, few are the members we could spare for such patrols," I relent a sigh, shaking my head, "And I do not think it wise to further extend the usage of our TSFs and infantry armors. The units of the IRG standing guard herein this palace and its adjacent delegations are obliged to one duty, to safeguard both this palace and Her Holy Majesty's residence. Furthermore, to bolster our presence might create friction with the MDF's Capital Protection unit," Stating the fact, I allow a moment to veil my sight, to slowly release air from my nose.

Not only such an arrangement would waste precious fuel and energy by leaving more TSFs in sentry duty, yet it could also cause debates over the deployment of said units. Some of the MDF's men would take to the field with pride and haste, yet one cannot ignore that many would welcome the IRG joining the efforts by their side. To flaunt, to deploy further units knowing they shall remain as the last to be sent to battle… I do not believe it wise, much less considering the arduous times we're navigating.

Hifukai-san coughs, sharply veiling his sight, "I understand and agree with your wishes, Your Highness. And so does Kujo-sama, as well as all those of us from the Kujo fellowship that are here at your service," A moment of pause extends, as does the ashen outline over the neutral and composed facade my advisor must endow, "Yet, many are those who echo this wish, to appoint most of the fresh recruits to Kitanomaru or this castle's guards, within the hallways and eateries. Some of my fellows have even heard such statements from groups within the students and cadets of the nearby academies," Brows furrowing along the further slowing of his tone, he cites the numbers and meetings the recruits themselves asked out of the Director, reading the page-long report in which the cadets that'll soon become full fledged Imperial Guards requested of their Instructors a chance for their top performing members to be appointed to this area's defense.

Folding a sigh, my mouth becoming dry and desolate, I merely shake my head again, "… I can sympathize with their desires, yet, such an arrangement is unrequired at the moment. Maya, has Ikaruga-dono displayed any interest in granting this wish?"

She shakes her head immediately, yet her expression does not thaw, "I have heard nothing of the sort, this is news to me, Your Highness. However, if you'd forgive my opinion, perhaps there is some merit to leaving more units in standby. After all, well…" Tapping her glasses, looking down, the others present in the room also seem to find themselves unable to return my gaze, "… you have left your Reaction Squadron grounded for quite some time at Hibiya."

Breathing in, suddenly feeling my heartbeats along a tickling, prickling, peeling on my nape's skin, due to such a sensation my eyes narrow and I thus speak from my stomach, "My orders towards the Chain squadron are a business of the Koubuin House. The defense of this area is related to crucial matters of the Shogunate, and the image we portray to the rest of the forces stationed in the Capital. Do think of how such a strengthening of our defenses would be taken," They all bow down hastily, I cannot help but to sigh heavily.

If the new recruits are all stationed here and tasked to guard the area of Chidorigafuchi and Hanzomon Gate until Hibiya Camp, be it in their machines or as constant patrols, then perhaps it could be misunderstood as an act of defense and distrust towards the Diet. Kurechika-dono does seem to be facing toilsome days indeed when negotiating with our fellows as of late. To instead place them near the rails of the outer gardens would have the recruits facing the international forum, where the UN's High Council is currently located. I am certain that will backfire, quickly. The rest of the surrounding areas of the palace are already covered by the forces of Ikaruga-dono in Camp Kitanomaru, the Imperial Guards who watch over His Holy Majesty, Raiko-san's unit in the small outpost in Hibiya, or this palace's own patrols.

Either way, no matter where we deploy the recruits, consequences will soon follow. Either sow more distrust towards the Diet and the MDF, risk an altercation with patrolling UN soldiers or their bureaucrats as they descend from the trains, bolster Ikaruga-dono's forces or over-commit units to my palace. When in reality the fresh recruits should be taking to the field to aid our people…

However, if the pressure is rising at this particular moment…

"Hifukai-san, would there be any connection between the petitions to bolster our stationed units and the request of the Undersecretary?" A hand caressing my chin, to support my face so that it does not wane under the intimate, burdening weight of the golden crown, I inquire.

He takes a deep breath, petrification permeating his entire posture clad in yellow, "There are no leads that would point towards such a case, no."

"Yet, do you believe that might be the case?"

"… I cannot deny it, Your Highness," Thus finally, dark ashes spread well beyond his expression.

Upon his somber answer Gekka-san coughs while taking a step forward. She then bows before speaking, as loudly as Daizaburou-san tends to do, "Many in Tokyo were perplexed, to say the least, with the sudden visit the Undersecretary paid Yokohama. By such concerns some believe this situation might devolve into…" Voice lowering, a speck of worry causing her lips to narrow, the papers she held now subjected to a vice grip, "Ahem… another treason from Tamase, and thus firmly think bolstering our defenses is justified."

"Sigh… However, from your report, all points to Kouzuki being ready to present precious intel to us," She wouldn't have requested an urgent meeting with the UN's HC and all Regents otherwise, "And forgive me if I'm mistaken, yet isn't it odd for Kouzuki herself to request a meeting of this magnitude? The woman does not strike me as someone who would bluff in such a way."

Gekka-san nods, the oval shape of her dark brown hair immutable unlike the quiver in her voice, "Indeed, Your Highness. The past meeting at Yokohama was but a small show, a quiet time for the Professor to share her reports and findings," She retells with much aplomb, and I nod in agreement.

That meeting, where many expected Alt. IV's start of operations to be announced, served only to disclose some minimal intel about Yokohama's own might. A show of the Imperial UN branch to their backers, to justify the funds spent on the base's construction. According to Gekka-san's prior reports, Undersecretary Tamase and one of the HC's Secretaries, Mooroka was his name I believe, affirmed certain Alt. IV supporters from America had contacted the Professor back then. A warning of what few allies this nation has in the west, of the soon to come pressure for the Treaty to be reinstated and the risk, the threat that supposed for Alt. IV. Chief Yoroi did not delve deeply into this, yet I believe time is running short for the Fourth Project.

Yet, the vital reports all awaited, the results everyone expected Kouzuki to deliver… were nowhere to be found back then, unlike now.

Leaning forward, treading and swirling my hair as I ponder for a moment, as my hand descends to my nape, a small jolt runs through me. Feeling as if static had enveloped my arms, as if my hair were standing in attention, that ensuing grip towered, covered my whole neck again. In slow motion I gulp, even slower I breath in.

Yet, what towers atop my head sinks deeply into me, forcing my chin to fold inwards. The pressure of gold undaunted by the skin and instead piercing the tender below it, tearing into where once he bequeathed kindness upon me. And it begins to hurt, the crown's weight. And it ails further, the reminder of what once was where pain lays now. It is odd, this amalgamation of swirling feelings in me. The same weight atop my head, the same intrusive reminder of my duties that compels such aplomb within is also what wakes whispers by which mine own tempest is cleared, cleansed. Allowing me to breath in calmly, rein in the toilsome pondering, hearing only those whispers of days long gone.

Usually, I'd have remained quiet on this doubt, I'd have taken a more peaceful approach. However… "I suppose that… said concerns do not surge from the Regents themselves?" I am not feeling particularly keen on the peaceful approaches for this occasion.

Gekka-san seemed to twitch, eyes parting open as skies after a storm, and she then hastily shakes her head, "Of course not, Your Highness. In all honesty, those who not know of either the Project or the meeting Kouzuki requested are growing anxious. Yokohama's silence as of late, their secrecy regarding the STF's deployments, and Tamase's sudden visit are making the echoes of those who hold… unpleasant views of the UN louder. Both within our walls and Ichigaya's hallways, it would seem," Eyes squinting as if amidst a heatwave, the habitual vigorous stride of her voice fades and gives way to nothing but a quiet wind to filter from her lips.

Seeing such apprehension, Hifukai-san coughs and looks towards me, with that equal petrification, that same apprehension as if the floor were about to give away upon a wrong step, "There is also the continuous insistence from the US to reinstate the Treaty to take into account, even if said attempts have been diminished since the Yukon Incident. While we cannot confirm any rumors, the UN's image has been steadily falling both in the IJA's camps and in the public opinion, many are those who still link the organization to the American forces," And once again, his expression falls down deep alongside his voice, "And… I also cannot deny some of our fellows are rather displeased with their showings of late, the lackluster support they've given our forces on the latest BETA incursions."

"That is something I can confirm," Kisaragi-san reluctantly affirms, barely raising his voice, "During the exchange of favors to repair and re-purpose the simulator units, quite many mechanics repined about how many units are gathering dust in the UN's bases, both sims and TSFs. I believe this animosity is one of many reasons why a press conference was requested out of you by the Prime Minister, Your Highness."

"… I assumed as much, truth be told," Once more feeling my shoulders grow heavy, desiring to bend down, this confirmation only brings further repining and pressure to the back of my head, from its top to my nape.

"So…" Gekka-san stares hesitantly, petrified in place, the hand she belatedly runs over her burgundy dress as if trying to grasp a flower with thorns, "… would you be wishing to parley with the Regents to quell this animosity, Your Highness?" She inquires and causes all others to also become statues, statues soon to turn to dust as those eyes, those hesitant and resigned eyes look my way.

Sigh…

Perhaps this is why the proposition to bolster our defenses is coming now of all times. Thinking twice, Yoroi has been silent for quite some time already. My actions to defend these deals with the UN have already forced me to debate with the other Houses, and quite adamantly to boot. The IJA is understandably growing anxious as the battles continue with no end in sight, not a single hopeful light arriving to our ears. If another assault were to occur and the BETA threaten with piercing the final defense line once more… If that report Yoroi gave us is confirmed either by the UN, our scouts, or Hikami-san's squadron, then… It is possible my people will choose violence to further their goals. No, any small incident might be plentiful enough to spark up the blazes of conflict which lay buried within the ashes.

Usually, I would relent. Prioritizing our people's and fellows' safety is an obligation I must hold dear. In no feasible way am I wishing to continue clashing with the other Regents frontally. To fold my hand when my agreement to their demands might aid in placating the righteous fury seething within the IJA would be a severe mistake. Even if I'd have to ask my subordinates to bend the knee, our actions should be moved by our obligation to safeguard our people's peace and safety.

Yet, as I breath in while reiterating that determined spiel, I don't answer. I cannot answer. Licking my lips, closing my eyes, I ponder the words, the board and what may lie beyond it. And again palpitations rise up, crawl up my throat, as the crown grows crushing.

" Are those impositions truly so dear to you? Is that what you should be protecting now?" His voice echoes, the query he forwarded after finally returning to my presence after our dissidence.

Usually, I would have ordered my fellows to parley, to find a peaceful solution to this conundrum. My voice as the Shogun is the only tool I truly possess to even the scales of this Empire. I cannot support those who would wish to see the Shogun's entire entitlements be restored lest those powers are either misused by the Royal Guard, who would then stand above the IJA in dominance, or taken as a threat by the UN and the rest of the Asian nations.

I also must support Kurechika-dono come what may as well as the Alt. Project, for both to remain independent as they are now is key so that we manage to maintain this amicable relation we have with the international community. Any signs of the Empire desiring to gain further powers, of the IRG wishing to acquire full control of this nation, of the Shogunate considering to once more rule by royal decrees as I had to during the invasion's darkest days… Even if said fears are unfounded, if the scenery paints such a picture the measures taken to prevent it might spiral into a forceful reinstatement of the Treaty, or worse… the abolition of the Shogunate. And such a threat, such an enticing desire is certain to drive the rest of the Guard into, perhaps, agreeing with those in the IJA who wish to bring about a paradigm shift to this nation. It is understandable that those in the MDF could be considering extreme alternatives to have their voices be heard after all the hardships our peasants are enduring. Kurechika-dono cannot solve what issues plague our people with words alone, and our reality in no way can measure up to the ideals we are sworn to uphold. That is why we remain serving in silence, all we can do as rulers is bow down in apology and keep pushing forward through these dark hours.

… So the obvious option is for me to relinquish further powers, to allow them to use my voice to quell the people and soldiers. It is the quickest and easiest path to stability, for me to simply remain playing the role of a bright Shogun. A mere tool to keep the tethering peace steady, to prevent a greater damage be inflicted onto our people. Appease the IJA, who possesses the numbers to act as a deterrent towards any insurgent desires the extremists within the IRG might harbor. Yet I must parley with the Regents so that they do not cause a power vacuum while I also have to continue to support the Diet despite the liberties some take with their powers, and the reaction that could cause within the more fervent soldiers of the IJA.

I can only sing and pray my voice is heard, and continue to slowly walk forward on this lone rope I have without ever looking back, ever looking down into the abyss that would befell my people were I to falter in protecting this frail balance. No matter how much my feet wail, how sore and numb they become… Such is my duty… to endure this knowledge in solitude, to shoulder this responsibility on my own… for the sake of maintaining this peace we enjoy…

… Then, what is this cold shiver that runs on my back? By which reason is my tongue regressing further and further into my throat? How can my arms feel so tense, as if showered by static?

" If you cannot ever hesitate, how can you be certain you're not making a mistake?" Feeling the glare on my nape, such pressure forces me to gag on emptiness, "If you can't prevent blood from being spilled… then, it's up to you to ensure the minimal amount of it ends up on the soil. You're the one who dictates, the one who forges the path forward as the Shogun."

Usually, I would have negotiated. Requested support for Kurechika-dono, a ceasefire in the intrigue towards the Diet from the nobility, or immediate aid for the settlements and shelters were a BETA incursion to occur again. I'd have accepted the critiques from the nobles for supporting both Kouzuki and Kurechika-dono as I've been doing, I'd have accepted Kurechika-dono's own doubts towards my capabilities as a leader of the IRG who is unable to rein in the nobles under her rule, to be the one who they admire and pledge their lives to. I'd have requested the soldiers of the IJA to merely remain steadfast in their resolve, to look away from my struggles and focus on safeguarding the people, to ensure no more blood is spilled pointlessly.

After all, all of them, those in the Diet, the IJA and the Guard, all of them solely wish for our Empire to once more be able to stand strong and proud by its own might. All that diverges is the methods they'd rather employ, and the colors with which they wish to paint the canvas of our future. Someone who does not take to the field cannot earn their reverence, that much I know. Someone who can only parley with time… is not truly fitting to be a Shogun as the traditions demand. From their eyes, I might as well be another bureaucrat instead of the divine embodiment of a warrior I should represent as His Holy Majesty's appointed Commander-in-Chief. Someone who must remain neutral, colorless, to not upset the spectrum among all factions cannot possibly convince them to reach a compromise.

I've known this since many moons ago, and all throughout these years without you I've managed to remain calm under the setbacks we've encountered, under the daily reminder of this crown which takes root into my head and does not wish to let go… Yet…

" So long as you promise to do what must be done for our future, even against the frail peace of today, I shall abide by any and all orders you issue, Yuuhi. And those who found me worth their trust shall make all those who are not in agreement bend the knee, by force if necessary. So in exchange…" Inhaling sharply, barely opening my eyes does not release me from that frown, that adusted, narrowed, accusing and imposing frown, "I want you to never back down from this oath. If you'll dedicate your life to serve the Empire as the Shogun, then make sure you're truly doing what's best for our future, to guide us towards a peaceful end to all this madness. So if there's any part of you that still would dare to hope for a peaceful world without wars… My soul and fealty are yours to command."

I slowly gulp, hands shifting and closing as the silence extends overlong. The rest continue to stare, still as pillars and afflicted much. There is no hold, yet my nape grows ever stiff. There is no gale, yet the lower part of my ears wail in displeasure and middling pain. There is nothing within my lips, yet my tongue twists and turns and the urge to cleanse it overflows.

You wouldn't have agreed with this course of action, would you Takeru? If I cannot hesitate, if blood will be on my hands no matter the choice… Then, it is my duty to reduce it to its absolute minimum. To make of this Empire a power known not for its military might but instead for its peaceful and honorable values, to reach the peaceful ending we dreamed of together. True peace cannot come to pass while such reservations, such grudges, such belligerent pride remains in our hearts. To continue down this road, compromising my standing to merely gain a temporary ceasefire…

That is not a solution. That's merely patchwork, a temporary deterrent, an eventual impediment. Regardless of whether… that cadet is him or not… if I truly wish for these arguments to stop… I must make myself be heard, otherwise these concessions will know no end. And if I truly have a listener no longer… that confirmation is plentiful for me to devise a path forward. After all, that which I have been regarding as impossibilities are nothing but the safe limits my overly fearful mind built for my ego.

Thus, exhaling softly, what embers of his still remain tried to lightly endow my voice. And I made no effort to suppress them, "… Sadly, I must refuse those petitions," Opening their eyes in dismay, truly flabbergasted they all remain as they find themselves at an utter lack of words, "As I stated moments before, I desire to find an end to these struggles. Furthermore, there are other bases and locations that deserve the Imperial Guard's attention. The troops stationed to guard both castles are plentiful enough, thus I ask that you notify the other advisors that I wish these discussions to be no more. The recruits will not be stationed in this palace nor in any of its surrounding outposts."

"H-However, if I may…" Gekka-san insists, voice again rising along clear concern grafted, imprinted into her eyes, "Your Highness, after the favors you unilaterally gave to Yokohama, you cannot push any further. The coming meeting might not grant us any boons, your standing and image would-"

"I rather see myself losing influence while following my own plans than to be swayed by outside influence," Again unable to repel, to resist the embers the dreams spurred in me, I take some seconds to stare into their eyes, one at a time, before grandly commanding, "All of us present are in agreement, I'm certain, that these squabbles must cease so that we can then prosper. These divisions once brought us to our knees during our darkest hour, and it is my obligation to ensure such a scenario does not repeat itself. Thus, my decision is final."

Thus, tapping her glasses and keeping a low tone, my retainer steps forward, "Your Highness, I comprehend your wishes, however this course of action could incite-"

"No, Maya. I believe such concerns are unwarranted. Kouzuki would not be requesting a meeting herself if she did not possess crucial reports to give. I know that, until the propositions become official, certain matters must remain unspoken, however…" Looking at both Gekka-san and Hifukai-san, the rim of my eyelids squints ever slightly, perhaps as you used to say fire would be coming out, "How likely is it that the Vice Commander requested authorization to assault Sadogashima?"

"Wh- Y-Your Highness!" Maya shrieks, appalled and paling, "How can you ascertain-"

"Maya, please. Considering the need to show results under such a narrow time frame, I do not doubt the XO is wishing to prove the Project's worth in a crucial mission," Between the railgun and the TSF developments she has shown, I do believe the possibility is quite high. Of course… whether she gains UN approval depends on the completion and prowess of the machine she has revealed almost nothing about, the one Kouzuki herself affirmed would be the peak result of her research, "Thus, what have you to say, 1st Lt Hifukai, 1st Lt Guren?" I inquire, once again staring into their souls.

He sighs, slowly running a hand into his long hair while dispelling the abundant tension, "I wouldn't go as far as to confirm such a notion. However… I do believe an important matter will be disclosed, for I have rarely seen Tamase hold his position with such resolve."

Gekka-san quickly nods, a hand on her ear as she slowly places, presses her folder onto her person, "I'd have to agree, Your Highness. I know not of what negotiations have occurred between you and Yokohama, yet it is clear this particular occasion comes with far more weight than any prior meetings. Whether that equals the results you'd be wishing, I cannot confirm."

"I see…" Sigh… That's a relief, at the least Kouzuki is finally delivering results, I'm certain, "Then Maya, may I entrust you with the duty of convincing Ikaruga-dono to douse his insistence over the matter of the recruits?"

"… I shall try my utmost effort," She relents with a bow, lacking all of her habitual confidence.

"That is all I ask," Smiling her way, I am able to finally sheathe the embers, "Well… I suppose this marks the end of these reports?" All of them nod, standing in attention, "Good enough, I shan't hold you any longer. Please do feel free to have lunch here if you yet haven't, and I hope this coming meeting brings us auspicious news."

All of three of my visitors bow down in unison, thanking me for my time, and in perfectly coordinated steps they thus leave my presence. Closing my eyes, away from the brightness of the audience chamber, I enjoy the soft breeze that intrudes from the balcony.

"Sigh… Truly, what a busy day today has been thus far…" And it is yet too early to retire to my chamber as well… What wouldn't I give for a few minutes in bed.

"Your Highness?" Maya asks, I look her way, "What has compelled such a stance from you? Are you still…" Lips twisting, she cannot finish.

Thus, I merely nod, "Indeed, it is as you fear. Yet, I believe this was truly a blessing. We cannot risk an incident to occur should Kouzuki truly ask for a mission to Sadogashima."

"Indeed, right you are. However…" Tapping her glasses, her stone-cold scolding gaze meets mine own unfaltering, "Might I advise you to retain your poise from now on? I do not believe it wise, for you to clash in such manner with the guard as you've done throughout today."

"… Yet, merely standing still is something I cannot allow myself to do. If compromises will be made regardless… then, why merely delay the inevitable, why waste time with patchworks? Shouldn't we be taking measures to truly heal this wound instead?"

"… I share your feelings, yet I am uncertain whether this approach is the most proper one."

"You could always employ a royal decree instead," An intrusive voice thus says behind Maya, making me twitch.

"Indeed, a decree would-" My retainer then stops short, opening her eyes wide as she turns around, allowing me to see Tsuhi's composed face as she stands in attention, "2nd Lt Yasomaga! Why have you not notified your presence?!" Maya berates, igniting her anger.

Eyelids descending slowly, Tsuhi remains calm despite the minute furrowing of her brows, "What good is a shinobi that announces its presence? Would you have me announce myself when I'm sent on recon missions, Maya-sama?"

"This and that are completely different matters, also you should not talk back to your superiors!"

"Maya, peace," Swaying my hand slowly as I sigh, Maya also does as she takes a step back which allows Tsuhi to walk closer to myself, bowing once she stops, "Tsuhi, whatever is the matter? Has something… occurred within the castle?"

"No, nothing of the sort, milady. However, Raiko-sama has announced herself at the gate. She is wishing to speak with you, Yuuhi-sama," Then, she looked up, unblinking.

"Is that so?" So she chose this day, when the advisors of the other Regent Houses are present, to come request such of me. Perhaps she's once more testing my character? Hmm… going by how Tsuhi referred to me just now… "Did she speak of the motives behind this visit?"

Tsuhi nods, still as composed as usual, "Raiko-sama desires to platicate with you regarding the food plant's situation, as well as the lack of orders her unit has received."

Maya comes closer, whispering as she taps her glasses, "Your Highness, I'd advise against this meeting. To merely accept to see her without having made an appointment beforehand would perhaps diminish your image."

"That might be, it is true. Yet… the food plant is one, if the only, project my fellowship can use to negotiate from an advantageous position. Perhaps I should simply allow this and resolve the meeting now," Before Mana calls with their meeting's results, or time erodes Raiko-san's patience towards my person, "Also, you have to be going back to Kitanomaru, don't you Maya?"

"Well, indeed. I can remain here for a moment, in case Raiko-sama were to step out of line," She ascertains, readiness in her eyes.

"Well, what would your orders be, Yuuhi-sama?" Tsuhi inquires, hurries as her sight never lifted from my person.

"… Allow her entrance, I shall meet with her immediately. By the by, have we received any calls during the meeting, Tsuhi?"

She returns herself upright, a hand tracing some hair, "No, were you expecting a call, Yuuhi-sama?" Inquiring as she again stares, tone and expression as loose and neutral as the grayness of her dress, "It wouldn't be something related to my leader, would it?"

"Yes, that is the case," Her inquiring stare eases up upon my honest answer, relaxing into her usual calm demeanor, "Mana might contact us for a report on the situation, is all. Please do inform Maya as soon as the call arrives, she will handle it," I order, holding her stare.

Tsuhi nods, despite how her brows again furrowed momentarily, the curiosity to delve further. After a deep bow, she then turns around and gracefully marches out of the room, with long and slow steps.

"… I swear, I still cannot locate her presence at all," Maya repines, rubbing her eyes under her glasses.

"So, you also cannot detect Tsuhi when she approaches?" I ask in genuine curiosity.

"I wish I could," She sighs, shaking her head, "Me, Mana and our sisters were only trained in the standard arts of the shinobi. I suppose Tsuhi has instead chosen to further polish her skill with her… family's methods," Just as a cloud covered the audience room with a faint shadow, Maya's expression so darkened.

"Is that so? Haven't you spoken with her to share such methods with you and the rest?"

"… I did try, and she refused," Maya sighs again, tapping her glasses as she frowns slightly, a foreign speck of complain in her voice, "She said back then that there was only one person she would ever teach her family's techniques to… And we know how that affair ended up," Her lips twist again, her glare cascades into the floor and I cannot help but to run a hand over my neck, "… However, that aside, Your Highness, are you certain you wish to speak with Raiko-sama as of now? What if Mana were to call amidst the meeting?"

Shaking my head, I finally lean back comfortably for a moment, "I doubt the situation warrants such concern, Maya. I can finish the meeting then or they can wait until we're done. Furthermore, I believe I do not have any impending duties for the remainder of the afternoon?"

"No, our fellows shall be crafting a speech for the press conference yet I doubt they'd have it for today."

"Sigh… I suppose I'll have to stand in wait all day long now…" Hopefully Mana can bestow me a pleasant report, to finally dispel these echoes I cannot rein in as of now.

Some moments pass, Maya made some tea for me and left the kettle and another cup at the ready for the eventual arrival of our guest. As a gentle breeze rustled its way into the audience room, as I breathed in this freshness, as the herbs replenished my good spirits, a rhythm knocked onto the door.

"Yuuhi-sama, may we enter?" Tsuhi requested.

"You may enter," Maya replies, and thus, the doors once more part open.

And behind Tsuhi… two figures walked towards me. A tall, slender but well-defined shape garbed in the burgundy attire befitting of a High Shinpan, readiness and resolve as in Maya's own stance. The short lily hair, with a trio of sharp spikes flowing backwards above her ears on each side as if three steel feathers they were, the strong, darker purple of her eyes locked onto mine own, her fair and smooth features betrayed the imposing aura, the brief displeasure that surged forth as she and Maya crossed glares. Stopping short, a slow and graceful bow she gives me, and her soft yet firm voice follows suit.

"Thank you kindly for receiving me, Yuuhi-sama. I hope this day finds you faring well, milady."

"… Thank you, Raiko-san. You may rise, it is… good to finally meet you again," She raises back, nodding to my words with a neutral expression. As she did, I could not help but to let my eyes wander to the one who stood by her side, tightly holding her hand, "Hello, I believe we have not met in person?"

The small boy hid behind Raiko-san, timidly peeking with a single eye at me. The short, light brown hair, the equally strong purple of Raiko-san's own eyes, the child was wearing a most elegant western set of clothing for the occasion, in cerulean and aquamarine with some small shades of thistle along its upper half.

"Come, introduce yourself," Raiko-san whispered to him, a small smile on her face as she gently pulled him by the hand, the child now standing before me.

Giving me a bow then quickly returning to her side, his eyes remained on me, "Good morning. I am Fujikagi Amato. It's a…" He looks up at Raiko-san, who gives a small nod, and his stare hesitates its way back to mine, "… It's a pleasure, Your Highness-sama."

"Fujikagi, you do not need to add a -sama when referring to Her Highness," She corrects softly.

"Truly?" He asks, eyes wide as he looks back at me.

Smiling and chuckling, I nod his way, "Indeed. There is no need for further honorifics," He then bows down, thanking me as he again hides behind Raiko-san's back. I remain staring at him for a moment, something or the other crawling down my throat, before I shake my head, "I suppose we should have him rest somewhere else. Tsuhi?"

"As you will," She immediately nods and walks up to the boy, who doesn't seem startled by her presence.

"Fujikagi, I need to resolve some work for the moment. Do behave well while under Tsuhi's care," She tells, patting his head.

The child nods with a smile, and bows down again my way before Tsuhi guides him by the hand out of the room. Raiko nods and thanks Tsuhi, who wordlessly salutes her as she goes her way towards the door along the child.

"… I see no reason why you'd bring the boy with you," Tapping her glasses, glacial gale greets its way forward. Sigh… Not again, "To have him ascend to this floor just to then have him rest elsewhere, I believe you should have left him resting in the nearby hotel."

"Why, I cannot merely leave him unattended. I expected more from someone who once watched over young children, but perhaps even than is beneath you today, Tsukuyomi," Thus, she immediately retaliates ready to rend Maya asunder.

My retainer frowns, scowls as she takes a step forward, "… Well, it is understandable. Yet, it is audacious of you, to request a meeting on this particular day without a prior appointment."

"Oh, I did request an appointment, you see. I wonder why my petitions have all fallen on deaf ears…" Raiko-san returns the pleasantry, grinning faintly, "It is almost as if someone were interfering with the communication attempts."

"Raiko-san, peace," I speak up, before Maya loses her temper, "I have not been in proper form to give you the time and attention you deserve. Please, do forgive my lack of tact towards your person."

Placing both hands behind her back, she hastily bows down, "No, there is no blame on your shoulders, Yuuhi-sama. Such are the circumstances you have been made to endure."

"That is good to hear… So then, do sit down. Tell me, how have you been faring as of late?" Trying to smile her way, she relents a nod and knees on the floor.

Shaking her head as Maya had offered a cup of tea, Raiko-san swayed her hair backwards in one fell swing then locked her eyes onto me, "As my reports have notified, I believe we have a working prototype for the main unit of the food plant. The smaller unit managed to deliver a satisfactory result, thus it is now time to proceed to the next stage and devise the core in its required size to be of use for the synth food plant's outlined output. Should the approval and funds be bequeathed to us, I estimate that we can begin work on the final phase in a month's time," She then told me of the work and proceedings she's been overseeing, going into fine detail when I so asked her to, "… At the very least, the filter to separate the flagellates from the seawater and any other substances is completed as of now. As I said, my main concern at the moment is the development of the main unit and its support systems. With proper funding, I estimate that it would take us two years to deliver the first off-shore food production plant."

"Is that so? That is truly a blessing…" Finally, a good advancement that is not tied to the war. Of course, it will also aid the war efforts greatly with its food supply, but such a development will certainly become a key piece for negotiations with the UN in the years to come, "I am certain that the Kujo House will undoubtedly support this endeavor, and I suppose the Takatsukasa House might also do so. Maya?"

She steps forward, giving a prompt nod, "It would seem that way, yes. The young Head of the Saionji is, well, more swayed by the militaristic approaches, yet I am of the opinion that Ikaruga-sama would try and negotiate for some of his fellows to be involved in the development process before giving his agreement."

"So we could have four of us in unison, huh. Raiko-san, I know I might be imposing, however is there any-"

"I must refuse," She quietly warns, frowning towards Maya, "The food plant is the fruit of the Koubuin House's endeavors. As the current Head of the Amato House, I shan't agree to relinquish our secrets or autonomy to the Ikaruga House."

My retainer steps forward as I was sighing, "You would dare to refuse a petition of Her Highness herself? The gall…"

Raiko-san once more ignites her wrath, clashing, crashing her sight into Maya's with unmasked contempt, "No, I am refusing your suggestion. We cannot show such weakness in our negotiations, to simply reveal our cards so easily won't do us any favors."

"However, further clashing will only place Her Highness in a compromising position," She ascertains, firmly, "I believe that, as her servants, it is us who should lower our heads to safeguards our Regent's wishes."

"Hmph… I wonder who you're referring to now," Very much toxic, she eyes Maya sideways.

Who does not relent upon my coughing, instead taking a step towards Raiko-san, "… So you think I serve another Regent, do you."

"Yes, for real," Frowning, she fires off. The wording catching me and Maya off guard, it brings cold nails into to nape, into my hands, "I certainly did not expect you to be wagging your tail so openly, dog of Ikaruga."

After a moment of bewilderment, wrath overflowed my retainer, "What… What was that?! I dare you to repeat that!"

"Maya!" Frowning, I warn. She grimaces, wringing her hands as she takes a step back, "Raiko-san, could you kindly cease these petty attempts to instigate an argument?"

Eyes narrowing, she eyes Maya sideways again, "I did nothing of the sort. I merely stated a fact, that Tsukuyomi herself suggested involving Ikaruga into our own business. And as the High Shinpan I am, I refuse to allow such a treason to escape unpunished."

"Treason, you say?" Maya whispers, her hands are shaking, "What has you casting such defamation upon my person, I wonder?"

Meeting her gaze, Raiko-san scowls, "… Under who are you stationed and what is your callsign as of now, Tsukuyomi?"

"Wh- That has nothing-"

"Could you kindly answer the question?" She presses, Maya groans in frustration, I sigh and shake my head. It is always the same between these two, I wonder why they never were amicable with one another.

Maya's gaze crumbles, fades to dust as she tightly veils her sight and whispers the answer to the query, "… IRG 16th Battalion, callsign Horn 3."

"Oh, is that so? If my memory isn't failing me, that unit is none other than the Ikaruga House's personal battalion, is it not?"

"Raiko-san, enough," I glare her way, voice low, "Maya has remained loyal to me, her position in said battalion is something I myself ordered many years ago. There is no need for such accusations to fall on her person."

"… Yet, one cannot deny the overbearing presence the Ikaruga House possesses in this palace, and the influence it holds over the other Houses. I cannot help but to think that… perhaps, your retainer should not be someone who has served another Regent for so long a time."

"… After not seeing us for so long, this is how you choose to conduct yourself?"

"Precisely because I do not know when we'll meet again I speak as such, Yuuhi-sama. Your retainer might be fulfilling her duties as of now, yet I implore you not to forget where her loyalty lies," She affirms, the link between our gazes never breaking, never waning.

"What are you even accusing me of?" Maya threatens, "I'd find you far more worthy of such suspicions, refusing to release the project if it isn't under the circumstances you desire, even in front one of Her Highness' direct requests."

"Well, if you insist I can refresh your memory, dog," She narrows her eyes once more, whatever thwarted the animosity giving in, "Who was the one who opposed my directives during Shura's Dance, wasting crucial time on the mission?"

Maya recoils, a step back as her lips quiver, "That… I was merely-"

"Who was the one that surveyed my unit's efforts after the fall of Yokohama, interfering with our investigations on multiple occasions?"

"I… I was not aware of-"

"Raiko-san, please let this matter rest. Nothing will come out of-"

Clearly not hearing me, or not caring to stop, she swiftly points a finger straight at Maya's eyes, a dagger at her throat, as her own eyes came under a draconian spell, "You are not worth our trust after your devoted service to the Ikaruga House during the invasion. Such is the reason why Takeru-uesama refused your collaboration when the Swordbreakers were still in function. If he did not deem you worth our trust back then, I see no reason to give you the benefit of the doubt when you've done nothing to cleanse the image you portrayed during the '99."

The mention, the name emptied my insides once again as the hold covered my neck whole. Inhaling deeply, to halt the harsh brush of anger into my canvas, to resist the embers, the echoes of the dreams. Thus, I took a moment of pause, yet…

Restrain withered in Maya, she hastily stepped towards Raiko-san, "How dare you mention his name… after you misguided him into such violence, you dare speak his name?!"

Observing her well, Raiko-san's fair features did not even waver. She merely narrowed her eyes at Maya, uncaring and cold as he used to be, "Misguided? Me? I'd like to you to not talk about which you know nothing about, dog of Ikaruga."

"Do not utter such balderdash," Hands wring, rough outlines of clear anger taint her face, her rising voice, "Who else other than you could have influenced Takeru into following such a vengeful path?"

Now frowning, scorching ice breathed through her lips, "Such words prove you know nothing about him. Takeru-uesama chose his own path on his own volition, as you did back then."

"Most interesting, coming from the person who prevented me from meeting him at all," Maya retaliates.

"Which was only a precaution I had to take, after you harmed him so savagely," Quietly, she thus slays any remaining composure my retainer had left.

Combusting alive, those eyes narrowed, those hands tightened as they stared at each other, "… I did nothing of the sort, you merely deceived him into-"

"Takeru-uesama was who refused to see you, because he no longer believed you worth his trust. And considering the current state of affairs, I still believe his judgment to be correct," She states, relentless downpour of aggression.

"That was only because you twisted his-"

"Maya, stand down," I order, firm and loud. When she holds my gaze, I frown as I used to do, endowing the embers once more. Maya recoils, sharply bowing down and taking quite a few steps back. Not dispelling the tension in me, I silently stare at both of them, who seem to sheathe their arguing wishes upon my gaze, "… Cpt. Amato, it has been two years already. Maya has already proved she was merely lacking intel on your operations."

Despite the bow she gives, the animosity did not thaw, "Yet, she herself is the one who mentions, the one who proposes to involve the Ikaruga House in our House's matters."

"As the Shogun, I require my fellows to prioritize the Empire's wellbeing over our own interests. Do remember the words of the Mugen Kidou, as well as the honor code."

"… That extends to all Regent Houses, not solely the one whose Head is the Shogun. Would you then be wishing to order me to relinquish my project to the Ikaruga House?"

Maya sighs, tapping her glasses as her voice cools down back to normal, "If it gained us the fastest approval without further discussions falling upon Her Highness… perhaps that is the correct choice."

"… I see. It would seem I was guided to the wrong room," Frowning, my guest slowly stands up.

"Excuse me, what is the meaning of-" Halting my words with a glare, a glare that resembles his all too much, she proceeds to bow down.

"I had asked to speak with Yuuhi-sama, the Head of the Koubuin House, yet it would seem… all that's left within you is a docile Shogun. I shall be taking my leave," She thus promptly turns around.

"Wh… Halt where you stand," I order, she looks back, "Cpt. Amato, I am both the Shogun and the Head of our fellowship. Such provocations shall only bring you further setbacks."

"It does not look as such from my eyes," She squints them, briefly glaring at Maya, "For you to so easily accept to hand over our research to other Houses… shielding this blatant mingling by saying it is for the good of the Empire… If that is how you wish to proceed, I shall resign my position from the project."

"… Why are you showing your fangs so easily, Raiko-san? I had believed you also wished to lead us to the peaceful world he so desired."

Scowling, her voice descends, the cold blizzard looks straight into my eyes, "Because I have not forgotten. Do you believe Takeru-uesama would have favored such a course of action?"

"… We must deliver results with the food plant, then perhaps we can once more offer it to the rest of the world to gain us valuable funds. It is a vital piece to negotiate, it could allow us to parley with Ikaruga-dono quite easily."

"You're assuming he would relent on his pressure," Looking away, venom overflows her lips, "And to hand over our advancements? If you wish to continue chasing this naive ideal of a forced peace, then do so. If you wish to keep compromising your power, to keep sacrificing your influence, you're free to act as you deem fit. However…" Taking some steps towards me, accusing and aggressive, "I will have to request you relinquish the position of the Head of the House, you're clearly only going to bring us to our knees in your quest for martyrdom," She states, almost hatefully.

… Just as he did… when we argued at Hakuryo…

"… Do you see me as such, Raiko-san?"

She nods, unabated, "Indeed I do. It is one thing to search for a compromise, to try to reach a truce in the required negotiations you face. However, you're preemptively readying yourself to lose your power. If your very first card to play is to knee and offer your boons to the rest of the nobility, then you're free to act as you deem fir. However, those of us who have supported your wishes would rather you stand firm in rule."

"Yet, that won't grant me any favors now, would it? I require the support of the other Regents, and Ikaruga-dono could very well aid us in reaching said compromise with his influence," As much as it pains my lips to admit…

Once more, the scowl surges forth. Sudden, harsh strokes of crimson taint her eyes, and Raiko-san can no longer hold my gaze,

"Is that so? Then… If you've determined such martyrdom to be your sole path forward… Why do you not marry Ikaruga instead?"

"Wha… What did you just say?" Teeth gritting, a cold sensation covers my back.

"If you wish to gain Ikaruga's unconditional support, you could court either him or one of his Shinpan retainers," She states, and we glare at each other.

"… I would never surrender myself in such a way, my First Gentleman must be someone who adheres to the code of the Koubuin House, someone who can stand by me in support of my wishes," Both as a Regent and as a woman, and simply uttering, pondering such words… brings back the grasp, the grip to my neck, pushes the air out through my teeth as I lick my lips, as his voice echoes again, "Could you perhaps enlighten me on what spurs such an irreverent inquiry from you, Cpt. Amato?"

"It is simple, Yuuhi-sama. I wish you to would clarify your standing for all those of us who you have neglected in these years," She then glares at Maya, barely subduing the scorching within her eyes, "If you have chosen to surrender your powers to the complete service of the other Regents' demands, then I ask you to give your vassals the freedom to act as they deem fit. We serve the values of your House, and if you choose to not uphold them then-"

"Silence," A quiet warning, a straight gaze into her. Inhaling sharply, a void rising from my stomach into my throat. I again speak from my stomach, "I understand your concerns, and they do hold some truth to them. I admit I have been neglecting my duties as a Head, imposing onto you all the order to always bow down, to be the firsts to relent. My apologies," I thus give her a short but deep bow. Yet, it does not release me from the frown, the accusing and disappointed frown I know he would have endowed, for I know Takeru wouldn't… have supported this course of action.

"Y-Your Highness!" Maya steps towards me, paling, "You need not show such gestures, you are our ruler. We would follow you to hell itself if you so ordered!"

"Please keep your opinions to yourself, Tsukuyomi," She retorts, pure toxic roused further, "Many of us wish to be able to uphold the values we hold dear, to protect our people instead of always have to bend the knee in front of the other Regents' and the UN's demands," Raiko-san fires off as aggressively as always, absolute anger anchored in her voice and tight posture.

Which causes my retainer to once again scowl in full force, "You dare to cast doubts on Her Highness' wishes? Have you no shame?!"

"Maya, stand back," I order, she flinches, "Raiko-san raises valid points, I have been too passive as of late."

It is true, all I've been doing is chasing the quickest solution. Never hesitating to obtain the result, no matter what was asked of me. All to safeguard our peace, so that no more innocent blood has to be spilled… Because one such as myself must not ever waver, for I am a guiding light that must forge the path towards future peace. Yet… by never questioning myself, by being hyper-fixated in my… yes, in my own selfish wish to never see blood be spilled again, I have allowed things to almost spiral out of control.

If the IJA had decided to try and root out Kurechika-dono in their frustration at our current situation, what would I have been able to do, realistically speaking? Try to parley with them or the government? Request UN support and leave the city to protect the people? And then… what cards would I have left? To see my people murder each other? To fail to keep them away from those shadows that almost engulfed us entirely during the invasion?

It is the same with these negotiations, at one point the only option I'll have left is… to entrust myself to fate. Perhaps, I could take action if I still had my Takemikazuchi if violence was chosen. If not then, I could face either the IJA or the IRG in the issues they have… to try and shoulder the burden on my own once again… as I've been doing to not upset either side…

Yet, if violence is again used to solve our inner problems… someone could then take the same path Takeru once took. Again, my passivity, my constant agreement to the expectations I am obliged to answer to would spawn a heartless blade… and my words might not be enough to sheathe it this time…

Hunching over, the crown again drills into my hair and skin. Sighing heavily, the cold feeling covers my back whole. Thus, I shiver before looking up again, "I admit, I have only been trying to not tip the scales, the balance of this Empire of ours," Slowly entwining my fingers, I frontally meet her gaze, calming down my tone, "Yet, I also do not think it wise to endow such aggressiveness as you do, Raiko-san. I will endeavor to bring about favorable results for our House, while also maintaining the frail peace we have today until we can begin to restore our land. And I ask you to once more place your trust in me, I assure you the tailwind is soon to come," I nod her way, not faltering upon her inquiring gaze.

Some moments pass, as do some clouds which obstruct the illumination. After a pause, a long extension of silence, Raiko-san eases up her posture, loosens up her arms, and bows down in apology.

"My sincerest apologies, Yuuhi-sama," Sigh… So you still refuse to call me otherwise, "However, how can you ascertain the tailwind is soon to come? From my humble outpost the sky looks grim indeed, and what we've discussed and your own complexion would grant credence to such assumptions," Kneeling again, she stares in concern as she folds her arms. Maya sighs and starts taking a few steps back.

Brushing my hair, the embers away, I try to inhale calmly for a moment, "… There have been some developments that have given me hope we'll hear good news soon. Your concern is noted, yet, I must ask you to remain steadfast for the time being," Brows still arching in dejection, she relents a nod, "Now… Do you think the food plant project can be brought to fruition without the support of the Ikaruga House?"

"I rather negotiate with the Takatsukasa or the Saionji, or even delay the plans than to continue to relinquish power to the Ikaruga House. And if you desire to gain their support, allow me to inform you me and my fellows shall resign our positions from the project," She states, again firmly staring at me.

"Such warning is unnecessary. I… was only considering the suggestion, is all," If he does return… I wouldn't be able to look into his eyes were he to learn I surrendered such a vital project to another Regent, "I shall ask my advisors to once more negotiate with the Takatsukasa House after the current tasks are dealt with. I trust you shall be available when the time comes?" Finally smiling, she bows my way, "Well then… I suppose you would now be wishing to discuss the matters of your unit?"

Raiko-san nods, eyeing Maya sideways once more, "Yes, Yuuhi-sama. However… I would like to ask Tsukuyomi to give us some privacy. I am not comfortable speaking of this in the presence of someone who serves another Regent," She insists, and their stares clash once more.

"Sigh… Very well, I shall grant your wish," If only to not have you two keep fighting all day long.

"Your Highness, there is no need to give in to such demands," Maya states, understandably adusted, "I am your retainer, and I shall stand by you."

"However, you also must be returning to your duties in Kitanomaru," I admit, which causes her to flinch as Raiko-san narrows her glare upon my retainer, "And there are other office duties you must see to before you depart, of course," Namely, the incoming report from Mana.

"Yet… Uh…" Maya's tone crumbles, she shivers for a second. Worriedly staring at me, she then looks at Raiko-san, and finally my retainer once more sighs, "I see… As you wish, Your Highness," She bows down deeply, as deeply as her voice fell, as her eyes lost all luster, "Now then, if you'd excuse me," Standing in attention she salutes me, then marches towards the door without sparing a gaze or any parting words for our guest.

Choosing to finish my now lukewarm tea, leaving the liquid in my mouth for a moment, tranquility envelops me. By that relaxation the cold is driven away, the echoes subside and my breathing eases up again.

"… You truly do dislike Maya, do you Raiko-san?"

"Dislike feels inappropriate. Despise fails to convey the feeling," She admits.

"Sigh… I know it might be pointless, yet I trust Maya with my life. She truly was merely in the dark regarding your operations. And… I won't claim to know in detail what transpired between you two during those months after Yokohama fell… yet I'm certain Maya would never have done anything to harm Takeru."

"… We will have to disagree on that front, Yuuhi-sama," She thus says, low, before shaking her head, "In any case, I do not desire to fuel any unnecessary altercations. If she keeps quiet, I shan't retaliate."

"Maya simply… has a strong view of you, as you do of her. I believe she might have thought you brought the child in an attempt to wrest for sympathy, perhaps."

"Hmph, as if I would subject Fujikagi to such uses… Please do not clarify her intents, it only darkens the already pale image I had of that dog," She fumes, understandably. It was my miss, I shan't deny it.

"If I may ask… Why did you bring the boy with you?" Let's try to divert the talks momentarily, so that we can reach the core matters under a more amicable atmosphere.

"As I said, I cannot simply him alone," She nods to herself, arms folded.

"Is there a problem in Hibiya I was not aware of?"

"No, nothing of the sort. It's that, while I'm nearby, Fujikagi stays put reading or playing, but as soon as he notices I'm gone my fellows have told me he starts wailing and complaining much, wanting to know of my whereabouts," She then sighs, "Such is the reason why I have not protested against your decision to have me do office work as I oversee Hibiya's outpost, for it means I can look after him without issues. However… these two years have been rough on me, to tend to him on my own…" Eyelids descend slowly, lips twist inwards, a sorrowful, wistful expression hewn into her face as she once more sighs, "Truly, I only brought him here due to that, and his curious questions about the Castles and what kind of person the Shogun was. I believe he was surprised to see you," Giving a small smile, slowly she treads her hair behind her ears.

"… I suppose he's in that age, where everything piques his interest," Slowly breathing in, a hand rests on the base of my neck, "Is everything well in Hibiya, then?"

"Yes, we have no complains, Yuuhi-sama," Back to her firm form, she nods, "However… There was something I wanted to notify you of."

"And what would that be?"

"You see, some days ago, we noticed a train arrived out of schedule at the station," She says, low. I gulp, nodding as I gesture her to continue, "It would seem one of the HC's Secretaries was the one in it, along some of his men. Our scouts said the UN's HC was in an uproar at the time, and my sources there did not wish to divulge what was the cause of such hectic behavior. However, they did tell me everything took a swift change after this Secretary arrived."

"… I see, so that happened…" She's talking of the report that came to lessen… the cadet's punishment. While Mana reported the situation to me, someone else did so to the HC. Which would mean… all of them now know of the name 'Takeru Shirogane'… If he ever returns…

"Yuuhi-sama, what is the matter?" She inquires, worriedly staring.

"Nothing… I was merely apprehensively pondering on what it could mean."

"Is that so? I had heard… Meiya-sama was harmed during her trial. Does such worry stem from that affair?" Her voice lowers, eyes sharpen, as whenever she proposed to… crush someone's fangs for me or Takeru.

"… Yes, it is related to that. However, that issue will be resolved soon. Worry not, Mana is handling it at the moment."

"Understood," Dejectedly, her readiness evaporates.

"In any case… I actually had a few requests to ask of you," Once more dulling my smile and speaking in a commanding tone, I stare into her eyes. She nods in silence, awaiting the orders, "First, I would need you to… take to the field once more. There is one matter that I require intel on."

"What does it entail?" She curiously inquires, unable not to smile. After all, it has been… a long time since I've sent Raiko-san to the field. I believe, since Kyoko-dono perished and we lost the support of the Takatsukasa House.

"A certain report reached my hands, a most dreadful report truth be told. There are many teams scouring the field to check the veracity of the papers, yet we do not have enough hands as is," She nods, full focus on my figure. Seeing such honesty in her features, how we can share words so easily, it reminds me of days long gone, it reignites the shiver on my back, the craving to divert my gaze despite knowing he is not there, "Thus, I'd be wishing to request your squadron to scout certain areas near the Niigata frontline. You would have to spend time away from here for this mission, and I'd like to ask you to begin the preparations immediately if at all possible."

"Hmm… It would take a day, perhaps two. What does this scouting entails? Will there be other fellows aiding in this search?"

"Yes, as it were… I was thinking on contacting Hikami-san for this mission as well."

"Huh? Is… that so," She says, lips again twisting. I suppose, to field her along one of her past squadmates must… make her wish to sortie alongside her, yet Hikami-san is not serving the IRG as of now, sadly.

Shutting my sight for a moment, I again entwine my fingers to quell the minute quiver in them, to prevent the desire to scour my neck once more, "… Thus, would you be willing to accept this mission?"

"If you grant me time to prepare properly, it would be my pleasure. However, you have yet to disclose the details, Yuuhi-sama," She says, eyes narrowing.

"Sigh… I shall give you the report shortly, to hear your thoughts on the situation. In any case, regarding the second-"

A strong knocking halts my words, a knocking in a rhythm I recognize as Tsuhi's way of announcing herself on the few occasions she does so. Why would she be coming to my presence herself once again? Well… Since Maya should still be here, it should be safe to allow her entrance.

"You may enter," I loudly say, so that she can hear me from the door.

Shortly after, Tsuhi enters the room by herself. As slowly as usual she approaches, taking a moment to stare, to gauge our complexions. Stopping some steps behind Raiko-san, she stands in attention.

"Yuuhi-sama, Mana has called."

"… Pardon?"

"I said Mana has called, and she says the report is urgent," She says, immutable.

"Excuse me?" Why are you mentioning that now? Tsuhi, what in the Heavens do you think you're doing? I… I had ordered-

"What is this about, if I may ask?" Understandably, Raiko-san firmly stares my way.

"Ahem… It is nothing. There are some negotiations underway with Yokohama, is all," I reply, barely managing to subdue the quiver in my neck. If Raiko-san were to learn of-

"Yuuhi-sama, I have the communicator with me," Tsuhi says, far closer than before, now standing merely a few feet from my position.

"Tsuhi, we were in the middle of dire business," Raiko-san wearily says, shaking her head, "Please, give us some moments. It shouldn't take too long, I presume."

"She speaks the truth," I affirm with a nod, "It won't be more than a few minutes. You may wait outside, Tsuhi," And cease whatever foolish attempt at a joke you're doing. I am in no mood for your taunts today, so kindly step outside.

"No, I believe you should inform Raiko-sama of this as well," She refuses, holding my gaze, "After all, going by their words, procuring a meeting might backfire as of now."

… Huh? Wait a moment, why did they tell her of the report? Did Maya have to leave for Kitanomaru instantly? No… What does she mean, a meeting might backfire? Did… something happen to-

"Yuuhi-sama, what is this about?" My guest inquired, clearly concerned as she switched her sight from me to Tsuhi.

"… It is nothing. I shall be overseeing this business myself."

Tsuhi shakes her head, brows narrowing, "I do not believe it wise, Yuuhi-sama," Still calm as a lake, she states, "By your lonesome this situation might not yield positive results."

… What?

That I'm not enough? That I'm insufficient? What is… she implying?

Fingers coil in, nails rake my palms. Inhaling slowly as I lead back, the shifting weight atop my head once more ignited the pressure on my nape. Choking a strand of hair does me no good, it cannot halt the shifting spectrum in my face as I can tell I am no frowning.

"My decision is final, 2nd Lt Yasomaga," I harshly order, Raiko-san seems puzzled and perplexed, "Take your leave, and await my call."

Yet… Instead of showing more signs of displeasure, Tsuhi smiled and began to chuckle, "Oh, is that so? Yet, considering what little Mana-sama has disclosed to this humble servant-"

"Silence! Such matters are-"

"… all this attitude of yours will achieve is to bring further harm into Takeru," She finished, both her words and my stride.

And for a moment, nothing could I hear or feel, even the intimate pressure of the crown, or the breeze coming in.

"… What do you mean?" That I'll harm… Wait, does that mean they have confirmed-

"Yuuhi-sama…" A low, hoarse voice releases me from my inner woes. Raiko-san was still as a mountain, her entire being subtly shaking, "… You wouldn't be testing my loyalty now, would you?"

"What… O-Of course I am not. I would never employ his name for such ploys."

"Then… What does this mean? Tsuhi, you did say 'Takeru', did you not? Are you saying…" Elbows compact, crash onto her sides, as if holding her breath underwater she remains stiff while glaring our way.

"Yuuhi-sama, may I?" Tsuhi asks, bowing.

"… In the first place, this is your miss. Why did you-"

"The report received so requires," She insists, now holding my gaze firmly, "As I told you before, you cannot remain idle."

"Sigh… However…" What does that mean? Why would my attitude harm him? He wouldn't…

"So, you're saying… he is…" Raiko-san again inquired, once more unable to finish.

Tsuhi again looks my way, I relent a nod as I sigh, "Raiko-sama, please remain composed. It would seem that, somehow, Takeru had survived the dropping of the G-Bombs during Operation Lucifer."

"… What?"

"I said, it would seem-"

"Not that!" Raiko-san berates her, loudly and out of breath, "How in the Heavens did… How did…"

"Ahem… The specifics can wait until later, however, around a month ago, Takeru returned to the Empire as a cadet in the UN. And after many trials and misunderstandings, Mana-sama and those in Yokohama have finally attained undeniable proof of his identity, in their own words," Taking a pause, Tsuhi smiles at the slack-jawed Raiko-san, "So, yes, for some odd miracle… Takeru is still alive, albeit with certain lakes in his memories. As of now, we are determining how to arrange his safe return."

"… As of now?" Her teeth gritting, biting her lower lip, it would seem the report had only served to ignite the hellish furnace of a wrath fierce enough to melt mountains, "You knew he was… all this time and… you said nothing for so long…"

"Cpt. Amato, please remain calm," I quickly order, "It hasn't been so long that…"

My voice drowned, unable to depart from my lips. All the apprehension, the stiff molding posture I had endowed in fear melted at once. Tsuhi herself also seemed surprised, mouth slightly open and also bereft of words.

"He's… alive? Are you being truthful?" She inquired firmly yet low, as if not daring to hope. All the while… her eyes were watering.

Not enough to release tears, not so little that one could dismiss it as a minor annoyance. Tightly holding her breath, never breaking eye contact, my nod served only to further enhance said posture as she embraced her arms, taking short breaths as she veiled her sight.

After a long moment of silence, she whispered, "Yuuhi-sama, since when… since when did you knew? Since when had he returned to the Empire?!" She demands, almost rising to her feet, embers lurking behind the dampness in her eyes.

"Peace, it hasn't been that long… Little more than a month ago."

"A month ago? Why did you wait so long to even try to confirm his safety?!"

"Sigh… I had not been made aware of this until the sorrowful incident of the CCSE. And since then… I've ordered the cadet to be observed closely, in case he were a faker."

"… And why did you not notify the Chains of this grave a matter? Had you sent us to Yokohama-"

"Cpt Amato, you know we cannot clash with the UN nor reveal Takeru's identity," I impose, she relents, "Furthermore, the risk of the man being a faker was decidedly high."

"Well… I can understand your apprehension," Caressing her hair, it does little to douse her mood, "So then, if he took part in that CCSE, was he placed alongside Meiya-sama? Does that mean Takeru-uesama is… stationed in Yokohama base?" A frown raises in concern, in disgust, "How is he as of now?" Raiko-san quickly inquires, edging closer, "Has he been treated fairly? What was of him during the CCSE?""

"Yes, he has remained in good spirits for the time being. Mana did notify me he had some altercations from time to time with certain people, but he has adapted well enough. As of now he's under a punishment due to what occurred during the CCSE, however. All points to… the cadet arriving on the twenty second of October to Yokohama."

"I see… So Takeru-uesama was who defended Meiya-sama from the chasers…" Nodding in realization, she relaxes for a moment. Yet, sharply opening her eyes, a finger tapping one of her brows, she begins to groan to herself, "The twenty second… The twenty second of October…" She repeats, every one lower and lower as if a tender bell it were.

"Raiko-san? Is something the matter?"

"… No, it is nothing," She takes a deep breath, folding her arms, "I was trying to… cross reference some odd occurrences with that date is all. So… Ahem, would you now possess veritable proof of this man's identity, Yuuhi-sama?"

"That is what this report should grant us," I nod, the confirmation sending a small jolt down my back, "Tsuhi, this proof you spoke of… Are Mana and Daizaburou-san absolutely certain of his identity then?"

She nods, "Indeed. The words he said during the meeting they held seemed plentiful. However, there are other concerns they raised."

"Uh, Yuuhi-sama? Could you perhaps enlighten me on the overall situation? Why was a meeting requested? And what of that fox? Does she know who Takeru-uesama is?" She inquires, again firmly staring.

"I suppose I could notify you of the situation later, if Yuuhi-sama so allows," Tsuhi diverts, and now I alone am under the dread-lock of Raiko-san's gaze.

"… Sigh. I suppose there is little to be done now. However… Raiko-san, you shan't take actions that might impair our efforts thus far. This situation is… delicate."

She narrows her eyes, obviously offended, "That was unnecessary. So… So is Takeru-uesama truly… alive?"

"It would… It would seem, yes. Even if some memories seem to be missing."

"However, how… how can you know it's truly him and not a faker?" All stoic remnants scattered, all that remained were hesitant, scarred fireflies in her eyes, a low tone in confusion.

"Well… all points to the man having possession of a Minaru Kamui," My guest recoils in shock, "Also, some of his words have… lent some credence to our doubts. Thus, Mana and Daizaburou-san would have a meeting with the man, under the guise of learning of where the blade came from and if he had any intel to mend the… well, empty data banks."

"I see… So… What will you do if you confirm your suspicions? Would you require my services to recover him from Yokohama?"

Unable to once more hunch over, I inhale sharply as I look into the wildfire within her eyes, "I know you… valued him much, yet hastiness will not work in our favor. I suppose I could… allow you to hear the report, if you give word you'll follow my directives to ensure his safe return to my side."

Immediately bowing down, she loudly and firmly speaks up, "As you command, Yuuhi-sama."

"… Even if I ask you to remain away from Yokohama?"

"I shall find ways to make myself useful to this cause without going against your wishes, milady," She affirms, all looseness, all quivers replaced by raw determination as if readying a slash, "If this is… if he truly is… alive…" Taking a moment for a deep breath, her gaze cascades down, "Then… Then, how could I do anything other than support you? Do you also not wish to see him once more, to see for yourself if this is true?"

… Also wish to see him, huh. No… I must focus, "Yes, I… I want a resolution to come soon."

"Truthfully, I cannot comprehend how have you managed to endure the uncertainty for so long," She sighs, dulling her readiness, eyelids almost closing as she runs a hand over her hair, "I… do not think I would have been able to… rein myself in had you not confirmed this… This truly is not some test, is it? Takeru-uesama truly is…" I nod, her shoulders compact once more and she clutches her chest for dear life, taking short breaths.

Gulping slowly, also finding myself short of air, I entwine my fingers, trying to raise an imposing facade, "Thus, you give word you'll abide by my orders?"

"I always have done so, milady," She asserts, "What else could I desire other than to serve you in bringing Takeru-uesama back to your side? If such concerns are what has forced your hand as of late… then, as one of the four Shinpan that watches over the fellowship, the query itself is insulting. I shall do all in my power to bring him back."

Releasing the tension, I nod her way, "… Very well then, I shall allow you to know so long as you follow my orders."

A moment to regain her poise, Raiko-san quickly nods, "However, if you may allow… Would you wish for him to remain as he was, or-"

"We shall see how he's faring as of now," I state, she once again nods, "I assume… you would wish to again serve under him, as you did during the invasion?"

"Besides him, if you so allow, milady," She counters, holding my gaze.

A moment passes and she doesn't relent, so I allow a nod to not spur any altercations now, "We shall see to it once he returns, then. However, no words goes to his other fellows unless I so order," I order, she quickly bows, "Now, Tsuhi. Is Mana-"

She bends one knee, offering me the communicator, "The connection is secure, and I took the liberty to also trigger the speaker," She informs.

A moment of complaining at her attitude later, I grasp the comms. Air squeezing its way into my lungs, slowly I bring it closer to my lips. A cold brushing against my nape, a moment of blankness, then I sigh and press the button.

"… Mana?"

"Yes, here we are, Yuuhi-sama," The static of the connection did not hide the weariness, the apprehension that had taken root in her tone, "Can you hear me well?"

"Yes. So… Tsuhi had said you had found proof of… the man's identity?"

"Yes, we did… However, well… Please remain calm, I shall detail what we learned in utmost detail," She affirms, and after coughing she thus begins to tell.

"… So he still refuses to mention who handed him the blade, huh," I sigh, coldness of dusk enveloping me.

"That is an ill omen," Raiko-san says, wincing, "For Takeru-uesama to refuse such inquiries so adamantly… it would equal he holds no trust towards them, not even giving them the benefit of the doubt," She looks down in concern, Tsuhi nods in agreement.

Mana, who had not heard them, continued her detailing, "… We believe that whoever that person was had owed Takeru-sama some form of favor, for they knew of the Minaru Kamui's royal purpose yet did not disclose it for over two years."

"That is true, it is odd the blade could make its way back to its owners hand unimpeded," I nod, tracing some hair, awaiting the intel I need to hear, "Thus, I suppose no other inquiries were forwarded regarding the blade?"

"No, we let that matter rest then," She affirms, the other two nodding to the words.

"Well enough. So, did the cadet… accept to visit the Capital at some point?"

"… No, he did not," Halting my breathing, my grasp on the comms tightened, "As a matter of fact, he was very defensive on that matter. However, this is when we acquired the proof we had been looking for, Yuuhi-sama."

"Is that so? What came of it? Did Takeru… recall anything?" Subduing the urge to press the speaker onto my ear, my heartbeats palpable on my neck, I awaited the orders.

The second it took Mana to order her words felt far longer, far tortuous than it should have, "It would seem he has recalled pieces of his earlier days, of his parents."

She then tells of how Takeru spoke of both of his parents on his own, detailing the looks of his house in Hiiragi, the position Kageyuki-san had as a Royal Guard, and even how his mother had died when he was young. Yet, the delay, the hesitation, the low tone Mana employed did not carry auspicious news.

"… Mana, what was it that went wrong? Did Kouzuki interfere somehow?"

"No, at all. The Vice Commander actually had tried to ease his temper, Yuuhi-sama," She relents voice prey to static and not because of the comms.

"His… Are you saying he grew adusted at you two?"

"Yes… It wasn't as back then, it was more subdued yet it was clear Takeru-sama was upset, pained at the situation. Kouzuki said he was still in shock after learning of his parents' passing and how they, well… lack any data in their profiles about ever having a son," She admits, low.

Oh… That's… Oh, by the Holy Emperor… What a miss…

I could have… rearranged the databases… I could have easily fixed their profiles without much issues. Obviously, Takeru would only grow more confused, all the more fearful when seeing he did not exist in his parents' profiles…

Holding my breath, I run a hand over my face, "Did… Did you manage to at least grant him some reassurance?" I lift my sight, trying to do so to my tone as well. Raiko-san had a wince engraved into her face, again tightly holding herself in check, while Tsuhi was standing still with a small frown in her face.

"We could not, I'm loath to admit," Maya dejectedly affirms, "A bad choice of words on my part caused him to flare up in anger, and since then the meeting spiraled out of control," Once again, my tongue seems to be retracting into my throat, my exhalation strong enough to reach the hand which held the comms, "H-However, he did not remain in such anger for long," Mana tries to comfort, "I also believe he might be confused, is all. Kouzuki did affirm she'd welcome our aid were we to bring some intel regarding his life. And this is, well, the core of this report," Coughing, she takes as second in silence. All three of us also shift in the pause, awaiting the words, "As it were, Takeru-sama seems to be afflicted over what became of him after Kageyuki-san's passing. He was convinced he was left alone, and that if he had been adopted it only brought him further suffering."

"… Pardon me?"

"Eh? Ah, uh, as I said, due to the confusion in his memories and the databases, how he's still registered as a 'Shirogane', Takeru-sama was very adamant in his position. Since everything points to him not being adopted and he has not yet recalled what was of him after Kageyuki-san perished, he-"

"Mana, by that point, we had already met. Are you saying Takeru does not… remember us?"

"… That is the case, milady."

Wh-What… B-But…

But you're… to me, you're an irreplaceable existence. My first and only truthful friend… my brother… and also… my trusted confidant, my right hand, the one who always stands behind me in protection… Takeru, you're…

Sheathing the emptiness, I force the inquiry outwards, "… Mana, what did you do under his queries?"

"We tried to assuage his concerns to no avail," Falling ashes would make noise enough to drown her voice, perhaps even be more bright than her expression as of now, "It would seem Takeru-sama is conflicted on that matter the most, on what was of him after his father's death. Kouzuki herself rose many fair reservations about him coming to the Capital, due to the… possibility of someone raising claims of identity theft."

"What? Who on Earth would even… No, a moment…" Someone who would wish to remove Takeru from that base… If not someone who held a grudge for who he was before his 'death', who Kouzuki could not know about, then it is someone who harbors ill will for his recent exploits. Someone who Kouzuki would be aware of…

Takeru did aid Meiya's squad so that they could pass the CCSE. And he thwarted the attempts of those chasers to harm them. So if anyone could wish him harm…

Looking up, Raiko-san had once more endowed a draconian glare, nodding my way as we made eye contact. So she suspects the same, someone from the UN's HC or one who influences them wishes to have Takeru gone. Someone who would rather keep Meiya and her squadmates sealed as cadets.

"I suppose… this would mean Kouzuki is looking after Takeru?" I ask, barely able to raise my voice, to rein in the embers.

"Yes, all points to that being the case," She quickly affirms, "However, she did gave us her agreement to delve into Takeru-sama's affairs on our own accord by granting her intel first. If we could bestow some clarity to the situation, perhaps that could aid his recovery?"

"I disagree," Raiko-san says, "I suggest we remove him from Yokohama post haste, it is too dangerous to leave him in that base."

"Excuse me?" Mana asks, puzzled, "Was that… Your Highness, forgive the inquiry, but-"

"Yes, Raiko-san is currently in my presence. I shall inform you of why later. So…" Gulping hard, I cannot rein it in any longer, "Mana, why did you not disclose what you knew of Kageyuki-san back then?"

"Huh? Well, I did not knew if you would favor-"

"You had confirmation of his identity, to inform Takeru that your inquiry was fueled by how you were a fellow to his father would have eased his confusion, I'm certain."

"Your Highness, I do not believe that would have been the case."

"… And why not?" Unable to not frown, I demand.

"Well… Takeru-sama had said himself how he did not trust in the nobility, even using the same words he… said when angered during his time as a shadow," She says, it brings me pause, another cold feeling on my back, "Also, I believe he might have suspected me of being lying without proof. However, when we offered to present Kageyuki-san's folder, Takeru-sama himself refused the offer, saying-

"What do you mean, he refused?!" Hitting the wooden floor, I can feel my hands shaking, something within tearing, opening an old wound.

Quietly, almost whispering, Mana proceeds to detail that moment of the talk, how they circled around queries, how he remained in denial. Yet, the words she notifies, the words he chose to use…

It truly is… It truly was him… So, he truly was alive all this time? It was no faker… Indeed, to detail his home with such precision, to make such gestures…

Takeru was… No… Takeru is alive…

The oppression I've been feeling melts away, opening the doors to a dance of emotions. That which I held within breaks loose, my vision grows distorted, tears fall slowly. My heartbeats clang faster and faster against my throat, trying to blast, to burst away from me as I hold my mouth tightly in a futile gesture, for I cannot stop weeping.

Like a lone leaf being swept around by the winds, I let myself wander to those days, those so distant nights, the days before the war came to our land. When he was still here, laughing by my side. When he did an utmost effort to adapt, to meet the required expectations of our ways of life. When he always was my tailwind, a smile ready to bring me back to my good spirits.

… It has been two years. No, a little more than that. Since we met battle for the very first time he had never smiled as he used to, he never gave me that delight of hearing his laughter once more.

A hollowness spawns on my chest, as I torment myself with the echoes our times together, both good and bad. Forcing me to remember when I wasn't enough, when he pushed me away. It tugs at my heart, it burns my insides. A gash so deep that no amount of time could heal, relieving his pain, remembering how powerless I was to console him.

For not all my memories with him are pleasant ones. How I was hurt by him here, in this same place. How he broke his vow, and left me all alone. How I failed him, when his heart was crumbling.

It all brings me pause, and makes me shiver inside. Because if this isn't a clone, a spy… if this is truly Takeru…

… It means I cannot remain idle, regardless of why he did not return to me after Lucifer. If he once again falls into anger… I cannot leave him alone, yet pushing him to return to the Capital will only worsen his disposition…

"Yuuhi-sama," Raiko-san calls, I look at her, "You must begin to take measures to bring Takeru-uesama back home."

"… No, not now. Pressuring him will do us no good, furthermore we need to delve into who might wish him harm."

"What are you saying?! Are you planning to leave him in the clutches of the UN, then?" She repines, eyes narrowed.

I don't know if she meant it, yet, the insinuation that I would abandon him again… is enough to break the bindings of my ire, thus I frown her way in honesty, "I am doing nothing of the sort, I'm merely being cautious. Also, there is a mock battle arranged for tomorrow. Mana and the rest can try to spur his memories back during it, and we need ample time to decide what intel we present to the UN. We cannot risk his identity being revealed," I remind as my gaze towers over her.

Yet, she frowns back, "You should be aware of how much Takeru-uesama despised the UN Farces and that vixen fox of a Vice Commander. Not only for his own mental health but for our relations with the UN as well, as much as I dislike the organization, we cannot risk him having an outburst!"

"He seems calm for the moment, we have enough time. Haste makes waste, and his safety is on the line. The safety of Takeru Koubuin, let me remind you."

However, instead of the wrathful counter I expected, Raiko-san breathed in deeply, rubbing her forehead as she winced, duress breaking her composure.

"Yuuhi-sama?" Tsuhi interrupts, "I believe Raiko-sama is raising fair concerns. Surely you recall the pattern that follows whenever Takeru grew distressed?"

"… The pattern?"

"Yes," She nods, composed as always, voice clear and undaunted, "First he vents loudly, expressing his concerns openly to those who he trusts. Then, he grows distant, silent," The words again brought back those days, and I could do little but mimic Raiko-san's expression. Tsuhi did not relent, calmly continuing, "When the pressure is too much, he begins to weep yet then will try to convince himself to keep pushing forward. And when he can't take it anymore-

"Enough, Tsuhi!" Raiko-san yelled before I could, hitting the floor as well, "It's enough… You've made yourself heard. Mana, was he truly so distressed?" She asks, eyes cemented onto the wood.

"No, I do not think so," She quietly replies, "He was antagonistic yet not particularly aggressive, save for moments at a time. And while Takeru-sama was pained, I believe Kouzuki is handling the situation tactfully for the moment," A small pause, her tone grows firm through the static, "Even if it means she does find him useful, for whatever reason. However, Yuuhi-sama, I find myself agreeing with Raiko-sama's words. I know it might take time, but precisely because of that we should begin to take cards in the matter."

"Is that so? Do you think you could platicate with… with Takeru during the mock battle?"

Thus, all that stoicism crumbles into a quiver, "I do not know… He did not even return the 'See you later' I gave when he left the meeting…"

"I… see… Then…" Inhaling sharply, my voice flows from my stomach, from my deepest wishes once more, "Remain in standby, and be careful when trying to contact Takeru during the battle. I shall use my available free time to devise a fitting report for the Vice Commander and him, so do stay on your guard and keep him under watch."

"Yes, Your Highness!"

"Raiko-san… I suppose I count with your support?"

Smirking, she nods, "I'd be elated to be of use, milady. What did you wish to have me do?"

"Sigh… First, let's give you all the details. Mana, are you available at the moment?"

"Yes, I have been freed of my duties. Daizaburou-sama, Mion and Shion are currently overseeing both the preparations for the training battle and watching over Meiya-sama's activities."

"I see. Then…" I guess… I can be selfish, just this time. Even if this won't go unnoticed… "I suppose we should discuss how to progress. Raiko-san, I'll have you contact Hikami-san when you take to the field, to ensure no one of… our old enemies take notice of Takeru's presence in Yokohama," She quickly nods, "Tsuhi, gather the profiles and prepare a room for us. Also, make sure Fujikagi remains entertained until we're done," Slowly bowing, she then departs, "Sigh… So, Mana?"

"Yes?"

"… Are you… certain Takeru has not recalled anything about us?"

"… The only thing he did was that line of anger, how he would 'crush the fangs' of anyone who would stand in his way," She says, understandably dejected. Looking at her, Raiko-san folded her arms as her expression seemed to cloud over, still as a pillar.

"Is that so… Well… It is not yet too late. I'm certain that, with due care, Takeru will regain some memories of us. And… at the very least, we must clarify his circumstances now that we've ascertained he truly is him. Stay at the ready, I shall call you in a few moments," Saying my parting words to Mana, I try to stand up.

My ankles feeling sore and numb, the wood feeling as if sand it were, I almost fall on my face as I hurried. Hastily lending me her shoulder, Raiko-san aids me to my feet. Thanking her gesture, once I felt my feet had regained their senses, the numbness and coldness receding, I walk towards the doors with my guest following behind. Yet, as I grasped the cold steel of the large knobs, I hesitated.

"… Raiko-san?"

"Yes, Yuuhi-sama?"

"What would you suggest we do… were Takeru start to show hints he's returning to be that… cold shadow he used to be?"

…

"I do not think such a thing worthy of your worry."

"… Why do you think so?" Because you prefer him in that way? Because he'd… ask for the Swordbreaker to be reinstated? Staring at her, instead of a cold expression or a mocking smirk…

I found a small, almost tender smile, "Because you should know better than anyone that he wasn't truly as cold as he seemed to be. After all… Takeru-uesama still chose to return to you on his own volition back then, and he was who chose the path of the shadows to remain by you. If that same overworrying and protective feelings still reside in him… then, it's all a matter of piercing through his thick and dense skin until he listens."

"Hehe… Ahaha… That much is true… However," A hand traces my neck, softly pressuring it, "What if he were to grow upset?"

"Hmm… If he's alone, then we should make haste. However, so long as he has someone he cares about, I doubt he'd lose himself. He did not do so during the invasion, I sincerely doubt he'd face something as soul-draining as those days now," She nods, then sighs.

"Well, I do agree with that. However, there is the risk of him isolating himself as well. I…" I wonder if I'll make it on time. I still don't know why Kouzuki wishes to keep him in Yokohama as well, nor who might wish to bring harm to him, or how he'll react to what we present to him, or… if he'll relieve all that happened during the invasion…

"Please, Yuuhi-sama," She pats my shoulder, a prideful and certain smile in her shining as noon, "Worry not. Regardless of our differing opinions on how fast should we proceed, there is no doubt that for the moment we have a period of grace to act. Let us focus on what we can do from now on, milady."

"I suppose… However, you're being far more accommodating than I thought you'd be, Raiko-san," I admit, staring into her eyes.

Yet, she purses her lips as she again folds her arms, "I have always been loyal to you and Takeru-uesama. The Amato House has remained at your service all this time."

"Then, what compelled your obstinacy until today?"

"… Blame those you've chosen as your retainers for said arguments."

"Sigh…" For how much you argue, you and Maya are truly similar to one another, "Very well… Let us make haste then. But… what did you mean by 'period of grace'?"

"Oh, it's simple," She again smiles, "So long as he has someone he can confide in, I believe Takeru-uesama shall remain in good spirits even if he could grow dejected at the situation."

"However… I have not heard good tales of his situation in the base," And you shouldn't have either, "Who are you referring to?"

"Isn't it obvious?"

"… No, it isn't," I narrow my eyes at her, "Who are you speaking about?"

"Meiya-sama, of course."

Chapter 60: Lurking Threats

---

November 13th, 2001. 05:24 AM.

(A small settlement near Komoro Base.)

[Akira Isumi]

---

"Saber 9, reporting in. We found no leads here, sir," I report to the Captain as I boarded my Gekishin.

A small icon, the common channel's notification, pops in the corner of my vision as his cheery voice reaches me, "Saber 1, copy that. Nine, Ten, move to the next settlement to the west, it's one of the last," As he says so, a beeping icon appears in my radar, "If you find anything, report in immediately."

"Yes, Captain!" I say, my partner also doing so immediately. Leaning back onto the seat, I close the comms and let out a sigh, lightly hitting the armrests.

Who does he think I am? I'm a commissioned Surface Pilot! I'm not a cadet anymore. It's true that this is one of my first sorties, but still… It makes me so mad to be treated like a kid, even after getting commissioned and surpassing the Eight Minutes of Death.

"Nine, should we be going?" Ten calls out, her dull and uninterested face zooming into view.

"Yeah, let's get on to it," Tapping the buttons, readying the boosters, we take off shortly after.

Sigh… Neither of us is at full focus, being so early. When we got an emergency scramble, I was about to shit myself thinking another BETA herd had broke through Niigata, but instead they sent us to scout the sticks.

What's up with this mission too? Why were we asked to search this area? There's no one living here, I'm sure the alarm must have malfunctioned or something. After all… How could anyone endure living for so long being cut off from society? I guess… it is for the best that we aren't finding anyone. If we do, we'd be obliged to take them with us, but if someone is staying behind in these conditions… To send all of us, an entire squadron, so early in search of the source of this rescue signal… I wonder if this was done with the intent of apprehending anyone who remained in their towns. Maybe this was a request of the UN? Ugh, this is the worst!

Tightly holding my controls, feeling the emptiness of a non-existent breakfast beginning to stir inside, I enter one long boost to shave the distance from our last location, the remnants of some sort of rural town. I can't wait to go back to Komoro Base and get a nice breakfast and a shower.

And anyway, this is the citizens' fault. If they had decent equipment we could have pinpointed their location instantly. Or better yet, they could have followed the Shogun's orders and retreated to a shelter.

"Yet, as soon as we appear, I'm sure we'll get shouts and insults…" It's not like I don't understand their feelings… But really, they're being a burden on our shoulders. Everyone else accepted the order to leave their homes… Do we really have the back to endure this selfishness? If a BETA herd ever breaks through this area, they'll be defenseless… There's no way they'll be able to defend themselves…

"Nine, where do we land?" Ten asks, slow and low, almost drowsy. How does she finds the constant rocking of the cockpit pleasant, I will never know.

"… Hmm. Let's descend some space away from the town. I don't want anyone taking the TSFs as a threat or anything."

"Oh, yeah. Good call, let's do that," She nods, eyes opening wide, brows stretching as the focus returns to her.

We overcome one last elevation, closing in the place as the small buildings appear in the view. The rows of trees spared from the BETA, the grassy patches along the mountain roads, a scenery that's all too precious after the invasion.

I heard during the briefing that Hidekatsu Saionji-sama, may His Highness rest in peace, cast a royal decree to have the peasantry retreat towards the east after Kyoto fell. However, many were the ones who refused and remained behind in their hometowns and villages, even after all connection to the rest of the Empire was lost during the invasion.

… I can't even begin to imagine how people kept living in such places in the middle of the invasion. Without supply lines for food and water… with the risk of BETA appearing all of a sudden…

"No… Get it together," Inhaling sharply then sighing heavily, I lick my lips as I gyrate the jump units to soften the coming landing.

Both Gekishins slowly approach the ground, to avoid doing more surfacing, to save us the lecture from the mechanics, and preemptively knee side by side. Opening the cockpit, squinting my eyes as a cold gust hits me right in the face, I trigger the pulley and go down, seeing Ten do the same by my side.

The wind again blows, greeting our arrival. The creaking, shaking branches of the trees ricochet off each other, a few leaves flying off. Brr… I should have put the helmet on, winter is almost here again. But… letting my face be seen might work in my favor if I find anyone. Sigh… I am so staying under the shower for a long while after we return.

Despite how they should have heard us landing here, no one comes out of their houses to see what the noise was about. As we approach the small town, I can see no windows were opened either. Dawn is still far away so it's still rather dark here, I turn my flashlight on as I move, Ten imitating me as she follows close by.

Cracked glass on the windows, tape desperately holding the cold air at bay. Paint fading away, the bare gray underneath exposed at places. Splintered wood, on the roofs, on the frames, had stronger colors, humid colors spreading in places where water fell regularly. As were the small marks of rust on the few doors of the newest-looking houses, small carvings littering the concrete around beaten road of dirt, the cover of dusk and the gust rustling the trees made the silence a bit unnerving.

"This is the IJA's 138th Squadron Saber, we are here to answer to a rescue alarm. Please come out of your homes," I speak to the wind as I approached the first houses.

Yet, silence.

Ten repeats the call as she gets by my side, we wait some more moments to see if anyone arrives but… Still, nothing.

"This place looks deserted, there is no sign of anyone being here, either," Ten says with a sigh, one eye closed, "Let's notify the Captain of it and go back."

"Well, that might be… Wait, what's…" My eyes wander to a pole to my left. There were some clothes hanging from it, "Hey, look. There's some clothes over there."

"Huh? Oh, you're right… You think they left them there all those years ago"? She asks, tilting her head.

"No… Look well, they don't look that old," Stepping towards that house, the clothing swayed by the breeze didn't look old or tarnished by the weather, "That means someone must have placed them here not so long ago, right?" Making a small fist, hitting the hair softly, I look back at Ten with a smile.

Who yawns wildly, her throat visible for a second, before shivering, rolling her shoulders up and down, and then getting her business face back on, "Finally found them, huh. Let's get this over with," She nods my way and we approach the house in question.

Knocking on the wooden door three times strongly, I repeat the call we're instructed to do. But, again, no answer.

After knocking and shouting some more, I simply opt to open the door. However, there is no one inside. The living room was made a mess, what little light filtered through the cracked windows painted the place in utter chaos. A kettle was on the floor along some books, even a chair was flat on its side.

"What the hell?" Ten whispers, peering behind me into the place, "Hey, shouldn't we, uh, contact the Captain, just in case?"

"Y-Yeah… Maybe, can you look into the house as I contact him?" She nods, entering the small rural house, repeating the call, as I tapped my chin mike's controls, establishing the connection, "Saber 9 to Saber 1. Captain, do you copy?"

"Saber 1, receiving you loud and clear. What is it?"

"Captain, we found some clothes hanging from a pole, they looked to have been put there recently. However, the house they were near is made a mess and there are no signs of people nearby. We will check further into the town, can someone come along just in case?"

I hear him snickering, "What is it? You scared, pup? It's the normal stuff, the winds do that sometimes. Windows open all of a sudden and send everything flying, it happens. There's also many abandoned houses, less than twenty people might be living in the place. Check everything thoroughly instead of freaking out, and call me back when you find someone. Saber 1, out."

Aargghhh! I hate him, why does he have to be like this all the time? What if this is something serious?! Hands shaking, I take a swing at empty air.

And almost hit Ten in the face as she came out of the house, "Uwah! Hey, what are you doing?!"

"Uh, sorry. It's just…" I tell her what the Captain told me, sighing at the end, "So we're on our own."

"Siiigh… Still, there's no one in this house. You'd think people would wake up after hearing a pair of TSFs land just a few meters away from here. But no one came to check us out, and… I don't hear anything either," Her flashlight's reveals a trail into the rest of the town, the faintly marked road in the ground with some grass on the side.

Yet, as she says, that's the sole illumination we have. The houses are pitch-dark inside and it's dead silent, too.

Ruffling my short hair for a second, I also aim my flashlight forward, "… Anyways, standing here won't get us anything. Let's check the rest of the town."

"Wanna split up to cover more terrain? Or, we stick together for safety?"

"I don't think there's any risks, we have our machineguns with us after all," Pointing a thumb to our Gekishins, she nods back. Going back to them and grabbing our guns, we then decide to check different ends of the place, "Leave your comms open just in case, alright?" Ten gives me a thumbs up with her back still turned to me, slowly going her way. Alright, time to get this done.

Checking on the other houses nearby first, all of them are in the same state of disarray. As if the people ran away in a hurry, tumbling stuff down as they made their escape. Maybe I'm overreacting since this is just my third sortie, but there is no way this is normal. Right?

As I walk towards the center of the town while surveying the area to the two of our landing position, Ten no longer in sight, there are more and more signs of nothingness around. No one answers my calls, only my steps echo along the breeze, the blanket of thick shadows giving away as the sun delays its wake. Yet, the more I walk into the heart of this place… the more I see houses that are almost falling down. Their walls have these giant holes on them, doors crushed and tumbled down. Weird thing is, as I point my flashlight at the buildings, the stuff inside doesn't seem that old. It's doesn't look like this place was abandoned for that long. Look, there's even some food on that table over there, and it isn't spoilt. And there's… there's barely no dust, either.

Tapping my chin again, I call out, "Ten, do you hear me?"

"… Saber Ten, do you copy?"

I gulp, waiting for her reply as the wind blows and tickles the back of my head.

Yet, silence.

Allowing a moment of wait, all that comes back is the wind again, the distant clashing of a tree's branches as my lips begin to quiver.

"Ten, you better answer me! If you're pulling my leg, I swear I'm-"

"Pipe down, now," She complains, sighing, "Hearing you loud and clear, I was just checking out some stuff."

"Oh, did you find damaged buildings, too?"

"… Yeah," Low, she admits, "Can't believe the damage, actually. You think… someone raided the town?"

"Can't leave any option out, but… Who would do this kind of thing? And, why?" Why attack defenseless people? What's to gain from such a thing?

Still slow but sharpening, she replies, "No idea, I'll keep checking stuff on this side of town. If you find anything, call me."

"Yeah, likewise. And at least answer when I call out, okay?"

"Yes, sorry. It's just…"

"What?"

"Nothing, all this silence is unnerving me. It feels as if a monster or something is gonna come out from the shadows, my neck's all stiff and itchy the more I walk in. I have this feeling that, if I turn around, there's gonna be something staring at me there, within the dark," She admits, before sighing.

Gulping, my neck also shivering at the words, hair standing in attention, couldn't help but to stop breathing. Really, always with the horror stuff. Why did I have to end up paired with you?

"Well, let's remain focused, okay?" I say, walking again.

"Yeah, yeah. Don't worry, I won't get my head chomped off by the shadows," She chuckles back at my groans.

"Thanks Ten, I did not need that mental image. Anyways, stay alert," She agrees, ending the connection for the moment.

As I got closer to the center, more and more houses were damaged badly. The holes in the walls, the gaping holes where the windows should have been, the shards of scattered glass with tape still stubbornly stuck to some, the wreckage of furniture inside the buildings didn't change.

Also, some weird marks are on the ground. Crouching, running a finger over them, can't exactly recognize them. What is this? Did a vehicle do this? No, not only these roads are too unstable for such small wheels but the soil… it's too hard for a car to leave such deeps marks. Unless it rained some time ago? But then, the marks shouldn't be engraved this well if they aren't recent.

"Anyways… They might be from some machine, I'm sure. Maybe someone else answered the rescue call before we got here?" Ugh, that better not be the case! This is one of the few times I get to prove my worth in the IJA.

Still, no one answers my calls. The town seems deserted and desolate, the only thing that's clear is that something happened here. The belongings inside the houses would indicate it wasn't that long from the incident, yet… I haven't found anyone yet. Ten also hasn't, she'd have contacted me if she had. Slowing down, observing the place well, and taking a moment to stare back as the silence was too much, I eventually reached the central square. A small patch of flowers with a few old wooden benches, which were left unharmed.

"At least the flowers are safe… But that being said, what's that smell?" The more I move, the more I sense this weird smell in the air. It's not that strong, but it definitely isn't nice. It dries my mouth, forces me to lick over the back of my teeth, "Hello? Is anybody here?"

The wind answers me, rumbling through the seemingly abandoned rural town. All this silence is making me more nervous than I should be, only the sound of my footsteps decorates this darkened scenery where the sun does not yet reach, where only my flashlight reveals what's in the buildings. My pace slows down and I start to take glances all around me, thanks to Ten's stupid words. Back before the BETA came, hearing animals was such a normal thing I didn't give a second thought to. But now I often find myself trying to remember how it was to hear birds chirping on the mornings or bugs buzzing during summer. It's not like they're all gone, but there's very few of them in the mainland. And that background noise… it's all gone now from this place, like around the base. It's all… so empty…

Continuing to check the houses nearby, peeking through their windows, I keep finding nothing. As I stride through a road, the wind blows strongly. Shielding my face with an arm, I stop walking for a moment.

Yet, a jolt runs down my back.

A sudden noise, right behind me. Far too close.

In the corner of my vision, obstructed by my arm, a shadow seemed to move, to circle to my back.

Inhaling sharply, turning around into a combat pose, trigger finder at the ready, all I see is a door creaking, swayed by the winds.

"Sigh… Just the wind, huh. Well, let's check this place next, I guess."

I close in slowly, gulping for a moment, a shiver down my back. Shaking my head, hearing no other sounds, I repeat my call in case there was a civilian hiding inside the place. Yet, as usual, silence answers me. Peeking through the small opening the door gave, I see the common sight thus far. A table upside down, some broken cups on the floor, the chairs lying on their backs and… Hey, there's someone in there!

The inside of the house is very dark, since its wooden windows weren't open, so I couldn't see it well, but that right there is a person, no doubt! But why are they sleeping on the floor?

"Hey, are you alright? I'm a soldier from the IJA and-"

All it took was me taking a single step inside the house. That was all it took, for all air to leave me, for my heartbeats to stop cold. For an acidic fire to start tearing me from within.

It was dark. So I didn't notice.

I was so happy to have found someone. So I didn't notice.

I wanted some answers so badly. So I didn't notice.

But when I entered, opening the door widely, showering the dim light of my flashlight into the house, I saw it. And along the realization, my senses sprung into action. A stench assaulted, an acidic pain twisted my insides, a sharp whistle obstructed any and all other sounds, my vision slowly became hazy and unfocused as my knees threatened to buckle. But I couldn't look away.

A deep red carpet was etched onto the floor. Blood… It wasn't dry, it's still rather liquid. And my eyes follow along the pool of blood, the red carpet…

… and there I find the figure I had seen, the torn remains of someone.

A few tiny little cables were strewn all over near my feat, except they're not cables or stretched plastic… They're fingers.

Something distinctly pink… something was protruding from the upper body where the head should have been, yet the skin was peeled off forcefully near where the neck was supposed to be, sunk in at some points.

A mess of blood and torn flesh coming from a hole in the abdomen, slivers of entrails dangling from it. The lower part of the legs and the forearms were missing, cut off unnaturally as if a Destroyer had rammed into a freight train.

And the sound… the calm buzzing sound of flies filled the entire place… as much as my eyes were filled with the swarm, bursting as if someone had thrown a mint candy into soda, that covered the body. The sea of convulsing worms all over the… the…

"Ugh… Kh-Khgh…" All it took was a second, and I began hiccuping, my throat burning as bile rose from inside.

Holding my mouth tightly, the hiccuping doesn't stop. Hacking and coughing, accidentally swallowing back something which burned my throat, I stumble away from the place. Saliva and acids cover the ground as I stop fighting the impulse. A cold sweat covers me despite the suit beginning to vibrate, to calibrate itself to my body again.

But the hiccups don't stop, and I can't calm my breath, and the smell chases me outside. The putrid stench, a few flies leaving the room, the image of the worms, the tiny fingers in the floor drenched in blood, the guts torn away from the body, it all etched itself into my mind.

And coughing and hacking, out of air and suffocating, more and more bile I puke, hunched over in the ground on all fours.

" Cough… Cough… wheeze… Oh, by the Holy… W-Wha… What the hell… Cough… Ugh…" Taking a deep breath, crawling away from the house, I try to regain my breathing.

Hearing something, glancing around, aiming my gun all around me, it was the wind again. But now, the smallest creak, the tiniest hint at anything is enough to make me want to fire. I have… I have to…

"S-Saber 9 to Saber 1!"

"Hey, Nine. What's-"

"Captain! Answer me!" Bashing the chin's trigger, hands shaking, I scream as I get back on my feet.

A bit of static later, I hear a sigh, "What's up, Nine? Need someone to-"

"I-I found a corpse, sir! Or maybe it's two, I dunno. There's some torn limbs a-and… Urk… Ugh… Cough… " I try to close my throat, but something still made its way out and splashed my leg. A foul taste filling my mouth, my knees giving up on me, I end up crashing onto a wooden door, losing grasp of my gun.

"Saber 9! Are you alright?!" He asks, alert and on edge.

"Y-Yes, sir. I'm fine," My knees are shaking, can't get up, and I have trouble breathing. Oh, what the hell is going here?!

"We'll be going to your position shortly, stay put and wait for me. Or better yet, return to your Gekishin. But do so slowly and in silence."

"Y-Yes, sir," Then, he cuts his connection.

But another worried voice soon follows, "Nine, do you copy?"

"… Yes, I… hear you…"

"Where are you as of now? I'm hurrying over to you side."

"Uh… I was… near the central park, with the flower…" Sitting on the floor, I lean on a wall as I start taking some breaths.

"Alright, I'll be there in a sec. Stay alert, okay?" She firmly says, then cuts the connection.

Breathing in deeply, rubbing my forehead, my senses calm down gradually. Once I think I can stand, I start moving away to at least remain standing, to pick up my sole weapon. Because… someone, or something, might be lurking nearby. Ugh, I'm so pathetic. My knees are shaking… I'm sure Marika-chan and Michiru-chan could keep their act together in a situation like this.

As I move away from that house, I notice something in the walls of a nearby building. Bullet marks. Someone fought here, and that caused that… But who could have done such a thing?

The silence eats at me, and I can only gaze upwards, praying for the Captain to come while tightly holding my gun, shivering in place, looking from time to time at my surroundings.

Yet, silence.

I have fought against the BETA, I have heard what they do to us when we lose. But… But this kind of thing? To… To… I can't even finish the thought, the same awful taste filling my mouth, again showered onto the ground and my feet.

Leaning against a wall, enduring the silence, I begin to take short breaths. What kind of monster would do this to our fellows?

Breathing heavily, my legs give up on me. Sitting on the ground, dropping my gun, I run a hand over my face, cleaning my lips. As I did, feeling a bit dizzy, I heard a small noise. Distant but constant, and growing closer. Looking up, I saw a silhouette approaching me within the ruins.

"Hey, Nine!" My partner shouts, hurrying her pace as she seems me, "Hey, feeling well?"

"… No. Did you… find anything?"

One eye closed, she shakes her head, "Broken buildings, is all. If I didn't hear wrong…" Her tone lowers, "You say there's a corpse?"

I nod, a quivering hand pointing to the place. Ten gulped loudly enough I could hear it, the hand holding her gun shaking. Before she could move, the rumbling of jet engines reached our ears, the trail of Gekishins in the skies. Soon after, the Captain and another one of my partners came along.

"Nine, Ten, are you both uninjured?" He asks as he comes closer, scanning each of us from top to bottom.

"Y-Yes, sir. Nothing happened while I waited," I try to stand in attention, and fail at it, as I spoke. Ten informed she didn't find anything, and that she hurried to come to me after my report.

The Captain sighs, then nods back to a dead serious expression, "I see. Where is the…" I point to the house, I couldn't move very far away as if I were chained here. Nodding, he goes towards the half open door slowly, his partner following close as Ten did. I couldn't move an inch, afraid of having another puking attack, "Let's see, what is… W-What the fuck…" The Captain couldn't keep his shock and disgust at the abominable sight, forcefully taking a step back. His partner looked away hastily, covering his mouth and nose with a hand.

"Holy shit… What the hell happened here?" Ten couldn't hide her repulsion either, slowly walking away into a broken building to spit something out.

"You three, on me," One commands, taking a deep breath, "We'll investigate this town thoroughly. The rest are already on the way. Let's go."

Amidst the silent streets, we follow the Captain closely. On the northern part of the town we found more pools of blood, more corpses and torn bodies. Ten ended up finding one herself by accident, and we had to stop as she also had a puking fit. The rest of our squadmates are now securing the area on their TSFs on the Captain's orders, so us four have to traverse the territory and investigate… whatever the hell happened here.

"Who did this? Why would anyone…" Rubbing Ten's shoulders as she seems to regain her composure, I blankly stare at the surrounding ruins.

"This is too fucked up…" She whispers, subduing the coughing, "Who the hell would tear up people like this?"

"Come on, you two. Up and strong," Two ordered, despite the quiver in his own voice, the shaking in his knees, "Whoever did this must have left clues. So come on, we have work to do. Leave the questions for later, okay?" Offering Ten a hand, he lends her a shoulder until she regains her balance. Giving her a good pat on the shoulder, and a nod my way, we again walk towards the Captain, "Sir, we're ready to resume our… Captain?"

One was standing still, not even looking our way. And in an almost inaudible voice, he whispers, "All of you, stay calm and listen to me. This wasn't done by other humans. Look there, under those boulders. Can you see it?" The Captain points to his left, where some houses had collapsed.

The rubble was like the one in the rest of the town, arching entrances collapsing over tumbled walls. But under the remains, a small pool of blood could be seen…

… But the blood… wasn't red… and the flesh… was a pale, clear white…

"… Eh? Why is… N-No!" The remains of a Warrior-Class BETA could be seen under the rubble, despite part of it being under some rocks.

"Seems like the town was attacked by the BETA during the night, and that's when they sent the rescue signal. If they had sent someone immediately…" The Captain punches a nearby pillar, grimacing.

"The BETA?" Ten barely manages to say, eyes widening as she shakes, "But this isn't… We're so far from the First Defense Line, there are no Hives nearby!"

"That's right, Captain! This… This must be…" A mistake? A lie? Then, what's that I'm seeing? If that isn't a Warrior-Class then, what the fuck is it?! But… But there's no hives near, and this is too far away from Sadogashima to have been invaded…

"Saber Nine, Saber Ten, calm down!" Two yells, standing stiff as his own voice seemed about to come as undone as the ruins of the town, "If there are BETA nearby, we cannot lose focus."

"… What do you mean, if they're nearby?" You're telling me there's more of those fuckers close by?

"Isumi, Aihara," Voice lowering into his usual, One gives us both a good, firm look, "Let me tell you something, part of the BETA that surfaced during the Niigata Invasion broke from their formation. We lost sight of them for a time, and later they regrouped and attacked again and almost pierced through to the Third Defense Line. It's possible that… some infantry types remained hidden within the mountains or underground and avoided detection until now."

Eh? The BETA are… within the mainland?! This has got to be a joke! There's no way… The BETA don't use tactics!

"Anyways, let's keep searching. There might be some survivors around," He orders, readying his machinegun. Two also does the same, giving us a firm stare as we hesitated.

Sharing a look with Ten, nodding to each other, I gulp and slowly ready my gun, following closely behind the Captain.

Some time later.

In the end, we found no one left alive.

We found most of the people living there dead, torn apart by the BETA. We also found a few corpses of Soldier and Warrior-Class scattered around what looked to be like a shelter. It seems the people put up a fight with what little guns they had on them. As the one who found them first I was tasked to deliver a report along the other three. And, aside from the sickening visage, I found something else to point out.

All the human corpses that we found were torn apart brutally. As in, their limbs were separated from their bodies. All of them.

However, none of the corpses had their heads, and we couldn't find a single one in the whole town. The mental image of the BETA tearing someone apart and then leaving while carrying their head… I couldn't put any food in me for the rest of the day.

This discovery was to remain as a Top Secret matter, and only me, Ten, Two and the Captain know about it. We were told the best men in the IJA would go scout the area for any possible threats, and that we also would be tasked to take part in these surveillance missions until we find more leads to find out how the BETA appeared in that settlement.

But that doesn't make me feel better. I needed answers and received nothing but cold stares and silence. Ten told me she got the same treatment as I, and the Captain told us to shut up and keep quiet about what we found. That we'd only inform the rest when we got the approval from the upper brass to join in these scouting missions.

The BETA are here in the mainland, they could be hiding anywhere in the mountains or even underground. Are they planning to build a Hive under our nose? What is the IJA and the Royal Guard gonna do about it?

A shiver colder than anything I ever felt before embraced me and refused to let go all day long, the image of the dismembered bodies kept ingraining itself in my mind. The BETA are here, they could be right about to attack. What if the next place is our base? What if when we return from one of these scouting missions the base is destroyed and everybody's remains are left headless in an ocean of blood?

Maybe it's because I'm a rookie, maybe I'm too green and this has happened in the past with the other invasions that happen every week. But my stomach is still turning and turning…

… I don't think I'll be able to sleep well for a few weeks. I don't wanna take hypnotherapy either… The drugs will only make this worse on my head…

Ugh…

December 2nd. Some minutes off 12 AM.

(Diet Building. PM's Office.)

[Kurechika]

---

"And that's why I'm sending you to check on them. While I agreed to let the Fuji Corps be the sole users of the batch of Shiranui-1C, I do not doubt there was another reason to hand them all that set of units, besides their elite status," I affirm, fingers interlocked and resting atop my desk.

"Understood. Allow me to inform you that the 87th and 88th Squads are running into problems with the maintenance of their units, sir. We may not be able to repair them for much longer," Major Kawazoe says, his voice dry as a desert.

I may need to do another deal in the dark with them. Of course, I know those models are not exactly the same, yet they're a good enough cover. Unless you look under the hood, you won't be able to see the difference. Those 'gifts' are the only life line I have in case something goes wrong and I need to field soldiers against Imperial forces, after all. I won't place my trust in Kouzuki any longer, after this 'visit' the Undersecretary paid her base without reporting of it.

Nodding towards the Major, I lean back onto my seat, "I'll try to get us some spare parts in the short term. Leave those units in the underground hangars, for when we really need them. How were their mock battles? Do they like their new units?"

Kawazoe grins, nodding with much vigor, "Nanase said that his squad is acclimating perfectly to them. Fujisawa's however is having some trouble with their newest members," He affirms.

Can't expect much from her, despite being our best Captain she isn't very good with people. Considering what she went through, it's a miracle she can even pilot.

"Not unexpected, but still bothersome. Get them priority in the sims, they should be exempt from patrol and sentry duty from now on. Also, you did uproot the spies from the base, right?" I inquire, narrowing my eyes, lowering my tone.

The Major tenses up, coughing as he places both hands behind his back while trying to maintain a sturdy facade, "Lt General Oohara said that he took care of that, but the risk is always there."

"Sigh… Fine, let's leave it at that. Anything else you want to report?"

"No, sir. However, regarding the matter of that settlement…" He tentatively asks, lowering his gaze.

"No updates whatsoever. We still haven't found anything about their whereabouts, despite having many scout teams on the move daily. There is nothing else I require of you at the moment, Major. Thanks for your services, you may leave," Nodding once to him, Kawazoe then salutes and excuses himself.

Sighing, I stand from my seat. Strolling to the coffee machine, I fill my mug. Leaving my lips caressing the rim, teasing myself with the taste and the smell, I walk over to the windows. And as I'm showered in the light, as the glimpse of the Castles lies in the distance, I slowly drink up to counter the cold sensation which engraved itself onto my skin.

BETA on the mainland, attacking isolated settlements. If this ever makes it to the public eye, the Parliament and the MDF will lose much support from the population. Our image won't endure such a scandal, and rightfully so. This is a disaster, an unpredictable one. As if we didn't already have enough trouble brewing. There is not an ounce of doubt in me that if this reaches the light, those subversive bastards will use that unrest to stir up chaos.

Returning the reflection's frown, holding it for a moment, staring into my eyes despite the strain, I finish my coffee. Sitting back, resting my mug in a corner to not drop it for the tenth time, I check up my mail, looking for that important contact. Once I find it, opening and reading the report carefully, I feel the tension on my shoulders evaporate. My back grows intimate with the seat, cuddling it softly, as I allow myself to close my eyes in introspection for a second.

It's amazing the things money can do. If this were a formal proposal, it would take months before I could attain an answer. However, send a few envelopes to the right people, and suddenly everything is green lighted in less than a week.

An entire Company, with two squads completely made out of Raptors, will be at the ready to come to my aid should I ever need it in exchange for my services in their benefit. Kouzuki still hasn't sent any reports since more than a month ago, so I consider Alt. IV to be done for. Anyone would abandon a sinking ship. And it's not like I care about what will remain behind. Honestly, I believe it for the best to purge humanity and restart in another star, away from all the clogging prejudices of this world. And it's the only way I'll be able to keep my vow.

A small twinge of pain below my ears, my eyes squint as I ponder the board and its consequenses. Disturbances calling upon a frown,

I run a hand over my face, taking off my glasses for a moment. All the negotiations, all the support I've given them… to end up being the only one shouldering the burden in public. Kouzuki will always be safe under the UN, she is in no risk of receiving harm. Her Highness is also under no risk, she's too important for this nation for anything to befall her. But me? Heh… If I had an extra hair for every death threat, every call announcing that an explosive was in my residence, both as a Prime Minister and my personal house, I would look like Mike Jolton in his prime.

In the end… Alternative IV seems doomed to fail, Yuuhi-sama has remained completely still to not upset the IRG, and both the Guard and those fools at Ichigaya have been less and less reluctant to display the reservations they possess towards my person, towards the Diet's government. So if in the end I'll be made into a scapegoat… I don't care if I'm branded a traitor to the Empire, or to humanity, but I'll do everything in my power to make Alt. V a reality, especially now that Chizuru managed to pass her CCSE. Kouzuki broke our deal, and if she gets commissioned, she'll join the A-01 STF.

Like I'll let my daughter die in vain for this rotten piece of dirt. Even if she never leaves the base, she still is in danger. I don't know what the UN would do to keep this nation in check should Alt. IV fail, as it looks like it will. Some may call me a traitor, but safeguarding this Empire is our priority. And there's no safer way to do so than with America's support. If the rumors I've heard from Ichigaya are true, there's little to be done. You can't argue with a deranged idealist who doesn't even consider the repercussions a restoration to total Imperial rule would cause. Heh, I'm the one negotiating with COSEAN and the UN under Yuuhi-sama's petition, yet I'm the "enemy" who steals the power from Her Highness and they are "the only ones" who truly understand her wishes.

"Pah… How did such a narrow-minded fool ever became the Captain of the Capital's defense regiment?" Sadly, to remove them would paint an innacurate image of me. It will lend credence to their suspicions, and soon their retribution would come after me.

And if it were only me, we could debate over our thoughts. Yet, I have a nation, a Shogun, and a daughter to safeguard. I cannot relinquish their futures to the folly of these young soldiers.

Sigh… If only that unit were still in function… Yet, Her Highness herself disbanded it, so I suppose I can expect no aid from the Imperial Guards.

Moving my neck in circles, my gaze wanders to the picture that is always to my left. Us three, visiting Osaka. Back when Chizuru still smiled, back when you were still here, Saeko. Back when I could share some words with my daughter, when Saeko had found another job as a teacher thanks to Suzumiya-san's support. Back when… we still had some hope left for this place… Sigh…

Ever since I became the Prime Minister, I've done everything in my power to get us to a brighter tomorrow. Even amidst the invasion, sleeping two to three hours a day, sometimes just not even having that luxury, then beginning to rely on that accursed white powder to keep myself afloat, I struggled with my men to keep the UN on our side. To not have them order a compulsive evacuation, another Gwangju. And during all those darkest days… Hands run deep into my hair, a sigh empties all air in me as I recall.

'We can't trust foreigners. We have to uphold our traditions, defend our land on our own. To die for our nation is the highest honor one could find. If the Emperor so decided, we shall hold our ground until our last breath'.

Like I'll let a hermit who spends his whole life within four walls, who pushes all his burdens onto the Shogun, have a say in my daughter's future. He's just another human, he isn't heavenly or anything. I've seen him, platicated for a moment, he may be smart but the Emperor is just another human. He isn't a God as many elders, and some young ones, still believe. And one without real life experience, who has been thrust into the position by fate. And to simply hear the way in which he speaks of our people… as if it were all trivial, as if it were obvious the rest of us should sacrifice everything to uphold these ideals…

… Had he given his blessing to a minimal evacuation, the situation wouldn't have escalated as it did. We could have managed the shelters that we have still available far better than today, we could have found useful allies somewhere. Of course, I understand the reluctance to have our people seek refuge in America, yet that was not our only choice. Both Brasil and Argentina were welcoming us with open arms, both having already an established community of Japanese immigrants. But more importantly, merely hearing one of the Emperor's press conferences would be a blessing for all the soldiers and peasants. Her Highness has filled that role well, yet it isn't the same.

… And yet, he remains silent. Pleasantly living in the Castle, without even hearing our reports as of late, which are answered by the Guards who watch over his residence. And Yuuhi-sama has done the same, merely limiting herself to preserve the status quo instead of daring to search for another solution. After all, they will never be held accountable for the situation of today.

Sighing, shaking my head, I stare at the ceiling. I won't allow the same disaster that happened to Kyoto with Saionji to repeat itself, that's what I said during my public vow when I assumed my position, that's what I honestly believed from the bottom of my heart. But nothing could change the nobles' minds, no amount of public buildings, no amount of protection, no amount of decent supplies was enough. To think there are idiots in the MDF and IJA that want all the power to go to the Shogun, when they're nothing more than a meat shield to the nobles. We're one of the few countries that is dividing its military force in two, and unlike the others we're at the frontlines.

Overspending to build all the models of the Type-00, forcefully keeping the amounts of Type-94 low to avoid 'an uprising', always demanding to keep their lifestyle as it once was, disregarding the amount of resources that takes. I thought Yuuhi-sama would try to reform the nobility from within, I truly had placed my last coin in her, but it seems the time I spent teaching her in the capital when she was young was a waste of time.

"Sometimes… I wonder if the bravado she exuded during the '99 was merely an illusion…"

Despite the troubles her ill mood brought me back then, I rather would spend time placating her stomping fury than to endure her deafening silence.

Well, humanity is doomed. That much is certain, if we remain employing the same approaches we've used thus far. That's why the Americans want to try to eradicate the BETA before they reach their continent. We can't rule out that another Hive Core could come from the moon, or Mars, at any time. If the Amazonas forest falls to the BETA, if the Antartida's ice is harvested by the aliens, we're done for. If America, the biggest TSF manufacturer in the world, falls to them we won't be able to keep up. If any point of the supply line that covers the Eurofront and Africa, passing through the Mediterranean Sea and all the way through Singapore, and linking back here and then to America, we will lose to the domino effect. We've been clinging to this feeble hope that is Alt. IV, but it was nothing but an illusion. And we have a certainty in our hands, the Migrant Fleet and the G-Bombs.

More than anything else, that's my motivation today. To buy a pair of seats on the fleet, for me and for the leaders of my party. And for you, Chizuru. Even if you hate me, I won't let the stupid traditions of this backwards nation take you from me. And only with ample aid will this nation rise once again, instead of having to compromise our budgets to the whims of the nobility.

Only then our orphans will again have three meals a day and a sturdy roof overhead, to once more return to a normal life that let's them resume their growth, their studies. Instead of conscripting most of them, dooming our future to a drainage of intelect.

But of course, we only need nobles in the universities. Pah…

"And for that future to come to pass… There is much work to do," My ears still hurting, unable to dispel the frown I endowed, I resumed my work.

As I shuffle through the documents on my PC, I notice a few interesting things. First, ten Type-00C were sent to Yokohama some days ago, for export purposes apparently. That is a relief, at least she'll be a bit safer with those there. And if that deal is secured, perhaps I could use my new contacts to gain a steady supply of funds, as well as intel on the Takemikazuchi.

Ikaruga also sent me a document regarding the Isumi girl that found the BETA and the corpses, she was really unstable during the interrogation and has remained like that in these weeks. He also sent me his 'most heartfelt' thanks for my support during our last deal. Heh, as if we both didn't knew we are aiming for the same prize.

I know my faction is the smallest here, so I have to be careful about my moves. I do hope Kouzuki gets her act together and starts giving us something, because I received many reports that Yoroi was seen coming and going from Yokohama to the Capital some days ago. I wonder if she's on Ikaruga's side… Maybe Her Highness is already playing according to his plans, willingly or not.

Again leaning back on my seat, I close my eyes for a moment. Pondering on our last meetings, Yuuhi-sama did seem a bit… distressed, perhaps? I suppose, she might not find any motives to openly support me any more. Well, I obtained some nice toys to defend myself with. I do have Nanase pretty much on a leash, thanks to his sister being a Cadet on a IJA base that's on my side. I also have Kawazoe and his whole Company with me, and Fujisawa doesn't really have anywhere else to go, since she's a commoner, she despises the UN and only wants to find a place to live, or die, in peace.

Entwining my fingers, feeling as if I were staring at the Yamata-no-Orochi, at all those vipers that stand in my way, I fill my stomach with air slowly. There are two large problems for my plans.

Ikaruga being the biggest one, since I doubt I can openly fight against the Royal Guards and keep the order in this country, even with the Americans' help. Well… I may need to use some… explosive methods to deal with them.

The second one, this Shirogane boy. I can't read him, who is he supposed to be? He killed part of Nanase's squad, yet received a very light punishment considering he was abroad. The UN is being very secretive about what he gave them in exchange for the lighter sentence. I don't know whether or not the Shogunate wants to give him a harsher punishment, or if he is with the Americans or not.

I doubt he's a small fry, anyone else in his position would have been executed. According to the report I received, he's obtaining very good numbers on his training course. With a prodigy like him on the squad, I don't doubt they'll get commissioned but I do not think I could send someone to harm him. And there is no data about his past, so I can't threaten him with nobody. This all goes back to Kouzuki. On whose side is she? Where are the reports?

… However, the lacking data could be used in my favor. To both rid myself of Shirogane and force Kouzuki's hand. She would never allow herself to be involved in a case of identity theft. Thus, by detaining this cadet, I can force out whatever intel he has on him, whatever Kouzuki would find him useful for, with the right drugs. Yet, if she tries to defend him, Kouzuki would need to procure more false intel. And lies are short lived, just like Alt. IV. In any case… if her project doesn't bestow us any spoils soon… I see little reason to support her when backing Alt. V would allow us to procure at least some G-Elements for ourselves, even if we have to remain as the US' vassals for some decades.

Well, I suppose this is all the time I'll get today to check up on everything by myself. I turn off the PC and grab my coat as I stand up. There are many meetings that I have to attend today, and in the following days. The press conference I asked of Her Highness being the main topic for the time being. Maybe I could have a little chat with Yuuhi-sama, to see if she's on Ikaruga's side or how she reacts to these deals she arranged with Kouzuki behind everyone's backs.

Same day, a few hours later.

(Camp Kitanomaru. Commander's Office.)

[Takatsugu Ikaruga]

---

Slowly, belatedly so, I circle a spoon within a cup. The most pleasant scent of the jasmine tea I brewed reaching me, the quietness around the office would suggest this moment to be auspicious for relaxation. Yet, my lips turn inwards in astounding astonishment.

I cannot express how upset I am with words. Well, upset is perhaps a strong word for this. Yuuhi, my dear Shogun, I cannot believe you rejected the proposal to send other mechanics to Yokohama. I thought it to be a simple matter, yet I cannot clean the sour taste in my mouth that was left after this defeat.

However, it was quite odd, this last meeting. Her Highness did seem troubled by something, despite the rather amicable atmosphere we enjoyed. It is remarkably odd for all five of us to be able to peacefully platicate for so long a time without arguing to ensue, so certain I was that you would be pleased the afternoon was a rather peaceful one. Yet, Her Highness did not relent in her stance, in any of her proposals. I was convinced you'd grace us with that lovely smile of yours at some point, yet your lips denied me of that pleasure, your gaze avoided showing its natural charms as it shone with that adusted wrath you very rarely endow

"Which would mean… a grave matter is upsetting her," I conclude, starting to drink my tea as I sit down.

For our sweet Yuuhi to be so openly upset, so confrontational, something is very wrong here. She isn't like me, her patience is one of her greatest virtues, her faith in people is deep, her love for peace is unconditional. Her Highness is not someone who would engage in such aggressive forms of negotiation, for I know she finds it truly aggravating. So, whatever caused her figure to be garbed in unnatural anger?

Resting my chin on a hand, taking a deep breath, supporting my weight on the desk I ponder on what had occured recently. I have not heard any particularly displeasing reports, truth be told. The Great General has been absent for some time, the two younger of the Tsukuyomi were also nowhere to be found according to my servants. I did hear Her Highness sent them to deliver those ten Type-00C and her own machine to the Mitsurugi girl, but why haven't they returned yet? Perhaps, is that what has distressed Yuuhi so? Something that lies in Yokohama… which isn't related to the deals since Her Highness defended them adamantly… Something that occured as of late…

… This couldn't have anything to do with that Shirogane, right? No, however, that mystery man is near the Mitsurugi girl.

Nothing appears on the databases about the supposed cadet's life. He's most definitely on the American's side, and he did kill two of my servants. Yet, the UN forgave him with a very light punishment, it seems. My scouts say the HC was in chaos at the news, yet for some reason, their more fervent desires were halted. And I had nothing to do with the alleviation of said wish. I wonder… Did you shield the cadet, Yuuhi? Was Shirogane who protected Mitsurugi, then?

Kurechika did not seem in league with the pawns sent to the CCSE, Kouzuki wouldn't want harm to befell the pigeons, and the cadet wouldn't have resorted to lethality lightly.

"Sigh… I suppose, those baseborns found themselves intoxicated by the thrill of violence," This is why we cannot trust in the peasants. The chasers should have been all Imperial Guards, then the plan wouldn't have failed.

Humming to myself, extending my legs as I glance upwards, a smile appears in me. I suppose I'm in your debt, Shirogane. Had he not shielded Mitsurugi and Kurechika's baby girl… What a mess that would have spawned, indeed. Still, your situation is quite the mystery. An unknown card in my opponents hand, a joker perhaps, a wildcard I don't know how to handle. This is why I despise card games…

Well, Shirogane is on Kouzuki's side, so in the end he's a friend of mine. And speaking of Kouzuki, I do hope I get to hear more news regarding Alt. IV in the requested meeting. After all, they're growing impatient. I'll have to let them do their mischievous act on the near future, and I really rather not ruin her project, even if I have to let them thrash the base.

"Ah, such is the recklessness of youth. However, I would need a small spark to ignite their passion," And I don't think I have time to spare, which would mean I have to use this volcanic activity in my favor.

However, I will not be able to take to the field then… Ah, such is the luck of the draw. I doubt Her Highness would allow a battle to occur in the city.

And to add insult to injury, I couldn't talk with Yuuhi in private as I was expecting. Perhaps a few cups of tea could have aided me in planting the seeds of agreement, alas she was as dry as the papers she presented, as cold as the weather is becoming. You're surprisingly hardheaded when upset, but you're lovely when displaying such firm resolve, so I can forgive the rudeness. If only she were as resolute in everything else… then, we would see eye to eye, I'm certain.

Sighing, finishing my tea, reading the reports, signing the papers that so requiered, the dull office work extended for a moment. To think we are wasting time on sending people to evacuate those mountain settlements… This is why peasants do not make fitting leaders. There is no honor to be gained from such a rescue, yet no one would impose the necessary order. And then, who are those who shoulder the responsibility of safeguarding their lives? Who are accused of abandonment by doing what must be done?

Sigh… We shouldn't have kept the Parliament running after the Battle of Kyoto. A simple decree of urgency was all it was needed to give full power to the Shogun once more. But we had to keep them safe, because of the international treaties.

Pah, we have enough capable men in the nobility to act as chancellors and ambassadors, we don't need commoners soiling our reputation. Kurechika is one of the few who actually has some sort of principles, and he also isn't afraid to be openly 'bad' to achieve his goals. Do I respect him because I see myself in him?

Considering all I've done, I can't help to sympathize with him a bit. I can't blame him for taking funds from the Restoration Project when I was the one who understaffed the final defense line and rigged our radars to ignore the infantry types. All to reignite our true soul, for the Takemikazuchi to fly in the open, for a hero to be born amidst Kyoto's ashes, so that our olden Capital's fall was not meaningless.

After all, Hidekatsu was a fool. He had to die. Sadly, he somehow survived that night. But he already had done enough damage. It's not like I completely disagree, but to create such an argument with the enemy breathing on your neck… It took Yuuhi and Kurechika almost a year of negotiating to convince the Americans to lend us a hand again. And I do not regret that, even if they betrayed our trust by dropping onto our troops those bombs. Japan would be no more if not for them.

However…

And if it weren't for those useless fools in the Parlianent, we would have the Second already in production. A mere comment of concern about the Yukon Incident is enlarged, enhanced to such lenghts that it caused almost lethal harm to our relations with the US. I can only hope little Yui is able to complete the railgun safely.

After all, I did call for her squad to be sent the frontlines when we were all retreating. Kyoko almost fainted when I told her that, and she had to yet again ask me for a favor to be allowed to deploy to save Yui. That little skirmish turned the little one into quite a fine Royal Guard, even after we lost Kyoko. Shame we have to lend her to the UN, indeed.

"Well, enough repining. Let us see if fate has arranged matters as I wish," I grab the folders Makabe left on my desk, scanning them well.

So they wish to send one Company to survey Yokohama Base, and will leave two Squads to surround the castle. I doubt they would open fire, so a small… incentive shall be arranged. Yet, Makabe reports that they're insisting on the capture.
